And uninhumed, lest vengeance, for my sake,
Attend thee from the gods; but burn my corse
With whatsoever arms I left, and raise

A kind memorial of me on the shore,
Heap'd high with earth; that an unhappy man
May yet enjoy an unforgotten name.
Thus do at my request, and on my hill
Funereal fix erect the polish'd oar,
With which among my friends I lately row'd.'
Cowper's Odyssey, b. xi., line 64.

["This belief is also graphically described by the Sybil of Virgil:—

["'Hæc omnis, quam cernis, inops inhumataque turba est:
Centum errant annos, volitantque hæc litora circum:
Tum demum admissi stagna exoptata revisunt.'
Virgil. Æn., vi., 325, 329, 330.

["'The ghosts rejected are the' unhappy crew
Deprived of sepulchres and funeral due:
A hundred years they wander on the shore;
At length, their penance done, are wafted o'er.'
Dryden, Æn., vi., 445.

["To be delivered from this dire calamity, Palinurus mploringly addresses Æneas:—

["'Quod te, per cœli jucundum lumen, et auras,
Per genitorem oro, per spem surgentis Iüli;
Eripe me his, invicte, malis;
Sedibus ut saltem placidis in morte quiescam.'
Virgil. Æn., vi., 363—365, 371.

["'Which, O! avert, by yon æthereal light,
Which I have lost for this eternal night:
Or, if by dearer ties you may be won,
By your dead sire, and by your living son,
Redeem from this reproach my wandering ghost.'
Dryden, Æn., vi., 494.

["The similarity between the ceremonies employed by pagan and Papal Rome, to obtain the liberation of souls who were enduring infernal torments, appears in the following:—

["'Ergo exercentur pœnis, veterumque malorum
Supplicia expendunt. Aliæ panduntur inanes
Suspensæ ad ventos: aliis sub gurgite vasto
Infectum eluitur scelus, aut exuritur igni.
Quisque suos patimur manes. Exinde per amplum
Mittimur Elysium, et pauci læta arva tenemus.
Donec longa dies, perfecto temporis orbe,
Concretam exemit labem, purumque reliquit
Æthereum sensum, atque aurai simplicis ignem.'
Virgil. Æn., vi., 739. See also Homer. Odyss., xi., 25—50.

["'For this are various penances enjoin'd;
And some are hung to bleach upon the wind,
Some plunged in waters, others purged in fires,
Till all the dregs are drain'd, and all the rust expires.
All have their manes, and those manes bear:
The few, so cleansed, to these abodes repair,
And breathe, in ample fields, the soft Elysian air.
Then are they happy, when by length of time
The scurf is worn away of each committed crime;
No speck is left of their habitual stains;
But the pure ether of the soul remains.'
Dryden, Æn., vi., 1002."*]

Our opponents, on this point, have at least four hundred years' antiquity against Christianity itself. In the first ages of its existence the doctrine of purgatory was not received. But when the religion of Christ became popular, Heathens, professing to be converted, brought into the Church many pagan opinions, among others the doctrine of purgatory. But from the beginning it was not so. It might be of some avail to the defenders of purgatory, could they bring any support for their system from the Holy Scriptures; but it answers no purpose, to adduce the sentiments of Heathenism, unsupported by sacred truth, to prove its existence.

[* Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 7, 8, 25, 26.]

IV. The Scripture declarations respecting the future state of man decide against the doctrine of purgatory.

[Mr. Hall justly observes, that "it is a leading doctrine of the Gospel, that 'the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin;' that 'God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.' (1 John i. 7, 9.) But what says the Romish Church? Not from all sin; not from all unrighteousness; but, in plain contradiction to these declarations of Scripture, she asserts that there are some venial faults, some small transgressions, for which man himself must make satisfaction either in this world or in purgatory. Thus, although 'there is now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus;' (Rom. viii. 1;) though their guilt is forgiven, and the ransom paid, they must still endure some temporal punishment, to make it more complete. 'No condemnation' must be interpreted, 'some condemnation.'

["Again: 'Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth.' (Rom. viii. 33.) He 'blotteth out as a thick cloud their transgressions, and as a cloud their sins.' (Isai. xliv. 22.) He 'casteth all their sins into the depths of the sea.' (Micah vii. 19.) 'If the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him.' (Ezek. xviii. 22.) 'The iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none; and the sins of Judah, and they shall not be found: for I will pardon them whom I reserve.' (Jer. l. 20.) Now, if no charge lies against God's faithful people; if their transgressions are 'blotted out;' if they are 'never to be mentioned;' and, even if sought for, 'never to be found;' what possible effect can these Papal flames, be they never so fierce, produce upon a nonentity?

["'Christ loved the Church, and gave himself for it, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish.' (Eph. v. 25, 27.) 'Though your sins be as scarlet,' says the evangelical Prophet, 'they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.' (Isai. i. 18.) Since all is holy and without blemish, sanctification must be complete, and Papal cleansing nugatory. Since there is no spot, no stain, where is the need of purification? If the guilt is washed out, the punishment surely is cancelled: if it is not, where is the blessedness of that man 'whose transgression is forgiven, and whose sin is covered?' (Psalm xxxii. 1.) God the Father has remitted, and God the Son has made full and sufficient satisfaction for our sins of deepest dye: is it not, then, absurd to suppose that our less flagrant offences shall be only partially forgiven and imperfectly obliterated?

["'By one offering Christ hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.' (Heb. x. 14.) 'With his stripes we are healed.' 'He beareth our iniquities.' (Isai. liii. 5, 11.) 'We have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins.' (Col. i. 14.) It appears, therefore, that man can neither do, nor suffer, any thing by way of merit, in working out his salvation. He can add nothing to that satisfaction which is already perfect, and has been so accepted. Are we then yet to be told that, after this perfect efficacy of Christ's oblation, by which our spiritual diseases are healed, and our redemption completed, we are still subject to punishment for venial sins, and unrequited transgressions?

["It is further remarkable, that it is for his own sake that God pardons his offending creatures. 'I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins.' (Isai. xliii. 25.) Not only are our sins blotted out and forgotten, but the pardon is for the sake of God. And surely they would not only be remembered, but the necessary cleansing would be for our sakes, if, without it, the satisfaction were not complete. God shows mercy for his own sake, and inflicts chastisement for the good of the sinner. In fact, the very name of purgatory is anti-scriptural. If the Son of God 'by himself purged our sins,' (Heb. i. 3,) who is it that shall set up another purgatorial medium as a substitute for that purifying stream which flowed on Calvary? 'If we be dead with Christ,' we believe that 'we shall also live with him:' (2 Tim. ii. 11:) for 'he that is dead is freed from sin,' (Rom. vi. 7,) and redeemed from all its effects by the meritorious sacrifice of Christ upon the cross. True it is that the handwriting of ordinances was against us; but Christ hath 'taken it out of the way, nailing it to his cross.' (Col. ii. 14.) It is not, therefore, upon the Scripture that purgatory is grounded, but upon 'philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ.' (Col. ii. 8.)

["It reflects indeed upon the truth of God, if, after an assurance that Christ should bear our iniquities, we are to undergo tortures after death, for those which he has not borne. The justice of the Almighty is impugned by the supposition that, after he has accepted an all-perfect sacrifice, he will make further demands upon those who have earnestly endeavoured, by the assistance of his grace, to keep his holy will and commandments. There is a failure in the fulness of divine mercy, if, the ransom being accepted, a penal condition is still attached to the prisoner's release.

["'To him that worketh, the reward is not reckoned of grace, but of debt.' (Rom. iv. 4.) If, however, salvation is 'by grace, then it is no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace.' (Rom. xi. 6.) Now, 'by grace are we saved through faith; and that not of ourselves: it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast.' (Eph. ii. 8.) 'Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost.' (Titus iii. 5.) Being thus 'saved by grace,' the Scriptures hold out the further assurance that those who depart this life in the faith and fear of God, 'enter into peace,' (Isai. lvii. 2,) and are 'at rest.' (Job iii. 17.) And a voice from heaven has declared, that 'blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours.' (Rev. xiv. 13.) Now, what kind of peace, what amount of blessedness, what degree of rest, can be experienced by the souls of God's people, in the endurance, for a period more or less protracted, of pains which Romanists describe as 'most horrible,' and as surpassing the most agonizing pain of mortal suffering? St. Paul believed that 'to depart and to be with Christ was far better' (Phil. i. 23) for himself, than to linger out a life of sorrow: and 'we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens:' and that 'when we are absent from the body, we are present with the Lord.' (2 Cor. v. 1, 8.)

["How often are Christians exhorted in Scripture to bear their present trials and afflictions with patience, upon the consideration that, when they die, these will all be at an end, and that they shall enter into the joy of the Lord! And how unseasonable, how fallacious are such exhortations, on the supposition that death is to be but the beginning of sorrows! (Rom. viii. 18; 2 Cor. iv. 17.) The soul of Lazarus went immediately to Abraham's bosom; the soul of the penitent thief to paradise.

["The life of man is compared in Scripture to a race, a pilgrimage, a warfare; and the dying Christian is said to have 'fought a good fight,' to have 'finished his course,' to receive a crown, and to enjoy his reward. These surely are expressions directly at variance with the idea of entering upon a state of sufferings, and of completing one stage of trial only to begin another. The metaphors are descriptive of a scene of probation finished, and of reward conferred. Besides, in speaking of the Church, the Apostle mentions it only in its two states, militant and triumphant; dividing the whole family of Christians into those on earth and those in heaven, without one word of the 'friends of God' waiting in purgatory for the rewards of glory."*]

1. The Scriptures present us with only two characters applicable to men in their present state, the righteous and wicked; those who serve God, and those who serve him not; believers and unbelievers. And however varied the shades of distinction discovered among them may be, only two general characters are mentioned. The view given us of men in Scripture, as they will stand in the day of judgment, precisely corresponds with this.

["And the word of God speaks only of two states after death; the one of happiness, the other of misery; both of which are alike interminable. 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned.' (Mark xvi. 16.) 'He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him.' (John iii. 36.)"†]

2. Our Lord promised the thief on the cross, that on that day he should be with him in paradise; and as He went to heaven, that place and paradise are only different names for the same state of happiness. What can more effectually destroy the doctrine of purgatory and human satisfaction than this? For if the latter be necessary, and purgatory is the place where it is made, then the penitent thief, according to this doctrine, must have continued a long time in purgatory; for he made no satisfaction for his sins, as far as temporal punishment is included, since he died after a vicious life, and a short and sudden repentance; yet he did not go to purgatory, but to the place where Christ was, even to paradise.

3. Our Saviour, likewise, in the case of the rich man and Lazarus, (Luke xvi. 22,) truly represents the state of the other world; namely, that the souls of the righteous, on their departure from the body, are in heaven, and those of the wicked in hell. When Lazarus died, he was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom; that is, paradise or heaven; and when the rich man died, he was tormented in the flames of hell; and although this is a parable, we cannot imagine that our Saviour would adopt a mode of instruction, calculated in the least degree to deceive.

4. St. John, in the Apocalypse, declares, that he heard a voice from heaven, which said, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them." (Rev. xiv. 13.) Here those that die in Christ are said to rest from their labours: it is therefore certain that none of them are punished or tormented after death. For how can rest from labour be consistent with dreadful miseries and sufferings, such as the souls in purgatory are said to undergo?

[* Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 84—89.]

[† Idem, p. 90.]

5. There are other portions of the sacred writings which speak a language utterly inconsistent with the doctrine of purgatory: we allude to the following:—"We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord." (2 Cor. v. 8.) "The night cometh, when no man can work." (John ix. 4.) "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." (2 Cor. v. 1.)

6. The doctrine of purgatory is at variance with that of justification. For, "being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." (Rom. v. 1.) Such a state of reconciliation with God cannot exist in union with the dogma of purgatory.

The justified are not condemned. "There is now therefore no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." (Rom. viii. 1.) Again: "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?" (Rom. viii. 33.) If there be no charge or accusation, whence arises condemnation? "I am persuaded, that neither life, nor DEATH, nor angels, nor principalities, shall be able to separate us," &c. (Rom. viii. 38, 39.) The believer in Christ "shall not come into condemnation." (John v. 24.)

7. The tenet of purgatory, from its very principle and declared object, must be opposed to the full and complete redemption procured by the Son of God. Sinners can only be delivered from the guilt and pollution of sin through the blood and sacrifice of Christ. "He, by his own blood, entered once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us." (Heb. ix. 12.) "Nor yet that he should offer himself often; for then must he often have suffered: but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." (Heb. ix. 25, 26.) "We are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all, who, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, for ever sat down on the right hand of God: for by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." (Heb. x. 10, 12, 14.) "When he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high." (Heb. i. 3.) "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin. He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." (1 John i. 7, 9.) "Christ loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood." (Rev. i. 5.) "These are they who have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." (Rev. vii. 14.) If these scriptures be true, where is the necessity or benefit of a purgatorial cleansing in a future state?

8. The doctrine is also dishonourable to God the Holy Ghost, inasmuch as the fire of purgatory is declared to be cleansing, sanctifying, and purifying. If so, then what is recognised in the sacred Scriptures as being the work of the Holy Spirit is useless and unnecessary.

V. The testimony of the Fathers is strongly urged in support of the doctrine of purgatory.

1. Patristic testimony, only so far as it agrees with the word of God, can avail any thing. The earliest Fathers of the Christian church certainly did not teach purgatory, although they had many crude and obscure notions respecting a future state, some of which may be supposed to favour the doctrine in question. The contradictory opinions which they entertained only prove that they held many heretical sentiments respecting another world. We confidently assert, that there is not a solitary Father, nor a single Council of primitive times, that is claimed by the Church of Rome during the first five hundred years after Christ, that taught the doctrine of purgatory, as it is now received; while, on the other hand, we are able to produce several passages from ancient authorities that completely overturn the doctrine.

(1.) Not any, or at least but very few, of the Greek Fathers mention the doctrine at all; the Latins did not believe it; but by degrees the opinion, in various forms, became current, until the Catholic or general Church partially recognised it. The words of Roffensis, (John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, beheaded June 22d. 1535, for denying the supremacy of Henry VIII.,) in his eighteenth article against Martin Luther, are as follow:—"He that pleases, let him read the commentaries of the old Greeks, and, as I suppose, he shall find none or very rare mention of purgatory. But neither did the Latins at one time, but by little and little conceive the truth of this thing."* And again: "For some while it was unknown; it was but lately known to the Catholic Church. Then it was believed by some by little and little; partly from Scripture, partly from revelations."† The following quotation from Polydore Virgil, who quotes Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, will place this subject in a yet clearer light:—"As it regards the origin of this matter, as far as I can ascertain, after inquiry, I do not find it before St. Gregory presented it in reference to his stations. Wherefore, in a subject of so much obscurity, I use the testimony of John, Bishop of Rochester, who, in that work which he lately wrote against Luther, thus declares the matter in the beginning of his concessions on this point:—'Probably he moved many not to trust much to indulgences, because their use appeared more recently in the Church, and was found out very lately among Christians.' To this I answer, that it does not appear certainly from what time they first began to teach indulgences. They were in use among some (as they say) of the ancient Romans, which can be collected from their stations, and follows of course. No orthodox Christian entertains a doubt respecting purgatory: concerning which, nevertheless, there is no mention among the ancients except in very rare instances. But even among the Greeks to this day it is not believed: for so long as there was no care about purgatory, nobody inquired after indulgences; for all the value of indulgences depends on purgatory: if you take away purgatory, what use is there for indulgences? Indulgences therefore began after men had a while trembled at the torments of purgatory."‡ To the foregoing we add the testimony of Alphonsus a Castro, which is as follows:—"Concerning purgatory, there is almost no mention, especially among the Greek writers. In consequence of which, even to this day, purgatory is not believed by the Greeks."* The consequences to be drawn from these quotations are: that if purgatory were unknown in the primitive days, and but lately to that portion of the Catholic Church which embraced it; if the Fathers have seldom, if ever, mentioned it; and if in the Greek hierarchy so great a silence was maintained respecting it, that to this day it is not cordially believed among them; then this doctrine is neither apostolic, nor primitive, nor catholic, but an innovation, and that of yesterday.

* "Legat qui velit Græcorum veterum commentarios, et nullum, quantum opinor, aut quam rarissimum, de purgatorio sermonem inveniet. Sed neque Latini simul omnes, at sensim hujus rei veritatem conceperunt."—Art. 18, cont. Luth., as quoted by Bishop Taylor, Works, vol. xi., Dissuasive from Popery, part ii., book ii., sect. 2, Of Purgatory, p. 58. 8vo. edit.

† "Aliquandiu incognitum fuit; sero cognitum universæ Ecclesiæ. Deinde quibusdam pedetentim, partim ex Scripturis, partim ex revelationibus creditum fuit."—Idem.

‡ "Ego vero originem quod mei est muneris, quæritans non reperio ante fuisse, quod sciam, quam D. Gregorius ad suas stationes id præmio proposuerit. Quapropter in re parum perspicua, utar testimonio Johannis Roffensis Episcopi, qui in eo opere quod nuper in Lutherum scripsit sic de ejusmodi veniarum initio prodit:—Multos fortasse movit indulgentiis istis non usque adeo fidere, quod earum

(2.) Though the Fathers frequently interceded for the dead, they never prayed for their deliverance out of purgatory, that being an act of worship which they never contemplated; nevertheless the Church of Rome professes to establish her doctrine of purgatory on the ancient usage of the Church in praying for the dead; but this conclusion is vain, because these prayers do not relate to purgatory. We have conclusive evidence, that in the ancient Roman offices, when vigils were kept for the dead, the anthems, versicles which were sung or recited, and responses which were made, recommending the soul to God, the prayer offered was, "that he might be freed from hell and eternal death; and in the day of judgment he might not be judged and condemned according to his sins, but that he might appear among the elect in the glory of the resurrection;" but not one word of purgatory was uttered, nor a single reference to its pains made, though these venerable men prayed for the departed souls of the pious, that God would show them mercy in the day of judgment; even "in that formidable and dreadful day, when," as saith Chrysostom, "there is need of much mercy to us." Indeed, St. Paul thus prayed for Onesiphorus, that "he might find mercy of the Lord in that day;" (2 Tim. i. 18;) that is, in the day of judgment, as Chrysostom understood it. Devils are said to be "reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day;" (Jude 6;) when they, together with the wicked, shall be doomed to eternal fire, which, as yet, is prepared for the devil and his angels. There is a pardon which belongs to this world; and there is one at the day of judgment, which shall confirm and declare the former to the universe: and it is in reference to this last or declarative pardon, that the ancient Fathers speak, and not to purgatory.

Besides, the Fathers offered supplication for those who, by the unanimous consent of all parties, were never in purgatory. They prayed for the Patriarchs, Apostles, the Virgin Mary, &c. This fact furnishes us with a direct and perfect confutation of the doctrine of purgatory. Cyril declares as follows:—"Afterwards, on behalf of the holy Fathers and Bishops who have fallen asleep before us, and, in a word, of all who in past years have fallen asleep among us, (we pray,) believing that it will be of very great advantage to the souls, for whom the supplication is put up, while that holy and most awful sacrifice is presented."* Epiphanius writes as follows:—"We make mention of the just, and of sinners; for sinners, that we may implore the mercy of God for them; for the just, the Fathers, the Patriarchs, the Evangelists, and Martyrs, Confessors, Bishops, and Anchorets, that following the Lord Jesus Christ with a single honour, we separate these from the rank of other men, and give due worship to his divine Majesty."†

(3.) The Fathers often speak of a fire of purgation after the present life; but only at the day of judgment, which destroys the doctrine of an intermediate purgatory. Origen appears to have been the first who mentions this, and Basil, Hilary, Jerome, Lactantius, follow him in the opinion: we use the term "opinion," because it was not an article of faith. According to these Divines, all, with the exception of Christ, not excluding even the Virgin Mary, must pass through this ordeal.

(4.) Another opinion, which is equally fatal to purgatory, obtained among the ancient theologians of the Church; namely, that before the day of judgment the souls of men are kept in secret receptacles, reserved unto the sentence of the great day; before which period, no man fully received his reward. Now, if this opinion be true, the dogma of purgatory must be false; and if it be not true, then that doctrine which is founded upon it must be fallacious. The Romanist authorities have been much perplexed with this opinion of their venerable men.

(5.) The doctrine of purgatory was never recognised by the Fathers as an article of faith, or even of apostolical tradition, as appears from the following:—

First. They received nothing as an article of faith but what was derived from the authority of Scripture. Other topics may be viewed as the private opinions of individuals; but the doctrines of the Church were received as such, because God had revealed them. Therefore, when men speak their own sentiments, independent of sacred truth, those opinions can claim no authority. To prove, therefore, that the Fathers considered the doctrine of purgatory to be an article of faith, it is necessary to show that they spoke of it as a doctrine of the Church which was supported by divine revelation.

Secondly. They did not receive the doctrine as an article of faith, because it was derived from passages of acknowledged obscurity; and since they confess those passages to be of questionable authority, which are alleged in support of the theory of purgatory, they could not recognise the doctrine as being divine. For instance, Augustine in several places asserts,‡ that all things ne-usus in Ecclesia videatur recentior, et admodum sero apud Christianos repertus. Quibus ego respondeo, non certo constare a quo primum tradi cœperunt. Fuit tamen nonnullus earum usus (ut aiunt) apud Romanos vetustissimos, quod ex stationibus intelligi potest et subit. Nemo certe dubitat orthodoxus an purgatorium sit, de quo tamen apud priscos, non ulla, vel quam rarissime, fiebat mentio. Sed et Græcis ad hunc usque diem, non est creditum esse; quamdiu enim nulla fuerat de purgatorio cura, nemo quæsivit indulgentias; nam ex illo pendet omnis indulgentiarum existimatio: si tollas purgatorium, quorsum indulgentiis opus erit? cœperunt igitur indulgentiæ, postquam ad purgatorii cruciatus aliquandiu trepidatum est."—Invent. Rerum., lib. viii., cap. 1.

* "De purgatorio fere nulla mentio, potissimum apud Græcos scriptores. Qua de causa, usque hodiernum diem, purgatorium non est a Græcis creditum."—Lib. iv., verb. Indulg. Vide etiam, lib. xii. Purgatorium. Taylor's Works, vol. xi., Dissuasive from Popery, part. ii., book ii., sect. ii., pp. 59, 60. 8vo edit.

[* "Deinde et pro defunctis sanctis Patribus et Episcopis, et omnibus generatim qui inter nos vita functi sunt (oramus), maximum hoc credentes adjumentum illis animabus ferre, pro quibus oratio defertur dum sancta et perquam tremenda coram jacet victima."—Cyril. Opera, Catech. xxiii., Mystag. v., sect. 9. Fol. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1720.]

[† "Nam et justorum pariter et peccatorum mentionem facimus: peccatorum quidem, ut iis a Domino misericordiam imploremus: justorum autem et Patrum, ac Patriarcharum, Prophetarum, Apostolorum, Evangelistarum, Martyrum, Confessorum, Episcoporum, Anachoretarum, ac cœtus illius universi, ut Dominum Jesum Christum singulari quodam honore prosequentes ab cæterorum hominum ordine segregemus, debitumque cultum illius majestati tribuamus."—Epiphan. Oper., tom. i., Adv. Hær., lib. iii., Hæres lxxv., sect. vii. Fol. Paris, 1622.]

‡ August. Opera., tom. vi., De Fide et Operibus, cap. xv., xvi. Fol. edit. Benedict. Paris, 1685.

cessary to be believed are clearly revealed in Scripture; and yet he says that the place (1 Cor. iii. 15) is very difficult and obscure, and one of those passages in St. Paul's writings which St. Peter pronounces hard to be understood: and therefore hesitated to consider that a matter of faith which is there inculcated. This was the principal text where he and other of the Fathers imagined that the doctrine of purgatory in a future state was to be found.

Thirdly. That cannot be an article of faith to those persons who express doubts concerning its authority and truth. Augustine expressed great hesitation respecting a future purgation;* but this was not the case concerning the Incarnation, Trinity, &c.; which doctrines the Romanists associate with purgatory as fundamental articles of belief.

2. These things being premised, we now proceed to examine the testimony of the Fathers concerning this doctrine. [In reference to which, Mr. Hall observes:

["An appeal to such authority must necessarily be of vast importance. As the stream flows more clear and transparent in the vicinity of its source, so the light of Christianity is more pure and unclouded in the early dawn of 'the day-spring from on high.' The errors were but few and trifling which had crept into the Church previous to the Council of Nice, A. D. 325; and the Fathers, who flourished closely upon the times of the Apostles, were doubtless so well acquainted with the manners and customs to which the Scriptures allude, with the proverbial expressions of the Jewish people, with the structure and phraseology of the oriental dialects, with the forms of Church-government, and with the rites and ceremonies which prevailed in those early days, that their unanimous consent in the statement of any fact may be received as decisive of its authenticity, and their unvarying agreement in the interpretation of any passage of Scripture, as declaring its true sense and import.

["But notwithstanding the just meed of praise which we are ready to award to these primitive Christians, to their piety, their zeal, their purity, their singleness of heart, their constancy even unto death; yet we must not forget that they were men, subject to the same infirmities of mind and judgment with ourselves, who often differed widely from each other in their opinions upon particular subjects, and that not unfrequently upon matters of some importance. But error in opinion ought not to invalidate their testimony as to matters of fact: and, indeed, this occasional difference should rather raise our estimate of the value of their unanimous concurrence upon any point of doctrine or discipline, inasmuch as it proves that they wrote not by design, or in combination, but for the sake of truth.

["Yet, valuable as the Fathers unquestionably are, according to the view now taken of them, and lauded as their writings have been by Romanists, with the most extravagant eulogies,† they were not infallible, they were not inspired. With respect, indeed, to the critical acumen of each individual, who would venture to compare Polycarp with Patrick, Justin with Jackson, Tertullian with Taylor, Hilary with Horsley, Ambrose with Usher, Jerome with Jewell, Augustine with Waterland, Vincentius with Van Mildert? At all events, it is clear, from their own writings, that they regarded Scripture alone as the grand rule for the regulation of life, for the decision of doctrine, for our guidance to heaven."*

["But let us see," continues Mr. Hall, "what the Fathers really have said. Nearly twenty of them are marshalled in formidable array as champions for the introduction of the rites of Elpenor and Palinurus into the Christian church, and are said to 'bear ample testimony to this point of Romish faith.' This 'ample testimony' divides itself into two portions: certain of the witnesses speaking in some sort of a trial by fire, and the rest merely confirming a practice which undoubtedly prevailed, but which will be shown hereafter to have no necessary connexion with purgatory,—the practice, namely, of praying for the dead.

["Previous to the examination of these authorities, it may be proper to advert to an opinion which obtained very generally in the early ages of the Church, and to which nearly all the Christian Fathers allude. It has been already intimated, that whenever a Roman Catholic controversialist meets with the word 'fire,'—whether in the Scriptures or in the Fathers,—his mind reverts at once to the flames of purgatory; and it will be hard if the passage cannot somehow or other be wrested to bear upon the doctrine. The texts, however, which best serve the purpose are those which involve the opinion in question,—that all mankind, at the day of judgment, will pass through a probatory or proving fire, and thereby be purified; suffering, at the same time, a degree of punishment, more or less severe, according as the tenor of their earthly lives has been comparatively evil or good. This opinion seems to have been derived from the expressions employed in certain passages of Scripture, of which the following are the most important:—'The fire shall try every man's work, for the day shall declare it,' namely, the day of judgment. And 'that day shall be revealed by fire.' (1 Cor. iii. 13.) 'The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God,.....when he shall come to be glorified in his saints in that day.' (2 Thess. i. 7, 8, 10.) 'But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heaven shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up.' (2 Peter iii. 10.) Again, the 'ancient of days' is described by Daniel as a Judge sitting upon his tribunal, 'whose throne was like a fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire, and a fiery stream issued and came forth from before him.' (Dan. vii. 9, 10.) And the words 'baptized with fire,' employed by St. Matthew, (iii. 11,) in connexion with those which immediately succeed them, were interpreted by the ancients in accordance with this opinion. Indeed, from all those texts which speak of the revelation of that day by fire, namely, the great and awful day κατ' ἐξοχην,—of the throne of the Judge being as a fiery flame—of the 'lake of fire prepared for those whose names are not written in the book of life,' (Rev. xx. 11—15,) it was concluded that a trial by fire awaited every man, when 'the great and terrible day of the Lord should come.'"†]

Ignatius asserts, that two states only exist in the future world, a state of death and a state of life; so that every one who departs shall go to the one or the other place.‡

* August. Oper., tom. vi., De Fide et Oper., c. xvi. Fol. edit. Benedict. Paris, 1685.

["† See 'The Nullity of the Romish Faith,' by Matthew Poole, pp. 33, 34. Oxford, 1667."]

[* Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 91—93.]

[† Idem, pp. 96—98.]

[‡ "Quia igitur finem res habent, et proponuntur duo simul, mors et vita: et unusquisque in proprium locum iturus est. Quemad-

Though Polycarp discusses the resurrection of the dead, he makes no reference to the doctrine of purgatory.*

Justin Martyr declares, "that immediately after death there is made a separation between good and bad men, and that the good are carried into paradise."†

Athenagoras wrote a treatise on the resurrection of the dead, in which he says not one word concerning purgatory.‡

Irenæus overturns purgatory when he says, "The souls of the dead shall depart into an invisible place prepared of God for them, where they shall abide in constant expectation of the resurrection and re-union of the body." §

[Tertullian, in his work "De Anima," has often been cited as entertaining notions which implied a belief in the existence of purgatory. The following is one of the passages to which reference has been made :—

["Since we understand that prison, which the Gospel indicates, to be the lower regions, and since we interpret the last farthing of every small fault to be there expiated by a delay of the resurrection; no one will doubt that the soul pays something in the lower regions, without a plenitude of the resurrection by the flesh also." ‖

["Hence the Romanists infer Tertullian's belief that departed souls are detained in prison in a state of suffering; of course identifying this prison with purgatory, and regarding the tortures there endured as an expiatory medium for preparing the unfortunate sufferers for heaven. It is, however, obvious to mark, that whatever Tertullian intended by 'expiation,' it was, according to the above version, to be effected by a delay of the resurrection, not by fire, which is generally, if not universally, received to be the agent of torture in the sulphureous region of Papal Rome.

["From a survey of his whole argument, it would appear that Tertullian is combating an opinion of certain heretics in his day, involving the twofold error, that the soul at death went at once into the immediate presence of God, and, consequently, that there was no need of a resurrection of the body, inasmuch as a fulness of bliss was enjoyed without the occurrence of that great event. With respect to these combined errors, Justin Martyr observes that those 'who deny the resurrection of the dead, affirming that, as soon as men die, their souls are taken up into heaven, are not to be received as Christians.'* Irenæus also rejects the opinion as heretical;† and Tertullian contends that not only will there be a resurrection of the body, but that no soul will participate in perfect happiness until the accomplishment of that mighty work of God; that previous to this event the soul will not sleep, but remain in a state of consciousness; and that, as the uttermost farthing will be required of every offender, the soul will be occupied, in this intermediate state, with reflections upon every small fault committed during life, and suffer more or less from the consciousness of deserved punishment, until it shall be re-united with the body at the resurrection.

["It is evident that he is here speaking of no other place than hades, or the common receptacle of good and bad men between death and the resurrection. By the 'prison mentioned in the Gospel,' he observes, 'we understand the lower regions; (inferos;)' and in the beginning of the chapter he had written thus: 'Are all souls, then, you would ask, in the lower regions? (penes inferos?) Whether you assent to it or not, there are there both punishments and refreshments; you have both the poor and the rich man;'‡ in allusion to the parable of Dives and Lazarus.

["The passage is doubtless obscure, though not more so than is generally the case with this difficult writer; but the correct version, as supported by the general tenor of the context, seems to be this: 'Since we understand the prison, indicated in the Gospel, to be the lower regions, and interpret the last farthing to mean every small fault which is to be there expiated in the delay of the resurrection, no man will doubt that the soul is capable of some reflection (animam aliquid pensare, that it can weigh, or meditate upon, past occurrences §) in those lower regions, until the flesh also participate in the fulness of the resurrection.'

["But to set the matter entirely at rest, it will suffice to adduce a few quotations from Tertullian himself, which are altogether subversive of the doctrine of purgatory. According to the Romish creed, martyrs, and certain others, go directly to heaven; but there is a passage in this very tract under consideration, which shows that no soul whatever, not even that of Christ himself, has avoided, or can avoid, the intermediate state, of which he is speaking. 'If Christ,' says he, 'being God, yet bemodum enim sunt numismata duo, hoc quidem Dei, hoc autem mundi; et unumquodque ipsorum proprium characterem superpositum habet; infideles mundi hujus; fideles autem in charitate characterem Dei Patris per Jesum Christum, per quem nisi voluntarie habeamus mori in ipsius passionem vivere ipsius non est in nobis."—Ignat. ad Magnesios Epistola, sect. v. 4to. Oxon., 1709.]

* S. Polycarp. Epist. ad Philip., sec. ii. 4to. Oxon., 1709.

[† "Qu. LXXV. Si ante corporum resurrectionem anima, peractæ vitæ meritorum retributionem non percipit; num illa alicui, postquam a corpore secessit atque divertit, subdita est quæstioni, ad ipsam usque resurrectionem?

["R. Quem in hac vita animæ cum corpore conjunctæ obtinent, eum, postquam e corpore migrarunt, non retinent statum. In hac etenim vita, quæ in unione animæ et corpore obtingunt, communia sunt justorum et injustorum omnia: et nulla eis est, quantum ad hoc pertinet, differentia: sicuti sunt gigni et mori, valere et ægrotare, ditescere et egere, et alia hisce similia. Post exitum vero animarum e corpore, illico justi ab injustis segregantur, abducuntur enim ab angelis, ad condigna sibi loca. Ac justorum quidem animæ in paradisum ubi consuetudine et aspectu fruuntur angelorum et archangelorum; per visionem autem et ipsius Servatoris Christi, pro eo atque dictum est; Peregre absumus a corpore, et præsentes adsumus apud Dominum. Injustorum autem animæ in ipsius orci loca; pro eo atque dictum est de Nabuchodonosore rege Babylonis: Infernus subter exacerbatus est in occursum adventus tui: et cætera. Et asservantur quæque in locis se dignis, usque ad resurrectionis et compensationis diem."—Justin. Mart. Opera, Quæst. et Respons. ad Orthodox., quæst. lxxv. Fol. Paris, 1636.]

‡ De Resur. Mort. in Oper.

[§ "Animæ (mortuorum) abibunt in invisibilem locum, definitum eis a Deo, et ibi usque ad resurrectionem, commorabuntur, sustinentes resurrectionem: post recipientes corpora et perfecte resurgentes, hoc est corporaliter, quemadmodum et Dominus resurrexit, sic venient ad conspectum Dei."—Irenæi Opera, Adv. Hæres., lib. v., cap. xxvi. Fol. Genev., 1570.]

[‖ "Cum carcerem illum, quem evangelium demonstrat, inferos intelligamus, et novissimum quadrantem modicum quodque delictum, mora resurrectionis illic luendum, interpretemur; nemo dubitabit animam aliquid pensare penes inferos, salva resurrectionis plenitudine per carnem quoque."—Tertull. de Anima, sec. lviii., p. 307, B. Paris, 1664.

[" * 'Οἱ και λεγουσι μη ειναι νεκρων αναστασιν, αλλα ἁμα τῳ αποθνησκειν τας ψυχας αυτων αναλαμβανεσθαι εις τον ουρανον, μη ὑπολαβητε αυτους Χριστιανους.'—Just. Dial. cum Tryphon., p. 306, E. Coloniæ, 1686.

[" † Irenæus, Oper. adv. Hæres., lib. v., c. 31.

[" ‡ 'Omnes ergo animæ penes inferos? inquis. Velis ac nolis et supplicia jam illic et refrigeria: habes pauperem et divitem.'—Tertull. de Anima, c. lviii., p. 306, D. Paris, 1664.

[" § For attributing to pensare its more usual sense, if any authority is necessary, the following examples may suffice:—Q. Curt. vii. 8, 2: 'Ibi sine arbitris singula animi consulta pensando, noctem vigiliis extraxit.' iii. 6, 5: 'Quicquid aut metus aut spes subjecerat, secreta estimatione pensabat.' viii. 2, 29: 'Cum hostis vires suasque pensaret.'

cause he was man likewise, died, and was buried according to the Scriptures, and satisfied this law also, by submitting to this condition of human death in the lower regions : (apud inferos :) and if he did not ascend into the heaven above, before he descended into the earth beneatn, that he might there consort with the Patriarchs and Prophets : you are required to believe in a subterranean region of hades, (inferorum,) and to repel those with contempt, who proudly imagine that the souls of the faithful are too good for the lower regions ; those servants above their Lord, and disciples above their Master, who disdain, it may be, to receive in Abraham's bosom the consolation afforded by expecting the resurrection.'* "] †

[Alluding to certain heresies which had been propagated even at that early period, he says : "This their doctrine, when compared with that of the Apostles, will of itself declare, by the difference and contrariety between them, that it had neither any Apostle for its author, nor any apostolic man ; because as the Apostles would not have taught things differing from each other, so neither would apostolic men have set forth things contrary to the Apostles, unless those who learned from Apostles preached a different doctrine." ‡

[With Mr. Hall, we do not hesitate to assert, that "although it will not be affirmed that Tertullian is always uniform and consistent in his opinions and views respecting the state of the soul after death, it is very clear from these passages that his idea of an intermediate state was perfectly distinct from that of the Romish Church. We observe, he affirms, that all souls remain in the intermediate state until 'the day of the Lord,'—the general resurrection of the dead : that the only suffering to which the soul is subject in its separate state, arises from the awful forebodings of its future destiny ; and that the torment or refreshment experienced by each soul is everlasting : all which is directly at variance with the opinions of Papists respecting purgatory, according to the analysis already given.§ The testimony of Tertullian, therefore, is vainly alleged in favour of the ideal fire of the Romish creed." ‖

[Origen in his commentary on Jer. xvi. 18, thus observes :—

["If we depart this life having sins, and having also virtues, shall we be saved on account of our good deeds, and absolved from transgressions knowingly committed? or shall we be punished on account of our sins, and receive no reward whatever for our virtues? Neither of these alternatives is admissible. For I say that to be recompensed for our good actions, and not for our evil ones, suits not with the will of God to purify (us), and to extirpate iniquity. For suppose that you have built upon the foundation, that is, upon Jesus Christ, in whom you have been instructed, not only gold, and silver, and precious stone :—suppose that you have indeed gold, be it much or little, and that you have silver and precious stone :—but suppose, I say, that you have not these alone, and that you have also wood, hay, and stubble ; what do you expect will be your condition after your departure out of this life? Think ye that you will enter into the holy places with your wood, and with your hay and stubble, and so pollute the kingdom of God ; or that on account of your hay, wood, and stubble, you will remain in the fire and receive no recompence for your gold, and silver, and precious stone? Neither is this reasonable.

["What then follows, in the first place, that you will receive on account of your wood? It is manifest that there is a fire which will consume the wood, and hay, and stubble ; for our God is verily (τῃ ουσιᾳ) said, by those who are able to understand, to be a consuming fire. Now the Prophet, when he says that God is a consuming fire, is silent as to what he consumes, and leaves us to infer from the observation, that he is a consuming fire, that there is something to be consumed. What is it then which is to be consumed? Surely he would not destroy that which (is made) after his own image and likeness, but the hay which is built upon it,—(that is, upon the foundation,)—the wood which is built upon it, the stubble which is built upon it. The place was very difficult of interpretation. There were promises, and, after these promises, he says, I will first reward them double for all their sins. Necessarily he adds in the first place ; for he first distributes the wages of iniquity, and then the rewards of righteousness."*]

[Here it will be observed, that although there is constant reference to the day of judgment, nothing is said concerning a purifying ordeal between death and the

['' * ' Quid si Christus Deus, quia et homo, mortuus secundum Scripturas, et sepultus secundum easdem, huic quoque legi satisfecit, forma humanæ mortis apud inferos functus : nec antea ascendit in sublimiora cœlorum, quam descendit in inferiora terrarum, ut illic Patriarchas et Prophetas compotes sui faceret : habes et regionem inferum subterraneam credere, et illos cubito pellere, qui satis superbe non putant animas fidelium inferis dignas ; servi super Dominum, et discipuli super Magistrum, adspernati si forte in Abrahæ sinu expectandæ resurrectionis solatium capere.'—Tertull. de Anima, c. lv., p. 304, A. Paris, 1664."

[† Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 104—107.

[‡ "Ipsa enim doctrina eorum, cum apostolica comparata, ex diversitate et contrarietate sua pronunciabit, neque Apostoli alicujus auctoris esse neque apostolici : quia sicut Apostoli non diversa inter se docuissent, ita et apostolici non contraria Apostolis edidissent : nisi illi qui ab Apostolis desciverunt et aliter prædicaverunt."—Tertull. Opera, de Præscript. Hæret., cap. xxxii.

[" § Vide supra, pp. 242—246."

[‖ Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 108, 109.

[* "Αρα εαν εξελθωμεν τον βιον εχοντες ἁμαρτηματα, εχοντες δε και ανδραγαθηματα, σωθησομεθα μεν δια τα ανδραγαθηματα, απολυθησομεθα δε περι των εν γνωσει ἡμαρτημενων ; η κολασθησομεθα μεν δια τα ἁμαρτηματα, ουδαμου δε μισθον ληψομεθα των ανδραγαθηματων ; Αλλ' ουδε το ἑτερον. Λεγω δε το απολαβειν τα κρειττονα, μη απολαβειν δε τα χειρονα, καθα δικαιον εστι τον Θεον καθαιρειν βουλομενον, και εκκοπτειν την κακιαν. Εστω γαρ σε φκοδομηκεναι μετα το Θεμελιον Χριστον Ιησουν, ὁν δεδιδαξαι, ου μονον (The vulgar reading is μενον, which is manifestly incorrect.) χρυσον και αργυρον, και λιθον τιμιον· Εστω σε εχειν χρυσον, η πολυν χρυσον, η ολιγον· εστω σε εχειν αργυρον, λιθον τιμιον. Ου μονα δε φημι ταυτα. Αλλ' εστω σε εχειν και ξυλα, και χορτον, και καλαμην· τι βουλει σοι γενεσθαι μετα την εξοδον ; Ποτερον ποτε εισελθειν εις τα ἁγια μετα του ξυλου σου, και μετα του χορτου σου, και της καλαμης, ἱνα μιανῃς την βασιλειαν του Θεου ; Αλλα παλιν απομειναι θελεις δια τον χορτον, δια τα ξυλα, δια την καλαμην εν τῳ πυρι, και μηδεν απολαβειν περι του χρυσου και αργυρου και λιθου τιμιου ; Ουδε τουτο ευλογον.

["Τι ουν πρωτον ακολουθει απολαβειν δια τα ξυλα ; Δηλον ὁτι το πυρ το αναλισκον τα ξυλα, και τον χορτον, και την καλαμην. Ὁ Θεος γαρ ἡμων τῃ ουσιᾳ λεγεται τοις συνιεναι δυναμενοις πυρ ειναι καταναλισκον· και εσιωπησε μεν το τι καταναλισκον ὁ προφητης λεγων, Ὁ Θεος ἡμων πυρ καταναλισκον. Ἡμιν δε καταλελοιπε νοειν, (ὁτε ειπεν, Ὁ Θεος πυρ εστι καταναλισκον,) εστι τι το καταναλισκομενον· τι ουν εστι το καταναλισκομενον ; Ου γαρ το κατ' εικονα και ὁμοιωσιν αναλισκει, αλλα τον εποικοδομηθεντα χορτον, τα εποικοδομηθεντα ξυλα, την εποικοδομηθεισαν καλαμην. Ὁ τοπος ην δυσδιηγητος σφοδρα. Επαγγελιαι ησαν, και μετα τας επαγγελιας λεγει, και ανταποδωσω πρωτον διπλας τας αδικιας αυτων· αναγκαιως προσκειται το πρωτον· πρωτον γαρ τα της αδικιας, ειτα τα της δικαιοσυνης αποδιδοται."—Origen. in Jer. xvi. 18, &c. Hom. xvi., tom. iii., pp. 231, 232. Paris, 1740.

resurrection, to which the souls of the righteous will be subjected. He believed "that wicked men and devils, after having been purged by fire, according to their demerits, would ultimately be saved, and that all should pass through the fire at the last day."] He plainly denied the eternity of punishment, which opinion the fifth General Council condemned. Of such a purgatory, Bellarmine* confesses Origen speaks, and places after the resurrection, asserting that Peter and Paul must pass through it. Many places are produced out of Origen, by Sixtus Senensis and others, for such a purgatory as this.† But this is a universal purgatory for good and bad, subsequent to the resurrection, and for the body as well as the soul; which is certainly very different from the Popish purgatory. Few, indeed, followed the opinion of Origen. St. Ambrose, Hilary, Jerome, and others, maintained the doctrine of a universal purgatory, through which all the pious must pass, the Virgin Mary herself not excepted. Jerome and Augustine speak of it, however, as a conjecture, not altogether improbable, but very uncertain. Jerome supposed that wicked men, dying in the communion of the Church, would finally be saved; but that devils, atheists, and wicked men not in the Church, would perish. His words are, "And as the torments of devils, and all deniers and wicked men who say in their hearts, 'There is no God,' will be eternal; so we think that the sentence of the Judge, against the sinners who are impious, and yet Christians, and whose works must be proved and purged in fire, will be a moderate one, mixed with clemency."‡ Augustine says, "If betwixt death and judgment the souls of the departed be said to suffer a fire of transitory tribulation, burning up worldly smaller faults, I reprove it not, because perhaps it is true."§ So feeble was the belief of a purgatory in the primitive Church. It was only a probable opinion at best, and was never viewed as a separate state, but only as a kind of purgation in their passage to glory: for it was a settled doctrine in the ancient Church, that there is no middle place; and that every man after death was either with the devil or with Christ, in hell or in heaven; that there are but two places after this life, one for the elect, another for the reprobate. So that the Popish purgatory, which is a place of torment, in which those who have not perfected their obedience here, stay to make satisfaction for their sins, and then enter into heaven, was altogether unknown. And, indeed, Polydore Virgil and Roffensis acknowledge this. "Nobody," says the latter, "who is a true Catholic, but believes there is a purgatory, although there is little or no mention of it in antiquity; and the Greek Church believes it not to this day." In reality, purgatory is a novel invention, as it is now taught, a contrivance for the advantage of the Clergy, and never received as an article of faith till the Council of Florence, in 1448.

Cyprian, who flourished about the middle of the third century, says, "When once we have departed hence, there is no longer any place for repentance, no longer any effectiveness of satisfaction. Here life is either lost or held; here we may provide for our eternal salvation by the worship of God and the fruitfulness of faith. Let not any one, then, be retarded, either by sins or by length of years, from attaining to salvation. To a person, while he remains in this world, repentance is never too late. Those who seek after, and understand the truth, may always have an easy access to the indulgence of God. Even to the very end of your life pray for your sins, and by confession and faith implore the one only true Deity. To him who confesses, pardon is freely granted: to him who believes, a salutary indulgence is granted from the divine pity: and immediately after death he passes to a blessed immortality."*

[Notwithstanding his works have been supposed to contain much that is confirmatory of the dogma of purgatory, one passage only has been quoted: "It is one thing to be waiting for pardon; another to attain to glory: it is one thing to be sent to prison, not to depart thence till the payment of the uttermost farthing; another to receive at once the reward of faith and constancy: it is one thing to be cleansed by protracted torments for sin, and to be purified for a long time in the fire; another to have wiped away all sins by suffering. Lastly, it is one thing to be in suspense as to the sentence of the Lord in the day of judgment; another to be immediately crowned by him."†

[It was to combat an error of Novatus, says Mr. Hall, "that St. Cyprian wrote his Epistle to Antonian. He contrasts the penitent with the martyr; and, comparing the severity of the penance which the Church requires, with the short suffering and the sudden glory of martyrdom, he considers the condition of the latter far more blessed than the former. 'The martyr,' says he, 'is immediately received into paradise;' his glory, his reward, and his crown are secure: while the penitent, who has been guilty of renouncing or of compromising his faith, must wait in anxious suspense, as to the extent and issue of his penance. 'It is one thing,' he remarks, 'to be shut out of the Church, to be thereby prohibited from holding communion with the faithful, and to be deprived of every spiritual consolation which religion affords, until the utmost farthing is paid,—until every iota of the penance awarded be endured,—and another thing to enter instantly, as do the martyrs, into heaven. It is one thing to suffer this fiery trial in the flesh for ten, twenty, or thirty years; and another to wash away all sins at once by the baptism of martyrdom.'

["Such is the meaning of St. Cyprian; and, indeed,

* De Purg., lib. ii., cap. i.

† Bibliotheca, lib. v., Annat. 170, 171.

‡ "Et sicut diaboli et omnium negatorum, atque impiorum qui dixerunt in corde suo, Non est Deus, credimus æterna tormenta; sic peccatorum atque impiorum, et tamen Christianorum, quorum opera in igne probanda sunt atque purganda, moderatam arbitramur, et mixtam clementiæ sententiam judicis."—Comment. in Isai. lxvi., ad finem.

§ See Jerom. in Isai. lxvi. 18, cap. ult., August. Enchirid., cap. lxvii.—lxix. De Civit. Dei, lib. ii., cap. xxvi. De Pec. Mer. et Rem., cap. xxviii. Cypr. ad Dem. Tert. de Bapt.; and also Origen., Hom. xiv., 1 Luc. Tert. de Anima, cap. lv. 1 Cor. iii. 15.

* "Quando istinc excessum fuerit, nullus jam locus pœnitentiæ est, nullus satisfactionis effectus. Hic vita aut amittitur, aut tenetur. Hic saluti æternæ cultu Dei et fructu fidei providetur. Nec quisquam aut peccatis retardetur, aut annis, quominus veniat, ad consequendam salutem. In isto adhuc mundo manenti pœnitentia nulla sera est. Patet ad indulgentiam Dei aditus, et quærentibus atque intelligentibus veritatem facilis accessus est. Tu sub ipso licet exitu et vitæ temporalis occasu pro delictis roges, et Deum, qui unus et verus est, confessione et fide agnitionis ejus implores. Venia confitenti datur, et credenti indulgentia salutaris de divina pietate conceditur, et ad immortalitatem sub ipsa morte transitur."—Cypriani Opera, Liber de Demetrian, cap. v. Fol. edit. Benedict., Paris, 1726.

[† "Aliud est ad veniam stare: aliud est ad gloriam pervenire. Aliud missum in carcerem non exire inde donec solvat novissimum quadrantem: aliud statim fidei et virtutis accipere mercedem. Aliud pro peccatis longo dolore cruciatum emundari, et purgari diu igne: aliud peccata omnia passione purgasse. Aliud denique pendere in die judicii ad sententiam Domini: aliud statim a Domino coronari."—Cyprian. Epist. lv., ad Antonian., part ii., p. 109. Oxon., 1682.

it is the interpretation freely admitted by one member of the Romish Church,* with the somewhat reluctant acquiescence of others; † so that the fire, of which he here speaks, is the affliction, the punishment, which the lapsed were to suffer, ere they were sufficiently purified for readmission into the bosom of the Church. Had there been any real difficulty in the matter, the words subjoined to the passage under consideration, which Romish controversialists find it sometimes prudent to omit, would at least remove it, so far as it bears upon the present inquiry. Cyprian adds, 'It is one thing in the day of judgment to be doubtful as to the sentence of the Lord,' as would be these penitents; 'another, to be immediately crowned,' as would be the martyrs. According to the notion of the Popish creed, these words cannot possibly apply to souls in purgatory, which, in the day of judgment, will have been abolished. Besides, the souls in that dungeon are not in a doubtful state; they have no anxiety about their future sentence; but are as certain of final salvation, after they have satisfied God's justice by the sufferings there endured, as if they were already in glory." ‡]§

Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, who was born in 310, was made Bishop about 367, and died about 402 or 403, before the doctrine of purgatory was admitted into the Church, wrote thus: "In the other world, after men's death, there is no fasting, repentance, alms, nor piety. There Lazarus comes not to Dives, nor Dives to Lazarus. The store-houses are sealed; there is no egress; the time is accomplished; the combat ended; the race run, and the crowns given; and they who have striven are quiet. After death all things are plainly terminated. While all are in combat, after falling there may be rising again; there is yet hope, there is yet help.....salvation is not desperate. After death the King shuts the doors, and admits none. After our departure we may not correct what was formerly amiss in us."

Gregory Nazianzen expressly affirms, "After this life there is no purgation." ‖

[Basil on Isaiah ix. 19, "Through the wrath of the Lord of hosts is the land burned," says: "The things which are earthly are given up to a punishing fire, for the benefit of the soul, according to the saying of the Lord, 'I am come to send fire on the earth; and what will I, if it be already kindled?'" On the next clause, "The people shall be as the fuel of the fire," he adds, "This is not a threat of extermination, but it denotes purification; and thus the Apostle declares: 'If any man's work burn, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire.'" ¶

[Allowing other passages from the writings of this Father to be exegetical of the one before us, he entertained no notion of a Romish purgatory.

["In his comment upon Psalm xv. 1, he says, 'It is fitting that he who liveth in the flesh, should be as a sojourner; but that, departing out of this life, he should be at rest in his own abode.'*

["In another place he observes, that 'this present life is a state of penitence, the next of retribution; here we must labour, there we receive our wages; this is a life of patience, that of consolation.' †

["Again: upon Psalm cxiv. 7, he observes, that 'everlasting rest is apportioned to those who strive lawfully in this life: not given in payment as for a debt of works, but awarded by the grace of a bountiful God to them that trust in him.' ‡]§

Ephrem, the Syrian, Deacon of Edessa, in the fourth century, in his twelfth discourse, says, that "there is no middle between hell and the kingdom of heaven." ‖

St. Ambrose saith, "Death is a haven of rest, and makes not our condition worse; but according as it finds every man, so it reserves him to the judgment to come." ¶

["In his treatise on the advantage of death, where he is speaking of all the faithful, and not of the special privilege of saints and martyrs, he says, 'Death is the dissolution of soul and body;' and then asks, 'What is the effect of this dissolution, except that the body is dissolved and at rest, and that the soul is set free, and translated to its repose, which, if she be pious, will be with Christ?'

["In the fourth chapter, he observes, that 'in every way death is a blessing, and, as it were, a port after a storm. As it finds us, so are we reserved for judgment.' He then adds, that by means of death, 'we pass from corruption to incorruption; from mortality to immortality; from trouble to repose.' ††

["Again, in the eighth chapter, he remarks, 'that whereas fools fear death as the greatest of evils: wise

["* Rigaltius. It may be remarked that instead of diu igne many manuscripts read divine; whence Bishop Pearson, the learned editor of the Oxford edition of Cyprian, 1682, has a very probable conjecture, that the true reading is, with the insertion of a single letter, diutine. If this be correct, we not only get rid of the notion of fire altogether, but keep up a unity in St. Cyprian's discourse, which is otherwise unnecessarily and abruptly broken by speaking of the dead.

["† Dr. T. Butler on 'The Truths of the Catholic Religion,' vol. ii., p. 262. London, 1838. Husenbeth's 'Faberism Exposed,' p. 562. Norwich, 1836.

["‡ Vide supra, p. 245, sect. xii.

[§ Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 119—121.]

‖ "Μηδε ὑπερ την νυκτα ταυτην εστι τις καθαρσις."—Oratio v. in Plagam Grandinis, et Orat. xlii. in Pascha. de Eccl. Dogm., cap. 79.

[¶ "Δια δυμον οργης Κυριου συγκεκαυται ἡ γη ὁλη.—Δεικνυσιν ὁτι τα γηϊνα τῳ πυρι τῳ κολαστικῳ παραδιδοται, επι ενεργεσιᾳ της ψυχης, καθα και ὁ Κυριος ὑποφαινει λεγων, Πυρ ηλθον βαλειν επι την γην, και τι ηθελον ει ηδη εκαη; Και εσται ὁ λαος ὡς ὑπο πυρος κατακεκαυμενος ανθρωπος.—Ουκ αφανισμον απειλει, αλλα την καθαρσιν ὑποφαινει, κατα το παρα τῳ αποστολῳ ειρημενον, ὁτι ει τινος το εργον κατακαησεται, ζημιωθησεται· αυτος δε σωθησεται, ούτως ὡς δια πυρος."—Basil. in Esai. ix. 19, p. 1039, D. Paris, 1718.]

["* 'Ζωντα μεν εν τῃ σαρκι παροικον ειναι προσηκει, μεταβαινοντα δε απο της ζωης ταυτης τοις οικειοις τοποις εναναπανεσθαι.'—Basil. in Psal. xv. 1, tom. i., p. 250, A. Paris, 1718.

["† 'Ούτος ὁ αιων της μετανοιας, εκεινος της ανταποδοσεως· ούτος της εργασιας, εκεινος της μισθαποδοσιας· ούτος της ὑπομονης, εκεινος της παρακλησεως.'—Basil. Proœm. in Regulas fusius disputatas, tom. ii., p. 403, A. Paris, 1718.

["‡ 'Προκειται γαρ αναπαυσις αιωνια τοις νομιμως τον ενταυθα διαθλησασι βιον· ου κατα οφειλημα των εργων αποδεδομενη, αλλα κατα χαριν του μεγαλοδωρου Θεου τοις εις αυτον ηλπικοσι παρεχομενη.'—Basil. in Psal. cxiv., tom. i., p. 310, D. See also Epist. ci., tom. iii., p. 197."]

[§ Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 125, 126.]

‖ Du Pin, Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 225. Dublin edit., 1723.

¶ De Bono Mortis, tom. i., lib. i., cap. iv., et cap. ii. Paris, 1686.

[" 'Mors igitur solutio est animæ et corporis. Denique et in Apostolo docuimus lectum, 'Dissolvi, et cum Christo esse, multo melius.' Solutio autem ista quid aliud agit, nisi ut corpus resolvatur et quiescat: anima autem convertatur in requiem suam, et sit libera, quæ, si pia est, cum Christo futura sit?'—Ambros. de Bono Mortis, tom. i., lib. i., cap. iii., col. 392, F. Paris, 1686.

["†† 'Omnifariam igitur mors est bonum; et quia compugnantia dividit, ne se invicem impugnent; et quia portus quidam est eorum, qui, magno vitæ istius jactati salo, fidæ quietatis stationem requirunt; et quia deteriorem statum non efficit: sed qualem in singulis invenerit, talem judicio futuro reservat, et quiete ipsa fovet, et præsentium invidiæ subducit, et futurum expectatione componit.

["'Transitus autem a corruptione ad incorruptionem, a mortalitate ad immortalitatem, a perturbatione ad tranquillitatem.'—Idem, tom. i., lib. i., cap. iv., sect. 15. Paris, 1686.

men desire it as a rest after labour and the end of sorrows.'—'Death is the completion of service, the end of our trading, the gift of manumission.'—'Death is not a grievous dissolution, inasmuch as to depart and to be with Christ is far better.'*

["Hence it was, he also observes, that 'the holy David was desirous to depart out of this state of pilgrimage, saying, I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were. Therefore, as a stranger, he hasted to that common country of all saints, seeking that those sins which contaminated him while abiding here, should be remitted before his decease.'†

["Having enumerated the joys of the righteous after death, he assigns the following as some of the reasons of their blessedness:—'They have overcome the flesh, and are not entangled in its snares. They enjoy security, the reward of their diligence and innocence. They are not involved in any terrors and troubles, as the souls of the wicked are, nor tortured with any remembrance of their vices. They begin to be conscious of their repose, to foresee their future glory; and, soothing themselves with that consolation, to rest tranquilly in their mansions, attended by guardian angels.'‡

["In another work, he maintains that 'death is not an evil, inasmuch as it is a refuge from all troubles and sorrows, a sure haven of security, an harbour of rest.'§]‖

[Jerome could not have been a believer in purgatory when the following sentiments fell from his pen:—

["'Whosoever, while he lives in this body, has not obtained pardon for his sins, and in this state departed out of life, perishes and ceases to exist with respect to God; although, as far as regards himself, he may still subsist in punishment.'¶

["He thus writes to Paula: 'Let the dead be lamented; but be it such an one as hell receives, and Tartarus devours, and for whose punishment the everlasting fire is kindled. For us, whose departure is attended by a company of angels, and whom Christ comes forth to meet, let us rather be grieved to dwell longer in this tabernacle of death: inasmuch as while we remain here, we are absent from the Lord.'

["Again, in an epistle to Marcella concerning the death of Lea, he addresses her in these words of consolation: 'Instead of her short trouble, she is already in the enjoyment of eternal blessedness. She is welcomed by companies of angels; she is cherished in Abraham's bosom, and, with Lazarus, who once was poor, she sees the rich man who was clothed in purple, now no longer honoured, but defiled, and asking for a drop of water to be brought to him on the tip of a finger.'*

["In his commentary on Amos, he remarks, that 'when the mind, released from corporeal fetters, has the liberty, by reason of its tenuity of substance, of flying whither it wishes or is compelled to go, it will either be conducted to the infernal, or certainly exalted to the heavenly, regions.'†]‡

St. Augustine had at one time some debates in his mind respecting purgatory, when he wrote his Questions, De Octo Dulcitiis, "Concerning the eight Delights." He then said, that "such a matter as a middle state for purgation might be inquired into."§ But though this crude notion seems to have entered his mind at one time, yet, on maturer examination, he says, "We read of heaven and of hell; but the third place we are utterly ignorant of; yea, we find it is not in Scripture."‖ Again he says, "Nor will any thing help thee but what is done while thou art here. As the last day of man's life finds him, so the last day of the world shall hold him."¶

["The Romanists," says Mr. Hall, "regard this Prelate as their mightiest champion, a very Goliath in defence of purgatory. Augustine, Bishop of Hippo, A.D. 395, is indeed the only Father who makes any thing like a distinct allusion to the doctrine. By the epithets of 'great,' 'glorious,' 'learned,' &c., which are generally applied to him, it is evident that he is thought to possess an impervious shield, an infrangible spear, and an impenetrable helmet; but, perhaps, a few smooth stones from the brook, discharged from the sling of truth, will prevail against these weapons. With whatever perspicuity he may treat of other subjects, he certainly writes on this in a most confused and undecided manner; not as advancing a doctrine of the Church, but merely as stating an opinion respecting which his ideas were very indistinct and unsettled."]

[The industrious author of the work on Purgatory, to which we have already been so much indebted, has,

["* 'Insipientes autem mortem quasi summum malorum reformidant: sapientes quasi requiem post labores, et finem malorum expetunt.'—Idem, cap. viii., col. 403.

["'Mors stipendiorum plenitudo, summa mercedis, gratia missionis.'—Idem, col. 404. 'Mors non est mala solutio; quia dissolvi et esse cum Christo multo melius.'—Idem.

["† 'Denique festinabat etiam sanctus David de hoc loco peregrinationis exire, dicens, Advena ego sum apud te in terra et peregrinus, sicut omnes patres mei. Et ideo tanquam peregrinus ad illam sanctorum communem omnium patriam festinabat, petens pro hujus commorationis inquinamento remitti sibi peccata, priusquam discederet e vita.'—Idem, cap. ii., sect. v., col. 391.

["‡ 'Vicerint carnem, nec illecebris ejus inflexæ sint. Deinde, quod pro pretio sedulitatis et innocentiæ suæ securitate potiantur, nec quibusdam sicut impiorum animæ erroribus et perturbationibus implicentur, atque vitiorum suorum memoria torqueantur. Incipiunt intelligere requiem suam, et futuram sui gloriam prævidere, eaque se consolatione mulcentes, in habitaculis suis cum magna tranquillitate requiescent, stipatæ præsidiis angelorum.'—Idem, lib. i., cap. xi., tom. i., col. 408, 409. Paris, 1686.

["§ 'Hinc igitur nobis adoriendus disputandi locus, mortem malum non esse; quia ærumnarum omnium malorumque perfugium est, et fida statio securitatis, ac portus quietis.'—Ambros. de Fide Resurrectionis, tom. ii., lib. ii., sect. xxii., p. 1140. Paris, 1690."]

[‖ Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 131, 132.]

["¶ 'Qui, dum in hoc vivit corpore, veniam peccatorum non fuerit consecutus, et sic de vita excesserit, Deo perit, et esse desistit; licet sibi subsistat in pœnis.'—Hieron. Comment., lib. xviii. in Isai. lxv., tom. iii., col. 481. Paris, 1704.

[" 'Lugeatur mortuus; sed ille, quem gehenna suscipit, quem Tartarus devorat, in cujus pœnam æternus ignis æstuat. Nos quorum exitum angelorum turba comitatur, quibus obviam Christus occurrit, gravemur magis, si diutius in tabernaculo isto mortis habitemus; quia quamdiu hic moramur, peregrinamur a Domino.'—Hieron. Epist. xxii. ad Paulam, tom. iv., pars 2, col. 56. Paris, 1706.

["* 'Nunc igitur pro brevi labore æterna beatitudine fruitur; excipitur angelorum choris; Abrahæ sinibus confovetur, et cum paupere quondam Lazaro, divitem purpuratum, et non palmatum consulem, sed atratum, stillam digiti minoris cernit inquirere.'—Jerom. Ep. xx. ad Marcellam, de Exitu Leæ, tom. iv., pars 2, col. 52. Paris, 1706. See also Epitaphium Nepotiani, Epist. xxxv. ad Heliodorum., col. 269.

["† 'Quando anima, vinculis relaxata corporeis, volandi quo velit, sive quo ire compellitur, propter tenuitatem substantiæ, habuerit libertatem, aut ad inferna ducetur, aut certe ad cœlestia sublevabitur.'—Hieron. Comment., lib. iii., in Amos viii., tom. iii., col. 1447. Paris, 1704."]

[‡ Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 138, 139.]

§ De Civ. Dei, lib. xxi., cap. 26.

‖ "Tertium penitus ignoramus, imo nec esse in Scripturis sanctis invenimus."—Ser. 14, de Verb. Dom. et Hypog., i. 5, Cont. Pelag.

¶ "In quo enim quemque invenerit suus novissimus dies, in hoc eum comprehendet mundi novissimus dies."—De Pec. et Merit. et Remis., Ep. 86.

[ Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, p. 139.]

with laudable diligence, examined the writings of this Father, which have appeared to sanction the doctrine of purgatory, and has, we think, completely rescued Augustine from the embraces of those Popish writers who would have rejoiced to recognise him as a friend and supporter.

["The passages adduced from his writings are these: 'The prayers either of the Church, or of certain pious persons, are heard in behalf of those departed Christians, whose life was not so bad that they should be judged unworthy of mercy, nor so good that they should be deemed to stand in no need of such mercy. Hence also, after the resurrection of the dead, there will not be wanting those, to whom, after suffering the punishment to which the spirits of the dead are liable, mercy will be imparted; so that they shall not be consigned to everlasting fire. For it could not truly be said of some, that they will not be forgiven, neither in this world nor in the world to come, unless there were others who would be pardoned, if not in this world, at least in the next.'*

["Again: 'If they built gold, and silver, and precious stones, they would be secure from both fires; not only from that which is everlasting, and designed for the eternal punishment of the wicked; but from that also which will purify those who shall be saved by fire. For it is said, he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire; and, therefore, that fire is treated with contempt. Saved, indeed, they will be; but their sufferings will be more grievous than any thing man can undergo in this life.'†

["And further: 'Some undergo temporal punishments in this life, others after death, and others, again, both now and then; but still before that last and most severe judgment. Those, however, who endure temporal punishments after death are not all consigned to those everlasting torments which will take place after that judgment. For we have already intimated that what is not remitted in this world will, to some, be pardoned in the next, so that they will not be doomed to the eternal punishment of the life to come.'‡

["Now, with respect to the first passage, which is cited from the 'City of God,' Ludovicus Vives, a Roman Catholic commentator upon that work, states, that two ancient copies in the libraries at Bruges and Cologne do not contain it; and in some of the printed editions it does not appear.* The commentary of Leonardus Coquæus has no remark upon it; and Dallæus confesses that it is wanting in the Paris manuscript.† If, indeed, it had been in existence and of indisputable authority, it is scarcely possible that Thomas Aquinas would have omitted it in his Catena Aurea upon Matt. xii. 31, 32. He has there quoted largely from St. Augustine, but makes no allusion to this favourite passage, which, in the opinion of Alexander Natalis,‡ who rejects all other texts from the New Testament in proof of a purgatory, amounts to 'demonstration.'§ It is not, therefore, unreasonable to conclude, that an interpolation has been made with a view to the support of a doctrine which St. Augustine himself had not so boldly maintained.

["In order to a right understanding of the second passage, which is part of an exposition of Psalm xxxviii., it may be proper to compare it with his comment on the first verse of Psalm vi., with which it is parallel. Now in that place he expressly connects the trial of which he is speaking, with the probatory fire at the end of the world.‖ 'All,' says he, 'are convicted in the day of judgment, who have not the foundation, which is Christ. But they are amended, that is, purified, who build upon this foundation, wood, hay, and stubble: for they shall suffer loss, but yet they shall be saved, so as by fire.'¶

["In the passage last quoted, St. Augustine refers to some other occasions on which he had spoken of certain cases wherein temporal punishment will be inflicted after death; and it is curious to note the manner in which the opinion is elsewhere broached by him. All is vague and uncertain; nothing is positive and defined. 'It is not incredible,' he says, 'that some such thing may take place after this life; and it may be worth while to inquire whether such be the case. It may be discovered, or it may remain in uncertainty, whether some believers (pass) through a certain purgatorial fire, from which they are saved, sooner or later, according as they have loved more or less the perishable advantages (of the world.)'

["In another place he speaks of this fire of 'transitory

["* 'Nam pro defunctis quibusdam, vel ipsius Ecclesiæ, vel quorundam piorum exauditur oratio: sed pro his, quorum, in Christo regeneratorum, nec usque adeo vita in corpore male gesta est, ut tali misericordia judicentur digni non esse, nec usque adeo bene, ut talem misericordiam reperiantur necessariam non habere. Sicut etiam, facta resurrectione mortuorum, non deerunt quibus post pœnas, quas patiuntur spiritus mortuorum, impertiatur misericordia, ut in ignem non mittantur æternum. Neque enim de quibusdam veraciter diceretur, quod non eis remittatur neque in hoc sæculo neque in futuro, nisi essent quibus, etsi non in isto, tamen remittetur in futuro.'—Aug. de Civit. Dei, lib. xxi., cap. xxiv., sect. ii., tom. vi., col. 1642. Paris, 1685.

["† 'Ædificarent autem aurum, argentum, lapides preciosos, et de utroque igne securi essent: non solum de illo æterno, qui in æternum cruciaturus est impios, sed etiam de illo qui emendabit eos, qui per ignem salvi erunt. Dicitur enim, ipse autem salvus erit, sic tamen quasi per ignem. Et quia dicitur salvus erit, contemnitur ille ignis. Ita plane, quamvis salvi per ignem, gravior tamen erit ille ignis, quam quicquid potest homo pati in hac vita.'—Idem, Enarrat. in Psal. xxxvii. vers. 2, sect. iii., tom. iv., col. 295. Paris, 1691.

["‡ 'Sed temporaneas pœnas alii in hac vita tantum, alii post mortem, alii et nunc et tunc; veruntamen ante judicium illud severissimum novissimumque. Non autem omnes veniunt in sempiternas pœnas, quæ post illud judicium sunt futuræ, qui post mortem sustinent temporales. Nam quibusdam, quod in isto non remittitur, remitti in futuro sæculo, i. e., ne futuri sæculi æterno supplicio puniantur, jam supra diximus.'—Idem, de Civit. Dei, lib. xxi., cap. 13, in fine; tom. vi., col. 634. Paris, 1685.

["* For instance, the editions printed at Fribourg are without it.

["† 'Decem aut duodecim versus, qui capite xxiv. habentur, et in quibus diserte purgatorium docetur, in antiquis libris Brugensi et Coloniensi non legi, ut neque in exemplaribus Friburgi excussis: imo et carere iis exemplar Parisiense, ut testantur qui editioni 1531 præfuerunt.'—Dallæus de Usu Patrum, cap. iv., Rat. 4. Genevæ, 1686.

["‡ Alexand. Nat. Histor., lib. ix., p. 374. Paris, 1683.

["§ It has been seen that in his genuine writings Augustine is silent respecting this interpretation. Vide supra, p. 252.

["‖ 'Purgatorias autem pœnas nullas futuras opinetur, nisi ante illud ultimum tremendumque judicium.'—August. de Civit. Dei, lib. xxi., cap. xvi., tom. vii., col. 636, F. Paris, 1685. 'He supposes that there will be no purgatorial punishments, except before that last and tremendous judgment.'

["Mr. Husenbeth contends that ante supports purgatory, and condemns the probatory fire at the day of judgment. If, however, there were any doubt as to the meaning of St. Augustine, the following note would be sufficient to make it clear.

["¶ 'Arguuntur autem in die judicii omnes qui non habent fundamentum, quod est Christus: emendantur autem, id est, purgantur, qui huic fundamento superædificant lignum, fœnum, stipulam. Detrimentum enim patientur, sed salvi erunt tanquam per ignem.'—Idem, in Psal. vi., cap. iii., tom. iv., col. 24, C. Paris, 1691. See also his Comment on Psalm ciii. Serm. 3, cap. v., tom. iv., col. 1154, B.

[" 'Tale aliquid etiam post hanc vitam fieri incredibile non est, et utrum ita sit quæri potest; et aut inveniri aut latere, nonnullos fideles per ignem quendam purgatorium, quanto magis minusve bona pereuntia dilexerunt, tanto tardius citiusve salvari.'—Idem, in Enchirid. de Fide, Spe, et Caritate, ad Laurentium, cap. lxix., tom vi., col. 222. Paris, 1685.

tribulation' as a matter which he is not disposed to 'dispute, inasmuch as it may perhaps be true.'*

["It is very clear, then, that purgatory was not in his time a doctrine of the Church, which could plead antiquity for its origin, universality for its belief, and general consent for its truth. It was merely an opinion, 'upon which the erudition of himself or others might be exercised, but which was in nowise sanctioned by canonical authority.'† Indeed the sentiments of St. Augustine, in his more thoughtful moments, are directly at variance with this doubtful doctrine; as when he says, 'After this life there remains no compunction or satisfaction.'‡

["'There is no middle place for any; so that he can be nowhere except with the devil, who is not with Christ.'§

["'The Catholic faith, resting on divine authority, believes the first place to be the kingdom of heaven, whence the unbaptized are excluded; and the second hell, where every apostate and alien from the faith of Christ will experience eternal punishments. A third place we are wholly ignorant of: nor shall we find it in the holy Scriptures.'‖

["'Inasmuch as there are two habitations, one in everlasting fire, and the other in the everlasting kingdom, believe thou therefore that in the everlasting fire one will be tortured in one way, and another in another. Nevertheless, there they will be: there all will be tormented; one more and another less.'¶

["'Know ye this, that when the soul is separated from the body, it is either immediately placed in paradise for its good works, or cast headlong into the depths of hell for its sins.'

["'The departing soul, which is not visible to the eyes of flesh, is caught up by the angels, and either, if she be faithful, carried into Abraham's bosom; or, if she be wicked, confined in the infernal prison, until the appointed day arrive, when she will resume her body, and give an account of her works before the judgment-seat of Christ.'††

["'By this grace of God, wherein he displays his great mercy towards us, we are guided by faith in this life; and, after this life, we shall be exalted into the fulness of perfection by the manifest appearance of unchangeable truth.'*

["'The souls of the righteous, being separated from the body, are at rest; and those of the wicked suffer punishment, until the bodies of the former rise to eternal life, and those of the latter to the eternal or second death.'†

["'Besides, there is no other place for the correction of morals except in this life; for, after this life, every one will receive that portion which he has here acquired for himself. Therefore we are compelled, from a feeling of charity towards mankind, to intercede for the guilty, that they may not so finish this life by punishment, that, when it is finished, they may not be able to finish their punishment.'‡

["'He who in this life does not please God, shall indeed have repentance for his sins in the world to come; but pardon in the sight of God he shall not find: because, although there will there be the sting of repentance, there will, however, be no correction of the will.'§

["'As the Lord finds a man when he calls him hence, so he judges him.'‖

["'The last day of the world shall dawn upon every man, in the same state in which the last day of his life shall find him: for as each shall die on the one day, so shall he be judged on the other.'¶

["It seemed advisable to quote more largely from the works of St. Austin, than from those of the other Fathers set up in defence of the doctrine, because it is in his writings, and in his only, that there is any, the slightest indication of an opinion, that departed souls are subject to certain penalties between death and the resurrection, by way of expiation or satisfaction for sins committed in this life."]

Chrysostom, in his second homily on Lazarus, says, "When we shall be departed out of this life, there is ["* 'Sive ibi tantum, sive hic et ibi, sive ideo hic et non ibi secularia (quamvis a damnatione venialia) concremantem ignem transitoriæ tribulationis inveniunt, non redarguo; quia forsitan verum est.'—Idem, de Civitate Dei, lib. xxi., cap. xxvi., sect. iv., tom. vii., col. 649, B. Paris, 1685.

["† 'Cum iis quæ scribimus, ita nostra vel aliorum exerceatur et erudiatur infirmitas, ut tamen in eis nulla velut canonica constituatur auctoritas.'—Idem, de Octo Dulcitiis Quæst. Q. 3, sect. iii., tom. vi., col. 131, E. Paris, 1685.

["‡ 'Postea, cum de hoc sæculo transierimus, nulla compunctio vel satisfactio remanebit.'—Idem, Hom. v. in 1 Tim. iv., col. 420, tom. x., D. Basil, 1569.

["§ 'Non est ullus ulli medius locus, ut possit esse nisi cum diabolo, qui non est cum Christo.'—Idem, de Peccat. Meritis et Remiss., lib. i., cap. xxviii., tom. vii., col. 680. Basil, 1569.

["‖ 'Primum locum fides Catholicorum, divina auctoritate, regnum credidit esse cœlorum, unde non baptizatus excipitur: secundum gehennam, ubi omnis apostata, vel a Christi fide alienus, æterna supplicia experietur: tertium penitus ignoramus, imo nec esse in Scripturis sanctis inveniemus.'—Idem, Hypognost. contra Pelag., lib. v., tom. vii., col. 1405, C. Basil, 1569.

["¶ 'Duæ quippe habitationes sunt; una in igne æterno, alia in regno æterno. Puta quia in igne æterno aliter ille, aliter ille torquebuntur: ibi erunt tamen, ibi omnes cruciabuntur; minus ille, plus ille.'—Idem, Serm. clxi. de Verbis Apostoli, sect. iv., tom. v., col. 776. Paris, 1685; or Serm. 18, tom. x., col. 349, B. Basil, 1569.

[" 'Scitote vero quod, cum anima a corpore evellitur, statim aut in paradiso pro meritis bonis collocatur, aut certe pro peccatis in inferni tartara præcipitatur.'—Idem, de Vanit. Seculi., cap. i., tom. ix., col. 947. Basil, 1569.

["†† 'Sed recedens anima, quæ carnalibus oculis videri non potest, ab angelis suscipitur, et collocatur aut in sinu Abrahæ, si fidelis est, aut in carceris inferni custodia, si peccatrix est: donec veniat statutus dies, quo suum recipiat corpus, et apud tribunal Christi, judicis veri, reddat suorum operum rationem.'—Idem, de Consolatione Mortuorum, Serm. 2, cap. i., tom. ix., col. 974. Basil, 1569.

["* 'Hac Dei gratia, qua in nos ostendit magnam misericordiam suam, et in hac vita per fidem regimur, et post hanc vitam per ipsam speciem incommutabilis veritatis ad perfectionem plenissimam perducemur.'—Idem, de Civitat. Dei, lib. x., cap. xxii., tom. vii., col. 257. Paris, 1685.

["† 'In requie enim sunt animæ piorum a corpore separatæ; impiorum autem pœnas luunt: donec istarum ad æternam vitam, illarum vero ad æternam mortem, quæ secunda dicitur, corpora reviviscant.'—Idem, de Civitat. Dei, lib. xiii., cap. viii., tom. vii., col. 330. Paris, 1685.

["‡ 'Morum porro corrigendorum nullus alius quam in hac vita locus est; nam post hanc quisque id habebit, quod in hac sibimet conquisiverit. Ideo compellimur humani generis caritate intervenire pro reis, ne istam vitam sic finiant per supplicium, ut, ea finita, non possint finire supplicium.'—Idem, Epist. cliii., sect. iii., ad Macedon., tom. ii., col. 525, B. Paris, 1688.

["§ 'Qui in hac vita Deo non placuerit, habebit quidem pœnitentiam in futuro sæculo de malis suis: sed indulgentiam in conspectu Dei non inveniet. Quia etsi erit ibi stimulus pœnitudinis, nulla tamen erit correctio voluntatis.'—Idem, ad Petrum Diacon., cap. iii., tom. iii., col. 209. Basil, 1569.

["‖ 'Qualem invenit Dominus, cum hinc evocat, talem et judicat.'—Idem, in Apocalyp., Hom. xi., tom. ii. in Append., col. 173, B. Paris, 1685.

["¶ 'In quo quemque invenerit suus novissimus dies, in hoc eum comprehendet mundi novissimus dies: quoniam qualis in die isto quisque moritur, talis in die illo judicabitur.'—Idem, Ep. cxcix., ad Hesychium, sect. ii., tom. ii., col. 743, B. Paris, 1685."]

[ Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 140—146.]

then no room for repentance: nor will it be in our power to wash out any spots we have contracted, or to purge away any one of the evils we have committed."

3. It has been observed, that we have the acknowledgment of several Roman Catholics, that the doctrine of purgatory was unknown in the primitive church,—we allude to Alphonsus a Castro, Roffensis, Polydore Virgil, &c.; and the testimony of others, that it cannot be proved from Scripture; namely, Petrus a Soto, Perienius, Bullenger, Petrus Picherellus, Barns, &c.,* who have expressly denied the doctrine, and have confuted the pretended reasons which are brought for its support. We acknowledge, however, that these opinions are not general, and that those who hold them are not even tolerated by their Church, which takes special care that the persons of those who impugn or renounce her sentiments shall be secured, if in no other way silence can be imposed upon them.

4. A few words may be added respecting the opinions of the Greek Church on purgatory. The Romanists affirm that their doctrine is the same with that of the Latins; than which nothing is more incorrect. It must be acknowledged, however, that at the Council of Florence certain opinions respecting purgatory were imposed on the Greeks, as being the doctrine of the Church on that topic. But that the Greek Church do not believe in the existence of a Popish purgatory, is evident from the following:—(1.) The Greek Church always dissented from the Church of Rome on this point, ever since the latter abandoned the doctrine of the ancient Christians, and adopted the novel idea of purgatory. (2.) At the Council of Basil the Greeks made their Apology in opposition to purgatory. (3.) Though at the Council of Florence the doctrine was imposed upon them, those who were present were divided about receiving it; and were compelled to adopt it by necessity, and the influence of Pope Eugenius; they never gave their full consent to the doctrine; they protested against having their half-consent put into the instrument of union; they were constrained even to this by the influence of their chiefs, who were bribed by the Pope; so that when they returned to Greece they were reprimanded for their inconstancy. (4.) The Greek Church never acknowledged this doctrine, and broke up an union, the articles of which recognised purgatory. These things are so well known, that they need no particular discussion.†

It will, however, be proper to give a few extracts from the Apology of the Greeks to the Council of Basil, held from 1431 to 1443. They say: "We own no purgatory fire, nor any temporary punishment by fire, which shall have an end; for we received no such thing by tradition, nor doth the Eastern Church confess it."

Afterward it is said, "We deny that any souls pass through this fire to eternal life; for in saying so we should weaken the consent of the whole Church; and, it is to be feared, if we would assert such a temporary fire, that people would be apt to believe that all the fire in the other life were only temporary, by which means they would fall into such neglect and carelessness, that they would make more fuel for eternal fire."

The Apology terminates as follows: "For these causes the doctrine proposed, of a purgatory fire, is to be cast out of the Church, as that which tends to slacken the endeavours of the diligent, and which hinders them from doing their utmost to purge themselves in this life, since another purgation is expected after it."* The Greeks, indeed, do not believe that any souls enjoy the beatific vision before the day of judgment, and on that account they allow prayers for the dead; not in reference to a deliverance from purgatory, but to a participation of their happiness on that day. But this is altogether distinct from the doctrine of the Church of Rome, which maintains a temporary punishment after the sin has been remitted.

VI. The practice of praying for the dead, in connexion with purgatory, will now be considered.

Offering supplication in behalf of the souls of the dead who are supposed to be in purgatory, is an exercise which is carried to a considerable extent in the Church of Rome. John of Damascus, who flourished in the eighth century, in a sermon on praying for the dead, acknowledges that it is not proved from Scripture, but by tradition from the Apostles. An attempt has been made to support it from the apocryphal book of Maccabees. Passages from the canonical Scriptures have also been occasionally adduced; but with so little success, that the most intelligent of the Romish Divines find it best to rest its claims on tradition, and the authority of the Church alone.

["It was boldly maintained that purgatory and prayer for the dead were of contemporaneous origin; and that the latter custom would never have prevailed for many centuries in the church, unless some assistance and benefit were thence derived to the souls of the departed, in the promotion of their release from purgatorial durance. Thus also it is affirmed by modern Romanists, that 'there is an inseparable connexion between the practice of praying for the dead, and the belief of an intermediate state of souls;' (that is, purgatory;) 'since it is evidently needless to pray for the saints in heaven, and useless to pray for the reprobate in hell.'† 'The two doctrines go so completely together, that if one is demonstrated, the other necessarily follows: the practice of praying for the dead is essentially based on the belief in purgatory.'‡ 'The custom of praying for the dead evidently presupposes the belief of a middle place between heaven and hell; that is, purgatory.'§

["With respect to the origin of the custom, it is difficult, in the silence of Scripture on the subject,‖ to speak with any positive certainty; but it is not improbable that it was introduced by the converts from Heathenism,¶ who, having been previously accustomed to celebrate the memory of their departed friends by oblations and sacrifices,

* See Stillingfleet's Grounds, part iii., chap. iv., p. 595.

† See on this topic Du Pin on the Councils of Basil and Florence. Stillingfleet's Grounds, part iii., chap. iv., p. 593.

* "Δια τα αυτα νυν και το προκειμενον δογμα του καθαρτηριου πυρος αποβλητεον αν ειη της Εκκλησιας ὡς βαθυμιαν εμποιουν τοις σπουδαιοις, επιπειθον αυτους μη πασι τροποις αγωνιζεσθαι κατα τον παροντα βιον ἑαυτους εκκαθαιρειν, ὡς προσδοκουμενης ἑτερας καθαρσεως," p. 93.

["† Milner's End of Controversy, Letter lv., p. 368.

["‡ Wiseman's Lectures, vol. ii., pp. 53, 54.

["§ Dr. Butler's Truths of the Catholic Church, vol. ii., p. 242.

["‖ Bishop against Perkins's Reformed Catholic, pt. xi., p. 149.

["¶ 'Prayer for the dead presupposes purgatory.'—Harding's Answer to Jewel's Apol., fol. 119. Antwerp, 1565.

["‖ Tertullian affirms that the practice of making oblations for the deceased martyrs and saints, and keeping the anniversary of their death, which they looked upon as a new birth, rests entirely upon tradition. De Corona, cap. iii., p. 121, D. Paris, 1634.

["¶ The Bruti, upon the death of their father, (A.U.C. 488,) established the Ludi Gladiatorii, at which slaves were cruelly slaughtered upon the grave, in the idea that their blood would propitiate the ghost of the departed. In ancient Christian times, the commemoration of the shedding of Christ's blood was celebrated immediately after the funeral, provided it took place before noon; that is, before the communicants had broken their fast. See Conc. Carth. iii., can. xxix., tom. ii., p. 1171. Ed. Labb. Paris, 1671.

thought it no less necessary, at the funerals of their Christian relatives, to present prayers and offerings at their tombs. These offerings, however, were devoted to the relief of the poor, and never regarded as propitiatory sacrifices.*

["'On these occasions,' says an early writer, 'we celebrate the day of their nativity, since those who die will thenceforward live for ever. Hence we celebrate it, assembling the devout with the Priests, the faithful with the Clergy, inviting, moreover, the poor and needy, feeding the orphans and widows; so that our festivity may not only be kept in remembrance of the repose of the souls departed, whose memory we celebrate, but may become to ourselves an odour of sweet savour in the sight of the everlasting God.'†

["These commemorative services, at first, were offered at the funeral only, but afterwards they became annual; and then, by degrees, found their way into the offices of the Church; so that at the celebration of the eucharist, the names of martyrs, and of others who had been distinguished for their piety, were honourably mentioned, and their memory perpetuated. Thus do we still, at the end of the 'prayer for the church militant,' 'bless God for all his servants who have departed this life in his faith and fear.' The sacrament of the Lord's supper was usually administered to the mourners assembled round the grave; and again also on the anniversary of the death of him they mourned. ‡

["In order more fully to appreciate the motives for which these prayers were offered, it will be necessary to ascertain something of the opinions of the early Christians respecting the state of the dead. They were doubtless mainly influenced by their belief in the existence of departed spirits, and of the communion which was kept up between them and the saints upon earth. There were, however, other prevailing notions which fell in with this practice. In the first place, it was held by many of the Fathers that the souls of the righteous, with the exception of martyrs,§ did not at death immediately ascend into heaven; but were detained in a place of comparative rest, known by the equivalent appellations of hades, paradise, or Abraham's bosom. In this abode they were not so completely blessed, but that their happiness might be increased, and therefore God was entreated to give them ease, rest, refreshment, comfort.‖ With reference to this opinion, St. Augustine observes, that during the time between death and the resurrection, they were kept in hidden receptacles.*

["Again: there were many who believed in the millennium, or the reign of Christ upon earth at Jerusalem, for a thousand years previous to the end of the world. Connected with this belief was the persuasion that those who had died in the faith would rise within that period, sooner or later, to reign with Jesus, according to the preponderance of their virtues;† and, therefore, God was implored to hasten their felicity by a speedy resurrection. This notion was built upon what St. John says of the first resurrection. (Rev. xx. 5, 6.) ‡

["A notion has also been shown to have been very generally prevalent, that at the end of the world all mankind would be made to pass through a probatory fire, by which each would suffer more or less, in proportion to his sins. Here, then, was another motive for prayer, that God would have 'mercy upon them in that day.'

["Lastly, a hope was entertained that the measure of happiness or misery awarded to the righteous, or wicked, at death, might not be final; that the one might be increased, and the other diminished, by prayer.§

["* See infra, p. 276, note §.

["† 'Sic itaque nos diem nativitatis celebramus, quia in perpetuo vivent ii qui moriuntur. Celebramus nimirum, religiosos cum Sacerdotibus convocantes, fideles una cum Clero, invitantes adhuc egenos et pauperes, pupillos et viduas saturantes, ut fiat festivitas nostra in memoriam requiei defunctis animabus quarum memoriam celebramus, nobis autem efficiatur in odorem suavitatis in conspectu æterni Dei.'—Pseud. Origen. in Job., lib. iii., tom. ii., p. 902. Paris, 1733.

["Bingham's Antiquities, vol vii., b. xx., cap. vii., sect. x.; b. xxiii., cap. iii., sect. xvi. Ed. 1840.

["‡ Idem, b. xxiii., cap. iii., sect. 11—13.

["Confessions of Augustine, b. ix., ch. xii., sect. xxxii., tom. i., col. 168, F. Paris, 1689.

["§ 'Nemo peregrinatus a corpore statim immoratur penes Dominum, nisi ex martyrii prærogativa: paradiso scilicet, non inferis, diversurus.'—Tertullian. de Resurrect. Carn., cap. xliii., p. 411, C. Paris, 1634.

["No one, when he departs out of the body, dwells immediately with the Lord, except it be from the prerogative of martyrdom; but his abode will be in paradise, not in hell.' Vide supra, note *, col. 2, p. 245.

["‖ This opinion was held by Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, Lactantius, Hilary, Gregory Nyssen, Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostom. See Sixtus Sinensis Bibl. lib. vi. Annot. 345, p. 714. Ed. 1626. Bellarm. de Sanct. Beat., lib. i., cap. v., p. 713. Bingham's Antiq., vol. v., b. xv., cap. iii., sect. 17. Whitby on 2 Tim. iv. 8. Brett's Dissertation on the Liturgies, p. 279. Ed. 1838.

["* 'Tempus autem quod inter hominis mortem et ultimam resurrectionem interpositum est, animas abditis receptaculis continet, sicut unaquæque digna est vel requie vel ærumna, pro eo quod sortita est in carne cum viveret.'—August. Enchirid. ad Laurent., cap. xxix., tom vi., col. 237, Paris, 1685.

["'The time which intervenes between a man's death and the last resurrection, keeps souls in hidden receptacles, according as each is deserving of repose or sorrow, in consideration of that which it has obtained while living in the flesh.'

["'Cujus pars quæ conjungenda immortalibus angelis ex mortalibus hominibus congregatur, et nunc mortaliter peregrinatur in terris, vel in eis qui morte obierunt, secretis animarum receptaculis sedibusque requiescit.'—De Civitate Dei, lib. xii., cap. ix., sect. ii., tom. vii., col. 308, D. Paris, 1685.

["'That part which is collected from among mortal men, in order to be united with the immortal angels, and which now either wanders in their mortal bodies on the earth, or among those who sleep in death, reposes in the secret receptacles and abodes of souls.'

["'Hæc ratio regni cœlestis; post cujus mille annos intra quam ætatem concluditur sanctorum resurrectio, pro meritis maturius vel tardius resurgentium.'—Tertul. contra Marcion., lib. iii., cap. xxiv., p. 499, C. Paris, 1634.

["'Such is the method of the kingdom of heaven. Within the space of the millennium is included the resurrection of the saints, who will rise, sooner or later, according to their merits.'

["'Te quæso, summe Deus, ut carissimos juvenes matura resurrectione suscites et resuscites; ut immaturum hunc vitæ istius cursum maturiore suscitatione compenses.'—Ambros. de Obitu Valentin. Cons., cap. lxxx., tom. ii., col. 1196, B. Paris, 1690.

["'Almighty God, I beseech thee to raise and resuscitate these most dear youths, in the early resurrection, so that thou mayest compensate for the premature termination of this life, by an earlier revivification.'

["‡ 'Pro anima ejus orat, et refrigerium interim adpostulat ei, et in prima resurrectione consortium, et offert annuis diebus dormitionis ejus.'—Tertul. de Monogam., cap. x., p. 682, A. Paris, 1634.

["'She prays for his soul, imploring refreshment for him, and a participation in the first resurrection, and makes an offering on the anniversary of his decease.'

["See the Rev. R. T. P. Pope on Roman Misquotation, pp. 206—208. London, 1840.

["Bingham's Antiquit., vol. v., b. xv., cap. iii., sect. 17. London.

["Archbishop Usher's Answer to a Jesuit, p. 190. Ed. Camb., 1835.

["§ 'Quibus prosunt (sacrificia et eleemosynæ) aut ad hoc pro sunt, ut sit plena remissio, aut certe ut tolerabilior fiat ipsa damnatio.'—August. Enchirid., cap. cx., sect. xxix., tom. vi., col. 236, D. et Paulin. Ep. 19. Paris, 1685.

["'The benefits produced by sacrifices and almsgivings are either such that remission is complete, or at least that condemnation itself is rendered more tolerable.'

["See also Chrysost., Hom. iii., in Philip. ch. i., tom. vi., p. 33, B; Hom. xxxii. in Matt. ch. viii., tom. i., pp. 372, 373, and Hom.

[" Such were the mere private opinions of those holy men, not any definitions of faith promulgated by the Church. It now remains to inquire whether every passage, which is adduced by the advocates of Romish error in favour of prayer for the dead, (that is, offered for the purpose of delivering their souls from the pains and horrors of their fancied purgatory,) may not be easily and justly reconciled with the views above stated, without involving the idea of those Fathers having ever dreamt of a propitiatory sacrifice for the soul's release.

[" A quotation has been alleged in support of prayer for the dead, according to the practice of the Romish Church,* which is taken from Tertullian, who flourished A. D. 200. 'Every woman,' says that writer, 'prays for his (her deceased husband's) soul, and desires that he may obtain refreshment in the interval, and a share in the first resurrection; offering an oblation on the anniversaries of his decease.†

[" Now it is manifest from the reference which has been made to the opinions of the ancients respecting the state of the soul after death, and from the ordinary custom at funerals, that the widow might easily have obeyed the injunction of Tertullian, without entertaining the slightest notion of the fire of purgatory. She was required to pray for the repose of her husband's soul, and for his participation in the first resurrection, inasmuch as it was thought that sin might in some cases be punished by the loss or delay of this privilege.‡ As the representative of her husband, she was to make an oblation on his account, on the anniversary of his death: and if she neglected to show these marks of attachment to his memory, she was to be considered as unworthy of any affinity with him. Not one syllable is to be found of making propitiation for the delivery of her husband's soul; not one word of purgatorial flames, even by inference. Her prayer was to be made for her husband's rest and peace; and his memory was to be embalmed in the hearts of the poor, by virtue of the offering made in their behalf. This view of the case is confirmed by another passage in Tertullian, who, speaking of various customs of the Church which tradition alone had established, observes, that 'oblations are made for the dead, on the anniversary of their decease, as if it were the festival of their nativity.'§ These celebrations (natalitia) are explained in the commentaries of Le Prieur * and others on the passage, to have been annually observed; and the oblations there offered to have been contributed for the benefit and support of the poor. These oblations were also eucharistical, and made for the greatest saints."

[Mr. Hall adduces "a citation from Cyril of Jerusalem, A. D. 348,† who observes, that 'we pray for the holy Fathers and Bishops who have fallen asleep before us; and, in a word, for all who in past years have fallen asleep among us, believing that it will be a very great advantage to the souls for whom the supplication is put up while that holy and most awful sacrifice is presented.‡

[" The excessive love of brevity which Romish controversialists so frequently evince, has been already noticed;

xxi. in Act. ch. ix., tom. iii., p. 203, A. Paris, 1636. Athanas. Quæst. ad Antioch. xxxiv., vol. iii., tom. ii., p 275. Paris, 1698. Prudent. Cathemerin. Carm. 5. De Cereo Paschali, p. 17. Amstelodami, 1667. Theophylact. in Luc. xii. 5, p. 344, B. C. D. Paris, 1631.

[" * Dr. Wiseman, vol. ii., p. 59. Faith of Catholics, p. 356. London, 1830.

[" † Vide supra, p. 275, col. 2, note ‡.

[" ‡ Vide idem.

[" St. Ambrose says, 'Qui autem non veniunt ad primam resurrectionem, sed ad secundam reservantur, isti urentur, donec impleant tempora inter primam et secundam resurrectionem: aut si non impleverint, diutius in supplicio permanebunt. Ideo ergo rogemus, ut in prima resurrectione partem habere mereamur.'—Ambros. in Psal. i. ver. 5, sect. liv., tom. i., col. 763. Paris, 1686.

[" 'They who come not to the first resurrection, but are reserved to the second, shall be burned until they fulfil the times betwixt the first and the second resurrection. Or if they have not fulfilled them, they shall remain longer in punishment. Let us, therefore, pray that we may deserve to have our part in the first resurrection.'

[" § 'Oblationes pro defunctis, pro natalitiis, annua die facimus.'—Tertul. de Coron. Milit., cap. iii., p. 102, A. Paris, 1664.

[" 'Per Natalitia intelligit solemnitates fieri solitas in honorem martyrum, quo scilicet die mundo mortui, cœlo nati sunt. Unde annua die, id est, quotannis facimus.'—Priorius in loc. Tertull. Oper. Rig. et Prior. annotat. adject., p. 102. Paris, 1664.

[" 'By Natalitia Tertullian means the solemnities accustomed to be held in honour of martyrs, on the day in which, being dead to the world, they were born to heaven. Hence we hold them on the annual day, that is, yearly.'

[" 'Sacrificia pro eis semper, ut meministis, offerimus, quoties martyrum passiones et dies anniversaria commemoratione celebramus.'—Cyprian. Epist. xxxix., p. 77. Oxon., 1682.

[" 'We offer sacrifices for them, from time to time, as ye remember, when we solemnize the sufferings and days of the martyrs by an annual commemoration.'

[" 'Denique et dies eorum quibus excedunt annotate, ut commemorationes eorum inter memorias martyrum celebrare possimus: quanquam Tertullus scripserit et scribat, ac significet mihi dies quibus in carcere beati fratres nostri ad immortalitatem gloriosæ mortis exitu transeunt; et celebrantur hic a nobis oblationes et sacrificia ob commemorationes eorum, quæ cito vobiscum Domino protegente celebrabimus.'—Idem, Epist. xii., pp. 27, 28. Oxon., 1682.

[" 'Lastly, note the days of their decease, that we may be able to celebrate their commemoration among the memorials of the martyrs: although Tertullus has written, and does write, and signifies to me the days on which in prison our happy brethren, by the issue of a glorious death, pass to immortality; and oblations and sacrifices are here celebrated by us on account of their commemorations, which we shall speedily, by God's help, celebrate with you.'

[" 'Oblationes vocari et intelligi sportulas, quæ in usum pauperum conferebantur, manifestissimum est ex canone Carthaginiensi et Vasensi. Can. 13, q. 2.'—Scultet. Med. Theol. Patrum, p. 307. Amb., 1603.

[" 'It is very evident from a canon of the Councils of Carthage and Vaison, that the doles, which were contributed for the use of the poor, were called and considered oblations.'

[" 'Porro in celebrando natali die genialis ethnicorum lætitia, (de quo Macrinum suum Persius admonet, Funde merum genio,) a præsulibus Christianis recte in oblationes, quæ in eleemosynam pauperum conferebantur, mutata est, cum ad nostram illi religionem transissent.'—B. Rhenan. in loc. Annot. Append. ad Tert., p. 43. A. D. 1597.

[" 'Moreover, the genial joy of the Heathen in celebrating the natal day, (of which Persius reminds his friend Macrinus, in the words, Pour forth wine in honour of your tutelary genius,) was rightly changed by the Christian Bishops into oblations, which were contributed for the relief of the poor, when they (the Heathen) had been converted to our religion.'

[" 'Cum ergo sacrificia sive altaris sive quarumcumque eleemosynarum pro baptizatis defunctis omnibus offeruntur: pro valde bonis gratiarum actiones sunt; pro non valde malis propitiationes sunt; pro valde malis etiamsi nulla sunt adjumenta mortuorum qualescumque vivorum consolationes sunt.'—August. Enchirid. ad Laurent., cap. cx., tom. vi., col. 238. Paris, 1685.

[" 'When, therefore, sacrifices, whether of the altar or of whatsoever kind of alms, are offered for all the dead who have been baptized: for the very good they are thanksgivings; for those who are not very bad they are propitiations; as to the very bad, although they help not the dead, they are some kind of consolation for the living.'

[" See Bishop Kaye's Ecclesiastical History of the second and third Centuries illustrated from Tertullian, p. 415. Camb., 1825, second edition. And also the Rev. R. T. P. Pope on Roman Misquotation, pp. 63, 199, &c. London, 1840.

[" See Archbishop Wake in Bishop Gibson's Preservative against Popery, title viii., cap. vii., p. 152.

[" * See the preceding note.

[" † Dr. Wiseman, vol. ii., p. 61. Faith of Catholics, p. 362.

[" ‡ 'Ειτα και ὑπερ των προκεκοιμημενων ἁγιων πατερων, και επισκοπων, και παντων ἁπλως των εν ἡμιν προκεκοιμημενων, μεγιστην ωνησιν πιστευοντες εσεσθαι ταις ψυχαις, ὑπερ ὡν ἡ δεησις αναφερεται της ἁγιας και φρικωδεστατης προκειμενης Θυσιας.'—Cyrilli Hierosol. Catech. Mystag., lib. v. cap. vi., p. 297. Oxon., 1703.

and it will probably account for the omission of the words which immediately precede the above quotation. Cyril is speaking of the prayer after consecration of the elements in the holy eucharist; with reference to which he observes, that 'we offer this sacrifice in memory of all who have fallen asleep before us; and first of Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs, that God, by their prayers and intercessions, may receive our supplications; and then we pray for our holy Fathers and Bishops,' &c.* In this memorial, then, we see that Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs were included; who, by the Papists' own confession, never enter purgatory; and yet sacrifices and prayers were perpetually offered for them, as well as others. The words in Italics are doubtless an interpolation, inasmuch as the ancient Liturgies prayed for those holy men; and Chrysostom expressly says, that prayers were offered for the martyrs.† Archbishop Ussher complains of a like insertion in the Latin translation of Chrysostom's Greek Liturgy, in order to make it appear that the primitive church did not offer up their prayers for saints and martyrs. That she did, however, is abundantly evident from the writings of the Fathers:‡ whence it appears that in the above passage, fairly and fully cited, purgatory was never contemplated.

[Reference is made by Dr. Milner "to St. Augustine's account of the death of his mother, Monica.§ On her death-bed she had entreated him to remember her soul at the altar; and, in compliance with this request, after her decease he performed this duty, in order, as he declares, 'to obtain the pardon of her sins.'‖ But what can this have to do with the point in question? In the first place, purgatory is not a place of pardon, but of punishment. Not only is Augustine silent respecting any temporal pains, but he adds, 'I believe that thou hast already done what I ask;'¶ so that his prayer could not be for her release from the Papal Tartarus. Throughout the whole narration, as well as the prayer, Augustine evinces no other feeling or thought, than that his mother left a life of piety for a life of peace.

["Another passage, adduced from St. Augustine, asserts, that 'the souls of the dead are relieved by the piety of the living, when the sacrifice of our Mediator is offered for them, or alms are distributed in the Church.'*

["It is evident that the whole strength of the argument in this quotation in favour of the Papist must rest solely upon the word 'relieved.' But why may not the passage be explained and interpreted by a similar one from the same writer, where he says, 'It is not to be doubted that the dead are helped by the prayers of the holy Church, by the salutary sacrifice, and by alms?'† By comparing these two quotations, we see that 'relieved' is 'helped,' and 'helped' is 'relieved,' and that either or both may be fully reconciled with the idea of the early Christians, before mentioned,‡—that the lot awarded at death to mortals was not final. There is not the slightest necessity for connecting the words with sulphureous torments or Vatican satisfaction. It was believed that prayer and almsgiving might possibly 'render some assistance to the departed;'§ at least, it was so hoped: and the ancients, in charity, perhaps, though unscripturally, thus attempted to aid them, and wished to be assured that they were able so to do. As to the authority for the practice, we say, Ουδε γρυ." ‖]

We readily allow, as was shown above, that some kind of prayers for the dead was used in early times, probably within two hundred years after Christ. But these were presented, not for the souls in purgatory, but for those in paradise, for whom Romanists do not pray; for all righteous persons deceased, Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs, the Virgin Mary, &c. The early Church did not pray to, but rather for them. The subject of their supplication was, that God would grant them his promised mercy in the day of judgment, and speedily complete their happiness in body and soul. Many of those pious people imagined that a man was not fully delivered from the entire curse of sin till, at the resurrection, he should receive his body again, and that the prayers and offerings of the living would be useful to them in order to increase their happiness until that period. Hence, in the Liturgy of the Church of Constantinople, said to be that of Chrysostom, is this prayer: "We offer unto thee, O God, this reasonable service, for those who are at rest in the faith; especially for our most holy, immaculate, and most blessed Lady, the mother of our Lord, the ever blessed." And in the Liturgy of the Church of Egypt, ascribed to St. Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Cyril of Alexandria, we have the following:—"Be mindful, O God, of thy saints, our holy Fathers, the Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs, especially the holy, glorious, and ever-blessed Virgin Mary, the mother of our Lord." The following ancient prayer from the Mass-book shows that the ancient Christians, in praying for the dead, had no thought of purgatory:—"To these, O Lord, and to all who are resting in Christ, we pray that thou wouldest grant the place of rest, of light and peace."¶ Here is a

["* 'Και ταυτην προσφερομεν σοι την θυσιαν,.....ινα μνημονευωμεν και των προκεκοιμημενων, πρωτον Πατριαρχων, Προφητων, Αποστολων, Μαρτυρων, ὁπως ὁ Θεος (ευχαις αυτων και πρεσθειαις) προσδεξηται ἡμων την δεησιν· ειτα και ὑπερ των προκεκοιμημενων,' κ. τ. λ.—Idem.

["† 'Ὑπερ μαρτυρων.'—Chrysost. Hom. xxi. in Act. ix., tom. iii., p. 204, A. Paris, 1636.

["Bingham's Eccles. Antiquit., vol. v., b. xv., ch. iii., sect. xvi., pp. 110, 108. Lond., 1840.

["‡ 'Nam nostra quidem scripta cur ignibus meruerunt dari? cur immaniter conventicula dirui? in quibus summus oratur Deus, pax cunctis et venia postulatur Magistratibus, exercitibus, Regibus, familiaribus, inimicis, adhuc vitam degentibus, et resolutis corporum vinctione.'—Arnob. advers. Gentes, lib. iv., p. 152. Lug. Bat., 1651.

["'Why, then, are our Scriptures to be committed to the flames, and our oratories to be cruelly destroyed? In them prayer is made to the most high God, and peace and pardon sought for all men; for Magistrates, armies, Kings, friends, and enemies, whether still living, or released from the thraldom of their bodies.'

["See the Notes of G. Elmenhorstius and of D. Heraldus in loc., with the copious authorities there cited; and especially Epiphani. adv. Hæres., lib. iii., pt. i. Hær. 75, cap. vii., tom. i., p. 911. Colon., 1682.

["§ End of Controversy, Letter lv., p. 370.

["‖ 'Nunc pro peccatis matris meæ deprecor te.'—August. Confess., b. ix., ch. xiii., sect. xxxv., tom. i., col. 170, A. Paris, 1629.

["¶ 'Et credo jam feceris quod te rogo.'—Idem, sect. xxxvi., ubi supra. In sect. xxxvii. he proceeds to pray that she may be in peace (sit ergo in pace) with her late husband; which seems to be no more than the ordinary requiescat in pace, which so often meets the eye upon the tablets of the departed.

["* 'Neque negandum est, defunctorum animas pietate suorum viventium relevari, cum pro illis sacrificium mediatoris offertur, vel eleemosynæ in Ecclesia fiunt.'—Idem, Enchirid. ad Laurent., cap. cx., tom. vi., p. 238. Paris, 1685.

["Faith of Catholics, p. 369. London, 1830.

["† 'Orationibus vero sanctæ Ecclesiæ, et sacrificio salutari, et eleemosynis, non est dubitandum mortuos adjuvari.'—Idem, Serm. 172, de Verb. Apost., tom. v., p. 827. Paris, 1683.

["‡ Vide ut supra, p. 275.

["§ Of this there is abundant proof in the authorities alleged in the notes below."]

[‖ Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 233—243, 248, 249.]

¶ "Ipsis, Domine, et omnibus in eo Christo quiescentibus—locum refrigerii, lucis et pacis, ut indulgeas, deprecamur."—Canon Missæ, Commemoratio pro Defunctis.

prayer, not for persons suffering, but for persons resting; and the object of the prayer is, the blessedness of the resurrection.

["But upon what ground, it may be asked, are prayers offered for the rest, comfort, and refreshment of the dead, if they are considered to be in a state of present happiness and repose? It is allowed that the practice of praying for the dead was prevalent among the early Christians; but the reasons alleged in its defence appear to be as various as the different tenets and opinions of the men who offered them. In the ancient Liturgies,* prayer is frequently made for rest to the souls, bodies, and spirits of such as are previously acknowledged to have fallen asleep in the true faith, and passed into the presence of the Lord of glory. Thus in the Alexandrian Liturgy of St. Basil, the prayer is, 'Grant repose, O Lord, to the souls of those whom thou hast received;' and a similar passage is also to be found in the Coptic Liturgy of St. Cyril. Can it then be said, that God has 'received to himself' the souls which are consigned to the tortures of purgatory? Besides, these prayers were frequently offered for Apostles, martyrs, and even for the Virgin Mary herself, and that too above three hundred years after her death.* Nevertheless it is granted that they never entered purgatory; so that these prayers could not refer to their deliverance from its pains, or their mitigation. Allusion has already been made to the belief of the ancient Christians, that the soul did not immediately, upon death, enter into heaven, but remained in earnest expectation of the accomplishment of the number of God's elect; and prayers were accordingly made for their repose, and quiet, and comfort, in the bosom of Abraham, until the time of the general resurrection. The happiness of the departed saint was supposed to be incomplete; and therefore his soul was commended to the mercy of God.

["* 'Εκεινους μεν, Κυριε, τας ψυχας εκει λαβων, αναπαυσον.'—Liturgia S. Basilii Alexand. apud Renaudot., tom. i., p. 73. Paris, 1716.

[" 'Υπερ δε τεθνεοτων, λεγει.

[" 'Υπερ αναπαυσεως και αφεσεως της ψυχης του δουλου σου.'

[" 'In behalf of the dead, the Priest says: We pray for the rest and pardon of the soul of thy servant.'

[" 'Μνησθητι παντων των προκεκοιμημενων επ' ελπιδι αναστασεως ζωης αιωνιου.'

[" 'Be mindful of all who have fallen asleep before us, in hope of the resurrection to eternal life.'

[" 'Εν τοπῳ φωτεινῳ, ενθα απεδρα λυπη και στεναγμος, αναπαυσον αυτους, ὁ Θεος ἡμων.'

[" 'O God, give them rest in that place of light, whence sorrow and lamentation have fled away.'

[" 'Και αναπαυσον αυτους, ὁπου επισκοπει το φως του προσωπου σου.'—S. Basilii Liturgia, apud Biblioth. Vet. Patrum, tom. ii., p. 53, D. Paris, 1624.

[" 'Give them rest, where the light of thy countenance shines upon them.'

[" 'Ο Κυριος, ευλογησαι παντας ἡμας, τας μακαριας ψυχας αναπαυων μετα ἁγιων και δικαιων.'—S. Jacob. Liturgia, apud Biblioth. Vet. Patrum, tom. ii., p. 3, E. Paris, 1624.

[" 'O Lord, bless us all, giving rest to happy souls with the holy and the just.'

[" 'Υπερ της αναπαυσεως των προκεκοιμημενων, πατερων τε και αδελφων, του Κυριου δεηθωμεν.'—Ibid., p. 9, C.

[" 'Let us entreat the Lord for the repose of our fathers and brethren, who have fallen asleep before us.'

[" 'Και δος γενεσθαι την προσφοραν ἡμων ευπροσδεκτον, ἡγιασμενην εν Πνευματι 'Αγιῳ, εις εξιλασμα των ἡμετερων πλημμεληματων και των του λαου αγνοηματων, και εις αναπαυσιν των προκεκοιμημενων ψυχων· ἱνα και ἡμεις οἱ αναξιοι δουλοι σου εὑρωμεν χαριν και ελεος εν τῃ ἡμερᾳ τῃ φυβερᾳ της ανταποδοσεως σου της δικαιας και αγαθης.'—Ibid, p. 11, D.

[" 'Grant that our offering may be acceptable, sanctified by the Holy Spirit, in order to the propitiation of our own sins, and of the failings of the people, and to the rest of the souls fallen asleep before us, so that we, thy unworthy servants, may find grace and mercy in the dreadful day of thy just and righteous retribution.'

[" 'Των εν πιστει Χριστου προκεκοιμημενων, πατερων τε και αδελφων, τας ψυχας αναπαυσον, Κυριε ὁ Θεος ἡμων, μνησθεις των απ' αιωνος προπατρων,' κ.τ.λ.—D. Marc. Liturgia apud Biblioth. Vet. Patrum., tom. ii., p. 34, D.

[" 'O Lord our God, give rest unto the souls of the fathers and brethren, who have fallen asleep before us in the faith of Christ, and remember our forefathers in time past,' &c.

[" 'Υπερ αναπαυσεως και αφεσεως της ψυχης του δουλου σου εν τοπῳ φωτεινῳ, ενθα απεδρα λυπη, στεναγμος,' κ.τ.λ.—S. Jo. Chrysost. Missa apud eandem Biblioth., tom. ii., p. 80, D.

[" '(We pray) for the repose and pardon of the soul of thy servant, in a place of light, whence sorrow and mourning have fled away.'

[" 'Μνησθητι, Κυριε ὁ Θεος, των πνευματων ορθοδοξων, απο Αβελ του δικαιου μεχρι της σημερον ἡμερας· αυτος εκει αυτους αναπαυσον, εν χωρᾳ ζωντων, εν τῃ βασιλειᾳ σου, εν τῃ τρυφῃ του παραδεισου, εν τοις κολποις Αβρααμ, κ.τ.λ. ὁθεν απεδρα οδυνη, λυπη, και στεναγμος· ενθα επισκοπει το φως του προσωπου σου, και καταλαμπει δια παντος.'—S. Jacob. Liturgia apud Biblioth. Vet. Patrum, tom. ii., p. 17, A. Paris, 1624.

[" 'O Lord God, be mindful of upright spirits, from righteous Abel unto this day. Do thou give them rest in the land of the living, in thy kingdom, in the delights of paradise, in the bosom of Abraham; whence pain and sorrow and lamentation have fled away, and where the light of thy countenance is seen, and shineth for ever.'

[" 'Rogamus te, Domine, Deus patrum sanctorum Abraham, Isaac, et Jacob, et omnis cœtus justorum et piorum, ut illis quietem tribuas; illis, inquam, omnibus, qui a nobis profecti ad te migraverunt, et ad sedes tuas beatas pervenerunt. Dele, ignosce, et remitte omnia peccata eorum, nota et ignota, voluntaria et involuntaria,' &c.—Liturgia Marci, apud Renaudot., vol. ii., p. 181. Paris, 1716.

[" 'We beseech thee, O Lord God of the holy fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of all the congregation of the just, that thou wouldest grant to them rest; to all those, I say, who, having departed from us, are gone to thee, and have arrived at thy blissful seats. Blot out, remit, and pardon all their sins, known and unknown, voluntary and involuntary.

[" 'Memento, Domine, omnium defunctorum fidelium, qui pridem obierunt, et ad te pervenerunt.'—Liturgia Duodecim Apostolorum, apud Renaudot., vol. ii., p. 173.

[" 'Be mindful, O Lord, of all the faithful dead, who have lately departed, and have come to thee.'

[" 'Memento, Domine, patrum nostrorum, orthodoxorum Archiepiscoporum, quorum obitus præcessit; eorum qui verbum veritatis recte dispensaverunt; et da nobis partem et hæreditatem cum eis.'—Liturgia Sancti Cyrilli, apud Renaudot., vol. i., p. 42.

[" 'Be mindful, O Lord, of our fathers, the orthodox Archbishops, who have departed before us; of those who have rightly dispensed the word of truth; and give us a portion and inheritance with them.' Would this prayer have been offered by any sane person, if the said Archbishops had been supposed to be enduring the inconceivable tortures of purgatory?

[" 'Dignare, Domine, recordari omnium sanctorum, qui tibi placuerint ab initio; Patrum nostrorum sanctorum, Patriarcharum, Prophetarum, Apostolorum, Evangelistarum, Martyrum, Confessorum, et eorum qui Evangelium annunciaverunt Ecclesiæ tuæ, et omnium spirituum justorum qui, consummati, defuncti sunt in fide. Præcipue vere sanctæ, gloria plenæ, semper Virginis, genetricis Dei, Sanctæ Mariæ, et sancti Joannis Præcursoris, Baptistæ et Martyris, et sancti Stephani Protodiaconi et Protomartyris,' &c.—Liturgia S. Gregorii, apud Renaudot., vol. i., p. 33.

[" 'Vouchsafe, O Lord, to be mindful of all the saints who have pleased thee from the beginning; of our holy Fathers, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Evangelists, Martyrs, Confessors, and those who have published the Gospel to thy Church, and of all the spirits of the just, who, having finished their course, have departed in the faith. But especially of the holy and glorious ever Virgin, mother of God, and of holy John the forerunner, Baptist and Martyr, and Stephen the first Deacon and Protomartyr,' &c.

[" If Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs, never enter purgatory, how will the Papist account for this prayer in their behalf?

[" To these examples might be added numberless others from the thirty-seven Liturgies published by Renaudotius, in all of which prayer is not only made for the saints in general, but likewise for the Apostles and the blessed Virgin herself, who are believed by every Romanist to be already in heaven.

[" See further illustrations in Archbishop Ussher's Answer to a Jesuit, p. 170. Camb., 1835.

[" * Bingham's Antiquities, vol. v., b. xv., chap. iii., sect. 16. And yet 'the body of the Virgin Mary was, within three days after her burial, assumpted into heaven.'—Rhem. Annot. on Acts i. 11.

["Inasmuch too as the Fathers believed in different degrees of 'refreshment' after death, they prayed rather for its increase, than its commencement; so that the words, 'give rest,' &c., may be, or rather must be, interpreted by this belief.

["In accordance with the above is the opinion of Ivo, who lived at a later period (A. D. 1092):—'It does not seem useless, if we intercede for those who already enjoy rest, that their rest may be increased.'* And Pope Innocent III. (A. D. 1198) remarks, that 'most people do not think it unreasonable that the glory of the saints is to be augmented until the day of judgment, and, therefore, that the Church in the mean time might pray for an increase of their glorification.' †

["Moreover, had the prayers for the dead, in the several Liturgies, referred to souls in purgatory, it is impossible that the present misery of those, for whom they were offered, should not have been mentioned. They must have run in form like this: 'Be mindful, O Lord, of thy servants who have departed this life in the faith, and who are now justly suffering miseries and tortures for their venial transgressions: grant them a speedy release from their sorrows, and give them rest and peace in the bosom of Abraham,' &c. But in no one instance is there any mention or allusion to suffering or wretchedness. It may therefore be naturally concluded that the prayer of the primitive Church was, that God would grant to those who had died in his faith and fear, an increase of that ease, refreshment, and rest which they then enjoyed, and that they might anticipate something of the perfect happiness and glory of heaven, before the resurrection. An opinion indeed prevailed, and is strongly advocated by Chrysostom,‡ that even the sufferings of souls in hell might be alleviated, although they could not be entirely removed, by the prayers of the living. § The prayers, however, which Papists offer are not for the wicked in hell, but for the good in purgatory.‖ St. Chrysostom will therefore add but little weight to their cause.

["It may be also proper to notice in this place the prayers which were offered up for the soul of the Emperor Constantine. These, it will be observed, were not intended to deliver him from misery, for Eusebius had just before pronounced him happy; but, as he himself had previously said of the faithful, 'presented in honour of him.'¶ It will also be seen that he was considered 'worthy of a divine translation to a better state;' that he 'was taken again to his God;' that his spirit was 'thrice blessed.' How far these expressions can apply to a suffering soul, it is waste of time to inquire.

["Again, it may be observed that St. James, in his Liturgy, Justin, Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement, Origen, Lactantius, Victorine, Ambrose, Prudentius, Augustine, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Arethas, Œcumenius, Theophylact, Euthymius, and Bernard, believed, one and all, that the souls of the saints would never see God until the day of judgment: why then should they pray for the deliverance of those souls from purgatory? And if they did pray for the dead, in the sense maintained by the Romanists, and obtained their rescue, what would become of them, consistently with their belief, until the second coming of Christ?

["In conclusion, it will suffice to advert to the opinion of Aërius, A. D. 368, who objected to prayers being offered up for the dead, and assigned the following as his reasons:—'That if the prayers of the living will benefit the dead, then there was no necessity for being pious and virtuous, inasmuch as a man need only to secure the prayers of his friends after his death: he would then be liable to no punishment, nor would his enormous crimes be required of him.'* To this Epiphanius replies: That there were many good reasons for mentioning the names of the dead in their prayers. It was an argument that they believed them still in being, and living with the Lord:—Prayer was of some advantage to sinners, in procuring the mercy of God, though it might not cancel all their crimes:—it also made a distinction between the perfection of Christ, and the imperfection of men, by offering prayers for them, but thanks to Him only. Hence they prayed for righteous men, Fathers, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Evangelists, Martyrs, Confessors, Bishops, and all orders of men. †

["* 'Non videtur otium, si pro his intercedimus, qui jam requie perfruuntur, ut eorum requies augeatur.'—Ivo Cartonensis, part ii., Epist. 174, p. 73. Paris, 1647.

["† 'Plerique reputent non indignum, sanctorum gloriam usque ad judicium augmentari; et ideo Ecclesiam interim sane posse augmentum glorificationis eorum optare.'—Innoc. III. Ep. ad Archiep. Lugd., tom. i., p. 673. Ed. Baluz.

["‡ Hom. xxi. in Act., tom. iii., in N. T., pp. 202, 203. Hom. iii. in Ep. Phil., tom. vi., in N. T., pp. 32, 33.

["§ Augustin. Enchirid. ad Laurent., cap. cx. See note §, p. 275, Chysostom, Hom. xxxii. in Matt.

["‖ "Οτι δε και των δικαιων αἱ προσευχαι, κατα τον τηδε βιον, μητιγε μετα θανατον, εις τους αξιους ἱερων ευχων ενεργουσι μονον, αἱ των λογιων ἡμας εκδιδασκουσιν αληθεις παραδοσεις.'—Dionys. Eccles. Hierarch., cap. vii., sect. 6, p. 412. Antw., 1634.

["¶ 'The true lessons of Scripture teach us, that the prayers of the just in this life, not to say after death, avail only for those who are worthy of holy supplications.'

["¶ Eusebius's Life of Constantine, lib. iv., c. lxxi., pp. 60, 64, and notes. Ed. Camb., 1692.

["* 'Τινι τῳ λογῳ μετα θανατον ονομαζετε, φησι, ονοματα τεθνεωτων; Ευχεται γαρ, φησιν, ὁ ζων, η οικονομιαν εποιησε, τι ωφεληθησεται ὁ τεθνεως; Ει δε ὁλως ευχη των ενταυθα τους εκεισε ωνησεν, αρα γουν μηδεις ευσεβειτω, μηδε αγαθοποιειτω, αλλα κτησασθω φιλους τινας, δι οὑ βουλεται τροπου, ητοι χρημασι πεισας, ητοι φιλους αξιωσας εν τῃ τελευτῃ, και ευχεσθωσαν περι αυτου, ἱνα μη τι εκει παθῃ, μηδε τα ὑπ' αυτου γενομενα των ανηκεστων ἁμαρτηματων εκζητηθῃ.'—Epiphan. adv. Hæres., lib. iii., pt. i. Hær. lxxv., c. iii, tom. i., p. 907, A. Colon., 1682.

["† 'Επειτα δε περι του ονοματα λεγειν των τελευτησαντων, τι αν ειη τουτου προυργιαιτερον; Τι τουτου καιριωτερον, και θαυμασιωτερον, πιστευειν μεν τους παροντας, ὁτι οἱ απελθοντες ζωσι, και εν ανυπαρξιᾳ ουκ εισιν, αλλα εισι, και ζωσι παρα τῳ Δεσποτῃ; Και ὁπως αν το σεμνοτατον κηρυγμα διηγησοιτο, ὡς ελπις εστιν ὑπερ αδελφων ευχομενοις, ὡς εν αποδημιᾳ τυγχανοντων; Ωφελει δε και ἡ ὑπερ αυτων γινομενη ευχη, ει και τα ὁλα των αιτιαματων μη αποκοπτοι· αλλ' ουν γε δια το πολλακις εν κοσμῳ ἡμας οντας σφαλλεσθαι ακουσιως τε και ἑκουσιως, ἱνα το εντελεστερον σημανθῃ· Και γαρ δικαιων ποιουμεθα την μνημην, και ὑπερ ἁμαρτωλων· ὑπερ μεν ἁμαρτωλων, ὑπερ ελεους Θεου δεομενοι, ὑπερ δε δικαιων και Πατερων και Πατριαρχων, Προφητων και Αποστολων, και Ευαγγελιστων, και Μαρτυρων, και 'Ομολογητων, Επισκοπων τε, και Αναχωρητων, και παντος του ταγματος, ἱνα τον Κυριον Ιησουν Χριστον αφορισωμεν απο της των ανθρωπων ταξεως, δια της προς αυτον τιμης, και σεβας αυτῳ αποδωμεν, εν εννοιᾳ οντες, ὁτι ουκ εστιν εξισουμενος ὁ Κυριος τινι των ανθρωπων, αν τε μυρια και επεκεινα εν δικαιοσυνῃ ὑπαρχῃ ἑκαστον ανθρωπων.'—Epiphan. adv. Hæres., lib. iii., pt. i. Hær. lxxv., sec. vii., tom. i., p. 911, A. Colon., 1682.

["' And then, with respect to reciting the names of the dead, what can be more beneficial than this custom? What can be more proper,

[" Now had Epiphanius believed in the Romish doctrine of purgatory, his answer to Aërius would have assumed a widely different form. He would have said that 'we pray for the dead in the assurance that our prayers are most beneficial to them, in procuring, in the first instance, the mitigation of the sufferings which they so justly endure for venial sins, committed while on earth; and the eventual deliverance of their souls from purgatorial flames.' Such, however, was not the object of his reply. It should seem to have been his chief aim to justify a practice of the Church, for which he could not clearly account. Indeed, the whole of his observations have reference to the opinions and feelings of the living; to the expression of their faith, hope, and charity towards the departed; and to the vast distinction they made between the Saviour, and the most perfect of human beings, in that while they prayed for Martyrs and others, to Him they offered worship and praise. Not the most distant allusion does he make to any benefit which might be likely to accrue to the dead.

[" From what has been said, something may now be learnt of the views entertained by the early Christians respecting the efficacy of prayers for the dead. They not only commemorated therein the virtues of the holy and the good, rehearsed the names even of Apostles and Martyrs, presented their praises and thanksgivings to God, in order that their good examples might lead others to aspire to that blessed estate upon which the deceased had entered;—but they prayed that the deceased themselves might meet with 'a speedy and timely resurrection;' that they might receive public remission of sins, a solemn acquittal in the judgment of the great day, and a perfect consummation of bliss and happiness in the world to come. Now all this may be comprehended in the short prayer of St. Paul for Onesiphorus, which was made for him while alive: 'The Lord grant unto him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day.' (2 Tim. i. 18.) *

[" By selecting a few passages from antiquity, we shall see how far the thoughts of the ancients will square with those of modern Rome, as to the need of prayer for delivering the soul after death from wretchedness.

[" 'All the generations from Adam to this day are past and gone; but they who have been made perfect in charity, according to the grace of Christ, possess the region of the godly, who shall be manifested in the visitation of the kingdom of Christ. For it is written, Enter into thy chambers, for a very little while, till my wrath and fury be past over; and I will remember the good day, and will raise you again out of your graves.' *

[" To this may be added the opinion of Gregory, 'This at least the living know, that they will die: but the dead know nothing, since no further changes remain after the necessary end is fulfilled.' †

[" 'I would earnestly aver,' says St. Cyprian, 'and publicly declare, that our brethren who are delivered from this world by the summons of the Lord, ought not to be bewailed, inasmuch as we know that they are not lost to us, but sent before us; that though receding from us, they precede us, as those who go on a journey or a voyage are wont to do; that they should be regretted, not mourned; nor should black garments be assumed here, since they have already put on white robes there.' ‡

[" 'While we are in the present world,' writes Jerome, 'we may be able to help one another, either by our prayers or by our counsels; but when we shall come before the judgment-seat of Christ, neither Job, nor Daniel, nor Noah, can entreat for any one, but every one must bear his own burden.' §

[" To conclude with a decree of the Council of Toledo: 'The bodies of all religious men, who at the divine call depart from this life, ought to be carried to the grave with psalms only, and the voices of singers. For the dirge commonly chanted over the dead, and the beating of the breast either by relations or families, we altogether prohibit. Let it suffice that, in the hope of the resurrection, the service of divine hymns is paid to the bodies of (departed) Christians; for the Apostle forbids us to be sorry for the dead.' ‖

[" Thus, then, it is clear that prayer for the dead has nothing to do with purgatory. Indeed, the practice very generally prevailed some centuries before the doctrine of purgatory had been introduced into the Church. Prayer for the dead did not arise from a belief in purgatory; but purgatory was in after-times appended to the practice of praying for the dead, as an artful and profitable motive what more admirable, than that survivors should believe that those who have departed still live, and are not in a state of annihilation, but that they exist and live with the Lord; and that the most emphatic preaching should declare that there is hope for those who pray for their brethren, as for travellers proceeding on a journey? And, indeed, the prayer made in their behalf is profitable, though it may not obliterate the whole of their offences; at least, inasmuch as while we are in the world we frequently sin both voluntarily and involuntarily, that what is more perfect may be made manifest. For we make mention both of the just, and in behalf of sinners:—for sinners, imploring God's mercy; and for the righteous, both Fathers and Patriarchs, Prophets, and Apostles, and Evangelists, and Martyrs, and Confessors, and Bishops, and Anchorites, and all orders whatsoever, that we may distinguish the Lord Jesus Christ from every condition of men, by the honour due to him; and that we may worship him in the conviction that he is not to be compared with any human being, though he were ten thousand fold beyond the rest of mankind in righteousness.'

[" See Archbishop Ussher's Answer to a Jesuit, chap. vii., pp. 221—225. Ed. Camb.

[" * Idem, pp. 177, 184, 194.

[" Bingham's Eccles Antiquit., vol. v., b. xv., chap. iii., sec. 17.

[" Hammond and Whitby on 2 Tim. i. 16.

[" * 'Αι γενεαι πασαι απο Αδαμ εως τησδε ημερας παρηλθον, αλλ' οι εν αγαπη τελειωθεντες κατα την του Χριστου χαριν, εχουσιν χωραν ευσεβων· ού φανερωθησονται εν τη επισκοπη της βασιλειας του Χριστου. Γεγραπται γαρ· Εισελθε εις τα ταμεια μικρον δσον, εως ου παρελθη ή ὀργη και θυμος μου. Και μνησθησομαι ήμερας αγαθης, και αναστησω υμας εκ των σηκων ὑμων.'—Clement. ad Cor. 1 Ep., p. 176, c. 50. Coteler., vol. i. Amstel., 1724.

[" The Romanist acknowledges that those who are in heaven do not need our prayers.

[" † 'Οι μεν γαρ ζωντες τουτο γουν επιστανται, ὁτι τεθνηξονται· οι δε νεκροι, ουδ' ὁτιουν γινωσκουσιν, αμοιβαι δε ουδενος προκεινται μετα το αποπληρωσαι το χρεων.'—Greg. Thaum. Metaphr. in Eccles. ix. 5, p. 91, C. Paris, 1622.

[" ‡ 'Contestarer assidue, et publice prædicarem, fratres nostros non esse lugendos accersitione Dominica de seculo liberatos, cum sciamus non eos amitti, (It is observable, that the paronomasiæ in the original cannot be preserved in the translation,) sed præmitti; recedentes præcedere, ut proficiscentes, ut navigantes solent; desiderari eos debere, non plangi: nec accipiendas esse hic atras vestes, quando illi ibi indumenta alba jam sumserint.'—Cyprian. de Mortalitate, p. 163, cap. iv. Oxon., 1682.

[" § 'Obscure licet docemur per hanc sententiolam novum dogma, quod latitat: dum in præsenti sæculo sumus, sive orationibus, sive consiliis invicem posse nos coadjuvari; cum autem ante tribunal Christi venerimus, non Job, non Daniel, nec Noe rogare posse pro quoquam, sed unumquemque portare onus suum.'—Hieron., lib. iii., Comment. in Galat., cap. vi., tom. iv., col. 311. Paris, 1706.

[" ‖ 'Religiosorum omnium corpora, qui divina vocatione ab hac vita recedunt, cum psalmis tantummodo, psallentium vocibus debere ad sepulcra deferri. Nam funebre carmen quod vulgo defunctis cantari solet, vel pectoribus se proximos aut familias cædere omnino prohibemus. Sufficiat autem quod in spe resurrectionis, Christianorum corporibus famulatus divinorum impenditur canticorum. Prohibet enim nos Apostolus lugere defunctos.'—Concil. Toletan. iii., ch. xxii., A. D. 589, apud Labbe, tom. v., col. 1014. Paris, 1671.

for its exercise. The fact that the primitive saints prayed for the departed, is no surer evidence that they therefore believed in the existence of purgatory, than the fact that the Romish Church has sought out additional methods of salvation besides that revealed in the Bible, is proof she is therefore the purest Church in Christendom; or that the female, who confesses to a Priest,* well instructed out of Dens's Theology, is therefore immaculate in mind and body; or that he, who believes in any thing contrary to the clear testimony of his senses, is therefore in his right mind. The doctrines are just as necessarily connected with each other, as St. Paul's in London is by necessary consequence united with, and dependent upon, St. Peter's at Rome."] †

In process of time, it must be owned, men fell into a variety of groundless conjectures concerning the state of Christians between death and the resurrection; and upon these suppositions they formed their prayers. But as all these were different from, and inconsistent with, the Romish notions of purgatory, so the prayers which the ancients used for the dead, even were they authoritative, would condemn, and not justify, those prayers which the Papists use.

VII. The origin, progress, and establishment of this doctrine will now claim our attention.

1. Roman Catholics have frequently and sophistically asked Protestants, "Where was your religion before Luther?" To this inquiry it has been usually answered, "In the Bible." But when we ask them, "Where was the doctrine of purgatory taught before the time of Gregory the Great?" they can give no other answer, than that "it was contained in the writings of Heathen poets and philosophers." And, indeed, Cardinal Bellarmine founds an argument in behalf of purgatory on this very circumstance. ‡ But if the writings of Heathen philosophers are to be our guides in religion, then the worship of images and every abomination may be established. Nevertheless, the principal doctrines and usages of Romanism, as distinguished from orthodox Protestantism, are borrowed from Heathenism, directly or indirectly.

2. It is evident, that the Churches which were planted by the Apostles knew nothing of this dogma; they did not teach the doctrine, and it was never introduced into the Church by divine authority. About the end of the sixth century Pope Gregory, called the Great, gave countenance to it; it speedily obtained currency, and in process of time, a general reception; especially after fictitious miracles and visions began to govern the Church. The flames of Ætna and Vesuvius were thought to have been kindled on purpose to torment departed souls. Some were seen broiling upon gridirons, others roasting upon spits, some burning before a fire, others shivering in the water or smoking in a chimney. The high-ways to purgatory were now discovered; one in Sicily, another in Pazzueto, and a third in Ireland. One was found out by the help of an angel, and another by the devil; insomuch that Pope Gregory was carried away with these illusions, some of which, even to this day, the Papists are not ashamed to own. By these means purgatory was established in the Roman Church during the sixth and following two centuries; although in a somewhat rude and unpolished shape. For ages it appears not to have obtained as a matter of certainty, so as to become an article of faith. Mosheim, when treating on the tenth century, says: "The fears of purgatory were now carried to the greatest height, and exceeded by far the terrifying apprehensions of infernal torments; for they hoped to avoid the latter easily, by dying enriched with the prayers of the Clergy, or covered with the merits and mediation of the saints; while from the pains of purgatory there was no exemption. The Clergy, therefore, finding these superstitious terrors admirably adapted to increase their authority, and to promote their interest, used every method to augment them; and by the most pathetic discourses, accompanied by monstrous fables and fictitious miracles, they laboured to establish the doctrine of purgatory, and also to make it appear that they had a mighty influence in that formidable region."

3. In the twelfth century many were led to doubt its existence, as we gather from Otto Frisingensis, anno 1146: "That there is in hell a place of purgatory, wherein such as are to be saved are either only troubled with darkness, or decocted with the fire of expiation, some do affirm." This plainly implies, that many did not receive the dogma. Purgatory, however, has now become an article of faith, and has been considered such since the Council of Florence, held in 1439; and is viewed as too profitable a source of gain to be easily renounced by the Clergy, who, by this craft, obtain their living; who are as zealous in its defence as Demetrius was for the worship of Diana. Nevertheless many of them believe it no more than a celebrated Cardinal who pleasantly proposed this question to his Chaplain: "How many masses would serve to fetch a soul out of purgatory?" To which, when the subordinate Priest was unable to reply, the Cardinal thus solved the difficulty: "Just as many as it would take of snow-balls to heat an oven."

VIII. We shall bring our remarks to a close on this doctrine, by referring to a few of its absurdities and evil consequences.

1. The doctrine itself received its chief support from apparitions and false miracles. St. Bernard writes, that a certain saint praying for a deceased sister saw her thrice in a vision. The first time she was clothed in black, standing without the church; on the second appearance, she was attired in a brown garment, just within the threshold; when he saw her the third time, she was dressed in white, and standing before the altar with other saints; whence the good man inferred that purgatorial cleansing is gradual. Bellarmine says that the same may be proved from many other visions.* The Priests and Friars have made great use of the apparition of St. Jerome after death to Eusebius, commanding him to lay his sack on the corpses of three dead men, that they, rising from the dead, might confess purgatory, which formerly they denied. This story is found in an epistle attributed to St. Cyril: but what is fatal to this assertion is, that Jerome outlived Cyril, and wrote his life. In the Speculum Exemplorum, it is said that a certain Priest, in an ecstasy, saw the soul of Constantinus Turritanus in the eaves of his house, tormented with frosts and cold rains, and that afterward he saw him climbing up to heaven on a shining pillar. A certain Monk saw some souls roasted upon spits like pigs, and devils basting them with

[" * See 'A Succinct and Accurate Account of the System of Discipline, Education, and Theology, adopted and pursued in the Popish College of Maynooth. By Eugene Francis O'Beirne, late Student at Maynooth College.' Hereford, Vale; London, Simpkin; Dublin, Carson. 1840.

[" See also Bailly's Moral Theology."

[† Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and the Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 249—259.]

‡ De Purg., lib. i., cap. xi.

* De Purg., lib. ii., cap. 14.

boiling lard; and shortly after they were carried to a cool place. Bishop Theobald, while standing on a piece of ice, heard the cries of a miserable soul, which informed him that under the ice he was tormented; and that if the Bishop caused thirty masses to be said for him, in thirty days he should obtain deliverance. A similar occurrence is recorded to have been witnessed by Conrad and Uldaric, in a pool of water.* But since the Council of Trent forbade such false stories to be propagated, arguments, so called, and even revelations, have been brought to prove purgatory. St. Odillo heard the devil complain, that the souls of dead men were daily snatched out of his hands by the alms and prayers of the living; while the sister of Damianus, on account of having been too much pleased with hearing a piper, told her brother that she was to be tormented fifteen days in purgatory.

["Many have represented water, accompanied with darkness, tempest, whirlwind, snow, ice, frost, hail, and rain, as the means of purgatorian atonement. Perpetua, in a vision, saw a pond in this land of temporary penalty, though its water was inaccessible to the thirsty inhabitants, whom it only tantalized with illusive mockery. Severinus of Cologne appeared to Damian immersed in a river in which he was steeped as an abstergent for his trifling contaminations. The water of this country, in the most authentic accounts, is both hot and cold; and the wretched inhabitants pass in rapid but painful transition from the warm to the frosty element, from the torrid to the frigid zone. The purgatorians enjoy, in succession, the cool and the tepid bath; and are transferred, without any useless ceremony, from the icy pond to the boiling caldron.

["These accounts have been authenticated by travellers who visited this subterranean empire, and who were privileged to survey all its dismal scenery. Ulysses, Telemachus, and Æneas were admitted to view the arcana of Tartarus; and Drithelm, Enus, and Thurcal, in like manner, were permitted to explore the secrets of purgatory. The visions of the three latter are recorded in the prose of Bede and Paris; as the gloomy path of the three former had been emblazoned in the poetry of Homer, Virgil, and Fenelon. The travels of the heroes, however, were attended with greater difficulty than those of the saints. Ulysses, Telemachus, and Æneas were entangled on their journey with the encumbrance of the body; while Drithelm, Enus, and Thurcal, unfettered by that restraint, winged their easy way, and expatiated in spirit through purgatory in all its sulphureous walks and roasting furnaces.

["Drithelm, whose story is related by Bede and Bellarmine, was led on his journey by an angel in shining raiment; and proceeded, in the company of his guide, towards the rising of the sun. The travellers at length arrived in a valley of vast dimensions. This region, to the left, was covered with roasting furnaces, and to the right, with icy cold, hail, and snow. The whole valley was filled with human souls, which a tempest seemed to toss in all directions. The unhappy spirits, unable in the one part to bear the violent heat, leaped into the shivering cold, which again drove them into the scorching flames which cannot be extinguished. A numberless multitude of deformed souls were in this manner whirled about and tormented, without intermission, in the extremes of alternate heat and cold. This, according to the angelic conductor who piloted Drithelm, is the place of chastisement for such as defer confession and amendment till the hour of death. All these, however, will, at the last day, be admitted to heaven; while many, through alms, vigils, prayers, and especially the mass, will be liberated even before the general judgment.*

["The story of Enus is told by Paris. This adventurer was a warrior, and had campaigned under Stephen, King of England. Resolved to make reparation in St. Patrick's purgatory for the enormity of his life, Enus visited Ireland. The Son of God, if old chronicles may be credited, appeared to the saint when he preached the Gospel to the bestial Irish, and instructed the Missionary to construct a purgatory at Lough Derg; and promised the plenary remission of sin to all who should remain a day and a night in this laboratory of atonement. Fortified by the holy communion, and sprinkled with holy water, the fearless soldier entered the gloomy cave.

["Protected by invoking the Son of God, Enus beheld the punishments of the wretched purgatorians. The groans of the sufferers soon began to stun his ears. Numberless men and women, lying naked on the earth, and transfixed with red hot nails, bit the dust with pain. Devils lashed some with dreadful whips. Fiery dragons gnawed some with ignited teeth; while flaming serpents pierced others with burning stings. Toads of amazing size and terror endeavoured with ugly beaks to extract the hearts of many. Monstrous deformed worms, breathing fire from their mouths, devoured some with insatiable voracity. Some hung in sulphureous flames with chains through their feet, legs, hands, arms, and heads, or with iron hooks, in a state of ignition, through their eyes, nose, jaws, and breasts. Some were roasted on spits, fried in pans, or boiled in furnaces. Many were hurled headlong into a fetid, tumbling, roaring river; and if any raised their heads above the surface, devils, running along the stream, sunk them again into the cold element. A sulphureous well, emitting flame and stench, threw up men like sparkling scintillations, into the air, and again received them falling into its burning mouth.†

["Thurcal's adventure is also related by Paris. Julian, who officiated as guide on the occasion, left the body of Thurcal sleeping in bed, and took only the soul as the companion of his journey to the nether world. He wisely, however, breathed life into the soul-less body, lest, in the spirit's absence, it should appear dead. Having settled these necessary preliminary arrangements, the two spiritual travellers departed, at night, from England to purgatory. The two disembodied companions soon winged their aërial way to the middle of the world towards the east, and entered a spacious fabric of wonderful structure. This edifice was the general rendezvous of departed souls, and was built by Jesus the Son of God, at the intercession of Lady Mary, his mother. The palace, of course, had a respectable architect.

["Many souls in this depôt of spirits, and many beyond the north wall, were marked with spots indicating their venial sins. The Apostle Paul sat in the palace at the end of the north wall; the devil and his guards sat without the wall opposite the Apostle. A balance was affixed to the wall between the Apostle and the devil, in which Paul and Satan, with precision and care, weighed the souls. The former had two weights, which were bright and golden; and the latter two, which, as might be expected, were dark and smoky. When the beam inclined to Beelzebub, the guards threw the soul, wailing and cursing, into a flamy gulf, which, of course, was hell. This unceremonious treatment of sinners afforded fine fun to the devils, whose duty on the occasion was attended with loud peals of infernal laughter. When the beam inclined to Paul, the Apostle introduced the soul through the eastern gate to purgatory, to make compensation for its venial crimes.

* Legend. 185.

["* Beda, v. 12. Bellarm. i. 7. Faber, ii. 449.

["† M. Paris, 83, 180, 270.

[" Purgatory, according to our subterranean traveller, consists of a vast valley between two walls, the northern and southern. The entrance into this ancient domain is occupied with purgatorian fire, caldrons filled with flaming pitch, blazing sulphur, and other fiery materials, to boil or roast the souls for the expiation of their sins. These furnaces also exhaled a stench which was not very pleasing to the olfactory nerves; and which caused even the disembodied souls that on earth had wallowed in filthy gratifications to cough, hiccup, and sneeze. Having enjoyed the warm bath, the souls, for the sake of variety, were introduced into the cold one. The unhappy spirits exemplified the variations of Popery, and passed into a frosty pool, which skirted the eastern extremity of the valley. The water of this pool was icy, salt, and shivering. The spirits, according to their crimes, were immersed in this lake to the knee, the middle, or the neck. Removed from this shivering situation, the sufferer had to undergo another trial: a bridge, studded with sharp nails and thorns, with their points turned upwards, had to be crossed. The souls walked bare-footed on this rough road, and endeavouring to ease their feet, leaned on their hands; and afterward rolled with the whole body on the perforating spikes, till, pierced and bloody, they worked their painful, tedious way over the thorny path. Passing this defile was often the labour of many years. But this last difficulty being surmounted, the spirits, forgetful of their pain, escaped to heaven, called the Mount of Joy.

[" Perpetua's vision may, for the sake of variety, be added to the Tartarian travels of Drithelm, Enus, and Thurcal. This holy martyr had a brother called Dinocrates, who died of an ulcer in the face, in the seventh year of his age. His sister, in a vision of the night, saw the boy after his death going out of a dark thirsty place, with a dirty face, a pale colour, and the ulcer of which he died remaining in his visage. The smoky, thirsty enclosure in which he was confined contained a pond full of water, which, however, being inaccessible, only tantalized the thirsty child.

[" Perpetua knew this prison to be purgatory; and her prayers and tears day and night for his deliverance were attended with their usual success. She soon had the pleasure of seeing her brother clean, dressed, and joyful. The malady which had disfigured his face was healed; he had obtained access to the Tartarean pool, and from a golden cup swallowed copious potations, and then played like a child through the plain.* Perpetua awaking, understood that the youth was released from punishment. All this is very clear and satisfactory. The vision presents a graphic description of purgatory, as a place of dirt, paleness, disease, heat, thirst, smoke, and tantalizing water; and, at the same time, opens a pleasing prospect of heaven as a country of cleanness, dress, health, watercups, joy, and, at least with respect to boys, of fun and frolic.

[" Perpetua's dream was eulogized by many of the ancients. Its truth and fidelity, in a particular manner, and on several occasions, was applauded by Augustine, of sainted memory. The report has also extorted an encomium from Alexander, who, moreover, discovered that those who deny purgatory are never privileged with such visions. Dreams of this kind, the learned Sorbonnist found out, are peculiar to the faithful friends of a middle state of expiation. He must have been a man of genius or inspiration to have made such a prodigious discovery. Bellarmine sings to the same tune. These holy men, says the Cardinal, could neither deceive nor be deceived, as they possessed the spirit of discrimination, and were the particular friends of God.

[" Such are the visions of purgatory, recorded by Bede, Paris, and Perpetua. The tales are as silly as the pagan mythology of Charon and his fabled boat. The relation is as ridiculous as any of the sarcastic dialogues of Lucian concerning the ferryman of Tartarus, which were designed to ridicule the absurdity of Gentilism. The Protestantism and philosophy of modern days have exposed such notions, and made the patrons of Romanism shy in recognising the ridiculous delineations. But the statements, however visible, obtained the undivided belief, and unqualified respect, of our Popish ancestors. The denial of these details would once have been accounted rank heresy. Bellarmine, in later days, swallowed the reports with avidity, in all their revolting fatuity. The moderns, who may choose to reject the tales of folly, will only add another instance to the many variations of Popery."*

[" Nidhart, quoted by Hottinger, mentions other modes of purgatorial purification. One consists in consigning the soul to cold lodgings. Some fishermen, it seems, during the time of a violent heat, found in the water a mass of the coldest ice. This the fishermen having presented to Bishop Theobald, a naked, shivering, frozen ghost, which suffered the pains of purgatory in this congelation, revealed, in loud outcry from its icy tenement, its distress, and begged the aid of Theobald's prayers.† The Bishop's intercessions soon thawed the congealment, and liberated the ice-imprisoned spirit. According to Gregory, Damian, and Nidhard, therefore, not only fire, but also water, in its fluid, frozen, and steamified state, will serve as a wash in a purgatorian process for purging venial transgressors. These authors, therefore, had discovered or invented no common depôt or medium of execution for the unfortunate ghosts doomed to satisfy for trivial misdemeanours.

[" Platina, in his Life of Benedict, presents a view of purgatory in the eleventh century. His posthumous infallibility, Pope Benedict, appeared to a traveller, decorated with the beautiful ears and tail of an ass, and dignified with the graceful countenance and limbs of a bear. The traveller, whoever he was, took the liberty of asking the cause of the unholy transformation. 'My deformity after death,' replied His Holiness, 'is the reward of my pollution in life.' The Pontiff, according to the historian, was doomed to be dragged till the day of judgment through thorns and filth, in regions exhaling stench, and sulphur, and fire."‡]

We cannot imagine that wise men in the Church of Rome credit such fabulous stories; yet by such the people have been brought to believe in purgatory, the better sort among whom either receive them, or do worse;

"* 'Ludere more infantium gaudens.'—Alex. ix. 393. Augustin. v. 1134, x. 401. Bellarm. ii. 6.

[* Variations of Popery, by Samuel Edgar, pp. 455—459.

[" † 'Episcopus audiverit quandam animam clamantem de ista glacie.'—Nidhard, 91. Hotting. vi. 1366.

[‡ Variations of Popery, by Samuel Edgar, p. 482.

for they urge and cite the Dialogues of St. Gregory, the Orations of John Damascene, De Defunctis, and the sermons of Augustine upon the feast of the commemoration of All-Souls, though the feast was not instituted till after his death. They also adduce various other quotations, which the Greeks in their Apology call, Διαφθορας και παρεμβολας αἱρετιζαντων, "the corruptions and interpolations of heretical persons."

But against all such apparitions and revelations the Scripture decides, inasmuch as it forbids us to inquire after truth from the dead.* The ancient Doctors of the Church, such as Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostom, Isidore, Theophylact, deny that the souls of the dead ever appear; affirming that if it were so, it would be the cause of much error; and that devils, under that pretence, might fill the world with revelations of their own. "If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead." (Luke xvi. 31.)

2. As it regards the site † of purgatory, opinions seem to vary; yet the Romish Church would place it in the centre of the earth. There are five places to which, she supposes, departed spirits are consigned. Heaven is the residence of the holy, and hell for the finally damned. Besides which, they enumerate Limbus Infantum, "the department for infants;" Limbus Patrum, or, "the department of the Fathers;" and "purgatory." Hell is placed the lowest, purgatory the next, then the Limbus for infants; and uppermost, although still under the earth, is the place for those who died before the advent of the Saviour.

Limbus Patrum, we are told, is the same with paradise, or Abraham's bosom. It is in Scripture called "hell," or "the lower parts of the earth." (Psalm xvi. 10; Eph. iv. 9.) The Rhemish annotators, on Luke xvi. 22, describe it as follows:—"The bosom of Abraham is the resting-place of all them that died in perfect state of grace before Christ's time, heaven before being shut from men. It is called in Zachary 'a lake without water,' and sometimes 'a prison,' but most commonly of the Divines Limbus Patrum, for that it is thought to have been the higher part or brim of hell, the places of punishment being far lower than the same, which, therefore, be called Infernum Inferius, 'the lower hell.' Where this mansion of the Fathers stood, or whether it be any part of hell, Augustine doubteth; but that there was such a place, neither he nor any Catholic man ever doubted: as all the Fathers make it most certain, that our Saviour, descending to hell, went thither specially, and delivered the said Fathers out of that mansion." Papists say that this place is now tenantless, as purgatory hereafter will also be.

The Limbus, that is, "border" or "department," for infants, is the abode of the spirits of children who have died without baptism, and who endure the eternal punishment of loss, though not of sense. As no unbaptized child can enter heaven, this place will never be evacuated.

Purgatory is represented as one of the departments in the infernal regions, just above hell, but under the Limbus Infantum. Bellarmine, in proof of the locality of purgatory,‡ adduces a variety of silly tales of visions and apparitions in the eruptions of Mount Hecla, from whence he would infer that the craters of volcanoes are so many openings which lead to the bottomless pit. Others, such as Thomas Aquinas and Pope Gregory the Great, supposed souls to have their purgatory in other places than that which has hitherto gone by this name. The following, from the orthodox Roman Catholic Dens, will show that this is not merely a Protestant interpretation:—That Divine asks, "Where is purgatory? Ans. The ordinary place of purgatory, which properly and commonly is understood by that name, is under the earth, and adjoining to hell. But St. Thomas Aquinas thinks that souls are, in extraordinary cases, purged out of this place. 'Some,' says he, 'are punished in different places, either for the instruction of the living or the benefit of the dead, that their punishment being known to the living, may be mitigated by the suffrages of the Church.' And thus Pope Gregory (lib. iv. of his Dialogues, cap. 40) produces an example of the soul of Paschasius, which was purged in the baths."*

3. Their Divines differ respecting the kind and degree of punishment. Some say that the fire is material, others say not; yet the greater part imagine the former. Dens says that the punishment of purgatory is twofold,—that of loss, and of sense; namely, what they lose, and what they suffer or feel; and that the Latins strenuously maintain the punishment to be that of fire. As to the degree of punishment, Aquinas supposes it to exceed any in this life. Bonaventure and Bellarmine † teach, that the greatest punishment of purgatory is heavier than the greatest in this life; but contend that the least inflicted in purgatory, is not greater than the most severe in this life.‡

4. As it regards the period of time in which souls may be detained in purgatory, it is difficult to say what the opinion of Romanist Divines really is. Some imagine that souls are actually detained there for many years; others, that the period is comparatively short. The fact, however, is, that the time appears to have been lengthened or shortened by the Clergy to such extent as would best answer the purpose of filling their coffers. The Rev. John Wesley, in one of his continental tours, met with the following document connected with the cathedral of Mentz, during his visit to that city:—

* Deut. xviii. 10. 11, &c.; Isai. viii. 19; vide Maldonat. in Luc. xvi.

† Vide supra, p. 243.

[‡ "Porro ad argumenta, quæ tunc attulimus, accedant variæ eruptiones ignis, quæ in terra apparent, quas non temere Beat. Gregorius putat esse indicia quædam inferni, intra viscera terræ existentis, lib. iv. Dialogorum, c. xxxv., nam in eodem lib., cap. xxx., scribit se certa relatione cognovisse, eadem ipsa hora, qua obiit Rex Theodoricus Arianus, visam fuisse animam ejus jactari in foveam Vulcani, quæ est in Sicilia; et Laurentius Surius in historia anni 1537, scribit circa montem Heclam insulæ Islandiæ, unde erumpunt flammæ et audiuntur quædam quasi tonitrua horribilia, sæpe apparere animas, quæ dicant se mitti ad illum montem. Hæc de infernis in genere."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Purg., lib. ii., cap. vi.; De loco Purgat., fol. Paris, 1608.]

* "Ubinam est purgatorium?—R. Ordinarius purgatorii locus," &c.—Dens De Purg., tom. vii., No. 27. Vide supra, p. 243, col. 1, note ¶.

† Vide supra, p. 244, col. 2, note ‡.

[‡ "Quænam est pœna purgatorii?—R. Est duplex: una damni, altera sensus, sed utraque temporalis. Pœna damni non est nisi retardatio visionis beatificæ in pœnam peccatorum.

["An in purgatorio pœna sensus causatur ab igne materiali?—R. Constans et retinenda est Latinorum sententia, in purgatorio esse ignem materialem similem igni infernali: hinc Ecclesia animabus fidelium non tantum petit locum lucis et pacis, sed etiam refrigerii, utique contra ardorem ignis.

["Hæc tamen sententia non est de fide, cum Græci in Conc. Flor. sustinuerint, in purgatorio non esse verum ignem, sed tantum esse locum laboribus et doloribus plenum, indeque causari pœnam sensus, et tamen nec in Florent. nec in Trident. sunt condemnati."—Dens Theologia, tom. vii.; De Quatuor novissimis, No. 27; De Loco Purgat. ejusque Pœnis.]

["Thursday, August 31st, 1738," he says, "we spent half an hour in the great church,—a huge heap of irregular building; full of altars, adorned (or loaded rather) with abundance of gold and silver. In going out, we observed a paper on the door, which was of so extraordinary a nature, that I thought it would not be labour lost to transcribe it." The following is a translation:—]

"A FULL RELEASE FOR THE POOR SOULS IN PURGATORY.

"His Papal Holiness, Clement the XIIth, hath this year, 1738, on the 7th of August, most graciously privileged the cathedral church of St. Christopher, in Mentz; so that every Priest, as well secular as regular, who will read mass at an altar for the soul of a Christian departed, on any holy-day, or on any day within the octave thereof, or on two extraordinary days, to be appointed by the Ordinary, of any week in the year, may each time deliver a soul out of the fire of purgatory."*

A multitude of such releases could be produced, were it necessary.

5. Romanists teach that souls in purgatory are assisted by the suffrages of the living. By which they mean: (1.) Masses said for the dead; and procured at the expense of the surviving friends of the deceased. (2.) Indulgences. (3.) Prayers, alms, and any good works done from charity; all which, namely, masses, indulgences, and alms presented to the Church, have been the great sources of wealth to the Romish Clergy, and the cause of poverty, ignorance, servility, and immorality among the laity. Arguments and a few passages of Scripture have been adduced in favour of these suffrages, embracing prayers for the dead, alms to the Church, good works, procuring of masses and indulgences: these we shall notice, before we develope that which is concealed under this part of their doctrine.

Dens, in maintaining that souls in purgatory are aided by the suffrages of the living, affirms that "it is an article of faith, defined in the Councils of Florence and Trent, sess. 22, cap. 2, and canon 3, and also sess. 25, in the beginning of the decree concerning purgatory."† To this we answer, that the decrees of these Councils are of modern date, and have taught this dogma in contradiction to Scripture, and without countenance from previous and primitive Councils; and therefore their decisions on this point are of no weight, and cannot establish the doctrine.

The above-mentioned Divine also observes, that "this doctrine is proved from the constant, perpetual, and universal practice of the Church."—"Idem patet ex constanti, perpetua, et universali Ecclesiæ praxi." All the answer that needs be given to this assertion is, that it is utterly unfounded, as we have already seen. The primitive Christians had no such practice; Scripture condemns it; and the most orthodox portions of God's church have invariably opposed it.

[* "VOLLKOMMENER ABLASS FUR DIE ARME SEELEN IM FEGFEUR.

["SEINE Päbliche Heiligkeit, Clemens der XIIte, haben in diesem jahr 1738, den 7 Augusti, die pfarr kirche des Sancti Christophori in Mentz gnädigsten privilegirt, dass ein jeder Priester, so wohl secular als regularischen stands, der am aller seelen-tag, wie auch an einem jedem tag in derselben octav; so dann am zwiein vom ordinario tägen einer jeden woch das jahr hindurch, für die seel eine Christglaubigen verstorbenen an zum altar mess lesen wird, jedesmahl eine seel aus dem fegfeur erlösen könne."—Wesley's Works, vol. i., p. 157. Third edition.]

† Dens Theologia, tom. vii.; De Quatuor Novissimis. No. 31; De Suffragiis pro Animabus in Purgatoriis.

The same author further asserts that it is proved from the communion of saints, and quotes for this purpose the following text: "And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it." (1 Cor. xii. 26.) From which it is inferred, that the fellow-suffering and assistance which the doctrine contended for supposes, may be deduced from this text of Scripture. That this passage, however, cannot support the Roman Catholic hypothesis, we hesitate not to affirm. (1.) For although the church of God in heaven and on earth are represented as one family, it is evident that the Apostle, in this place, speaks only of that part of the Church which is on earth; for he refers to certain distinction of offices, such as Apostles, Prophets, Teachers, &c., (verse 28.) which pertain exclusively to the militant church of Christ. (2.) The Apostle represents the different characters, stations, and offices of mankind in society by the different members of the body; probably after the manner of Menenius Agrippa, in his allegory of "the belly and the members." By comparing schism in the Church to schism in the body, he shows that it consists in a want of affection in some of the members toward others, whereby contentions and animosities are produced. He teaches, farther, that by unity, co-operation, and proper subordination, each, by the right exercise of his proper gifts, ought to assist his neighbour, and rejoice when his welfare is promoted. (3.) The living members sympathize not with those who are departed; because the latter suffer not, seeing that all tears are wiped from their eyes, (Rev. vii. 17,) and, consequently, need not our prayers. That the saints on earth rejoice with their glorified brethren, because they have escaped the sorrows, sins, and snares of this world; and that the saints, as well as the angelic host, rejoice at the conversion of sinners, is readily allowed, because the sacred Scriptures attest this to be the case. But that there should be such an intercourse as the doctrine of purgatory supposes, is altogether inadmissible. As this text appears to be the most cogent which the Papists urge in favour of the doctrine of the suffrages of the living aiding the dead, it will be perceived that its support from the inspired writings is utterly inadequate to establish it.

["To assert that man can 'more effectually help the dead' than the living; or that he can even help them at all, after they have once passed the boundary-line of their trial upon earth, seems to be a direct violation of the authority of holy writ. Not only is it impossible to render any assistance to the saints departed, but the Scriptures seem to indicate, and we have reason to think, that they are perfectly unconscious of any thing that is done upon earth. 'The dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun.' (Eccles. ix. 5, 6.) Job, speaking of one dead, observes, 'His sons come to honour, and he knoweth it not; and they are brought low, and he perceiveth it not of them.' (Job xiv. 21; Isai. lxiii. 16.) Elijah, previous to his rapture into heaven, begged Elisha 'to ask what he should do for him, before he was taken away from him.' (2 Kings ii. 9.) Of good King Josiah it was said, 'Thou shalt be gathered into thy grave in peace; and thine eyes shall not see all the evil which I will bring upon this place.' (2 Kings xxii. 20.) Moreover, as the Scripture affirms that God only knows the hearts of men, therefore 'to him' alone 'must all flesh come.' (Psalm lxv. 2; Jer. xvii. 9, 10.)

["In accordance with these texts, Augustine is of opinion that the dead know nothing whatever of our proceedings upon earth. 'If,' says he, 'the souls of the dead were interested in the affairs of the living, and really conversed with us, when we see them in our dreams, my affectionate mother, not to mention others, would not leave me for a single night; even as, during life, she traversed sea and land to live with me. And if our parents be not with us, what other mortals shall be cognizant of what we do, and what we suffer? The spirits of the dead, therefore, are removed beyond the power of seeing what is done by men, or what befalls them in this life.'*

["Now, if the dead are utterly unconscious of what is passing in the world which they have left; and if the man of God could not benefit his successor, after his separation from him; it is surely a reasonable inference that the living are equally unable to serve the departed. Such, indeed, is indisputably the case. The die is cast on this side of Jordan; and, when we have once passed the valley of the shadow of death, the means of averting ill, or procuring good, are past and gone for ever. 'The soul of man, passing out of the body, goeth straightways either to heaven or to hell; whereof the one needeth no prayer, the other is without redemption.'†

["Is there, then, no communion between the saints on earth, and those who have quitted their earthly tabernacle? There is: and at every recital of the Apostles' Creed we profess our belief in it. In what, then, does this communion consist; and by what invisible links is the chain connected? The saints in heaven and the saints on earth form one mystical body, of which Christ is the head. (Col. i. 18; ii. 19; Eph. i. 22, 23; iii. 15; iv. 15, 16.) We are said to be fellow-citizens with the saints, and to form part of one and the same spiritual household. (Eph. ii. 19, 22.) We participate in one God, in one Christ, in one baptism; and we are all sanctified by one Holy Ghost. As the foundation of this communion is spiritual, so it is not to be dissolved by death. Forming part, then, of the same society with the saints departed, we are bound to honour them, to imitate their virtues, to praise God for their examples. Hence we pray that we, with all those 'who have departed in the true faith of God's holy name, may have our perfect consummation and bliss, both in body and soul, in his eternal and everlasting glory.' We form but one body, though we differ in the state of our condition, and in the degree of our happiness. They are in the Church triumphant, we in the Church militant. They have 'passed the waves of this troublesome world,' we have yet to pass them. Of the nature and extent of the interest which the deceased are permitted to take in the welfare of surviving friends; and of any other tie, save those of honour, love, and imitation, by which we are bound to them, the Scriptures are altogether silent. Neither in the sacred writings nor in the Fathers, is there any warrant for the belief that our communion with them involves any satisfaction made in our behalf; (Eph. iv. 15, &c.; 1 John i. 3; Rom. xii. 4, 5;) so that the very idea must be rejected as a presumptuous and perverse addition to the revealed word. (Rev. xxii. 18.) St. Paul, indeed, speaks of partaking with the saints in the heavenly inheritance; but not one word does he utter respecting any participation in satisfactions. (Col. i. 12.) To satisfy for another is not merely the work of Christian love, but that of a mediator. True it is, that the ancients sometimes went so far as to say, that the departed saints sympathized, and prayed for the Church below; (see 1 Cor. xiii. 8; Eph. vi. 18; Rev. vi. 10; viii. 3;) but not even Thomas Aquinas, in his exposition of the Creed, nor any of its more ancient expositors, ever asserted with Bellarmine, 'that the Church on earth not only communicates its advantages to all its members, but offers prayers for the Church in purgatory; and that the Church in heaven communicates the benefits of its prayers and merits to the Church on earth.'* If, indeed, the saints did rejoice with them that rejoice in this world, it is not unreasonable to suppose that they would also, in sympathy, weep with them that weep. Such grief, however, would be directly contrary to the assurance, that in that place sorrow and sighing shall be no more. And although the Church on earth is called 'a house of prayer,' there is no scriptural text wherein the Church in heaven is so denominated. The prayers offered by the angel upon the golden altar, mentioned in the Revelation, (viii. 3,) were not the prayers of the saints in heaven; for they themselves were before the face of the Almighty, and needed not the offering: but they were the prayers of the saints upon earth.† In heaven, praise, thanksgiving, and glory, are ascribed to God;

["* 'Si rebus viventium interessent animæ mortuorum, et ipsæ nos, quando eas videmus, alloquerentur in somnis; ut de aliis taceam, meipsum pia mater nulla nocte desereret, quæ terra marique secuta est ut mecum viveret. Si autem parentes non intersunt, qui sunt alii mortuorum, qui noverint quid agamus quidve patiamur? Ibi ergo sunt spiritus defunctorum, ubi non vident quæcumque aguntur aut eveniunt in ista vita hominibus.'—August. de Cura gerend. pro Mort., cap. xiii., sect. xvi., tom. vi., col. 526, B. D. G. Paris, 1685.

["† Homily concerning Prayer, part iii.

["* 'Non solum Ecclesia, quæ est in terris, communicat bona sua cum omnibus membris sibi conjunctis, sed etiam communicat suffragia Ecclesiæ quæ est in purgatorio; et Ecclesia, quæ est in cœlis, communicat orationes et merita sua cum Ecclesia quæ est in terris.'—Bellarm. in Symbol., art. ix., p. 123.

["† When it is said that 'the Spirit maketh intercession for us,' (Rom. viii. 26,) the meaning is, that he assists, directs, and strengthens our minds, so that our prayers may prove fervent and effectual at the throne of God. And when Christ is said to intercede, (verse 34,) or to be our advocate, it is indicated that he became so by presenting his obedience and sufferings, by negotiating, as our merciful friend and agent, all the affairs of our salvation. For the original word (εντυγχανω) properly signifies 'to meet,' and, secondly, 'to advocate a cause.' (See Rom. viii. 26, 34; xi. 2; Heb. vii. 25; Acts xxv. 24.) It may be remarked, that 'intercession,' in the sense of supplication, does not appear from the Scriptures to have formed any part of the Priest's duty under the Levitical law. The only authority which we possess for the fact of the Priest's interceding, in the sense of making supplications, is Philo, who, when enumerating their duties, says, 'The High Priest, agreeably to the laws, makes daily supplications and sacrifices.'—Philo. Legat. ad Caium, ii. 77, p. 591. Edit. Mangey. See Outram on Sacrif., dissert ii., c. vii.

["* 'Interpellat pro sanctis; id est, interpellare facit sanctos.'—August. de Anima et ejus Origine, lib. iv., c. ix., tom. vii., col. 1193, D. Basle, 1569.

["* 'Maketh intercession for the saints; that is, causes the saints to make intercession.'

["* 'Interpellat pro sanctis. Quod non sic est intelligendum, ut existimemus Sanctum Spiritum Dei, qui in Trinitate incommutabilis Deus est, et cum Patre et Filio unus Deus, tamquam aliquem, qui non sit Deus, interpellare pro sanctis. Interpellare itaque sanctos facit gemitibus inenarrabilibus, inspirans eis desiderium etiam adhuc incognitæ tantæ rei, quam per patientiam expectamus.'—August. Epist. cxxx., ad Probam, c. xv., sec. 29, tom. ii., col. 394, B. Paris, 1688.

["* 'Maketh intercession for the saints. This is not to be so understood as to lead us to suppose that the Holy Spirit of God, who in the Trinity is an unchangeable God, One with the Father and the Son, intercedes with the saints as one who is not God. He causes, therefore, the saints to make intercession with groanings that cannot be uttered, inspiring them with an earnest desire of that great advantage which, though yet unknown, we expect to obtain by patience.'"] and adoration and blessing are given unto the Lamb; but of prayer we hear nothing. Christ himself never prays: he only presents the prayers of the saints who are on earth. (Rev. v. 13; viii. 3.)"] *

The following passage has been quoted:—"If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it." (1 John v. 16.) From which they infer, that as some sins are deadly, and other sins are not, for the latter prayer should be made in order to obtain forgiveness. This text, however, cannot authorize prayers for the dead: (1.) Because the sin unto death may be the sin against the Holy Ghost, which hath no forgiveness. (2.) The text does not allude to the practice of praying for the dead, but for the living, and cannot refer to purgatory at all. It seems to speak of temporal life and death, and, therefore, has no reference to any such custom as praying for those who are dead.

[The Rev. Mr. Hall has conducted a most elaborate defence of the Protestant Reformed Church, from the charge which has often been alleged against her by the Papacy and others, that in her Liturgy she sanctions the practice of praying for the dead. To lay this article before our readers in an abridged form, would weaken the force and destroy the effect of the argument. We give it entire, that our readers may witness the triumph of Protestantism over this dogma of error and superstition, and be led to appreciate the services of the excellent author in the common cause of truth and righteousness.

["An objection presents itself, that the Protestant, in denouncing the practice of praying for the dead, forgets that it is sanctioned and encouraged by two petitions in the first Reformed Liturgy of Edward VI.; by expressions in the Common-Prayer Book still in use in the Anglican Church; and by the examples of pious Protestants of his own communion. It may be proper to examine these allegations at large.

["In the Communion Service of the Liturgy set forth A. D. 1549, the prayer for 'the whole state of Christ's church' contained the following words:—'We commend unto thy mercy, O Lord, all other thy servants which are departed hence from us with the sign of faith, and now do rest in the sleep of peace. Grant unto them, we beseech thee, thy mercy and everlasting peace; and that at the day of the general resurrection, we and all they which be of the mystical body of thy Son, may all together be set on his right hand.' † Again, in the Burial Service: 'Grant unto this thy servant, that the sins which he committed in this world be not imputed unto him; but that he, escaping the gates of hell, and pains of eternal darkness, may ever dwell in the region of light, with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the place where is no weeping, sorrow, nor heaviness; and when that dreadful day of the general resurrection shall come, make him to rise also with the just and righteous, and receive this body again to glory, then made pure and incorruptible.' ‡

["'The prayer for the church militant,' in the Communion Service of the Book of Common-Prayer, now used in the Church of England, has the following clause:—'We also bless thy holy name for all thy servants departed this life in thy faith and fear; beseeching thee to give us grace so to follow their good examples, that, with them, we may be partakers of thy heavenly kingdom.' To a like effect is the petition in the Burial Service: 'Beseeching thee shortly to accomplish the number of thine elect, and to hasten thy kingdom, that we, with all those that are departed in the true faith of thy holy name, may have our perfect consummation and bliss, both in body and soul, in thy eternal and everlasting glory.'

["With reference to the examples of learned and pious Protestants, it is well known that the Rev. Herbert Thorndike, a Prebendary of Westminster, who departed this life A. D. 1672, wrote an inscription for his tomb, wherein he desires the reader 'to pray that he may have rest, and a happy resurrection.' * In like manner, Dr. Barrow, Bishop of St. Asaph, and uncle of the learned Dr. Isaac Barrow, who was Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, † in the epitaph which he appointed to be placed upon his tomb, requests the faithful 'to pray for their fellow-servant, that he may find mercy in the day of the Lord.' ‡ And, lastly, the learned Dr. Johnson has left several prayers, which he is said to have frequently used for the souls of his departed wife and parents. Among them is the following:—'O Lord, so far as it may be lawful for me, I commend to thy fatherly goodness my father, my brother, my wife, my mother. I beseech thee to look mercifully upon them, and grant them whatever may most promote their present and eternal joy.' §

["Now, in the quotations from the Liturgy of King Edward VI., there is not the slightest allusion to temporary fire for the purgation of venial sins between death and the resurrection. The petition from the Prayer for 'the whole state of Christ's church' is divided into two parts; whereof the former prays for those 'who are departed hence from us with the sign of faith, and now do rest in the sleep of peace;' and the latter for the living members of Christ's mystical body; thereby clearly indicating a distinction between the members of Christ on earth, and those who 'rest in the sleep of peace.' Surely these last cannot be in the agonizing pains of purgatory; and even if it be contended that the words 'mystical body' include the dead as well as the living, still there is no allusion to deliverance from tortures preceding the resurrection; but simply a petition for their eventual exaltation to God's right hand. To the living, of course, these fancied fires never come.

["In the citation from the Burial Service of the same Liturgy, the petition is, that the sins of the departed 'may not be imputed unto him.' Now the venial sins of the unfortunate wretch, who is doomed to purgatory, must inevitably be imputed to him, or he would not be there incarcerated. And since for these alone he suffers, a prayer to the above effect would be nugatory in relation to them. It also further entreats that the departed may 'escape the gates of hell, and the pains of eternal darkness.' But, on the Papists' own acknowledgment, all who go to purgatory are sure, before they enter, of

[* Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 277—282.]

["† The Two Liturgies of King Edward VI. compared, p. 296. Oxford, 1838.

["‡ Ibid., p. 382.

["* 'Hic jacet corpus Herberti Thorndike, &c. Tu, lector, requiem ei, et beatam in Christo resurrectionem, precare.'

["† The Bishop of St. Asaph died A. D. 1680. The Master of Trinity College died A. D. 1677.

["‡ 'Exuviæ Isaaci Asaphensis Episcopi, &c. O vos transeuntes in domum Domini, in domum orationis, orate pro conservo vestro, ut inveniat misericordiam in die Domini.'

["§ Oxford English Classics, vol. ix., p. 216.

escaping everlasting torments: so that it is therefore totally unnecessary to pray for deliverance from them. The prayer speaks only of eternal darkness, whereas purgatory, with all its horrors, is yet but a place of temporal gloom, and limited wretchedness. Even if, from the mention of the 'dreadful day of the general resurrection,' the prayer could be strained into a supposed allusion to the ancient, but long exploded, opinion of the probatory fire at the end of all things, it would still be equally unconnected with the Papal notion of purgatorial suffering.

["With respect to the citations from our present Book of Common-Prayer, which was put forth in 1661, we pray in one, that God 'may give us grace,' and in the other, that he will 'hasten his kingdom,' in order that 'we, with the departed, may be partakers of God's heavenly kingdom,' and 'have our perfect consummation and bliss in his eternal glory.'

["The prayer, however, be it especially noted, is not that we and those who are departed, but that 'we with those who are departed, may have OUR perfect consummation and bliss;' that is, we as well as they who have preceded us, and are in the present enjoyment of that happiness to which we are looking forward. Taking it for granted that those who have died 'in the faith and fear of God,' leaving behind them their 'good examples,' inevitably will be partakers of his heavenly kingdom, and have their perfect consummation and bliss in body and soul, in eternal glory; we make our supplication that we, at the resurrection of the just, may be found fellow-heirs with them, and may, like them, be blessed. We have previously thanked God for those who have departed in his faith and fear; and we pray that we may have grace to do the same. We pray, in fact, for ourselves, not for the dead. If, indeed, there was no other reason for concluding that these petitions refer exclusively to the living, the very rubric of the Prayer in the Communion Service, by which it is limited to the 'church militant here in earth,' is, in that instance at least, irrefragably conclusive.

["The epitaphs of the Rev. H. Thorndike and Bishop Barrow might be dismissed at once with the observation, that it was merely private opinion which is responsible for the petitions placed upon their tombs; and that, as the Church had never authoritatively prohibited prayer for the dead, they were at liberty to act, in that respect, as they pleased. The Church, however, had in her twenty-second Article positively condemned purgatory; so that, until these Divines are proved to have believed in that palpable error, and, as a necessary consequence, to have been destitute of all righteous principle, (inasmuch as they had sworn to receive those Articles as expressive of the true faith,) it is only reasonable to infer, that, in their thoughts, that fearful error was in no way connected with the prayer for 'rest, mercy, and a happy resurrection,' which they entreated the passers-by to offer in their behalf. The prayers themselves, however, seem merely to breathe the spirit of that hallowed petition of our Litany,—'In the hour of death, and in the day of judgment, good Lord, deliver us:'—or of that in the Burial Service, when we pray, 'that at the general resurrection in the last day, we may be found acceptable in God's sight.' These petitions are presented, notwithstanding our belief that at death our state will be finally fixed; and can have nothing to do with purgatory, inasmuch as they are made for the living, that they may, while living, be prepared for deliverance in the last great day of final retribution. Thus St. Paul desired that Onesiphorus might 'find mercy of the Lord in that day,' (2 Tim. i. 18,) by which emphatic term the day of judgment is repeatedly designated in the New Testament. It may be added, that these prayers do not imply a doubt in the Christian's breast of the result of his petition, any more than when he prays that the word of the Lord 'may run and be glorified,' which, God has already declared, 'shall not return unto him void;' or that 'His kingdom may come,' which assuredly will come in his own appointed time; or that the light of day may return, knowing at the same time that 'day and night shall not cease.' Nothing more, indeed, could really be signified by any Protestant than the expression of that earnest, but humble and waiting posture, in which every righteous man is desirous that his soul should ever be found.

["In conclusion: the prayers of Dr. Johnson for the souls of his wife and parents can only be regarded as the warm effusions of an affectionate heart, in behalf of those whom he tenderly loved in life. He offers no defence for what he does; but in every prayer he qualifies his unscriptural practice with the guarded words,—'So far as it may be lawful for me.' It might be that he could do them no good, but he would at least try. But in whatever sense it was that he prayed for the souls of those to whom he was so warmly attached, this at least is manifest from the petition, that he most certainly did not believe in purgatory; inasmuch as he prays, that 'when the time should come that he must die, like her whom God had taken from him, he would grant him eternal happiness in his presence:' and that he might 'pass, by a holy and happy death, into the joy which God had prepared for them that love him.'* He looked for happiness immediately after death: and of any intermediate torture, between death and the resurrection, he had not the slightest notion; so that his testimony, if adduced in behalf of this Romish error, is both irrelevant and vain.

["Some have thought that the petition in the Litany,† 'Remember not, Lord, our offences, nor the offences of our forefathers,' might possibly refer to the dead: but if the sentence be closely examined, it will rather appear that the offences of our forefathers are so deprecated, that the penal consequences of their transgressions may not be visited upon us, their children, 'unto the third and fourth generation.' The petition, therefore, is for ourselves, and not for our forefathers. So far, then, as this Liturgy is concerned, nothing is in any way to be gained in favour of purgatory.

["Admitting, however, for the sake of argument only, that some of the petitions we have been considering exhibit allusions to the baneful doctrine, it was hardly to be expected that the mental vision of the Church, while under its reform, and just emerging from the thick darkness of Popery, should be so clear, as fully to detect the extent of the corruptions which lay imbedded in the principles and practices of the Romish Church. It would be unreasonable to look for a strict and exact expression of Christian doctrine, while her views of perfection were yet ripening, or for an entire correction of all abuses in a moment. The blindness of error had fallen so deeply upon their eyes, that it required cautious, yet determined, resolution to remove the film, that the cure, though gradual, might be at length complete. Thus the progress of light will be seen to have advanced from strength to strength, until those holy men who had laid the axe to the root of the purgatorian tree,—that 'fond thing vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture,'—at length evinced the pious determination of dispelling the 'dream, that the souls of the dead are any thing at all holpen by our prayers.'

["* Oxford edition of the English Classics, vol. ix., p. 210.

["† Collier's Ecclesiastical History, vol. ii,, p. 259. London, 1714.

["The first act of purification is observable in the 'Formularies of Faith, put forth by authority during the reign of Henry VIII.' Both the 'Articles about Religion, A. D. 1536,'* and the 'Institution of a Christian Man, A. D. 1537,'† represent prayer for the dead as 'a good and charitable deed;' and recommend 'the giving of alms to others to pray for them, whereby they may be relieved and holpen of some part of their pain.' At the same time there is a declaration of the 'necessity of putting away those abuses which, under the name of purgatory, have been advanced, so as to make men believe that, through the Bishop of Rome's pardon, souls might clearly be delivered out of purgatory, and all the pains of it; or that masses said at scala cœli, or elsewhere, in any place, or before any image, might likewise deliver them from all their pain, and send them straight to heaven.'

["A further correction was introduced into 'A necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man, A. D. 1543,'‡ also included in the Formularies before mentioned. Herein it is still maintained to be 'a good and charitable deed to pray for souls departed, trusting that it doth profit and avail them:' and that, 'though the intent of the masses and suffrages be more for one than another, yet they are to be done also for the universal congregation of Christian people, quick and dead.' It will be remarked, however, that there is an omission of the sentence, 'that they may be relieved, and holpen of some part of their pain:' and that there is more energy in the declaration, that 'it is much necessary that all such abuses as heretofore have been brought in by supporters and maintainers of the Papacy of Rome, and their complices, concerning this matter, be clearly put away; and that we therefore abstain from the name of purgatory, and no more dispute or reason thereof, under colour of which have been advanced many fond and great abuses.'§

["The next advance is to the first Liturgy of Edward VI., A. D. 1549, which contains the passages already noticed; and in the second Liturgy of Edward VI., A. D. 1552, which was revised only three years after the former, those portions, referring to Prayer for the Dead, are omitted altogether.

["A similarly cautious and gradual change to that exhibited in the above works will likewise be found in the successive 'Bidding Prayers,' which were used between the years 1509 and 1559.‖

["Proceeding onwards to the Articles of Religion, as agreed upon in Convocation, (A. D. 1562,) the twenty-second is wholly condemnatory of purgatory; at the same time, leaving Prayer for the Dead altogether unnoticed.

["Lastly, in the Second Book of the Homilies, published in 1563, the people are exhorted 'not to dream either of purgatory, or of prayer for the souls of them that are dead; but earnestly and diligently to pray for them which are expressly commanded in holy Scripture, namely, for the saints of this world, otherwise called the faithful; for all men living.'*

["In the gradual expulsion of these errors from the Reformed Church, it is impossible not to admire the judicious forbearance exercised by the holy Reformers, with reference to the abuses and corruptions which were then so awfully prevalent in the church of God. With respect to the motives by which they were actuated in their sweeping condemnation of purgatory, in the twenty-second Article of the Church, while they long continued to withhold their public disapprobation of prayer for the dead, it is obvious to remark, that the doctrine of purgatory was an invention of the darkest ages, attended with the saddest consequences, inculcated for the basest purposes, and therefore demanding a prompt and positive excision. On the other hand, prayer for the dead had been a most ancient practice in the Christian church; though used, as already shown, for purposes widely different from those for which it is wickedly employed by the Church of Rome. As offered in the primitive church, 'for the rest, peace, and consummation of the bliss' of the departed, it was of itself comparatively innocent; but the Romanist, having engrafted thereon his diabolical purgatory, it was imperatively necessary, in order to the effectual extirpation of the one, to discourage the other; and the more so, because there is no scriptural authority whatever for its countenance and support.

["It may be observed, by way of illustration, that prayer for the dead and lay-baptism appear to have been similarly discountenanced, though never openly and authoritatively condemned by the Church.† The reason

* Formularies of Faith, put forth by Authority during the Reign of Henry VIII.; viz., Articles about Religion, 1536; The Institution of a Christian Man, 1537; A necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man, 1543. Oxford, 1825, pp. 16, 17.

["† Ibid., p. 210.

["‡ Ibid., pp. 375, 376.

["§ Ibid., p. 376.

["‖ In 1509 the Manuale sec. usum Eboracensem contains the following:—'Ye shall make speciall prayer for all the sowles that byde the great mercy of Almighty God in the bytter peynes of purgatory.'

["In 1513 special prayers were to be made for 'the three estates, concerning all Christian people, that is, for the spirituality, the temporality, and the souls being in the pains of purgatory.'

["In 1534 prayer was ordered to be made 'for the souls of all them that be dead, and especially for such as it shall please the Preacher to name.'

["In 1536. 'Ye shall pray for the souls that be departed, abiding the mercy of Almighty God, that it may please him rather, at the contemplation of our prayers, to grant them the fruition of his presence.'

["In 1537. 'Ye shall pray for all those that are departed out of this transitory life, and now sleepe in the sleepe of peace, and rest from their labours in quietnesse and peaceable sleepe, faithfully, lovingly, and patiently, looking for that that they clearly shall see, when God shall be so pleased.'

["In 1550. 'I commend unto you the souls departed this life in the faith of Christ, that ye remember to give laudes, prayer, and thankes to Almighty God for his great goodness and mercy shewed unto them in that great need and conflict against the devill and sinne, and that gave them, at the hour of death, faith in his Sonnes death and passion, whereby they might conquer and overcome, and get the victory.'

["In 1554, Mary's reign, prayer was again to be made for 'souls departed this world, in the faythe of Christ, abydinge the mercy of God in the paynes of purgatory.'

["In 1559, Elizabeth's reign, the prayer was again altered to the following form:—'Let us pray God for all those which are departed out of this life in the faith of Christ, and pray unto God that we may have grace soe to direct our lives after their good example, and that after this life we with them may be partakers of the glorious resurrection in the life everlasting.'

["See a Collection of the 'Forms of Bidding Prayer, with Introduction and Notes.' Oxford, 1840.

["* Homily xix., part iii.

["† It was solely upon this ground that, on the 12th December, 1838, the learned Judge, the Right Honourable Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, gave his decision in the Arches Court in favour of Mrs. Woolfrey, who had inscribed upon the tombstone of her departed husband, in the churchyard of Carisbrooke, Isle of Wight, the following words:—'Pray for the soul of Joseph Woolfrey. It is a holy and for this may lie in the necessity of doing as little violence as possible to the predisposed feelings of the people during the progress of the Reformation. The charities and the religious sympathies of the multitude, who had for centuries been taught to believe that the soul of a fellow-sinner could be delivered from fiery suffering by their prayers, could not be rashly and peremptorily wounded. They had in like manner been instructed that without baptism * salvation was altogether hopeless; and they would not readily be induced to forego an eternal boon, in the newly acquired belief that it could not be communicated by unconsecrated hands. Against these impressions deeply engraven in the minds and affections of the multitude, the Reformers, with that high wisdom, that extreme moderation, that penetration of mind, for which they were so triumphantly conspicuous, abstained from issuing a hasty, a public, an authoritative, condemnation; and discountenanced them only by omitting prayer for the dead in the liturgical services, and by naming in the rubrics, 'Priest,' 'Pastor,' 'Curate,' or 'lawful Minister,'* as the only authorized instrument for the administration of either sacrament. If another revision of the Book of Common-Prayer were to take place, the Church could not and would not now be restrained from exercising her rightful authority, in showing clearly the uselessness of praying for the dead at all; and the culpable irregularity, to say the least, of any unauthorized person administering a sacrament, which was ordained by Christ himself, and intrusted to the hands of those only, whom he sent forth until the end of time, with an authority similar to that with which he himself was commissioned by his heavenly Father.† (John xx. 21; Matt. xxviii. 18, 19; Mark xvi. 15, 16.)

["It is sometimes argued by the Romanists, with reference to prayer for the dead, and consequently purgatory, that the Jews who practised the former, and, as it is assumed, believed in the latter, were never condemned by our blessed Lord for the practice now repudiated, although it could scarcely have escaped his reproof, had it been an error in practice or belief. To this it may be replied, that silence is not always to be interpreted into sanction. The Pharisees believed in the transmigration of the soul from one body to another;‡ yet we never hear that our Saviour condemned it. If all things, which were not forbidden, are to be considered as approved by the Saviour, how many of the errors which prevailed among the different sects of the Jews in the time of our Lord, would now pass current as the teaching of God! Upon this method of reasoning, there is not a doctrine, however fallacious and bad, which might not easily be defended.

["Notwithstanding all the evidence which has been adduced in condemnation of the Romish practice of praying for the dead, the pious Christian may yet be tempted to ask, Whether the practice, when divested of its awful and delusive tendencies, would be culpable in the Protestant? As the happiness of the departed will be imperfect until the re-union of soul and body at the resurrection, is not that happiness, in accordance with the opinion of the early Christians, capable of being increased? And may not the survivor indulge his affectionate aspirations for an augmentation of the comfort and joy of the soul of the departed? May we not pray for the increased bliss of one who has been very dear to us upon earth? Are the affections to be bounded by sight, or to be limited to this sublunary state? May we not pray for the speedy fulfilment of bliss to those who have loved us, and in every way have done us good, while they sojourned here below?

["In the guarded use of this practice, it appears, at first sight, not very unnatural to suppose that it may be exercised. Employed with charitable, pure, and holy wholesome thought to pray for the dead.—2 Macc. xii. 45.' The Court decided that the Church of England held that no necessary connexion whatever existed between the doctrine of purgatory and the practice of praying for the dead. Hence we may infer that, had such a union been recognised, the defendant, upon the authority of the twenty-second Article of the Church, would have been convicted. See the case of 'Breeks v. Woolfrey,' fully given in Curteis's Ecclesiastical Reports, vol. i., p. 880.

["* 'Si quis dixerit, baptismum liberum esse, hoc est, non necessarium ad salutem; anathema sit.'—Concil. Trid., sess. vii., can. v., p. 51. Romæ, 1564.

["'Whoever shall affirm that baptism is a matter of indifference, that is, not necessary to salvation; let him be anathema.'

["'Nihil magis necessarium videri potest quam ut doceantur, omnibus hominibus baptismi legem a Domino præscriptam esse, ita ut nisi per baptismi gratiam Deo renascantur, in sempiternam miseriam et interitum a parentibus, sive illi fideles sive infideles sint, procreentur.'

["'Nothing can be apparently more necessary, than that the faithful should be taught, that the law of baptism was ordained by the Lord for all men; so that unless they be regenerated by God, through the grace of baptism, they are begotten by their parents, be they believers or unbelievers, to everlasting misery and perdition.'

["'Cum itaque, per Adæ peccatum, pueri ex origine noxam contraxerint, multo magis per Christum Dominum possunt gratiam et justitiam consequi, ut regnent in vitam: quod quidem sine baptismo fieri nullo modo potest.

["'If, then, through the sin of Adam, children have inherited primeval guilt, much more by Christ the Lord are they enabled to obtain grace and righteousness, in order that they may reign in (eternal) life. This, indeed, can in no wise be effected except by baptism.'

["'Pueris infantibus nulla alia salutis comparandæ ratio, nisi eis baptismus præbeatur.'—Catechismus ad Parochos, pp. 189, 191. Lugduni, 1579.

["'No other means of salvation is supplied to infants, except baptism be administered to them.'

["'Tertius est locus pro infantibus sine baptismo abeuntibus: pro pœna solius damni æterna est limbus puerorum.'—Bellarm. de Purgat., lib. ii., cap. vi., tom. ii., p. 410, A. Coloniæ, 1628.

["'There is a third place for infants who die without baptism. This Limbus Puerorum is for the eternal punishment of loss only:' that is, the loss of the presence of God.

["'Cum igitur infantes non sint rationis capaces, ac per hoc non imitentur peccata patrum, et tamen puniantur pœna omnium gravissima, quæ est mors temporalis et æterna; sequitur necessario ut habeant aliquod aliud peccatum, ob quod juste puniantur; et hoc est quod originale vocamus.

["'Quare dubitari non potest, quin infantes, quibus necessarium esse baptismum ex verbo Christi et apostolica traditione monstratum est, peccatum habeant, quod secum ex utero matris adduxerint.'—Bellarm. de Amiss. Gratiæ et Statu Peccati, lib. iv., cap. vii., tom. iv., p. 61, G, 62, B.

["'Since, then, infants are without reason, so that they cannot imitate the sins of their fathers, and are nevertheless punished with the most severe of all punishments, that is to say, death temporal and eternal; it necessarily follows that they have some other sin, for which they are justly punished; and this is what we call original sin. It cannot, therefore, be doubted that infants (for whom it is shown from the word of Christ and apostolic tradition that baptism is necessary) have sin, which they bring with them from their mother's womb.'

["* The Two Liturgies of King Edward VI. compared, pp. 326, 334, 337, (Oxford, 1838,) and the present office for Private Baptism.

["† 'Baptism was not administered among the Jews by any whomsoever, but only by men of some authority, and in Orders, and appointed thereunto. A Bethdin, or Consistory, or Triumvirate, was orderly and properly to administer it, and not every one that would take it upon him. So also was the administration of this ordinance in the New Testament by ministerial men, and men appointed and empowered for such a work. For mechanics and private men to baptize, wanteth the warrant and example both of Scripture and antiquity.'—Lightfoot, vol. i., p. 584. London, 1684.

["'And what is more intolerable is, that in case of the want of a Minister, women will undertake to be baptizers; which is a monstrous profanation of so high a service.'—Archbishop Ussher's Body of Divinity, p. 419. London, 1649.

["‡ Josephus. Bell. Jud., lib. ii., cap. 8.

affection, it might possibly convey no direct offence to Almighty God: but at the same time, there is reason to believe, on the authority of Scripture, that such prayer will be utterly useless to him who has paid the penalty of sin. Having once left this world, its only place of probation, no change whatever, as to its final condition or destination, will take place in the soul after death. Of the numberless exhortations to prayer for others throughout the sacred volume, not one has the slightest allusion to those whose bodies moulder in the dust. All, without exception, have reference to the living. That the living may grow in grace, and increase in happiness, we have, thank God, an abundance of precepts to assure us, and of examples to encourage us; but that the departed spirit in the intermediate state can increase in sanctification, or progress towards perfection in happiness and glory, the Scriptures contain no intimation.* Prayer to this end, therefore, will rather partake of the nature of 'will-worship,' than of Christian obedience to the dictates of holy writ: and, if on that account alone, it should be avoided. If, indeed, the feeling were indulged, it would be difficult to place bounds to its exercise. Why might we not, with like feelings of charity, extend our prayers to the damned in hell, whose doom the Scripture has positively determined to be as lasting as the glory of the saints in heaven?

["Warned, indeed, by those awful instances of abuse in praying for the dead, to which the practice has led in the fallen and apostate Church of Rome; and perceiving, at the same time, that it is entirely destitute of sanction, either by precept or example, in the word of God, it is the wisdom, it is the duty, of every sober Christian to bow to his only unerring guide; and, instead of consuming his energies and his Christian sympathies upon those for whom they will not avail, to devote his brief span of existence to the avoidance of the vices, and the imitation of the virtues, of those who have preceded him in their exit from this transitory world."†]

That prayers for the dead are unauthorized, the following reasons will show:—

We have already proved that there is no such place as purgatory, and consequently no souls detained there: praying for such, therefore, must be absurd and useless.

No prayer is acceptable to God without faith. We are commanded to pray without wavering and doubting. But we cannot pray thus for the dead. We are ignorant who are there, how long they may continue, or indeed whether there be any such place as purgatory.

Our prayers cannot profit the dead, because there is no repentance or remission of sins after this life.

Prayer for the dead is also contrary to an acknowledged maxim of the Papacy, which is taken from Augustine: "Injuriam facit martyri, qui orat pro martyre."‡ "He doeth wrong to a martyr who prayeth for a martyr." Accordingly, in the old Mass-books, they prayed thus: "Annue nobis, Domine, ut animæ famuli tui Leonis," &c. "Grant, Lord, that this oblation may be profitable to the soul of thy servant Leo." The form is now changed thus: "Quæsumus, Domine, ut intercessione," &c.§ "We beseech thee, Lord, that by the intercession of blessed Leo, this oblation may be profitable to us."

The following extract from the theology of Dens may satisfy the curiosity of the inquisitive reader, respecting the foolish distinctions and immoral precepts which are connected with praying for the dead in purgatory. After stating that prayers, alms, and other good works, performed by the living in behalf of the dead, ex charitate facta, "must spring from charity," he proceeds thus: "It is said 'done out of charity;' for if the doer be not in a state of charity, or a state of grace, his works are not properly satisfactory, nor meritorious, ex opere operantis, (through the merits of the performer). Nevertheless the sacrifice of the mass is profitable to the dead, although it may be offered by a Priest in a state of mortal sin: because it is effective ex opere operato, (by the very act of being offered,) independently of the merit of the Priest. In like manner suffrages made in the name of the Church are always effective in the act of doing them; that is, while the Priest in the church chants the funeral service of the dead, as St. Thomas Aquinas says, Suppl. q. 71, art. 1. So likewise in the same place Aquinas saith, that the suffrages done by a sinner may profit the dead, if the sinner does that as the instrument of him who procured or commanded that these things should be done while he was alive, and in a state of grace: because the work of the instrument is the work of the principal agent. But these suffrages may have effect after the manner of an impetration, satisfaction, or merit of congruity. Observe, however, that a work done for a dead person can profit the doer for the purpose of augmenting his grace and meriting eternal life, in proportion as the deed proceeds from grace and charity, and thus the doer does not lose the reward of glory. Thus St. Thomas, as cited above, art. 4. Nay, as Steyaert says, God often in this life remunerates suffrages done in behalf of the dead with some temporal good. Yet these suffrages do not avail for the doer in the way of satisfaction directly; because the doer hath applied this satisfaction for the dead: for the same satisfaction is not sufficient to discharge two debts. But if it were necessary that it should exceed the debt of another, then that excess, in the way of satisfaction, would go to the account of the doer."* The shock-

["* 'This life is given unto men to work out their salvation with fear and trembling: but after death cometh judgment, reflecting on the life that is past, not expecting amendment or conversion then.'—Bishop Pearson on the Creed, art. v., p. 244. London, 1715."]

[† Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 288—306.]

‡ Serm. 17, de Verbo Apostol.

§ Decret. Greg., lib. iii., tit xli., cap. 6.

["Quibus operibus seu mediis animæ in purgatorio juvari possunt?—R. 1. Juxta Concil. Trid., sess. xxv., initio decreti de purgatorio, præcipuum est sacrosanctum missæ sacrificium.

["2. Indulgentia defunctis applicata, quæ scilicet ita est concessa, ut eis applicari possit. Vide Tract. de Indulgentiis.

["3. Orationes, eleemosynæ, et quæcumque alia opera bona ex charitate facta.

["Dicitur, Ex charitate facta; si enim operans non esset in charitate seu statu gratiæ, opera ejus non esset proprie satisfactoria, nec meritoria ex opere operantis.

["Sacrificium tamen missæ prodest defunctis, licet oblatum a Sacerdote in statu peccati mortalis; quia valet ex opere operato independenter a merito Sacerdotis.

["Similiter suffragia facta nomine Ecclesiæ etiam semper valent impetratorie; v. g., dum Sacerdos in Ecclesia cantat exequias mortuorum. S. Thom. Suppl., q. lxxi., art 1.

["Pariter eodem loco docet S. Thom., quod suffragia per peccatorem facta prosint defunctis, si peccator agat ut instrumentum illius, qui in statu gratiæ existens ea fieri procurat seu jubet, quia opus instrumenti est agentis principalis.

["Suffragia autem valere possunt per modum impetrationis, satisfactionis, vel meriti de congruo.

["Nota, quod opus pro defuncto factum possit facienti prodesse ad augmentum gratiæ, ad meritum vitæ æternæ, in quantum procedit ex gratia et charitate; atque ita operans non amittet meritum gloriæ. Ita S. Thom., quæst. cit., art. 4.

["Imo, ut dicit Steyaertius, Deus sæpe in hac vita suffragia pro mortuis facta remunerat bono aliquo temporali.

["Non valent tamen suffragia illa operanti in ratione satisfactionis directe; quia hanc operans applicavit defunctis; eadem vero

ing impiety and immoral sentiment of this passage must strike all on reading it. The wickedness of the Priest, or of the offerer, seems to present no obstacles to the traffic carried on between the souls in purgatory and their friends on earth. Besides, the surplus of merit necessary to atone for sin, and the precise meritorious value of human performances, are calculated upon and treated as if men could really do more than is commanded them, and as if God were such an one as themselves, with whom they could commute, and change their meritorious deed, and obtain from him, as by a common bargain, a precise amount of benefit for the exact value of that with which they repay him! Nor is this a Protestant misrepresentation. The book itself is the class-book used at many of the Roman Catholic theological seminaries, and is approved by the most eminent men in the Church of Rome.

6. According to the teaching of the Romish Divines, those only go to purgatory who die in venial sin, and those whose mortal offences are pardoned, the temporal punishment of which only remains to be expiated. It is indeed strange, that souls should be detained in purgatory for thousands of years on account of venial sins, and yet their mortal sins may be remitted by the Priest. In addition to this, they pray for all the faithful, which must undoubtedly include many who are in heaven, and, according to their own doctrine, need not the prayers of any.

7. It is stated that this doctrine is an article of faith, and whosoever does not believe it, will assuredly go to hell. The Creed of Pope Pius embraces it as an article of faith, which must be held without hesitation; but though recognised by the Church of Rome, it is not taught in Scripture. The Greek Church repudiated it. Many of the Fathers, among whom was Augustine, doubted its existence: consequently all these, according to the Church of Rome, must be in a state of damnation.

8. The doctrine and ceremonies of purgatory embrace a variety of superstitious observances.

The Council of Trent seems evidently to have been aware of this, as we may gather from its decisions on the subject; for, while they condemn some superstitions which they name not, their judgment itself embraces and countenances some of the worst. We read: "Let difficult and subtle questions, which tend not to edification, and from which commonly religion derives no advantage, be banished from popular discourses, particularly when addressed to the ignorant multitude. Let such as are of doubtful character, or seem to border upon error, be prevented from being published and discussed. Let those which promote mere curiosity, or superstition, or savour of filthy lucre, be prohibited as scandalous and offensive to Christians. Let the Bishops take care that the suffrages of the living faithful (namely, masses, prayers, alms, and other works of piety, which the faithful have been accustomed to perform for departed believers) be piously and religiously rendered, according to the institutes of the Church; and whatever services are due to the dead, through the endowments of deceased persons, or in any other way, let them not be performed slightly, but diligently and carefully, by the Priests and Ministers of the Church, and all others to whom the duty belongs." *

satisfactio non sufficit ad solvenda duo debita. Si tamen opus esset tantum, ut excederet debitum alterius, tunc excessus ille in ratione satisfactionis posset prodesse facienti."—Dens Theologia, tom. vi., De Quatuor Novissimis, No. 31, De Suffragiis pro Animabus in Purgatorio.]

* "Apud rudem vero plebem difficiliores ac subtiliores quæstiones, quæque ad ædificationem non faciunt, et ex quibus plerumque nulla Here, while the Council forbids the discussion of "difficult and subtle questions," with such as "promote mere curiosity or superstition, or savour of filthy lucre;" they enjoin "the saying of masses and prayers for the dead," as well as those "services due through the endowments of deceased persons." How absurd it is to pretend to forbid what is superstitious and lucrative, when at the same time the whole machinery of Popery makes ample provision for the purchase and celebration of masses, which are paid for by the living or by the legacies of the dead! This is not a perverted view either of the Council of Trent, or of this doctrine and its natural consequences. The common practice of Popery will establish the truth of this assertion.

["'The new doctrine and invention of purgatory, as it was managed, became a most forcible engine continually to drain the people's money. For when men were made to believe that after death their souls should enter into a region of fire, there to suffer long and bitter torments, to be purged and fitted for the region of bliss; but yet to be eased there, and the sooner released, according to the measure and number of the masses, offices, and prayers which should be made on their behalf here, whilst they lay broiling in that fearful state; people were put upon it to make the best provision they could in their life-time, or at least at their deaths, that such helps and means should be used on their behalf, so that they might look forward to a short continuance there.

["'To this purpose the founding and endowing of monasteries, abbeys, and nunneries, by the best and richer sort, and the colleges, free-chapels, and chantries, by the middle sort of people, according to their respective abilities, and the apprehensions they had of this future state, all pointed at the good of the founder's soul after death, and the souls of such others as he appointed.

["'But, then, alas! for those poor creatures whose small estates and narrowness of fortunes would not reach to such provisions, what would become of them? These, then, were put to it to make the best shift they could for themselves, by endeavouring, in their life-time, to get an interest in the favour and merit of some saint, and by purchasing and getting all the indulgences they could: for it was a very sad thing to leave all to chance, or to trust to the voluntary intercession of others; this would leave them at a great uncertainty, and, in articulo mortis, make the poor soul shift its mansion in a most fearful apprehension and horror. Indeed, Sir Thomas More was so charitable a solicitor for these poor souls, that he drew up a most pathetical supplication for them, and presented it in their names thus: To all good Christian people,—In most piteous wise continually call and cry upon your devout charity and tender pity for help, comfort, and relief, your late acquaintance, kindred, companions, spouses, playfellows, and friends, and now your humble, and unacquainted, and half-forgotten suppliants, poor prisoners of God, the silly souls in purgatory, here abiding and enduring the grievous pains, and hot-cleansing fire, &c.

sit pietatis accessio, a popularibus concionibus secludantur. Incerta item, vel quæ specie falsi laborant, evulgari ac tractari non permittant. Ea vero quæ ad curiositatem quamdam aut superstitionem spectant, vel turpe lucrum sapiunt, tamquam scandala et fidelium offendicula prohibeant. Curent autem Episcopi, ut fidelium vivorum suffragia, missarum scilicet sacrificia, orationes, eleemosynæ, aliaque pietatis opera, quæ a fidelibus pro aliis fidelibus defunctis fieri consueverunt, secundum Ecclesiæ instituta pie et devote fiant; et quæ pro illis ex testatorum fundationibus, vel alia ratione debentur, non perfunctorie, sed a Sacerdotibus, et Ecclesiæ Ministris, et aliis, qui hoc præstare tenentur, diligenter et accurate persolvantur."—Concil. Trid., sess. xxv., Dec. de Purg.

["'But yet, not trusting to the uncertain charity of others, most persons strained to the utmost, and many most excessively, their fortunes considered, to leave some provision behind them, for that purpose: and most commonly by their last wills and testaments, which were accounted sacred, and carrying an obligation more than ordinary for all persons concerned to see them performed; and thereby, or by acts executed in their life-time, it was not rare, for many men, though they had many children to provide for, or many debts to pay, to postpone all relations and considerations to this concern of the soul, and to appoint and take order for masses satisfactory, anniversaries, obits, requiems, dirges, placebos, trentals, lamps, lights, and other offices, to be performed daily, weekly, monthly, or yearly, as far as the sums destined would afford, for the ease and help of the testator's soul.

["'MASSES SATISFACTORY were the Romish service appointed to be said, or sung, at a certain time, or times, and at an appointed place, at such an altar, or in such a chapel, with special reference to, or remembrance of, such a soul, or souls, tormented in purgatory.

["'AN ANNIVERSARY was the appointment and performance of prayers, at such or such a time, once a year, for the souls of deceased persons; commonly upon the day of the death of the party who appointed it; and this in imitation of the old anniversary days, whereon the martyrdom or deaths of saints were celebrated.

["'AN OBIT was a funeral office, performed for the dead, and for his soul's health, at certain times and places appointed.

["'A REQUIEM was an office, or mass, commonly sung for the dead; so called from those words in it, Requiem æternam dona eis, Domine.

["'A DIRGE, quasi dirige, was an office of the same nature, for souls in purgatory; so called from the first word of the first antiphone in the office, Dirige, &c.

["'A PLACEBO was another such like office, or service, performed for the health and good estate of some soul or souls; so called from the word Placebo being the first word of the office.

["'A TRENTAL, from the French Trente, was a service of thirty masses, said or sung for the dead, or a service performed thirty days after their death.

["'Lamps and lights were by many ordered to be continually burning before some certain altar, image, or place, or over some sepulchre, so hallowed, as conceived to afford some ease or benefit to souls in purgatory.

["'The revenues that were given and settled for the maintenance of these, and such like devices, which were very considerable throughout the kingdom, were, by the stat. 1 Edward VI., cap. 14, given to the King; and they, as vain and superstitious inventions, quite annulled.

["'What an esteem was formerly held of the virtue and efficacy of these masses, &c., may partly appear by a memorable record still extant; namely,—Eleanor, consort of King Edward I., dying, the King sent out a writ to all the religious houses and to the Monks of Cluny in England to sing masses, and make prayers for her soul, and to certify him the number of the masses they should perform on that behalf, that proportionably he might show his gratitude to them.

["'So, in the year 1290, Dominus Thomas (Prior of Christ's church in Canterbury) concessit Domino Regi in festa translationis beati Edvardi quinquaginta Psalteria Duo Millia CCCL missas, pro animabus progenitorum suorum et reginarum Angliæ, as an extraordinary liberality and spiritual alms; as is related by W. Thorn.

["'And about the same time also it was, that Arnold Otho, Abbot of Condam, sent a certificate to the King, to inform him what prayers, masses, and anniversaries, he and his monastery had ordered for the speedy translation of his deceased Queen to the heavenly joys.

["'From all this now may easily be apprehended the force of vitiated and depraved imaginations; when men's intellectuals are first blinded with ignorance, and then led by superstition; being affrighted with uncouth relations of apparitions, miracles, and the horrors of an imaginary purgatory. What will they not do, or undertake, to alleviate and mitigate, in tanto, not in toto, these approaching torments; and for that purpose suffer themselves to be hauled and pulled, sometimes one way by guides as blind as themselves, and sometimes another by treacherous and dangerous designers?'"*]

Much superstition appears also in their ceremonies connected with the interment of the dead. It is acknowledged that the bodies of the deceased should be carried to the grave in a decent manner, that lamentation and sorrow ought to be properly manifested respecting them, that it is not unlawful to use appropriate rites, not so much for the sake of religion as for that of order. These things we acknowledge to be fitting and proper; but there are other subjects relating to funerals and burials that are flagrantly superstitious, and which grow out of, and are intimately connected with, the doctrine of purgatory: for instance:—

First. They burn tapers or candles to indicate that the souls of the deceased are alive.† The use of holy clay is another superstitious observance.

[* Romish Horseleech, pp. 197—202, as quoted by Hall, in his Doctrine of Purgatory, &c., 338—341.]

[† "His non obstantibus asserimus sepulturam rem esse bonam, et utilem, et ritus omnes Ecclesiæ in sepeliendis mortuis esse antiquos, et sanctos. Quod sit res bona, et meritoria, probatur ex illo, 2 Reg. ii.: 'Benedicti vos a Domino, qui fecistis misericordiam hanc cum domino vestro Saul, et sepelistis eum, et nunc retribuet vobis Dominus.' Tob. xii.: 'Angelus extollit inter alia opera Tobiæ quod mortuos sepelierit.' Matt. xxvi.: 'Opus bonum operata est in me; mittens enim unguentum hoc, ad sepeliendum me facit.' Quod sit res antiqua et utilis facile demonstrari potest, nam omnia quæ nunc in Ecclesia servamus, semper in usu Ecclesiæ fuerunt. Primum, corpora mortuorum nunc lavantur; id etiam olim fiebat, ut patet Act. ix., de Tabitha, et apud Gregorium, lib. iii., Dialog., cap. xvii., et lib. iv., cap. 16, 17.

["Secundo, corpora cum honore et multitudine comitantium deferuntur ad sepulchrum: ita etiam legimus factum olim. Genes. l., et Luc. vii., et apud Gregorium Nazianz., Orat. ii., in Julianum; Sulpitium in Vita S. Martini; Hieron. in Vita S. Fabiolæ et S. Paulæ; et alios.

["Tertio, corpora fidelium in templis et locis sacris sepeliuntur: ita olim Jacob et Joseph Patriarchæ in terra Egypti mortui, in terra promissionis sepeliri voluerunt, unde Christus erat nasciturus, et ubi templum Domini futurum erat. (Gen. xlix. et l.) Deinde temporibus Christianorum, corpora fidelium in templis sepulta fuisse, testantur Ambrosius, lib. i., De Abraham., cap. ix.; Hieron. in Vita Paulæ et Fabiolæ; Gregor., lib. iii., Dialog., cap. xiii.; et August. libro De Cura pro Mortuis, cap. i.

["Quarto, corpora fidelium cum hymnorum et psalmorum cantu sepelienda, testantur Gregorius Nazianz., Orat. ii., in Jul.; Chrysost., Hom. iv., in Epist. ad Heb.; Hieron. in Vita S. Pauli Eremitæ, et S. Paulæ Viduæ, et S. Fabiolæ; Sulpitius in Vita S. Martini; et omnium antiquissimus Dionysius Areopagita, cap. vii., De Eccles. Hierarchia.

["Quinto, ad funus fidelium lampades et cerei accensi adhibebantur, ut nunc etiam fit. Nyssenus, Epist. ad Olympiam De Obitu Sororis; Nazianzenus et Chrysost. locis notatis; Hieron. in Vita Paulæ; et Theodor., lib. v., Hist., cap. xxxvi.; et alii.

["Sexto, sacrificium altaris pro eis offertur; ita etiam olim, testibus Tertull., lib. De Corona Militis; Cypriano, lib. i., Epist. ix.; August., lib. ix., Confessionum, cap. xii.; Ambr., Orat. de Valent. Obitu; et aliis.

["Septimo, non solum cum sepeliuntur, sed etiam die anniversaria pro defunctis offertur, et oratur, ut patet apud Tertull., lib. De Monogamia; et Gregorium Nazianz., Orat. in Cæsarium fratrem.

["Octavo, non solum die anniversaria, sed etiam die 3, 7, et

Secondly. Superstitious remembrance of the dead. They have their week's minds for the departed, or a remembrance of them every seventh day; their half-week's minds, or every third day; their month's minds every month: and their anniversaries, or every-year's minds.

Thirdly. They teach that whatever is done in behalf of the dead is meritorious; alleging the place where David sent messengers to the men of Jabesh Gilead: "Blessed be ye of the Lord, that ye have showed this kindness unto your lord, even unto Saul, and have buried him." (2 Sam. ii. 5.)

Fourthly. They imagine that their singing, chanting, and ringing, giving doles and alms to the poor, with other superstitious customs, profit the dead.*

Fifthly. In their funerals and suffrages for the departed, they make a great difference between the rich and the poor. They suppose it to be possible that so many prayers and suffrages may be presented, that the souls of the dead may at once be emancipated from purgatory. "And therefore, in this case only, the condition of the rich is better than the poor, because he possesseth that wherewith suffrages can be made for him."† There is greater respect shown to a deceased Pope than to any other; for on the first day there must be two hundred masses said for his soul, and for nine days subsequently one hundred masses on each.

All teach, with Dens, that suffragia animabus pro quibus fiant prosunt infallibiliter: "suffrages infallibly profit the souls for which they are made." The reason that is given for this, is, "because there is no impediment in them, and God appears to accept these suffrages for them; for, as St. Thomas saith, 'These works are efficient for those for whom they are offered, being bestowed on them, as it were, by the doer of them.' For such is the belief of all the faithful."‡ It is therefore plain from this, that the rich who are able to pay for a greater number of masses and prayers by their alms to the Church, that is, to the Clergy, (for alms are an important part of these suffrages, as truly as prayers or masses are such,) are certainly in a much better condition to obtain salvation than the poor, who have few, if any, alms to give in order to procure them. The Priests furnish masses in proportion to the number of alms they receive: the rich give a greater amount. The consequence is, that the more alms or donations the Clergy receive, the greater profit will accrue to those for whose benefit the offerings are made; and the rich can, and do, make the greater offerings, and are consequently in a better state than the poor. This view of the doctrine is confirmed by the decision of the Council of Trent, which, in reference to those Priests and others who did not appropriate the money or legacies for masses to their designed objects, or who did not say masses in proportion as they were paid for them, decreed, "that the suffrages, and all services due to the dead from endowments of deceased persons, or in any other way, should not be performed slightly, but diligently and carefully, by the Priests and Ministers of the Church." This decision, in the Decree concerning purgatory, virtually and in effect authorizes all the superstitious and lucrative practices connected with it.

To the objection, that the rich are placed in a better condition than the poor, Dens gives the following unsatisfactory and evasive reply, which positively contradicts the doctrines of his Church on this point:—"The reason why the greater number of suffrages profit the rich is merely by accident; for there is nothing to hinder that the rich, according to St. Thomas, (art. 12, ad. 3,) should be by accident in one respect, when the poor, in other respects, should be in like manner in a better condition. Hence, because the poor, on this head, may possess less, they may probably be compensated in this, that God may apply to them those suffrages offered for those who are now damned or in heaven. Or it may farther be replied, that although the suffrages infallibly profit the dead for whom they are made, nevertheless, it depends on the will of God whether they obtain the whole or a part of the remission of their punishment; so that the remission of the punishment may be regulated according to the disposition and capacity of the dead person for whom the suffrages were offered; whence it follows, that though more suffrages are made for the soul of the rich man, it is not to be imagined that he is aided the more."*

Sixthly. Much stress is also laid on places where individuals are interred, as in churches, consecrated churchyards, and especially under the altar. It would be endless to enumerate the various superstitious opinions and practices which are associated therewith. A few only can be named. Great importance is attached to being buried in their own consecrated burying-ground. So that if Roman Catholics die at a distance from these places, their bodies are often conveyed thither, however distant, or however great the expense. Strong reluctance, nay, unbending opposition, is often manifested among them to the burial of a Protestant, or any heretic whatsoever, in their cemeteries.

In Blairsville, in Western Pennsylvania, on the great canal, about forty-two miles east of Pittsburgh, a singular instance of this superstition is met with. On the outside of the Roman Catholic burying-ground there is a grave, the end of which is contiguous to the external boundary of the consecrated place. On the inside there is another grave, directly opposite to this, and within a few inches from coming in contact with it. The grave on the outside is that of the husband, who was a Protestant; and the other, inside, is that of the wife, who was a Catholic. Permission could not be obtained to bury the former within consecrated ground; he was therefore interred on the out-

30, ut est apud Ambros., Orat. De Obitu Theodosii, initio, id quod etiam nunc servatur.

["Nono, eriguntur tituli; idem olim. (Gen. xxxv.; Acts ii.; 1 Machab. xiii.)

["Decimo, dantur eleemosynæ pauperibus; idem olim, Chrysost., Hom. xxxii. in Matth."—Bellarm. Oper., tom. ii., De Purgat., lib. ii., cap. xix., De Funere. Fol. Paris, 1608.]

* Idem, ibid.

† "Et ideo in hoc solo casu melior est conditio divitis, quam pauperis, quia habet unde suffragia fiant pro ipso."—Albert. Mag. De Offic. Miss., tract. 3.

‡ "Quia nullum in eis est impedimentum, et Deus videtur illa pro eis acceptare; cum ut dicit S. Th., (quæst. cit. art. 1, in corp.,) 'Ista opera quodammodo efficiuntur eorum, pro quibus fiunt, quasi eis a faciente collata.' Ita etiam habet sensus fidelium."—Dens Theologia, tom. vii.; De Purg., No. 31; De Suffragiis pro Animabus in Purgatorio.

* "Quod plura pro divitibus suffragia fiant, hoc est per accidens: nihil autem prohibet, juxta S. Th., (art. 12, ad. 3,) divites per accidens esse melioris conditionis quantum ad aliquid, cum pauperes quoad alia similiter sint melioris conditionis. Deinde, quod pauperes ex hoc capite minus habent, forte compensantur per hoc, quod Deus illis applicet suffragia pro illis, qui damnati vel jam in cœlo sunt, facta, vel etiam dici potest, quod, licet suffragia infallibiliter prosint illis defunctis pro quibus fiunt, tamen a voluntate Dei dependeat, quod totum, vel tantum partem, remissionis pœnarum consequantur; ita ut remissio pœnæ reguletur secundum dispositionem et capacitatem illius defuncti, pro quo suffragia offeruntur: unde licet pro anima divitis plura fiant suffragia, non sequitur, quod semper plus juvetur."—Dens Theol., tom. vii.; De Purg., No. 31.

side, in the open street, unprotected by any fence or other suitable enclosure.

The following description of Popish intolerance toward Protestants will present a true picture of their sentiments concerning the interment of the latter in Roman Catholic places of sepulture. The account is taken from Dr. Young's Night Thoughts, (Night the Third,) entitled Narcissa:—

"And on a foreign shore, where strangers wept,
Strangers to thee, and, more surprising still,
Strangers to kindness, wept: their eyes let fall
Inhuman tears: strange tears! that trickled down
From marble hearts! Obdurate tenderness!
A tenderness that call'd them more severe;
In spite of nature's soft persuasion, steel'd;
While nature melted, superstition raved;
That mourned the dead; and this denied a grave.
Their sighs incensed; sighs foreign to the will:
Their will the tiger-suck'd outraged the storm.
For O! the curst ungodliness of zeal!
While sinful flesh relented, spirit nursed
In blind infallibility's embrace,
The sainted spirit, petrified the breast;
Denied the charity of dust to spread
O'er dust, a charity their dogs enjoy.
What could I do? What succour? What resource?
With pious sacrilege, a grave I stole;
With impious piety, that grave I wrong'd;
Short in my duty, coward in my grief,
More like her murderer than friend, I crept,
With soft, suspended step, and, muffled deep
In midnight darkness, whisper'd my last sigh.
I whisper'd what should echo through their realms;
Nor writ her name, whose tomb should pierce the skies.
Presumptuous fear! How durst I dread her foes,
While nature's loudest dictates I obey'd?
Pardon necessity, blest shade! Of grief
And indignation rival bursts I pour'd;
Half execration mingled with my prayer,
Kindled at man, while I his God adored;
Sore grudged the savage land her sacred dust;
Stamp'd the curst soil; and with humanity
(Denied NARCISSA) wish'd them all a grave.
Glows my resentment into guilt? What guilt
Can equal violations of the dead?" *

9. The doctrine of purgatory is an amazing source of profit to the Roman Clergy, who diligently inculcate that the sufferers in that place have their pains diminished by the suffrages of the living. Hence this doctrine is a constant source of revenue, by means of masses for the dead and indulgences, besides casualties, legacies bequeathed by dying persons or their friends, in hopes of a speedier release out of purgatorial pains. No plan could be better contrived to extort the largest gifts from those whose riches were as great as their sins, than by persuading them that by so doing they would the sooner be delivered out of the flames of purgatory, and admitted into heaven. A more easy method of filling the coffers of the Church could not have been invented; and that they have been so filled even to repletion is a fact which is prominent on the page of history.

["Proceeding, then, at once to the highest authority of the Romish Church, it will be found that in the twenty-fifth session of the Council of Trent, Bishops are enjoined 'to provide, that the suffrages of living believers, that is to say, the sacrifices of masses, prayers, alms, and other works of piety, which have usually been performed by the faithful, for other deceased faithful persons, should be piously and devoutly performed, according to the institutions of the Church; and that whatever is due in their behalf, either from the bequests of testators, or from any other source, should be discharged, not as a matter of course, but diligently and accurately, by the Priests and Ministers of the Church, and by others who are bound to perform this office.' *

["In the event, however, of these 'bequests' and emoluments 'from other sources,' which are given in return for the services of the Priests, not being regarded as sufficiently savouring of filthy lucre, it may be proper to turn to a work by which a late champion of the Romish Church has declared his willingness to be judged.† Therein it is asserted, as a portion of the Papist's belief, that 'those who are in purgatory, being the living members of Jesus Christ, are relieved by the prayers of their fellow-members here on earth; and that the charitable works performed upon their death-bed, and the alms disposed of in their last will, are very available afterwards, in order to their speedier release.' ‡

["Surely from these 'charitable works performed upon death-beds;' these 'alms disposed of in last wills,' so as to be 'very available afterwards, in order to the speedier

[* "The illustrious author of the Night Thoughts lived at this time among the great, with that respect to which his literary talents justly entitled him. He had married Lady Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the Earl of Lichfield, and widow of Colonel Lee. With Mrs. Temple, the amiable daughter of Lady Elizabeth, by her former husband, Lady Huntingdon had been extremely intimate; and having met Dr. Young abroad, their conversation had reference to the death of this lady, who died of consumption at Montpelier, the year after her marriage with Mr. Temple, son of Lord Palmerston. It is more than poetically true, that the Doctor and Lady Elizabeth accompanied her to the Continent.

'I flew, I snatch'd her from the rigid north,
And bore her nearer to the sun.'

But in vain. Her funeral was attended with the difficulties painted in such animated colours in Night the Third.

["As the Doctor saw her gradually declining, he used frequently to walk backwards and forwards in a place called the King's Garden, to find the most solitary spot where he might show his last token of affection, by leaving her remains as secure as possible from those savages, who would have denied her Christian burial; for at that time, an Englishman in France was looked upon as an heretic, an infidel, or a devil. The under-gardener, being bribed, pointed out the most solitary place, dug the grave, and let him bury his beloved daughter. The man, through a private door, admitted the Doctor at midnight: bringing his daughter wrapped in a sheet upon his shoulder, he laid her in the hole, sat down, and shed a flood of tears over the remains of his dear Narcissa:—

'With pious sacrilege, a grave I stole.'"

—Life and Times of Selina, Countess of Huntingdon, vol. i., p. 21.]

["* 'Curent autem Episcopi, ut fidelium vivorum suffragia, missarum scilicet sacrificia, orationes, eleemosynæ, aliaque pietatis opera, quæ a fidelibus pro aliis fidelibus defunctis fieri consueverunt, secundum Ecclesiæ instituta pie et devote fiant; et quæ pro illis ex testatorum fundationibus, vel alia ratione debentur, non perfunctorie, sed a Sacerdotibus et Ecclesiæ Ministris, et aliis, qui hoc præstare tenentur, diligenter et accurate persolvantur.'—Canones et Decreta Concil. Trident., sess. xxv. Decret. de Purg.

["† In the Introduction to his Book of the Roman Catholic Church, (p. 10,) Mr. C. Butler requests all Protestants, in reviewing the principles of the Romish Church, to judge them by reading,—

["1. The Catechism of the Council of Trent.
["2. Bossuet's Exposition of Faith.
["3. Gother's Papist Misrepresented and Represented.
["4. Dr. Chaloner's Three Short Summaries of Catholic Faith and Doctrine, contained in three sections prefixed to his Garden of the Soul.

But why confine us to these four volumes, when two only speak out upon the doctrines at issue? From the others, being chiefly of a practical nature, little can be learnt of the gross errors and absurdities with which the Romanists are chargeable. Are there not many other books issued cum permissu superiorum, by which we are equally justified in testing their tenets? The writers of the Romish Church cannot be expected to affix to every line,—'This is an article of faith;'—but when we find them maintaining the doctrines which she has added to the Apostles' Creed in that of Pope Pius IV., together with their unavoidable consequences, we shall freely rest upon their authority, and uncompromisingly denounce their errors as contrary to God's holy word.

["‡ A Papist Misrepresented and Represented, art. xxiii., p. 60. Edit. 1685.

release' of the souls of those faithful members of Jesus Christ who have not failed in their liberality to the Church; only one conclusion can be fairly drawn respecting the union of the two tenets in question, which for centuries has been so tenaciously maintained by the Church of Rome. The pecuniary benefit thence derived to the priesthood is the only rational means of accounting for the fact. 'They all look to their own way, every one for his gain, from his quarter.' (Isai. lvi. 11.) This was the moving cause, the exciting principle, which led to the introduction of the doctrine of purgatory, and its connexion with prayer for the dead. And that the like special watchfulness over the 'bequests of testators,' 'charitable works performed upon death-beds,' and 'alms disposed of in last wills,' has ever been exercised by the Romish Church, will appear from her ancient Statutes and Constitutions, published long before the meeting of the so-called General Council of Trent, A. D. 1563.

["In the Statutes of the diocess of Sodor, set forth in the year 1239, or nearly three centuries before the Reformation, there is the following decree:—'In regard to mortuary fees, let the best animal be paid over to the Church, whether it be a cow, or an ox, or a horse, if the value thereof be six shillings, or less. With respect to clothes, it shall be at the option of the Church to receive them as a mortuary, or three shillings and sixpence. And if the man be poor, and pay no mortuary, let the clothes be taken as they are, and every fifth penny of his personal property.'*

["Again:—'When a man pays a mortuary, the Priest is to have his boots to the value of sixpence, with his hood, or cap, be the value more or less, such as he wore it on Christmas-day: also his shirt and girdle, to the value of one penny; purse, to the value of one penny; and knife, to the value of one penny.'†

["In the Constitutions of Giles de Bridport, Bishop of Sarum, in 1256, it is decreed, that 'the Parson or Vicar, upon the death of any land-holder, shall receive the best head of cattle next after the heir; and if there should not be much cattle, the executors are bound to satisfy the Parson or Vicar, according as means permit, from the goods of the deceased, before they administer to his will.'‡

["Again, in the Constitutions of the diocess of Sodor, A. D. 1291, it is decreed that, 'according to the custom of the neighbouring provinces, the Church shall have the option of all the cattle of the deceased, except one; with all his clothes, and his bed, or couch. But if he have not a couch, let sevenpence be given instead; and let oblations be made for every dead person, according to his means, both in pence and candles, in his parish church. And we forbid, under pain of excommunication, that any corpse be carried elsewhere for burial, until a mass shall have been performed for it in the parish church.'*

["According to Lindwood,† the whole personal estate of the deceased was sometimes assigned by the Ordinary, for the benefit of the soul of the defunct, when there were neither parents, wife, nor children. Sometimes a half, when there was a wife surviving, but no children. And when there were both wife and children, a third of the personal property was assigned for funeral expenses and masses.

["The people, however, writhing, at different times, under these exactions, often gave or alienated the whole of their property, in order to elude the mercenary grasp of the priesthood, so that it was really bestowed 'according to their last will and testament.' On this account the Constitutions of Richard, Bishop of Ossory, A. D. 1320, declared that those who did so, 'cruelly defrauded their own souls of works of piety after death, and deprived the same, as far as in them lay, of the suffrages of prayer:'‡ and further declared, that 'those who thus defrauded the Church, by a private distribution of their property, should not be admitted to Christian burial, unless with the special licence of the Bishop.'§ And the Constitutions of Archbishop Stratford, A. D. 1342, ordained a similar penalty, 'any absolution from the said sentence notwithstanding.'‖

["Moreover, to make assurance doubly sure, it was ordained that, in time of sickness, and doubtless for the benefit of his soul, 'every sick person should make his will in the presence of his Confessor and neighbours.'¶

["* 'Statuendo præcipimus, quod de bonis cujuslibet decedentis Ecclesia habeat optionem de omnibus, juxta consuetudinem vicinarum provinciarum, excepto uno; cum omnibus indumentis suis, et fulcro vel culcitra. Quod si non habeat birretum et culcitram, septem dentur denarii. Et cum quolibet mortuo juxta facultates fiant oblationes tam in denariis, quam in candelis, in ecclesia sua parochiali. Et sub pœna excommunicationis inhibemus, ne aliquis mortuus alio loco deferatur sepeliendus, donec missa pro eo fuerit celebrata in ecclesia sua parochiali.'—Idem, in Constitut. Synod. Sodoren., c. xi., vol. ii., p. 176.

["† Johnson's Collection of Ecclesiastical Laws, vol. ii. Stratford's Constit. MCCCXLIII., const. 7. London, 1720.

["‡ 'In semetipsos crudelissimi animas suas proprias defraudent post mortem operibus pietatis, et orationum suffragia, quantum in iis est, penitus subtrahant ab iisdem.'—Idem, in Constitut. Synod. Ossoriens., art. xvi., vol. ii., p. 505.

["§ 'Ordinamus et statuimus, quod quicunque in mortis articulo constitutus, vel ante, omnia bona sua donaverit cuicunque machinando mortem proximi sui, vel in fraudem Ecclesiæ et creditorum, et animæ propriæ dispendium, ad sepulturam ecclesiasticam nullo modo admittatur sine licentia Episcopi speciali.'—Idem, ibid.

["‖ 'Donantes insuper, et sua bona in ipsa provincia taliter alienantes, propter sui gravitatem excessus, non obstante quacunque absolutione impensa a prædicta sententia, ecclesiastica careant sepultura.'—Idem, in Concil. Londinen., c. ix., vol. ii., p. 706.

["¶ 'Statutum est, quod universi fideles in infirmitate positi, Confessore suo et vicinis astantibus, cum debita solemnitate testamentum condant, et bona sua mobilia, dummodo uxores et liberos habeant, (ære alieno, et servientium mercede exceptis,) in tres partes dividant; unam liberis, alteram uxori legitimæ, tertiam propriis exequiis relinquentes. Et si forte prolem legitimam non habuerint, bona ipsa inter ipsum et uxorem in duo media dividantur. Et si legitima uxor decesserit, inter ipsum et liberos bipartiri debent.'—Idem, in Constitut. Cassiliens., A. D. 1172. Can. 6, vol. i., p. 473.

["'It is ordained that all Christians, when visited by sickness, make a will with due solemnity in the presence of their Confessor and neighbours, dividing their moveables, (after the payment of debts and servants' wages,) when they have wives and children, into three parts; so as to leave one to the children, another to the lawful wife, and a third for the funeral expenses. If a man have no legitimate children, his estate is to be divided between himself (that is, his dues to the Church) and his wife. And if his lawful wife be dead, between himself and his children.'

["* 'In mortuariis principale animal Ecclesiæ persolvatur, vacca vel bos, aut equus, si fuerit ad valorem vi. sol. aut minus. Et quantum ad vestes, si homo mortuarium persolverit, ad arbitrium Ecclesiæ stabit, an vestes aut iii. sol. et vi. den. habere maluerit. Et si pauper fuerit, et nullum mortuarium persolverit, accipiantur vestes, sicuti sunt; et quintus quisque denarius ex liberis.'—Concilia Magnæ Britanniæ; in Statut. Synod. Sodorens., vol. i., p. 664. Edit. Wilkins, London, 1737.

["† 'Debita Clerico persolvenda sunt hæc. Si homo mortuarium persolverit, Clericus habeat ipsius hominis caligas, calceamenta ad pretium vi. den., et caputium, pileum, aut capellum, pretii majoris vel minoris, sicuti ipse homo in die natalis Domini ambulaverit. Item camissiam, zonam ad unius denarii valorem, bursam ad unius denarii valorem, et cultellum ad unius denarii valorem.'—Idem, ibid.

["‡ 'Item Persona, seu Vicarius, in obitu cujuscunque terram tenentis, de tenemento defuncti percipiet melius averium post dominum; et si forte non fuerint ibi plura averia, executores defuncti tenentur satisfacere Personæ vel Vicario de bonis, quæ fuerunt defuncti, prout facultates suppetunt, antequam alibi aliqua executio de testamento fiat defuncti.'—Idem, in Constitut. Ægidii de Bridport., vol. i., p. 713.

[" Elsewhere also it is decreed, that 'those who make not their wills in the presence of a Priest, shall be looked upon as having died intestate.'*

[" Indeed, so crafty and avaricious were the priesthood, that, in the year 1530, Sir Henry Guildford declared in Parliament, that 'the great polling, and extreme exaction which the spiritual men used in taking corpse-presents, or mortuaries, was such, that the children of the dead might all die for hunger, and go a begging, rather than they would, of charity, give to them the silly cow, which the dead man ought, if he had but only one.'†

[" Passages such as these are sufficient to show the extent to which the love of lucre has influenced the Romish Church, in setting forth the doctrine of purgatory, and upholding the Papal practice of praying for the dead. The effect of the precaution, 'that no will be made without the presence of a Priest,' none can doubt, who is in the least acquainted with the machinations of secret confession, the power of priestly persecution and intimidation, or the enchantment of extreme unction, as a passport into the Pope's paradise. There is no fiction in the tale of whole estates being diverted from their natural, their legal, their bounden course, for the purpose of establishing a chantry for securing priestly prayers for a speedy rescue from penal fire, for enriching a mortuary mass-house, or otherwise aggrandizing the priesthood, and enlarging the influence of the Roman See.‡ And, although one act of impiety will never justify another, yet, should we even admit the truth of the assertion, that cupidity at the Reformation destroyed the foundations of two thousand three hundred and seventy-four mass-houses,* it is no less true that by the crafty cupidity of the priesthood they were at first established." †]

We have seen that the dying sinner, if he be a wealthy man, may compound for ages of misery by bequeathing his riches to the Church. His spiritual guides do not always assert in as many words, that so much money will effectually deliver a soul from purgatory: though it should be thousands of pounds, and as many masses as they could purchase, the utmost that can be effected by this wealth is only a certain relief, mitigation, or abridgment of the duration of the torments of that place.

Those who are rich may purchase some mitigation of their torments; but those who have nothing to pay must suffer in their own persons all the pains of purgatorial fire, until they shall have made full satisfaction to divine justice by paying "the uttermost farthing." It is true, they may comfort themselves with the idea that their surviving friends will probably pay money to have masses said for them; but when they reflect how destitute their friends are, and what a monstrous debt stands against them, no poor sinner can derive much comfort from this reflection.

To the foregoing view may be objected what Gother says, "That such as have no relations or friends to pray for them, or give alms, or procure masses for their relief, are not neglected by the Church, which makes a general commemoration of all the faithful departed in every mass, and in every one of the canonical hours of the divine office." From this we infer, that those who have friends need expect no relief but by their alms, that is, by procuring masses for them; which is neither more nor less than paying money to the Priests. By this arrangement the poor who have no friends are in a woful plight. They are declared to be in purgatory; but the Church takes no particular interest in any of them, because there is none to pay money. They are brought in en masse, by a general commemoration of all the faithful; which can be of little avail when there is no specific reference to any individual case. In this general commemoration are included all who have paid for themselves, and all whose friends have paid for them, as well as all those who had neither money nor friends. It may also easily be supposed that the intentions of the Priest in saying masses will be directed to the souls of those who have paid liberally. Dens, however, allows, as quoted above, that the suffrages which would belong to those who are in heaven, or to the lost, may be transferred to the poor. But as he and all of them teach, that suffrages profit only those for whom they are given, and they are never given for those in heaven or hell, there can be no transfer to the poor from either of these quarters. But why do we reason logically on this point? Alas! it is of no avail, as the doctrine and its practices are unscriptural and simoniacal; and as such they must appear to every enlightened and unprejudiced individual.

[" * 'Præcipimus et statuimus, quod quilibet langnens in extremis agoniis, cum testamentum condere voluerit, vocet Capellanum Ecclesiæ et Clericum; et ipsis præsentibus, duobus vel tribus viris adhibitis bonis et fide dignis, testamentum suum ore suo ordinet: et ipse Sacerdos substantiam suam diligenter exquirat, et si in aliquibus creditoribus sit obnoxius, vel de ære alieno oneratus; quod si non fecerit, tanquam intestatus reputetur.'—Idem, in Constitut. Synod. Sodoren., cap. xxxi., vol. ii., p. 179.

[" 'We ordain and decree, that if any one, in the agonies of death, wishes to make his will, he shall call for the Minister of the Church and a Clerk; that in their presence, and before two or three good and trusty witnesses, he shall dictate his will by word of mouth: and that the Priest himself shall inquire diligently into his substance; to what creditors he is indebted, and with what debt he is encumbered: and that if he does not act thus, he shall be looked upon as intestate.'

[" † Extracts from Fox apud Wilkins's Concilia, vol. iii., p. 739.

[" ‡ Witness the statutes of Mortmain! Time was, when scarcely a will was made without a large portion of the dying man's estate being left to the Romish Church; so that if the Legislature had not interfered, the whole temporalities of the kingdom would, ere long, have been alienated from the State, and unduly appropriated by the hierarchy of Rome.

[" In the following Case it came out in evidence that the 'Secular Clergy, who are associated to the General Fund in the counties of Lancaster, Westmoreland, Cumberland, and Chester,' are bound by the following rules:—

[" 'That each of the brethren shall study to promote this stock in apt and fitting ways.

[" 'That he shall, with the greatest prudence, exhort to this same pious work his friends and patrons, not only at death, but whenever any quantity of alms is to be distributed.

[" 'Each Priest shall celebrate mass every month for the benefactors of this stock in general, once for each Priest enrolled in the books, thrice when he shall depart out of this life, and also once for every Priest throughout England, when notice shall reach him of his death.

[" 'Each Priest also in particular shall commend benefactors to God according to the proportion of their donations; that is to say, each Priest, beside the general recommendation, shall celebrate specially once for him who shall have given £10; twice for him who shall have given £20, and so forth.

[" 'Ten Pounds, taken from the Fund, and to be made up from the yearly supply, shall be deposited in reserve with the Superior, to afford help in wills of this kind, which he shall impart according to the equity of his judgment.'

[" These rules are taken from the Latin copy printed in Manchester, in the year 1827, at the press of J. A. Robinson. Copied from a printed Appeal to the House of Lords, pp. 12, 13, in Appendix. See Middleton v. Sherburne. Young and Collyer's Equity Reports, vol. iv., part 2, p. 358. West v. Shuttleworth. Mylne and Keene's Reports, vol. ii., p. 684. Attorney-General v. Todd. Keene's Reports, vol. i., p. 803. Attorney-General v. Fishmongers' Company. Beavan's Reports, vol. ii., p. 151. Devereux v. Bullock. Phillimore's Reports, vol. i., p. 60. Southey's Book of the Church, chap. x., p. 185. London, 1841.

[" * Milner's End of Controversy, Letter lvi., p. 378."]

[† Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 313—318.]

It is true the Council of Trent prohibits what has a reference to filthy lucre; but, we have shown, that it authorizes and even enjoins those things which unequivocally embrace both the sins of simony and filthy lucre. The Council was aware that scandal and offence arose from the pecuniary traffic which had been carried on in relation to purgatory: and yet they did not contradict this false doctrine, and correct these lucrative practices; but, on the contrary, established both, in commanding Bishops to teach the people to perform acts of charity on behalf of the faithful who are dead; that is, "to give money to the Priests for the relief of the souls which are in purgatory." The custom of many ages forms a practical proof that Roman Priests have amassed immense wealth by means of the doctrine of purgatory; and it may not be amiss in this place to exhibit some of those expedients by which this has been accomplished.

(1.) Great care is taken to bring this subject constantly before the people. In public discourses the miseries of purgatory, the value of masses, and various figures which imagination can paint, are presented in order to induce all to contribute for their relief.

(2.) Prayers are formed on purpose, to make this service appear as solemn and important as possible. They are prepared to be offered at the moment of death, at stated intervals after it, and at the return of the anniversary of the event. A solemn office for the dead forms part of the service of the Church, and is usually recited once a month, and in Lent once a week: on All-Souls' day extraordinary masses are also said for their relief.

(3.) Arrangements may be made at any time with the Priest, to procure private masses to be said for the benefit of a friend, whose deliverance out of purgatory is desired: and should the friends of the deceased be slow in procuring masses, the Priest will soon inform them that their relative is in purgatory, and that a certain sum is immediately required, either to release him altogether, or to mitigate his pain.

[A modern writer records the following account:—

["At the conclusion of our entertainment, we heard the church-bell toll, what in Spain is called las animas, 'the souls.' A man, bearing a large lantern with a painted glass, representing two naked persons enveloped in flames, entered the court, addressing every one of the company in these words: 'The holy souls, brother! remember the holy souls.' Few refused the petitioner a copper coin, worth about the eighth part of a penny. This custom is universal in Spain. A man, whose chief employment is to be agent for the souls in purgatory, in the evening—the only time when the invisible sufferers are begged for about the towns—and for some saint or Madonna during the day, parades the streets after sunset, with the lantern I have described, and never fails to visit the inns, where the travellers, who generally intrust their safety from robbers to the holy souls, are always ready to make some pecuniary acknowledgment for past favours, or to engage their protection in future dangers. The tenderness of all sorts of believing Spaniards for the souls in purgatory, and the reliance they place on their intercession with God, would almost be affecting, did it not originate in the most superstitious credulity. The doctrine of purgatory is very easily, nay, consistently, embraced by such as believe in the expiatory nature of pain and suffering. The best feelings of our hearts are, besides, most ready to assist the imagination in devising means to keep up an intercourse with that invisible world, which either possesses already, or must soon possess, whatever has engaged our affections in this. Grief for a departed friend loses half its bitterness with a Catholic, who can firmly believe that not a day shall pass without repeated and effectual proofs of attachment on his part, till he join the conscious object of his love in bliss. While other articles of the Catholic faith are too refined and abstract for children, their tender and benevolent minds eagerly seize on the idea of purgatory fire. A parent or a brother, still kind to them in another world, yet suffering excruciating pains that may be relieved, shortened, and perhaps put an end to by some privation or prayer, are notions perfectly adapted to their capacity and feelings. Every year brings round the day devoted by the Church to the relief of the departed souls.

["The holy vestments used at the three masses, which, by a special grant, every Priest is allowed to perform that morning, are black. Large candles of yellow wax are placed over the graves within the churches; and even the church-yards, those humble places of repose appointed among us for criminals and paupers, are not neglected on that day of revived sorrows. Lights are provided for them at the expense of the Society established in every town of Spain, for the relief of the friendly spirits, who, for want of assistance, may be lingering in the purifying flames; and many of the members, with a Priest at their head, visit these cemeteries for nine successive evenings.

["Thus, even benevolence, under the guidance of superstition, degenerates into absurdity. It does not, however, stop here, but rushing headlong into the ludicrous, forces a smile upon the face of sympathy, and painfully compels our mirth where our tears were ready to flow. The religious ingenuity of the Catholics has gone so far as to publish the scheme of a lottery, for the benefit of such souls as might otherwise escape their notice. It consists of a large sheet of paper fixed in a frame, with an open box beneath it. Under different heads, numbered from one to ninety, the inventor of this pious game has distributed the most interesting cases which can occur on the debtor's side of the infernal Newgate, allotting to each a prayer, penance, or offering. In the box are deposited ninety pieces of card, distinguished by numbers corresponding to the ninety classes. According as the pious gambler draws the tickets, he performs the meritorious works enjoined in the scheme, generally a short prayer or slight penance,—transferring their spiritual value to the fortunate souls to whom each card belongs.

["Often in my childhood have I amused myself at this good-natured game. But the Inquisition is growing fastidious; and though the lottery of purgatory is as fairly grounded on the doctrines of Rome as the Papal bulls for the release of suffering souls, which are sold for sixpence, with a blank for inserting the name of the person in whose behalf it is purchased; the Inquisitors, it seems, will not allow the liberation of the departed to become a matter of chance, and the lottery scheme has lately been prohibited. Fortunately, we still have various means of assisting our friends in hades; for besides masses, bulls, prayers, and penances, the Pope has established eight or ten days in the year, on which every Spaniard, (for the grant is confined to Spain,) by kneeling at five different altars, and there praying for the extirpation of heresy, is entitled to send a species of habeas-animam writ to any of his friends in purgatory. The name of the person whose liberation is intended should, for fear of mistakes, be mentioned in the prayers. But lest the order of release should find him already free, or perhaps within those gates to which no Pope has ever ventured to apply his keys, we are taught to endorse the spiritual bill with other names, addressing it finally, to the most worthy and disconsolate.

[" These privileged days are announced to the public by a printed notice, placed over the bason of holy water, which stands near every church door; and as no one enters without wetting his forehead with the blessed fluid, there is no fear that the happy season should pass unheeded by the pious. The words written on the tablet are plain and peremptory: Hoy se saca anima; literally, 'This is a soul-drawing day.' " *]

(4.) Public applications are frequently made to obtain money for the purpose of paying for masses to be said for souls in purgatory. In Italy and Spain travellers are continually solicited for contributions.

For several ages before and after the sitting of the Council of Trent, the Clergy contented themselves with what they could extort from rich and poor individuals; but it was reserved for later times to devise plans by which the poor might act unitedly, in raising contributions on the small scale of a penny a week, to enrich the Priests by purchasing the release of souls believed to be in purgatory. This is done by the formation of Purgatorian Societies. In a pamphlet published by the Rev. James Carlile, of Dublin, in 1815, there is contained the constitution of such a Society formed in that city in 1813. Our readers have heard of penny-a-week Societies for different purposes, such as relieving the poor, educating children, circulating the Scriptures, &c.; but perhaps few have heard of Purgatorian Societies, for the purpose of raising money to relieve themselves and others from purgatory when there.

" PURGATORIAN SOCIETY,

"Instituted July 1*st*, 1813, and held in St. James's Chapel.

"In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

" 'It is therefore a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead, that they may be loosed from their sins.' (2 Macc. xii. 46.)

" THE members who compose the Society of the Office for the Dead, commenced on the above day, at the said place, adopting the spirit and meaning of the above sacred text, and wishing, in conformity to the Divine precepts of the holy Catholic Church, to extend their charitable views beyond the grave, by relieving, as far as in them lies, the suffering souls in purgatory, and inviting all tender-hearted Catholics, who have a feeling sensibility of the duty they owe their departed parents, relations, and friends, who probably may stand more in need of their commiseration at present than at any period of their lifetime, to assist in the charitable and pious purpose of shortening the duration of their sufferings by the most easy means imaginable, have agreed to and adopted the following rules:—

" Rule 1. That the affairs of this institution shall be regulated by the Superior, Rectors, and six of the members, who compose the Office for the Dead, who shall attend on every Wednesday night, at half-past eight o'clock, throughout the year, at the above-named place, or any other place which may be hereafter appointed, and there, with attention and devotion, recite the office for the dead, agreeable to the intention that shall then be mentioned.

" Rule 2. That every well-disposed Catholic wishing to contribute to the relief of the suffering souls in purgatory shall pay one penny per week, which shall be appropriated to the procuring of masses to be offered up for the repose of the souls of the deceased parents, relations, and friends, of all the subscribers to the institution in particular, and the faithful departed in general.

" Rule 3. That on the first Monday of every month a mass will be offered up in the parish chapel of St. James's, at ten o'clock, for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the subscribers of this Society.

" Rule 4. That the Superior, Rectors, and Council, shall continue in office for six calendar months; at the expiration of which time candidates shall be nominated by the persons in office, who shall give due notice to the whole body of members who compose the Office for the Dead, that they may punctually attend on the first Wednesday night in July, at half-past eight o'clock, and on the first Wednesday night in January, for the purpose of electing a Superior, Rectors, and Council, to serve the ensuing six months, and so in succession.

" Rule 5. That each subscriber, on entering this Society, do purchase a copy of these Rules, in order to defray the expenses incurred by printing, and other contingencies; and that the money arising from the weekly subscriptions shall be disposed of to the most necessitated Clergymen, who shall be required to give receipts for what they are paid.

" Rule 6. That the spiritual benefits of this institution shall be conferred in the following manner; namely, each subscriber shall be entitled to an office at the time of their death, another at the expiration of a month, and one at the end of twelve months after their decease; also the benefit of masses, which shall be procured to be offered by the money arising from subscriptions, and which shall be extended to their parents, relations, and friends, in the following order: that is to say, their fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, uncles, aunts, and, if married, husbands, wives, and children, if they have any departed who lived to maturity.

" Rule 7. That every member of the Office for the Dead who serves the Society in the capacity of Superior shall, at the time of his death, be entitled to three masses, to be offered for the repose of his soul; and also every member who serves the office of Rector shall be entitled to the benefit of two masses; and every subscriber, without distinction, shall be entitled to the benefit of one mass each, provided that such member or subscriber shall die a natural death, be six months a member of the institution, and be clear of all dues at the time of their departure; that care shall be taken, by the surviving Superior and Rectors, that such soul-masses are punctually obtained, agreeable to the interest [intent?] and meaning of this institution.

" Rule 8. That the Superior, Rectors, and Council, be empowered to make (as occasion may require) such by-laws as they shall think expedient, provided they do not interfere with the spirit of these Rules; said by-laws are to be laid before the body at large for their approbation: and that four shall form a quorum on the Council.

" Rule 9. That the Superior shall, on every All-Souls' day, advance to the parish Priest of James's-street chapel whatever sum is necessary for obtaining an insertion in the mortality-list of the altar the names of the parents, relations, and friends, of all the subscribers to this institution, to be recommended to the prayers of the congregation at every mass throughout the year.

" Subscriptions received and subscribers registered at the chapel on every Wednesday evening, from seven o'clock until nine, and in the school-room adjoining the chapel, on the first Sunday of February, May, August, and November, being quarterly days, from ten o'clock until one.

[* Doblado's Letters from Spain, pp. 150—154.]

"The books to be opened for the inspection of subscribers."

"J. COYNE, Printer.

"Price Three Pence." *

The following article in the Quarterly Review for September, 1818, page 109, shows that a Purgatorian Society was established in London in 1810:—

"The Roman Catholics in London have an association of Sunday-schools, and the reader may be edified by the title under which it has been instituted, and by some of its rules. It is called a 'Spiritual Association, in honour of the most holy Trinity, and under the protection of the blessed Virgin Mary, for the relief of souls in purgatory, and instruction of the ignorant.'

"All moneys acquired by this charity, from subscriptions or otherwise, shall be destined to provide that the holy sacrifice of the mass be offered for the intentions of the Society, and for the support of the schools.

"At the death of any member, mass shall be said three times for the repose of his (or her) soul. Masses shall be said every month for the deceased members of the Sodality in general. The standing intentions of this Society shall be: First, The soul most in need. Secondly, The deceased members. Thirdly, The welfare of the living subscribers.

"A member may enter the names of his departed parents or friends on the books of the Society; and such deceased persons shall be deemed members of the same, and partake of its spiritual advantages, as long as their subscriptions continue to be paid.

"The rosary of the blessed Virgin Mary shall be said daily for the intentions of the Society, and on no account whatever be omitted." †

["Let the reader attend to these documents. The former Society, he will observe, was instituted about two years ago.‡ He will also observe that it is countenanced by the Clergy, at least those of St. James's; for it is held in the chapel. Let him then advert to the objects of it. They are to relieve suffering souls in purgatory, particularly those of the members of the Society, when they shall go thither, and their relations who are already there, by the most easy means imaginable. And what are these means? Why, paying a penny per week, as the easiest manner of raising money to procure masses. It is natural to ask to whom this money is to go, which is thus expended? and the answer must be, To the Clergy, for they alone can give them. But, besides these, there is mentioned, in the ninth rule, a kind of subordinate help to the poor suffering souls; namely, insertion into the mortality-list of the altar, which recommends them to the prayers of the congregation at every mass throughout the year; and this privilege, also, is to be purchased of the parish Priest of St. James's by the Society.

["'In what a light does this place the priesthood! They believe, or at least they teach, that the friends of their flock are lying weltering in a lake of fire, from which they could deliver them by saying masses for them, and recommending them to the prayers of the congregation; and yet they will not perform these services, nor even recommend them, unless they be regularly paid for it. How can a man represent himself as such a monster, and yet hold up his head in civilized society? What! shall I believe that a single soul is suffering torments so dreadful; that it may continue to suffer them for ages; that I have the means in my power of relieving it; and yet shall I coolly wait till I be paid, before I use these means? By what process of reasoning can men be brought to believe, that this is the religion given to us for our salvation, by our kind and merciful Father in heaven? By what arguments can the poor be convinced that a system of extortion, which gives so manifest a preference to the rich, can be that Gospel which was to be preached peculiarly to the poor?

["'But the reader may be most surprised to learn, that intelligent, upright, and conscientious individuals belong to this Society, and conduct it. The very style of correctness with which the rules of it are composed and arranged; the care and foresight with which they are fenced and guarded, show them to be the work of a man of judgment and prudence. The fifth rule provides that the money shall be disposed of to the most necessitated Clergymen, who must give receipts for what they are paid. The sixth marks precisely the order and consanguinity in which the benefits of the Society are to be extended, to parents, relations, and friends. The seventh gives encouragement to persons conducting the business of the Society, and provides, that a subscriber, in order to obtain the benefit of it, must be of six months' standing; must die a natural death; and must be clear of all dues at the time of his departure. The ninth rule seems to be intended to provide a kind of remuneration for the use of the chapel of St. James's; for it confines the money that is to be expended in procuring the prayers of congregations, to the Priest of that parish. There is one point, indeed, which seems to be left very vague and indeterminate; namely, what precise effect the masses and prayers will have, whether they will relieve the souls from purgatory immediately, or whether they will only shorten the duration of their sufferings. That they may be relieved at once from purgatory, that they may even be saved from going thither, by certain processes, or that the precise relief may be ascertained, is manifest from some of the indulgences quoted above; one of which provides that he who complies with the terms of it shall never see purgatory; another, that if he were there, he shall be delivered from it; and another assures him of ninety thousand years of respite. Now, it would surely be satisfactory, to those who subscribe to this Society, if they knew precisely how much it would take to deliver each soul, or what is the exact diminution of suffering that each mass effects; because, for aught I see, they may be paying for the relief of those who are already finally relieved: whereas, if they knew better what they were doing, they could save that money, and apply it to the relief of those who certainly need such aid. I am afraid, however, that the Clergy are too cunning to fix this matter with any great precision; for nothing can be more profitable in this traffic than a little uncertainty. The bare possibility of any ease being procured by a little money, for a dear friend recently deceased, must be an almost irresistible inducement to bestow it.

["'O, awful delusion! that men, with the light of the Gospel shining upon them, should persuade themselves that the God of heaven would actually sell, for money, relief from some necessary purgation, or some

* M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. ii., No. lxxvii., pp. 210—212.
† Quarterly Review, vol. xix., p. 109, 110, note.
["‡ This was written in 1815.

merited punishment! Look at this Society again, and say, whether it might not with much greater propriety be denominated, A Society for the Relief of necessitous Clergymen, than for the relief of souls in purgatory! Survey the whole transaction. A self-elected, incorporated body declare, that they alone are commissioned by God, to teach what he chooses should be known, respecting eternity and the world of spirits; and that the truth of what they teach, nay, and the reality of their commission, are not to be examined, further than they themselves think fit to submit them to examination. Among many other doctrines equally profitable to themselves, they teach, that the souls even of those who listen to them implicitly, must go to a place of torment for a time, to be purified, before they enter on the infinite rewards of their implicit faith and obedience; that they, by performing certain mystical ceremonies or incantations, which they call mass, can shorten this torturing purgation, or release the soul from it altogether; that they are warranted, nay, for aught I know, commanded by God, to exact money for performing these masses, which money is to be appropriated to their own use; and they countenance their people in forming Societies to raise money, for the purpose of purchasing masses from the most necessitous among themselves. I appeal to any man of common discernment, if ever he met with a transaction, that bore fraud and imposture so legibly written on the face of it, as this does! And yet, where can we look for deliverance to our fellow-countrymen, from these tricks that are every day practised upon them, and for the sake of which they are studiously kept in the most profound ignorance? No ray of light is permitted to reach them; and, lest by any chance a passing gleam might shine upon them, they are taught to shut their eyes, and to believe that every one is their enemy that would persuade them to look around them.'"*]

["From the Catholic Directory for 1838, it appears that Purgatorian Societies are still flourishing in the diocess of Ossory. In that for the year 1841, several charitable institutions are enumerated, prefaced with the apocryphal motto, 'Alms deliver from all sin, and from death; and will not suffer the soul to go into darkness.' (Tobias iv. 11. Douay version.)

["Among them is the 'London Mission Fund,' whose subscribers are tempted by the promise of 'a participation in the benefit of four masses that are celebrated every week in the Bishop's College for its members and benefactors.' Again: the benefactors and subscribers to the 'Secular Clergy common Fund' are allured by the regulation, that 'all the members of the Fund are bound to say four masses each, every year, for members and benefactors, living and dead.' 'The more wealthy of their communion' are appealed to in behalf of 'the struggling institution of the Catholic Free School of St. Francis.' The benefactors to this establishment are promised 'an exceeding great reward in heaven;' and also 'the offering of the holy sacrifice on the feast of St. Francis Xavier.' 'The Society of Catholic Ladies, for providing poor churches with the necessary altar linen, vestments,' &c., seem to be even more highly favoured. 'Once every indulgence the most holy sacrifice is offered up in behalf of the members of this Society. At the decease of a member, one mass is said for her soul; and, in the week following All Souls, requiem is sung for all the deceased members. The smallest donation regularly contributed (the poor usually give sixpence at each indulgence) entitles the donor to be a member of the Society; and a yearly subscription of one pound constitutes a member of the Committee.'

["In the Catholic Directory for 1842, it is announced that 'monthly masses will be said for such benefactors as will aid in paying off the debt on the chapel and schools' situated in Wade-street, Poplar; and, in addition to this privilege, that 'mass shall be said every quarter for those who are interred in the burial-ground.' At Duckinfield, St. Mary's, near Manchester, there is a Society attached to the chapel, termed St. Marie's Society, which has for its object the liquidation of the heavy debt upon the building. The members participate in the advantages of two masses offered up on the first Monday and Tuesday of every month. The subscription to be paid by a member is but one penny a week.' 'A halfpenny per week' will enrol a member in the Association for the Propagation of the Faith, which was established in France in 1822; and, as an inducement to subscribe, the public are assured that 'numerous indulgences have been granted to the members of the Society by several Pontiffs.'

["Hence it appears that the mainspring for the excitement of Christian liberality is not the love of God in Christ, but the delusive hopes of benefits to be received for the souls of the living and the dead, from Popish masses and solemn requiems! In fact, there is scarcely an institution or Society connected with the Romish Church, within the meshes of which, openly or covertly, is not thickly coiled the tortuous cunning of this wily, enslaving, and deadly doctrine of purgatory.

["Dr. Moore, in his Travels in Italy, (A.D. 1775,) mentions a Society of persons who attend upon criminals when under sentence of death, and collect money to pay for masses to be said for the purpose of praying them out of purgatory. He witnessed the execution of a criminal who was hung for the fifth murder he was known to have committed. During the time the body was suspended on the gallows, the members of this Society went to a neighbouring church, and remained there while a mass was said for the repose of his soul. The author also observes, that boxes were fixed in churches, and against the walls of convents, for the purpose of collecting money for these objects; and that the people were reminded of this charity not only by inscriptions, but also by pictures. 'Over the boxes,' says he, 'into which you are directed to put your money, views of purgatory are painted in the most flaming colours, where people are seen in all the agonies of burning, raising their eyes to those unmindful relations and acquaintances, who, rather than part with a little money, allow them to remain in those abodes of torments.'"*]

There is one custom which prevails extensively in Ireland, and perhaps in other countries also, which excels even Purgatorian Societies in corruption. It is called "canting the corpse." This is done very much after the manner of an auctioneer, in the act of selling property under the hammer; for the term "canting" is used in Ireland in the same sense as "auction" or "vendue" is employed in America. Previous to the funeral procession, mass is performed for the soul of the deceased. Immediately at the close of this ceremony, and before the procession commences, the Priest proceeds to collect money from the persons assembled. He begins by saying, "Who gives for the soul of the faithful departed ?" The nearest relatives are the first and the most liberal contributors. When the first announcement is made, one gives in his name by pronouncing it aloud, coming forward and laying down his offering, as it is called, on the table, or on a plate laid on the coffin for the purpose. As soon as this is done, and while he is laying down his money, the Priest proclaims aloud the offerer's name, and immediately adds, "Who will give more for the soul of the departed ?" Then another comes forward, names himself, and lays down the money: and thus the ceremony proceeds as long as there is any person to contribute. The Priest, however, does not forget to utter a blessing on each as he presents his offering on the coffin or table, by saying, "God bless you." Thus the process continues while any money can be obtained. That success on these occasions is considerable, we may conclude, from the strong belief of purgatory in the minds of his hearers, and various affecting peculiarities connected with the event, when the friends and neighbours of the deceased are touched with all the feelings which the recent loss and prospective sufferings of a beloved relative can inspire. Protestants, notwithstanding their rejection of the doctrine, have been known to contribute liberally at such seasons, being induced thereto by the sympathies of human nature, which obtain great power under these circumstances. However, the appeal of the Priest is never made in vain, and for the most part the success is abundant. We have witnessed these scenes many times in the north of Ireland, and we learn the custom prevails throughout the whole country. Whether it obtains in other places we are not informed. Our description is what we have seen, and know to be practised, so far as our acquaintance extended; and it was as general as the occurrence of Roman Catholic funerals, and appeared to produce no disgust or opposition.*

[* M'Gavin, Protestant, vol. ii., p. 212—215. Tenth edition.

[* Hall's Doctrine of Purgatory, and Practice of praying for the Dead, examined, pp. 322—324, 344, 345.]

10. The doctrine of purgatory, and the practices which are connected with it, encourage, inculcate, and establish merchandise of souls. The instances given in our last paragraph afford striking proofs of this. The cases that could be given to exemplify it, are so numerous, that a volume could not contain them; and so dark and atrocious are they as to surpass the belief of ingenuous Protestants, who have not been conversant with these evil deeds of the Papacy. Indeed, this unchristian traffic is carried on with unblushing effrontery in Roman Catholic countries, and even in those which are professedly Protestant; and although the practice is conducted with considerable caution and privacy, there are instances of frequent occurrence to prove, that purgatory is the great market for traffic in human souls.

In Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, a curious case was brought before the Court. It was a suit instituted against the Priest, who lived in that neighbourhood, by heirs, because his Reverence had not said the proper and prescribed number of masses for a deceased relative, which the price of a farm called for, that had been bequeathed to the Priest or Church, for the purpose of laying out its value in masses to be said for the repose of his soul. Considerable excitement was raised in consequence.

The Church of Rome, infallible and always the same, knows how to carry on her merchandise in the souls of men in a wholesale way. Thus Henry D. Inglis, in his Account of Spain, gives the following case:— "I was greatly amused by the history of a law-suit that was pending while I was at Alicant. A certain rich proprietor, having died about six months before, left money to the Church sufficient to purchase twelve thousand masses for his soul: but after a few of these had been said, the masses were discontinued; and the process was brought by the heir to recover the sum left for the masses, the Church having failed to fulfil the condition upon which the money was bequeathed. The defence set up was sufficiently singular. Those upon whom the duty of saying these masses devolved, willing to be excused from the labour, interceded with the Bishop, who interceded with His Holiness the Pope: the defence against the claim was the production of the Pope's letter, which declared, by his sovereign authority, that the celebration of twelve masses should have the same effect, and be as beneficial to the soul of the deceased, as the celebration of twelve thousand masses. The decision upon the case had not been given when I left Alicant: but as it involved a question touching the Pope's spiritual power, the probabilities are, that His Holiness would prove an overmatch for the heir. The argument of the counsel in support of the claim was merely non-fulfilment of the stipulated duty: while the argument of the Church was, that the deceased had intended to benefit his soul to a certain extent, for which he left a certain sum of money; and that since his soul was benefited to the same extent by the performance of twelve, as of twelve thousand masses, the intention of the deceased was equally fulfilled, and the money therefore equally the property of those who fulfilled it. But this evidently leaves room for a rejoinder, as to the power and value of the Pope's letter." *

["The devout desire," says Bourgoing, "to benefit departed souls is universal in Spain. The people know the day a soul is to be taken out of purgatory, and you frequently see an advertisement against the doors of churches: Hoy se saca anima; 'To-day a soul is delivered.' After the death of any person the masses are without end: however poor the relations may be, they must deprive themselves of every thing for the repose of the soul of their departed friend. The masses a man appoints to be said for him after his death are privileged: his soul is preferred to his creditors. Philip V. ordered, by his will, all the Priests of the place where he should die to say mass the same day for the repose of his soul; besides which, they were to celebrate during three days, before privileged altars, as many masses as possible; and that he might not fail in his purpose, he further commanded an hundred thousand masses to be said in his behalf, the surplus of as many as were necessary to conduct him to heaven, reversible to poor solitary souls, concerning whom no person bestowed a thought.'" †

[The subjoined bill of masses, said for the dead, we have transcribed from a curious collection of letters and other documents relating to the Royal Military and Hospitaller ‡ Order of Knights of St. Lazarus, which are preserved in the library of the British Museum. The volume is numbered 8859 of the Additional Manuscripts, and endorsed "Messrs. Chevaliers de Mont Carmel."

* See M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. ii., pp. 234—236. Tenth edition.

[* Inglis's Spain in 1830, vol. ii., pp. 234, 235. Second edition.

[† Bourgoing's Modern State of Spain, vol. iv., pp. 272, 273. 8vo. London, 1808.]

[‡ Hospitallers, an Order of religious Knights, who built an hospital at Jerusalem, wherein pilgrims were received. To these Pope Clement V. transferred the effects and revenues of the Templars, whom, by a Council held at Vienne, he suppressed for their misdemeanours. These Hospitallers were called Knights of St. John at Jerusalem, and are now called Knights of Malta.

[" MEMORANDUM OF MASSES, WHICH HAVE BEEN SAID IN THE CHURCH OF THE RELIGIOUS CARMELITES, CALLED (THOSE) OF THE HOLY SACRAMENT 'DES BILLETTES,' ON THE DAYS OF THE PROMOTIONS OF MESSIEURS THE KNIGHTS OF THE ROYAL, MILITARY, AND HOSPITALLER ORDER OF OUR LADY OF MOUNT CARMEL, AND OF ST. LAZARUS.

	1702.	LIVRES.
3.	April 8.—One mass in the tribune	10
10.	May 14.—One mass in the choir of the church	20
10.	May 29.—One mass in the choir of the church	20
20.	July 20.—A service for the dead the day after the festival	20
3.	August 6.—A mass in the tribune	10
20.	December 18.—A service for the dead on the day after St. Lazarus' (day)	20
	1703.
3.	February 11.—A mass in the tribune	10
10.	March 20.—A mass in the low choir of the church	20
10.	March 25.—A mass in the low choir of the church	20
10.	April 29.—A mass in the low choir of the church	20
3.	June 2.—A mass in the tribune	10
20.	July 17.—A service for the dead on the day after the festival	20
20.	December 18.—A service for the dead on the day after St. Lazarus' (day)	20
	1704.
3.	January 31.—A mass in the tribune	10
20.	July 17.—A service for the dead on the day after the festival	20
3.	November 23.—A mass in the tribune	10
3.	December 23.—A mass in the tribune	10
	1705.
3.	January 25.—A mass in the tribune	10
3.	February 5.—A mass in the tribune	10
20.	February 7.—A service for the dead on the day after St. Lazarus' (day), the ceremony of which was postponed to this day	20
	Total, three hundred and ten livres	310

[" I certify that the above services have been performed.

[" Monsieur de Breget, Chancellor and General-Treasurer of the Order, is most humbly requested to pay the Reverend Father Sacristan des Billettes the sum of three hundred and ten livres contained in the present memorandum, which has been adjusted, subject to the pleasure of Monseigneur the Grand-Master, and Messieurs the Council of the Order.

" Paris, February 23d, 1705.

" SILVEST. DE SAULEUX.

[" Mgr. the Grand-Master and the Council have ascertained (or fixed) the present bill at one hundred and ninety-seven (livres), and (have) determined that, in future, three livres only shall be paid for low masses in the tribune, in consideration of the fees which the R(everend) F(athers) have out of the admission fees;* and twenty livres for masses for the dead, which shall be said only once a year.

" Ordered, the last (day) of February, 1705.

" B. DE BREGET.

[" I, the undersigned Monk, Priest (and) Sacristan of the Carmelites Billettes, acknowledge to have received of Monsieur de Breget, General-Treasurer of the Orders of Our Lady of Mount Carmel and of St. Lazarus, the sum of one hundred and ninety-seven livres for the account settled, from the 8th of April, 1702, to the 7th of February, 1705, a discharge for which has been given at Paris this 18th of March, 1705.*

" F. BENJAMIN, SACRISTAN DES BILLETTES." †]

[* " It has been estimated that the Neapolitan Clergy extort between five-and-thirty and forty thousand pounds per annum from all classes of their flocks, under pretence of 'clearing souls from purgatory!' This subject affords a frequent topic for pulpit oratory; and a modern traveller relates a recent instance of the manner in which it is handled. 'He was one of a crowded auditory, when the drum-ecclesiastic opened his discourse with a deluge of rhetorical bedevilment, admirably calculated to warm his hearers' imaginations. At last he made an appeal to the souls in purgatory themselves, and they were heard responding with a doleful tale of their sufferings. The Preacher then turned round to the congregation, exclaiming, That voice which you heard was your brother's, your mother's, your son's, or daughter's; but he appeared very wary of saying it was a wife's or husband's. It was most edifying to mark the adroitness with which he played upon his hearers' consciences; nor was it to small purpose, for he gleaned a harvest of alms which made his eyes glisten with delight, and, doubtlessly, effected the release of many a tortured soul from transmundane pains and penalties that very day. On some occasions even dramatic clap-traps are played off by the brethren of the cowl and rosary; but this farce is never adventured, excepting before a select audience, and then rockets are let off behind the altar, as a type of the ascent of souls from purgatory into paradise.'"

[† " MEMOIRE DES MESSES, QUI ONT ETE DITS DANS L'EGLISE DES RELIGIEUX CARMES DITS DU ST. SACREMENT DES BILLETTES, AUX JOURS DES PROMOTIONS DE MESSIEURS LES CHEVALIERS DE L'ORDRE ROYAL, MILITAIRE, ET HOSPITALIER DE NOTRE DAME DE MONT CARMEL ET DE ST. LAZARE.

	1702.	LIVRES.
3.	Le 8 Avril.—Une messe dans la tribune	10
10.	Le 14 May.—Une messe dans le chœur de l'église	20
10.	Le 29 May.—Une messe dans le chœur de l'église	20
20.	Le 20 Juillet.—Un service des défuncts le lendemain de la fête	20
3.	Le 6 Août.—Une messe dans la tribune	10
20.	Le 18 Décembre.—Un service des defuncts le lendemain de St. Lazare	20
	1703.
3.	Le 11 Février.—Une messe dans la tribune	10
10.	Le 20 Mars.—Une messe dans le bas chœur de l'église	20
10.	Le 25 Mars.—Une messe dans le bas chœur de l'église	20
10.	Le 29 Avril.—Une messe dans le bas chœur de l'église	20
3.	Le 2 Juin.—Une messe dans la tribune	10
20.	Le 17 Juillet.—Un service des défuncts le lendemain de la fête	20
20.	Le 18 Décembre.—Un service des défuncts le lendemain de St. Lazare	20
	1704.
3.	Le 31 Janvier.—Une messe dans la tribune	10
20.	Le 17 Juillet.—Un service des défuncts le lendemain de la fête	20
3.	Le 23 Novembre.—Une messe dans la tribune	10
3.	Le 23 Décembre.—Une messe dans la tribune	10
	1705.
3.	Le 25 Janvier.—Une messe dans la tribune	10
3.	Le 5 Févri.—Une messe dans la tribune	10
20.	Le 7 Févri.—Un service des défuncts le lend. de St. Lazare, dont la cérémonie a été remise à ce jour	20
	Total, trois cent dix livres cy	310

[" Je certifie les services cy dessus avoir été faitz.

[" Monsieur de Breget, Chancelier et Trésorier-Général de l'Ordre, est trés humblement prié de payer au Reverend Père Sacristain des Billettes la somme de trois cent dix livres, continue au present

[" * That is, the fees paid by the Knights on their admission into the Orders of our Lady of Mount Carmel, and of St. Lazarus."

[" In what high repute the doctrine of salvation from purgatory, by donations of property to the Clergy, was held when Popery was in its best days, may be fairly gathered from the tenor of those which were made to the Church. A few extracts from the History of Whitby, where many such cases appear, will cast light upon this subject:—

[" 'William Bore, to all that see or hear these letters, whether present or to come, greeting: Know ye that I have given, granted, and by this my present charter confirmed, to God and Saint Mary's in Godeland, and to the fraternity serving God there, one toft in Locintun, (query, Lockington, near Beverley?) which is between those of Thomas and Martin, for the souls of my father and mother, and for the salvation of my own soul, for a free, pure, and perpetual alms.'

[" 'To all sons of holy Mother Church. Thomas de Coleville, greeting: Know ye, that I have granted, and by this my charter confirmed, for a perpetual alms, the donation which Alan de Percy made to the church of St. Peter and St. Hilda at Whitby, and to the Monks of that place serving God; namely, two carucates of land, the one in Oxenham, and the other in Hetune, for the redemption of my own soul, and for the salvation of my ancestors.'

[" 'Know all who see or hear these letters, that I, Thorfine, and my heir, have given the church of Crosseby Ravenswart, with two carucates of land, to the church of St. Peter and St. Hylda at Wyteby, and to the Monks serving God there, free and clear from every exaction, for a perpetual alms, for the salvation of my Lord William de Romar, and his wife, and their sons and daughters, and for the salvation of our own souls, and those of our ancestors.'

[" Purgatory might well keep up its credit, when its advocates were so amply rewarded for fanning the penal, purging flame. Whether those who gave such gifts for the redemption and salvation of their own souls, the souls of their ancestors, and the souls of their posterity, obtained redemption and salvation, or were swindled out of their land, and cheated out of their souls, the convents were enriched; whether the 'fraternity of Monks served God there,' or kissed images, or prayed to the Virgin Mary, or recommended themselves to the souls in purgatory,* they lived well, and went on thrivingly; and it was their interest to make their benefactors believe, that the doctrine of purgatory is as true as the Bible, and that its fire would be as beneficial to the soul, as donations of land were to the monasteries."*]

If it be stated, that these are abuses of the doctrine, we reply, that they are nothing more than carrying into practical effect the decisions of the Council of Trent. We have shown, that though this Council forbade that which tends to superstition and filthy lucre, by confirming and re-enacting suffrages for the dead by masses, alms, prayers, &c., it has virtually annulled what it ordained respecting superstition and lucre, and has established this merchandise in souls, and has taught and practised the sin of simony in its worst form. Accordingly, the Church of Rome and the Council of Trent are condemned by the twenty-third canon of the Council of Constantinople, which was held in the year 692. The canon says, "that no Bishop, Priest, or Deacon shall demand money or any thing from the communicant on account of his communicating; for grace is not to be sold, but freely imparted without any trick."

11. The doctrine of purgatory is a powerful engine to work upon the feelings, fears, and passions of an ignorant and deluded people. It were easy to give specimens of passionate discourses, in which the doctrine of purgatory has been employed to create the most afflicting feelings with which a human soul could be exercised. Not only has the public Preacher, but the private priestly adviser also, made use of this doctrine to arouse the sympathies of near relatives, by informing them that their deceased friends were in this place of torment; and have accomplished their lucrative but nefarious purposes, by extorting money, through the medium of sporting with the fears of the ignorant, who ought rather to be taught than deceived. Instead of calling forth the truth of the Gospel, which sheds light upon immortality, they have engendered fear in their minds, and then practised the deception which has been grounded on these fears.

12. This unscriptural doctrine is nothing more than gross and grievous falsehood. The impositions practised by the priesthood in reference to this would fill volumes. We refer our readers to those who have entered fully into a detailed account of them.†

13. It is pernicious to the souls of men. By praying for the most wicked, as being only in purgatory, Papists are strongly tempted to conclude, that no members of their Church go to hell; and by creating many imaginary fears about this fictitious place, the pious are kept in a state of constant anxiety respecting themselves and their relatives. How applicable are the words of the Prophet!—"With lies ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad; and strengthened the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life." (Ezek. xiii. 22.) How admirably does this picture of the Prophet answer the deception practised by the inventions of purgatory!

14. Purgatory connects itself with the corrupt state of the Church of Rome, both in doctrine and in practice. A belief in the dogmas of Popery, and the practice of its ceremonies, are perfectly consistent with a life of wickedness. In the Church of Rome it is not necessary mémoire, qui a été arresté, sous le bon plaisirs de Monseigneur le Grand-Maistre, et de Messieurs du Conseil de l'Ordre. A Paris, le 23 Février, mil sept cent et cinq.

"SILVEST. DE SAULEUX.

[" Mgr. le Grand-Maistre et le Conseil ont réglé le present mémoire à cent quatre vingt dix sept, et arresté, qu' à l'advenir on ne payera les messes basses de la tribune qu' à trois livres, attendu les retributions que le R. P. ont dans les droits de passage, et les messes des morts qui ne se diront que d'un fois par an à vingt livres. Arresté, le dernier de Février, 1705.

"B. DE BREGET."

[" Je, sousigné Religieux, Prêtre, Sacristain des Carmes Billettes, reconnois avoir reçu de Monsieur de Breget, Trésorier-Général des Ordres de Notre Dame de Mont Carmel et de St. Lazare, la somme de cent quatre vingt dix sept livres, pour le mémoire arrestè, depuis le huit Avril, mil sept cent deux, jusqu'au Septe. Février, mil sept cent cinq, dont quittance faite à Paris, ce dix huit Mars, mil sept cent cinq.

"F. BENJAMIN, SACRISTAIN DES BILLETTES.

[" * In a Roman Catholic book, printed in London, 1796, and entitled 'Meditations on the four last Things for every Day of the Month,' we meet with the following direction: 'Recommend yourself to the Blessed Virgin, to your guardian angel, to your patrons, and the souls in purgatory.'" that a man be renewed in the spirit of his mind, or that he should crucify the flesh, with its affections and lusts. If he has been baptized, this makes him a new creature in ecclesiastical estimation. This, they assert, constitutes him a member of Christ; and he cannot be deprived of this connexion with the Saviour, unless he become a heretic, or excommunicated. His mortal sins are washed away, as it respects their eternal punishment, every time he confesses and receives absolution from the Priest. His venial or smaller sins do not render him liable to eternal punishment. He makes confession, and receives absolution, as often as he pleases, provided he can afford to pay; while it is evident by his whole conduct, that he is unfit for heaven, and that even to the hour of his death he is unholy and depraved. There remains knowledge sufficient in the minds of Roman Catholics to convince them, that persons dying with the pollutions of sin unremoved cannot enter into heaven without undergoing a purification; and this suggests to them the reasonableness and necessity of purgatory. But true Christianity requires no such middle state, in order to purge men from the guilt or pollution of sin. Through Jesus Christ is preached the forgiveness of sins. "By him all that believe are justified from all things." (Acts xiii. 38, 39.) "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanses from all sin. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." (1 John i. 7, 9.) The blood of Christ is sufficient, not only to atone for sin, but also to cleanse from all pollutions.

[* The Pursuit; or, a Reply to N. Gilbert's Second Defence of Popery, in a Series of Letters, by John Slack, pp. 157—159. 8vo. Whitby, 1813.]

† See M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. ii., pp. 551—557. Tenth edit. See also Master-Key to Popery, by Anthony Gavin; and many Roman Catholic authors. Consult especially the Breviarium Romanum in four thick volumes, 8vo.

[Well might Hugh Latimer, Bishop and Martyr, observe, "They that begot and brought forth that our old ancient purgatory pick-purse, that was swaged and cowled with a Franciscan's cowl, put upon a dead man's back, to the fourth part of his sins, that that was utterly to be spoiled, and of none other, but of our most prudent Lord Pope, and of him as oft as him listed: that satisfactory, that missal, that scalary: they, I say, that were the wise fathers and genitors of this purgatory, were, in my mind, the wisest of all their generation, and so far pass both the children of light, and also the rest of their company, that they both are but fools, if ye compare them with these. It was a pleasant fiction, and from the beginning so profitable to the feigners of it, that almost, I dare boldly say, there hath been no Emperor, that hath gotten more by taxes and tallages, of them that were alive, than these the very and right begotten sons of the world, got by dead men's tributes and gifts. If there be some in England, that would this sweating of the world to be with no less policy kept still, than it was born and brought forth in Rome, who then can accuse Christ of lying? No, no; as it hath been ever true, so it shall be, that the children of the world be much wiser, not only in making their things, but also in conserving them. I wot not what it is, but somewhat it is I wot, that some men be so loth to see the abuse of this monster, purgatory, which abuse is more than abominable: as who should say, there is none abuse in it, or else as though there can be none in it. They may seem heartily to love the old thing, that thus earnestly endeavour them to restore his old name. They would not set an hair by the name, but for the thing. They be not so ignorant, no they be crafty, but that they know if the name come again, the thing will come after. Thereby it ariseth, that some men make their cracks, that they, maugre of all men's heads, have found purgatory. I cannot tell what is found. This, to pray for dead folks,—this is not found, for it was never lost. How can that be found that was not lost? O subtle finders, that can find things (and God will) ere they be lost. For that cowlish deliverance, their scalary losings, their Papal spoliations, and other such their figments, they cannot find. No, these be so lost, as they themselves grant, that though they seek them never so diligently, yet they shall not find them, except perchance they hope to see them come in again with their names. And that then money-gathering may return again, and deceit walk about the country, and so stablish their kingdom in all kingdoms. But to what end this chiding between the children of the world, and the children of light will come, only He knoweth that once shall judge them both." *

[In conclusion, "(1.) It has often been asked, how the punishments of purgatory can possibly affect the departed? And there is something, little less than infatuation, in the belief generally entertained by Roman Catholics upon the subject. I am aware that the more cautious and enlightened among them employ the most guarded language, and do not profess to determine what the nature of the punishments may be. But the great mass of the people are accustomed to believe purgatory to be a place of penal fire. Now who are they on whom the fire is to act? Disembodied souls: immaterial, spiritual beings. You may talk of inflicting a wound upon the human body by means of a word, or yet more by means of a thought or a feeling,—you may talk of cutting and maiming the bodily members, by means of an idea which exists only in the mind; and you would not talk more irrationally than if you were to speak of injuring, or in any way affecting, the immaterial soul, by means of material fire. The thing is an absolute absurdity.

["(2.) The dogma of purgatory is founded on the assumption of the insufficiency of Christ's atonement. We have had occasion frequently to bring forward this objection against the several tenets of the Roman Catholic Church. Defective and fallacious views of the work of the Redeemer, of the nature of his sacrifice, and of its efficacy, constitute one of the grand errors that run through the whole Popish system. This has already been proved with reference to the dogma of the sacrifice of the mass, and that of justification by works: we shall find it as clearly applicable to the dogma of purgatory. Nothing can be more manifest than that it is, in fact, questioning the sufficiency of Christ's atonement almost in so many words, to assert the existence of a place of torment beyond death for those for whom Christ died,—a place where they must continue to satisfy for those very sins for which he shed his most precious blood. An inspired Apostle declares that 'the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth us from all sin.' We read in another passage, that 'by one offering he hath for ever perfected them that are sanctified.' God himself assures his people, on whom the blood of the covenant has been sprinkled, 'I will be merciful to your unrighteousness, and your sins and your iniquities I will remember no more.' And we are told, that Christ 'hath put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.' But, upon the supposition of a purgatory, sin is not yet fully expiated, and, in addition to all that the Redeemer has borne, there must be sufferings on our part, nevertheless; yea, sufferings even beyond the period of our dissolution. We read of 'the unsearchable riches of Christ's grace.' We read of 'his love that passeth knowledge.' The New Testament abounds with the amplest assurances, and with the most affecting proofs and illustrations, of that love. But for all the kindness of his heart, upon the supposition of a purgatory, he must, notwithstanding, have left the proof of his weakness behind him, since there is yet a temporary hell in which his ransomed people must be immured. Those who believe not only in the ineffable kindness, but in the unlimited power, of the Redeemer,—those who know the evidence with which Scripture abounds, in favour of the infinite preciousness and virtue of his blood, and of the infinite sufficiency of the atonement which he made for sin, can judge how utterly, and with what unmingled abhorrence, a doctrine which foully degrades and dishonours both, is to be reprobated.

[* Latimer's Sermons, vol. i., pp. 47, 48. 8vo. edit.]

["(3.) The idea of a purgatory is incompatible with the wisdom of God. I might take even higher ground, and assert that the very justice of the divine procedure is hereby called in question. God has laid the sins of men upon the head of Christ as their substitute, and he has exacted the full amount of satisfaction from him which was due for these sins; he has even declared himself well-pleased with the substitution, and the sacrifice, and the righteousness of Christ. What equitable ground, then, can there be for any farther claim to be made upon those for whom Christ died, seeing that their substitute has satisfied in their stead? But the wisdom of God is still more deeply implicated than his justice. It must be recollected, that the plan of human salvation, from first to last, and in all its parts, is of divine origin, and that it is set before us as the very mightiest and most stupendous of all the divine contrivances. If ever there was a plan on which the very utmost resources of God have been bestowed, and in which all that his wisdom and his power could do, have been done, this is the scheme. Has, then, this scheme proved a failure? Has the method of reconciliation which God devised been found altogether inadequate? Has God been outdone? Has his wisdom been thwarted? Have his deepest purposes been confounded? Or, in order to prevent entire defeat, has a new expedient been adopted—and a clumsy and miserable patchwork introduced, of human sufferings in a future world, eking out the deficiencies and oversights of the divine plan?

["(4.) The idea of a purgatory is incompatible with the mercy of God. We read that he is 'slow to anger,' 'full of compassion,' 'ready to forgive,' and 'plenteous in mercy.' We are told that 'he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.' 'God is love,' one inspired writer informs us. 'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that God loved us, and sent his Son to be a propitiation for our sins.' 'Herein God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.' This is his name and his memorial to all generations, 'The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin.' It was pure love on the part of God that led him not to spare his only-begotten Son, but to deliver him up to death for us all; and if 'we have redemption through the blood of Christ,' it is 'according to the riches of God's grace.' How, then, is it to be believed, that, after satisfaction has been made by the blood of his own Son, the God of infinite love should yet inflict sufferings upon those who are his children, through their interest in Christ—should inflict such sufferings that, according to Roman Catholics, nothing in the present world can enable us to conceive of them? If even human parents, under the impulse merely of natural affection, revolt from the idea of tormenting their own offspring, shall it be believed that our Father in heaven takes delight in the sufferings of his creatures, and that he will not let slip an opportunity of imposing sufferings, although his own Son has borne their sins in his own body on the tree? The suspicion is base as it is unfounded; and a dogma which implies such a suspicion can only be rejected with detestation.

["(5.) The idea of temporary punishment, of whatever kind, after death—the idea of a place of purgation and of moral discipline—is a self-contradiction. Even in the present world, the visitations of divine providence, with all the alleviations with which they are mingled, are often hard to bear, and they often engender murmuring and discontent. We may hence, therefore, judge what the effect would necessarily be in a state where there was nothing but punishment. If, amongst the myriads around us, we saw, and in our own minds we felt, nothing but suffering; and if pure suffering, however light its pressure, were continued to us, without one joy intervening, for ages or for centuries; it is impossible but that something more than intolerable dejection would be created; dissatisfaction with God, suspicion of his goodness, would be inevitable; if, indeed, the more usual effect of continued suffering were not produced, and the mind was not hardened irrecoverably, and rendered more resolutely and desperately averse to God. Thus, whilst enduring satisfaction for our past sins, we should only be accumulating new guilt, and rendering our release more distant and more hopeless.

["Above all, if even on earth we are not, and cannot, be free from infirmity, where is the possibility that in such a state as the purgatory of Roman Catholics an opposite result would be accomplished? In this world we are furnished with the means of grace and salvation, and we are surrounded with innumerable influences that are powerfully calculated to deter us from sin, and to promote holiness. But beyond death, in a purgatorial state, whilst we should retain the same depraved nature, we should be destitute of all the advantages and the helps to piety and holiness which we now enjoy, and should be left purely to our own strength. If we find, wherever men are associated together in this world, that, in spite of the example of the good, and in spite of their counsels and their remonstrances, vice multiplies and grows rank among them,—what would the effect be if, in the future world, multitudes, not of the good, but of those who were not yet cleansed from sin, were associated together constantly, and in the closest manner—were confined to the same spot, and sharing in the same sufferings? Would they not necessarily and inevitably debase and pollute one another? and would not vice, which even in single individuals is black and hideous enough, grow up amongst them in rank and deadly luxuriance? The idea of a state of salutary discipline and punishment beyond death is a pure contradiction. Purgatory, if such there were, would be only another name for hell,—a prison from which there could be no release. Once immured in that prison, the soul, instead of being cleansed from the remains of sin, could only become a thousand-fold more guilty, and a thousand-fold more the heir of irrecoverable damnation.

["What rational motive those who adopt this wild and miserable dogma can have, it is impossible to divine; for to us it seems inevitable that the moment it is entertained, the peace and the hopes of the glorious Gospel must be foregone entirely. 'Being justified by faith,' says one inspired Apostle, 'we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.' And again, 'There is therefore now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus.' And again, 'Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth, who is he that condemneth?' But, if beyond death there await us we know not what sufferings, and how long a series of years or of centuries before heaven can be ours, all the tranquillity and all the joy which such passages are calculated to awaken must be surrendered at once; and instead of calmly and humbly resting in Christ and confiding in God, as perfectly and for ever reconciled to us through Christ, our minds must become a prey to gloomy and painful apprehensions; and death, instead of being divested of its sting and of its terrors, must be looked upon as the stern executioner of divine justice, whose office it is, not to elevate us to happiness, but to drag us to more awful punishment than we have ever yet known. What make we of the words of the Apostle John, 'Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them,'—or of these, 'Even so come, Lord Jesus,'—if there be a purgatory beyond death? In this case, farewell, 'the hope that maketh not ashamed!' Farewell, calm assurance of God's love! Farewell, joyful anticipation of our last moments! Farewell, all foretaste of heavenly blessedness! Farewell, that influence which has lighted up the chamber of death with the glow of paradise. Farewell, all the raptures and the triumphs of piety! Death no more wears a friendly and inviting aspect, but he is an unwelcome foe, who removes us from a state of comparative enjoyment, to one of final suffering! Was it under the influence of such a doctrine as this, that the Apostle Paul entertained a desire 'to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better,' or that he believed, that when 'he should be absent from the body, he would be present with the Lord?' Was it upon the understanding of such a doctrine as this, that we are told that Lazarus, when he died, 'was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom?' or, was it in consistency with such a doctrine as this, that our Lord said to the thief on the cross, 'To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise?' or shall it be imagined that any who really belong to the Saviour, shall be less happy than a malefactor converted almost in the very article of death, after a whole life-time of wickedness, and on a cross?

["Roman Catholics extol their doctrine of purgatory as a wise and merciful provision of God against despair, since it shows that even after death, and by means of a certain measure of penal sufferings, heaven may at last be ours. But, like every attempt to perfect the work of God, this device is clumsy and futile. 'The weakness of God is stronger than men, and the foolishness of God is wiser than men.' How poor and how pitiful is such an invention when placed in contrast with the hopes of the Gospel! In the infinite efficacy of the atonement, and the infinite preciousness of the blood of the Lord Jesus, there is the most ample provision for pacifying the alarmed conscience, and for encouraging the most guilty. In the cross of the Redeemer, God is seen to be 'just, and the justifier of the ungodly;' and whilst the full impression of his inflexible justice and his unspotted holiness is entertained, the most solid and enduring peace is at the same time enjoyed—peace resting upon a foundation than which none can be more secure, even the sacrifice of Christ, the perfection of which God himself has declared, and with which he is infinitely pleased. The dying saint, conscious of guilt, thinks not to satisfy the divine justice by any sufferings of his own, and he is oppressed by no gloomy prospect of hundreds or thousands of years spent in banishment from heaven and from all that he loves, and amidst the pains and the torments of purgatory; but he looks up to God as perfectly reconciled to him through Christ Jesus, who has for ever atoned for all his sins; and, anticipating death only as the messenger of peace, who shall transport him from a scene of trial and of evil to the bosom of his Father in heaven, he exclaims, 'See, O God, my shield, look on the face of thine Anointed.'

["The doctrine of purgatory furnishes the strongest encouragement to sin, by holding out the hope of pardon even after death. It can hardly be questioned that the fear of death operates powerfully even upon those who have overcome the ordinary restraints of religion and morality. And that in which chiefly the fear of death has its origin, and which gives it all its power as a motive, is the idea of future retribution. All the circumstances of pain and gloom with which death is accompanied might easily be surmounted, were it not for the conviction, that after death is judgment. If even the stoutest heart trembles at the prospect of dissolution, it is not merely because unknown agonies must be endured, it is not because the silence and the lonesomeness of the grave must be encountered, but it is because beyond death there can be no hope of change, and because then our condition must be unalterable. It is easy, then, to anticipate the effects, if death be stripped of its terrors, to the guilty mind, and if the prospect be held out, that even after death eternal punishment may be foregone. In this case, one of the strongest influences which deter from the commission of sin will be withdrawn, and the conscience of the sinner will be at rest, and the love of sin will be indulged without fear, since the only effect of such indulgence would be a few years longer of penal discipline; and who, that knows what human nature is, can imagine that this consideration would for one moment weigh against the deep corruption of the heart? But the dogma is unfounded, as it is ruinous in its tendency. The condition of human beings after death is unalterable. There is no middle state of temporary punishment, any more than of temporary happiness. There is not a statement, not a line of Scripture, to support the idea. We have the same evidence for believing that the state of the wicked after death is irreversible, as we have for believing that the state of the good is irreversible. The doctrine is one of tremendous import; but it is true, if there be truth in Scripture, that whatever punishment obtains in a future world is eternal. And it is by this, as one of the most overpowering motives that can influence the mind, that the wicked are implored to 'flee from the wrath to come,' and to give heed to the things that belong to their peace, 'before they be hid from their eyes.' 'NOW IS THE ACCEPTED TIME, AND NOW IS THE DAY OF SALVATION.'"*]

[* Young's Lectures on Popery, pp. 221—234.]

CHAPTER XIII.

INDULGENCES.

I. Statement of the Doctrine. 1. Creed of Pius IV. quoted: 2. Dens and other authorities: 3. The Pope is the sovereign dispenser of indulgences: 4. Conditions and dispositions required in those who receive them: 5. Declaration of Leo X.: 6. Decree of Council of Trent.—II. The Authority by which the Doctrine is supported. 1. Romanists make it an article of faith: 2. The Council of Trent: 3. Their Scripture authority: 4. Ecclesiastical usage not in their favour. They superseded the ancient canonical penances, and followed the abrogation of the primitive discipline. Mosheim cited: 5. The foundation of them laid by Clement VI., A.D. 1350.—III. Specimens of Indulgences. 1. Romanists endeavour to keep out of sight their real character: 2. Form of one quoted by Robertson, as used by Tetzel, which is neither an exaggeration of their doctrine, nor an abuse of it. Their real doctrine the same: 3. Some indulgences have been annulled: 4. Those granted to certain Orders. Examples: 5. Those granted to the faithful generally. Many instances given. Specimen in full by Benedict XIV.: 6. Indulgences of recent date. Additional examples.—IV. How Indulgences apply to the Dead.—V. The Jubilee. 1. The jubilee among the Jews: 2. Its first institution in the Church of Rome: 3. The jubilee in 1825.—VI. Evil Consequences of Indulgences. 1. The conditions on which they are granted form a strong argument against them: 2. Their uncertainty, danger, and deception: 3. They operate as a licence to commit sin. The indulgence properly prepares to remit sin; and not its temporal guilt merely, as their Divines say. The Protestant doctrine not chargeable with the same difficulty: 4. Indulgences suppose sentiments and feelings averse to pure religion: 5. The sale of them operates as an encouragement to iniquity: 6. And is even a licence to sin. This proved by facts. The Tax-Book referred to: 7. Indulgences employed by the Church of Rome to obtain money, &c.

I. Statement of the doctrine concerning indulgences.

1. The Creed of Pope Pius IV. contains the following article on this subject:—"I also affirm, that the power of indulgences was left by Christ to the Church, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people."* The Council of Trent found themselves in an awkward dilemma; having been compelled, by the vigilance of Protestants, either to justify the abominable traffic of Leo X. and some of his predecessors, or, on the other, to condemn the custom so far as not to make indulgences any more than a remission of Church censures. The practice of the Church of Rome, and the express declarations of Bulls and Acts of Grace, must be our guide when the Romish hierarchy refuses to define this article of her faith.

2. Dens describes indulgences thus: "What is an indulgence? It is the remission of the temporal punishment due to sins, remitted as to their guilt, by the power of the keys, without the sacrament, by the application of the satisfactions which are contained in the treasury of the Church. What is understood by the treasury of the Church? It is the collection (cumulus) of the spiritual goods remaining in the divine possession, the distribution of which is intrusted to the Church. From whence is this treasury collected? In the first place it is collected from the superabundant satisfactions of Christ, next from the superfluous satisfactions of the blessed Virgin Mary and of the other saints. This treasury is the foundation or matter of indulgences, and is that infinite treasury made up in part from the satisfactions of Christ, so as never to be exhausted; and it daily receives the superabundant satisfactions of pious men."*

Indulgences are divided, according to the same author, into local, real, and personal; into plenary, non-plenary, more plenary, and most plenary; and into perpetual and temporal.†

3. The Pope, as the sovereign dispenser of the Church's treasury, possesses the plenitude of power in the whole Church; which power is vouchsafed to Bishops in their respective dioceses from the Pope. The Pope hath the power of granting plenary indulgences to all Christians; but a Bishop of granting indulgences only in his own diocess. The Pope holds the power by divine right; but the Bishop only by that which is ecclesiastical: the French, however, deny this distinction, and consider all Bishops in possession of this power. Aquinas says that it is one of jurisdiction, and not of order.

4. The conditions and dispositions required of those who receive indulgences are chiefly the following, according to Dens and other theological writers:—That the receiver be baptized, has the use of reason, is in a state of grace, says certain prayers, visits churches, receives the communion, fasts, gives alms, confesses, &c.‡ They differ, however, in regard to the state of grace necessary in order to receive an indulgence. Dens says, that "according to the more common and true opinion, it is sufficient that the last act of what is required be done in a state of grace, unless it is otherwise expressed in the diploma."§ Biluart teaches, that "though all requisite works need not be done in a state of grace, they ought to be done with a disposition to forsake mortal sin."‖

5. The following declarations in the Bull of Leo X., the whole of which we subjoin, will give the reader some idea of indulgences:—"The Roman Pontiff, the successor of Peter in regard to the keys, and the Vicar of Jesus Christ upon earth, possessing the power of the keys, by which power all hinderances are removed out of the way of the faithful—that is to say, the guilt of actual sins—by the sacrament of penance, and the temporal punishment due for those sins, according to the divine justice,

[* "Indulgentiarum etiam potestatem a Christo in Ecclesia relictam fuisse; illarumque usum Christiano populo maxime salutarem esse, affirmo."—Concil. Trid. apud Bullas Romæ, 1564.]

[* "Quid est indulgentia?—R. Est pœnæ temporalis peccatis, quoad culpam remissis, debitæ remissio, facta potestate clavium extra sacramentum per applicationem satisfactionum, quæ in thesauro Ecclesiæ continentur.

["Quid intelligitur per thesaurum Ecclesiæ?—R. Est cumulus bonorum spiritualium permanentium in acceptatione divina, et quorum dispositio Ecclesiæ est concredita.

["Ex quibus thesaurus ille coalescit?—R. Primario coalescit ex superabundantibus Christi satisfactionibus, deinde ex supereffluentibus beatæ Mariæ Virginis et reliquorum sanctorum satisfactionibus. Hic thesaurus est fundamentum sive materia indulgentiarum, est que thesaurus ille infinitus ex parte satisfactionum Christi, adeoque nunquam exhauriendus: deinde indies accedunt piorum hominum superabundantes satisfactiones."—Dens Theologia, tom. vi.; Tractatus de Indulgentiis, No. 30; De Indulgentiarum Natura.]

[† "Quomodo dividuntur indulgentiæ?—R. 1. In locales, reales, et personales. 2. In plenarias et non plenarias: aliæ etiam sunt pleniores, aliæ plenissimæ. 3. In perpetuas et temporales."—Idem, No. 31; De Divisione Indulgentiarum.]

[‡ "Ante omnia prærequiritur, ut recipiens indulgentiæ effectum sit baptizatus. Deinde indulgentia tantum prodest eis, qui aliquando usum rationis habuere; quia tantum tales pœnæ temporalis reatum habent. An ad percipiendum indulgentiæ fructum requiritur status gratiæ?—R. Affirmative: quia inimico Dei nulla pœna remittitur; et ideo in omnibus indulgentiis fit mentio de vere contritis et confessis."—Idem, No. 34; De Requisitis in Recipiente Indulgentias.]

[§ "Juxta communiorem ac veriorem sententiam sufficit, si ultimum opus ex requisitis fiat in statu gratiæ, nisi aliter in diplomate exprimatur."—Idem, No. 35; An omnia præscripta ad lucrandum Indulgentias fieri debeant in Statu Gratiæ.]

[‖ "Docet hic Biluart, quod licet omnia opera requisita non debeant fieri in statu gratiæ, debeant tamen fieri deposito affectu ad peccatum mortale."—Idem, ibid.]

by ecclesiastical indulgence; that the Roman Pontiff may, for reasonable causes, by his apostolical authority, grant indulgences out of the superabundant merits of Christ and the saints, to the faithful who are united to Christ by charity, as well for the living as for the dead; and that in thus dispensing the treasure of the merits of Jesus Christ and the saints, he either confers the indulgence by the method of absolution, or transfers it by the method of suffrage. Wherefore all persons, whether living or dead, who really obtain any indulgences of this kind, are delivered from so much temporal punishment, due according to divine justice for their actual sins, as is equivalent to the value of the indulgence bestowed and received." *

[* " BULLA LEONIS X. DE INDULGENTIIS.

[" Leo Episcopus: Servus Servorum Dei, dilecto filio Thomæ tituli S. Sixti, ad carissimum in Christo filium nostrum Maximilianum in imperatorem electum nostro et sedis Apostolicæ Legato, salutem et apostolicam benedictionem.

[" Cum postquam circumspectio tua Germaniam applicuerat, ad aures nostras pervenisset, quod nonnulli religiosi, etiam ad evangelizandum verbum Dei deputati, super indulgentiis a nobis et Romanis Pontificibus prædecessoribus nostris ab immemorabili tempore citra concedi solitis, publice prædicando, multorum cordibus imprimerent errores, idque nobis intelligere nimis grave et molestum esset, aliis nostris literis eidem circumspectioni tuæ, de qua propter ejus singularem doctrinam et in rebus agendis experientiam specialem in Domino fiduciam obtinemus, commissimus, ut auctoritate nostra approbatione digna approbares; ea vero, quæ minus recte dicta essent, etiam per eos, qui Rom. Ecclesiæ doctrinam se sequi paratos asserent, reprobare et damnare curares.

[" Et ne de cætero quisquam ignorantiam doctrinæ Rom. Ecclesiæ circa hujusmodi indulgentias et illarum efficaciam allegare, aut ignorantiæ hujusmodi prætextu se excusare, aut protestatione conficta se juvare, sed ut ipsi de notorio mendacio ut culpabiles convinci et merito damnari possint, per præsentes tibi significandum duximus, Rom. Ecclesiam, quam reliquæ tanquam matrem sequi tenentur, tradidisse, Rom. Pontificem, Petri clavigeri successorem, et Jesu Christi in terris Vicarium, potestate clavium, quarum est aperire tollendo illius in Christi fidelibus impedimenta, culpam scilicet et pœnam pro actualibus peccatis debitam, culpam quidem mediante sacramento pœnitentiæ, pœnam vero temporalem pro actualibus peccatis secundum divinam justitiam debitam mediante ecclesiastica indulgentia, posse pro rationalibus causis concedere eisdem Christi fidelibus, qui caritate jungente membra sunt Christi, sive in hac vita sint, sive in purgatorio, indulgentias ex superabundantia meritorum Christi et sanctorum, ac tam pro vivis quam pro defunctis apostolica auctoritate indulgentiam concedendo, thesaurum meritorum Jesu Christi et sanctorum dispensare, per modum absolutionis indulgentiam ipsam conferre, vel per modum suffragii illam transferre consuevisse. Ac propterea omnes tam vivos quam defunctos, qui veraciter omnes indulgentias hujusmodi consecuti fuerint, a tanta temporali pœna secundum divinam justitiam pro peccatis suis actualibus debita liberari, quanta concessæ et acquisitæ indulgentiæ æquivalet. Et ita ab omnibus teneri et prædicari debere sub excommunicationis latæ sententiæ pœna, a qua illam incurrentes ab alio quam a Romano Pontifice, nisi in mortis articulo, nequeant absolutionis beneficium obtinere, auctoritate apostolica earumdem tenore præsentium decernimus.

[" Et ne quispiam de præmissis valeat ignorantiam allegare, circumspectioni tuæ mandamus, quatenus universos et singulos Germaniæ Archiepiscopos, Episcopos, et alios locorum Ordinarios, in virtute sanctæ obedientiæ, et sub suspensionis a divinis pœna, moneas eisque districte præcipiendo mandes, ut præsentes literas sive earum transumptum infra tempus per circumspectionem tuam eis præfigendum, in eorum ecclesiis, dum inibi populi multitudo ad divina convenerit, publicare et circa indulgentias prædictas supradicta sub simili excommunicationis latæ sententiæ pœna tenere et prædicare debeant, et nullus contra ea quovis modo directe vel indirecte venire præsumat. Tibi nihilominus contra præsumentes et inobedientes procedendi illosque debitis pœnis, quibus tibi videbitur, puniendi plenam et liberam etiam per præsentes concedimus facultatem, in contrarium non obstantibus quibuscunque.

[" Et quia difficile foret easdem præsentes literas ad singula quæque loca, in quibus expediens fuerit, deferre, volumus et dicta auctoritate decernimus, illarum transumptis, manu publici notarii inde rogati subscriptis et sigillo alicujus Prælati seu personæ in dignitate ecclesiastica constitutæ munitis, vel Curiæ Ecclesiasticæ, ea, prorsus in judicio et extra, ac alias ubilibet, fides adhibeatur, quæ præsentibus adhiberetur, si fuissent exhibitæ vel ostensæ.

[" Datum Romæ apud S. Petrum, anno incarnationis Dominicæ millesimo quingentesimo decimo octavo, quinto idus Novembris, Pontificatus nostri anno sexto.

[" Sign.

[" Bembus."

—Monumentorum ad Historiam Concilii Tridentini. Judoci Le Plat, 4to., tom. ii., pp. 21—24. Lovanii, 1782.]

[" * Extrav. Clem. Unigenitus, Tit. de Pœn.

[" † Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Purg., lib. ii., cap. xvi., fol. Colon., 1620.

[" The principle of the doctrine of indulgences is as follows:—

[" The Church possesses a treasure which is absolutely inexhaustible. This treasure is allowed by all Papists to consist, in the first place, of the merits of Christ's sufferings beyond what was necessary for the redemption of mankind; for one drop of that blood being sufficient to redeem all men, the rest, we are told, constituted a legacy, to be applied in mitigation of purgatory, as the Popes, in their wisdom, might think fit. As those merits were infinite, their value could not be diminished by any application of them, and they therefore continue infinite still. In aid, however, and that most unnecessarily, of this infinite treasure, come the merits of the works which the saints have performed, beyond what was necessary to satisfy for themselves. All the good works of the just are supposed to have a double value in the sight of God; one of satisfaction, the other of merit; that is, one constituting an equivalent for the temporal punishment of sin, the other giving a title to recompence hereafter. As, then, the satisfaction arising out of the good works of the saints far exceeds their temporal debt to the justice of God, it becomes a balance in favour of the Church, which she may apply to the exigences of others.

[" The Bull, also, of Clement VI.* says, as 'a single drop of Christ's blood would have sufficed for the redemption of the whole human race,' the rest was a treasure which he acquired for the militant church, to be used for the benefit of his sons; which treasure he would not suffer to be hid in a napkin, or buried in the ground, but committed it to be dispensed by St. Peter, the key-keeper of heaven, and to his successors, his own Vicars on earth, to be prudently dispensed to the faithful; and for proper and reasonable causes, for the total or partial remission of the temporal punishment due to sin, as well generally as specially, in conformity with the known will of God, to be mercifully administered to those who are truly penitent and confess. To an augmentation of this treasure, the merits of the blessed mother of God, and of all the elect, from the first just one to the last, are known to contribute; of the consumption or diminution of which not the least fear needs be entertained, as well on account of the infinite merits of Christ, before stated, as from the consideration, that the greater the number of persons who are attracted to righteousness by the application of it, so much is the amount of the merits increased.

[" The benefit of indulgences is stated in the recent jubilee Bull of Pope Leo XII., to be, 1. For 'remission of canonical penance;' 2. For 'remission of the temporal punishment due to the divine justice for past sins;' 3. To 'afford succour to such as have departed real penitents in the love of God; yet, before they had duly satisfied, by fruits worthy of penance, for sins of commission and omission, and are now purifying in the fire of purgatory; that an entrance may be opened for them into that country, where nothing defiled is admitted.'† in this life or in purgatory, after the remission of the guilt of sin; they derive their efficacy from the treasure of the Church, which treasure consists, primarily, of the merits and satisfactions of Christ; for, as a single drop of his blood was sufficient for the redemption of the sins of the whole world, there remains an infinite hoard of his merits at the disposal of the Church for the service of her children; and, secondarily, of the merits and satisfactions of the Virgin Mary and other saints, who underwent far severer sufferings than their own sins required; which superabundance and almost superfluity of sufferings of theirs, form a sort of bank or deposit, out of which the Church may make disbursements for the common benefit of the faithful, in the way of payment (via solutionis) for the punishments or satisfactions due from them.*

[" One of the Class-books of Maynooth says:—'Indulgences remit, even in God's forum, the debt of temporal punishment which would else remain to be satisfied, either

["'There is no reason why this should not be done for the dead as well as for the living; the Church offering to God, by the method of compensation, (per modum compensationis,) payment for them out of the satisfactions of Christ and the saints.'†

["Some Popish writers pretend, that the validity of indulgences, like that of absolutions, entirely depends upon the disposition of the sinner; but this is directly contradicted by their having been subjected to sale, in which, after being purchased of the Pope, by as good a bargain as possible, they were disposed of in retail, each indulgence of course bearing an adequate premium.

["'And, besides,' says a late writer, 'what is the meaning of the expression, in the decree against heretics, —An indulgence for two years? Is it, that the individual, receiving the grant, has permission to repent for that period, and no longer? The answer of the Roman Catholics, I presume, will be—No. Well then, repentance is not a necessary concomitant of a grant of indulgence.'

["That sincere repentance is no necessary condition of indulgence, is also evident from this, that indulgences are thus also granted to souls already in purgatory, of whom Bellarmine says, that 'the Pope applies the satisfactions of Christ and the saints to the dead, by means of works enjoined on the living. They are applied, not in the way of judicial absolution, but in the way of payment, per modum solutionis.'"*]

6. The following is the decree passed by the Council of Trent:—"Since the power of granting indulgences has been bestowed by Christ upon his Church, and this power, divinely given, has been used from the earliest antiquity, the holy Council teaches and enjoins, that the use of indulgences, so salutary to Christian people, and approved by the authority of venerable Councils, shall be retained in the Church; and it anathematizes those who assert that they are useless, or deny that the Church has the power of granting them. Nevertheless, the Council desires that moderation be shown in granting them, according to the ancient and approved custom of the Church, lest, by too much laxity, ecclesiastical discipline be weakened. Anxious, moreover, to correct and amend the abuses that have crept in, and by reason of which this honourable name of indulgences is blasphemed by the heretics, the Council determines generally, by this present decree, that all wicked gains accruing from them, which have been the principal source of these abuses, shall be wholly abolished. But with regard to other abuses, proceeding from superstition, ignorance, irreverence, or any other cause whatever; seeing that they cannot be severally prohibited, on account of the great variety of evils existing in so many places and provinces, the Council commands each Bishop to procure a careful account of the abuses existing within his own jurisdiction, and lay the same before the first Provincial Synod; that when the opinion of other Bishops has been obtained, the whole may be immediately referred to the supreme Pontiff, by whose authority and prudence such enactments will be made as are expedient for the universal Church; so that the gift of holy indulgences may be dispensed to the faithful, in a pious, holy, and incorrupt manner."† How far the declaration of the Council respecting the "antiquity" of indulgences is correct, we shall presently discover.

[In the Catechism for the use of all the Churches in the French empire, to which are prefixed the Pope's Bull, and the Archbishop's Mandamus, we meet with the following on the subject of indulgences:—

["Q. What does faith teach us concerning indulgences?

[* Reformer's Library, vol. v., pp. 278—282.]

† "Cum potestas conferendi indulgentias a Christo Ecclesiæ concessa sit; atque hujusmodi potestate, divinitus sibi tradita, antiquissimis etiam temporibus illa usa fuerit: sacro-sancta Synodus indulgentiarum usum, Christiano populo maxime salutarem, et sacrorum Conciliorum auctoritate probatum, in Ecclesia retinendum esse docet et præcipit: eosque anathemate damnat, qui aut inutiles esse asserunt, vel eas concedendi in Ecclesia potestatem esse negant: in his tamen concedendis moderationem, juxta veterem et probatam in Ecclesia consuetudinem, adhiberi cupit, ne nimia facilitate ecclesiastica disciplina enervetur. Abusus vero, qui in his irrepserunt, et quorum occasione insigne hoc indulgentiarum nomen ab hæreticis blasphematur, emendatos et correctos cupiens, præsenti decreto generaliter statuit, pravos quæstus omnes pro his consequendis, unde plurima in Christiano populo abusuum causa fluxit, omnino abolendos esse. Ceteros vero, qui ex superstitione, ignorantia, irreverentia, aut aliunde quomodocumque provenerunt, cum ob multiplices locorum et provinciarum, apud quas hi committuntur, corruptelas commode nequeant specialiter prohiberi, mandat omnibus Episcopis, ut diligenter quisque hujusmodi abusus Ecclesiæ suæ colligat, eosque in prima Synodo Provinciali referat; ut aliorum quoque Episcoporum sententia cognita, statim ad Summum Romanum Pontificem deferantur; cujus auctoritate et prudentia quod universali Ecclesiæ expediet statuatur; ut ita sanctarum indulgentiarum munus, pie, sancte, et incorrupte omnibus fidelibus dispensetur."—Can. et Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. xxv.; De Indulg.

[* "Prop. In Ecclesia existit thesaurus ex quo derivantur indulgentiæ, qui coalescit primario ex meritis et satisfactionibus Christi, et secundario ex meritis et satisfactionibus sanctorum.

["Probatur prima pars. Christus, semetipsum dando redemptionem pro omnibus et propitiationem pro peccatis nostris et totius mundi, veram et proprie dictam satisfactionem Deo obtulit, eamque infinite superabundantem, cum vel unius guttæ sanguinis effusio ad totius mundi delicta redimenda plusquam sufficiens fuisset; hæc autem supereffluens meritorum et passionum Christi copia thesaurum constituit, ex quo vere solvi possunt debita quæcumque pœnarum quas luendas habemus ratione peccatorum nostrorum etiam dimissorum. Porro cum maxime congruat ut thesaurus ille otiosus non maneat, merito creditur, sicut sponsus, quidquid vivens acquirit, sponsæ et filiis suis relinquit, ita Christum ex his terris avolantem meritorum et satisfactionum suarum thesaurum Ecclesiæ reliquisse, quo ad utilitates filiorum suorum uteretur.

["Probatur secunda pars. De meritis et satisfactionibus sanctorum. Illi nimirum multa præstiterunt satisfactoria opera, quibus in expiationem suorum delictorum non indigebant. Sic B. Virgo, licet omnis peccati expers, dolores multos et acerbissimos pertulit; sic S. Joannes Baptista ab utero materno sanctificatus austeriorem duxit vitam quæ martyrio coronata fuit; sic Apostolorum, Martyrum, Confessorum, Virginum, aliorumque sanctorum plurimi longe graviora passi sunt quam exigebant illorum peccata. Atque hæc satisfactionum affluentia penes Ecclesiam manere merito censetur, instar alicujus depositi, quod in publicam fidelium utilitatem impendi possit, via solutionis pro illorum debitis."—Delahogue, Tract. de Pœnit. Append. De Indulg., cap. ii., art. 2.

[† "Nullatenus enim repugnat quominus ista facultate utatur Ecclesia, Deo per modum compensationis offerendo solutionem ex satisfactionibus Christi et sanctorum, pro debito pœnæ temporalis quo illæ animæ in purgatorio detinentur, licet ad ipsius forum non amplius pertineant."—Idem, cap. iv., art. 1; Prop. Indulgentiæ prosunt Animabus Defunctorum quæ sunt in Purgatorio.

["A. That the Church has received from Jesus Christ the power of granting them, and that the use of them is very salutary to Christians.

["Q. Why are indulgences so salutary?

["A. Because they are established to moderate the rigours of the temporal pains due to sin.

["Q. Is it necessary to know precisely how this rigour is moderated?

["A. No; it is sufficient to believe that a good mother, like the Church, gives nothing to her children but what really serves to relieve them in this world and in the next.

["Q. Is it the intention of the Church to free us by indulgences from the obligation of God?

["A. No; the mind of the Church is, on the contrary, to grant indulgences only to those who attend to the duty of satisfying, on their part, divine justice.

["Q. Of what use are indulgences?

["A. They are of much use to us in every way, since we have always reason to believe that we are very far from having satisfied according to our obligations.

["Q. What follows from hence?

["A. That we should be our own enemies if we had not recourse to the graces and indulgences of the Church.

["Q. What, then, in a word, is the intention of the Church in the dispensation of indulgences?

["A It is to assist well-meaning Christians to clear themselves in regard to God, and make up their infirmity.

["Q. What does she intend by that?

["A. To excite more and more in the heart piety and love to God, conformably to the word of our Lord: 'He to whom much is given, ought also to love much.'

["Q. What is the best disposition to obtain indulgences?

["A. Doing in the best manner we can what is prescribed to obtain them, and waiting the effect of them, from the mercy of God, who always knows the secrets of the heart.

["Q. On what are indulgences founded?

["A. On the satisfaction of Jesus Christ and of the saints.

["Q. Why do you add the satisfaction of the saints to that of Jesus Christ?

["A. Because of the goodness of God, who is willing, on the behalf of his most pious servants, to forgive the others.

["Q. Why besides?

["A. Because the satisfactions of the saints are united to that of Jesus Christ, whence they derive all their value.

["Q. Who has a right to give indulgences?

["A. The Pope in the whole Church, and the Bishops in their diocesses, with the limitations appointed by the Church."

[It is rather strange that Christ's Vicars should, for a succession of ages, have combined in giving a blundering account of the nature and effects of their own indulgences; and even if we are not to regard their language as a proof of what the doctrine of the Church of Rome on this subject is, we may at least consider it as an illustration of what is very common among Popish Priests; namely, a wish to insinuate in the minds of their ignorant votaries what they cannot defend when controverted. But if the Popes have often erred, by ascribing too much to their indulgences, most modern champions of Popery have gone into an opposite extreme. The statement of Bossuet and Gother, which represents indulgences merely as the relaxation of the canonical censures or penances, imposed by the Church in the exercise of discipline, is a deliberate fraud, as is conclusively proved, not merely by many Papal Bulls, but by the Council of Trent, the ordinary Popish Catechisms in constant use, and the evidence given by the Popish Prelates before Parliament in 1825. Dr. Kelly, indeed, the late Popish Archbishop of Tuam, gave the same fraudulent account of indulgences before the Committee of the House of Commons; but then it was contradicted by his colleagues, Drs. Doyle and Murray, not because they were honester men than he, but because they knew that such a misrepresentation, though sanctioned by Gother and Bossuet, was too gross to be of any real service to their cause. Indeed, the Popish Prelates examined on that occasion do not seem to have been at sufficient pains to arrange beforehand, to what length they were to concur in fraudulently misrepresenting the doctrine of their Church on the subject of indulgences; for Dr. Kelly, Dr. Doyle, and Dr. Murray gave different accounts of the doctrine, as to its nature and effects, Doyle letting out a little more of the truth than Kelly, with Gother and Bossuet, and Murray a little more than Doyle, although even Murray was far from saying all that candour required. As the gross abuses practised or sanctioned by the Pope, in regard to indulgences, had been instrumental in originating the Reformation, the Council of Trent acted very cautiously on this point, and forbade altogether the sale of indulgences. Dr. Murray asserts, and Dr. Doyle denies, that an indulgence averts the wrath of God, with respect to the temporal punishment of sin: Dr. Murray's doctrine, however, is that of the Romish Church. It is maintained not only by Bellarmine, but by Dens,* by Delahogue, in the Maynooth Text-Book,† and also by Pope Pius VI., in a Bull published A. D. 1794.

[In Dr. Butler's Catechism, revised, enlarged, approved, and recommended by the four Roman Catholic Archbishops of Ireland, as a general Catechism for the kingdom, we meet with the following on the subject of indulgences:—

["Ques. What does the Church teach concerning indulgences?

["Ans. That Christ gave power to the Church to grant indulgences; and that they are most useful to Christian people.

["Q. What is the use of an indulgence?

["A. It releases from canonical penances, enjoined by the Church on penitents for certain sins.

["Q. Has an indulgence any other effect?

["A. It also remits the temporary punishments with which God often visits our sins, and which must be suffered in this life, or in the next, unless cancelled by indulgences, by act of penance, or other good works.

["Q. Has the Church power to grant such indulgences?

[* "Valent autem indulgentiæ non solum in foro Ecclesiæ, sed etiam in foro Dei; id est, non tantum liberant a pœnis, in quantum alioquin ab Ecclesia injungerentur, sed etiam in quantum Deo debentur, et alioquin forent luendæ vel hic, vel in purgatorio, ut infra latius ostendetur."—Dens Theologia, tom. vi.; De Indulg., No. 30; De Indulgentiarum Natura.

[† "Sed quænam sit illa pœna quæ vi indulgentiarum remittitur, non convenit inter theologos, ut videri est in Regula Fidei, Veronii (c. ii., sect. 4, De Indulg.). Præcipua de hoc controversia est, utrum vi indulgentiarum remittatur in foro Dei pœna temporalis post peccatum dimissum debita, quæ sive hic sive in purgatorio luenda superest."—Delahogue, Tract. de Sac. Pœnit. Append. De Indulg., cap. ii., art. 1.

["A. Yes; 'Whatsoever,' says Christ to St. Peter, 'thou shalt loose upon earth, it shall be loosed also in heaven.' (Matt. xvi. 19; 2 Cor. ii. 10.)

["Q. To whom does the Church grant indulgences?

["A. To such only as are in the state of grace, and are sincerely desirous to amend their lives, and to satisfy God's justice by penitential works.

["Q. Is an indulgence a pardon for sins to come, or a licence to commit sin?

["Q. No; nor can it remit past sins; for sin must be remitted by penance as to the guilt of it, and as to the eternal punishment due to mortal sin, before an indulgence can be gained.

["Q. Why does the Church grant indulgences?

["A. To assist our weakness, and to supply our insufficiency, in satisfying the divine justice for our transgressions.

["Q. When the Church grants indulgences, what does it offer to God to supply our weakness and insufficiency, and in satisfaction for our transgressions?

["A. The merits of Christ, which are infinite and superabundant; together with the virtues and good works of his Virgin mother, and all his saints.

["Q. What conditions are generally necessary to gain indulgences?

["A. A good confession and communion, and a faithful compliance with the other good works which the Church requires on such occasions.

["Q. What are the other good works which the Church usually prescribes in order to gain indulgences?

["A. Prayers, fasts, and alms-deeds, which good works, besides confession and communion, indulgences promote; and on this account, also, they are most useful to Christian people."*

[In the Instructions for the Sacrament of Penance, printed in Edinburgh, for the Roman Catholic bookseller, and taught in the Popish schools in that city, we meet with the following questions and answers:—

["Q. Does the sacrament of penance remit all the punishment of sin?

["A. No; it only changes the eternal punishment which they have deserved into a temporal one.

["Q. Are not our sins forgiven us by the absolution of the Priest?

["A. Yes; as to the guilt and the eternal punishment they have deserved, but not as to the temporal punishment into which the eternal punishment has been changed by virtue of the sacrament of penance: and this remains to be expiated either in this world or in the flames of purgatory.

["Q. How do you satisfy God for this temporal punishment?

["A. By good works, and chiefly by sacramental satisfaction.

["Q. What is this sacramental satisfaction?

["A. It is a faithful performance of the penitential works imposed upon us by the Priest.

["Q. Has the Church the power of supplying part of the satisfaction due to God for sin?

["A. Yes; and this power she uses by the grant of indulgences to those who do what is requisite to gain them.

["Q. Does the power which the Church has of remitting the punishment of sin extend to the next world?

["A. Yes, indirectly; for the satisfaction which the sinner makes in this life exempts him from suffering in the next, in proportion to what he has suffered in this: and, as the indulgence which the Church grants to the sinner stands him in lieu of this satisfaction, it follows that she remits the punishment of the next world.

["Q. Can the Church grant indulgences in favour of souls in purgatory?

["A. Yes; but not in the same way as she grants them to the faithful upon earth. She grants them to the living by way of absolution, but in favour of the dead only by way of suffrage and intercession."

["To understand this point well," says the Jesuit Mumford, in The Catholic Scripturist, "which is misunderstood by a world of people, note, first, that full often, after that God hath pardoned the guilt of sin, he doth not pardon the guilt of all that pain to which the sinner, according to justice, is still liable for the sin forgiven. Note, secondly, that we are most grossly belied by our adversaries, who say that our doctrine is, that 'the Pope can forgive us our sins by granting indulgences unto us.' Whereas no Roman Catholic Doctor can ever be showed to have taught this doctrine. We all unanimously teach, that 'the Pope, by no indulgence, can forgive any one single mortal or venial sin.' For our faith tells us, that those sins are only forgiven us by true contrition, or due sorrow in the sacrament of confession, joined always with a sincere purpose of offending no more. That which is forgiven by an indulgence is not the guilt of any sin, either mortal or venial, but it is 'only the pardoning of part or of all that pain,' which yet (according to God's justice) we stand liable to pay, for the sin already forgiven. Neither doth any (Roman) Catholic Doctor teach that the Pope can forgive any sinner this pain at his pleasure, by granting him a plenary indulgence. But, if our doctrine be truly understood, we all require more for gaining pardon, even of the least part of the pain, (still due to our very least sins,) than Protestants require to the full forgiveness of all the greatest sins that are, or can be, taken all together with all the pain which can be due unto them; which is a point exceedingly to be noted, it being apparently true.

["2. For the first thing which we require to gain any part even of the least indulgence, is to have true faith producing true repentance for our sin. This alone with Protestants suffices to remit the guilt of all sins whatsoever, and all pains due to all sins of which any man can be guilty. Doth it do so with us? No; it is far from it. We say that after this, first, he must make a true entire confession; secondly, he must moreover stand obliged to make perfect restitution of any thing to which he is bound; thirdly, he stands obliged to perform the penance enjoined him; fourthly, if this penance fall short of satisfying the divine justice for the pains yet due to the sins forgiven, the sinner stands still obliged to satisfy the divine justice by other penal works. Now all that we say is, that this pain may be pardoned him by indulgences: though not by indulgences granted merely at the Pope's pleasure, but by indulgences granted by him upon sufficient causes, which causes he must carefully examine. And after the grant of indulgences, (upon due causes,) you must not think that any thing is done until we, on our parts, have done what is required. What is that? It is, that after such humble repentance, and after such an entire confession and restitution, as I said, we perform the things expressed in the grant of the indulgence. And when all is done, the most that we obtain is, to have pardon due to such sins, the guilt of which is already forgiven by our repentance and confession. But the Protestants teach, that faith alone quite frees men for ever of all their sins; and of all the pain that was due for their sins, though never so many or so great; for after this faith God imputes their sins no longer to them.

[* Butler's Catechism, Lesson xxviii. Cork, 1839.

["3. Before I prove that the Pope hath power, by indulgences, granted upon just cause, to pardon such as duly perform what is enjoined, I further note, that the blood of Christ was of that infinite value, that the shedding of one drop thereof was able to satisfy divine justice for all the sins of the world; yea, of a million of worlds; and able to satisfy also for all the pain that could be due for all those sins. Wherefore, seeing Christ did not shed his blood for us by drops, but by showers, hence it followeth evidently, that the satisfactions of Christ alone be, in a most high degree, superabundant. Tell me now, is the most precious treasure of all this superabundancy of satisfactions, in order to cancel the pain due to our sins, so wholly lost, that even the living members of Christ's body can receive no benefit by this superabundancy? God forbid! They be not treasures wrapped up in a napkin. Wherefore there must be a power on earth to dispense this rich treasure; but yet to dispense it so, as becomes a prudent dispenser of the mysteries of God. Now, who is the highest and chiefest in this dignity of dispensing, but he whom we have proved to be the head and chief Pastor of Christ's church, to whom it was said, 'To thee I will give the keys of the kingdom of heaven.' (Matt. xvi. 19.) 'Feed my sheep.' (John xxi. 15.)

["4. That such indulgences as are here described may be granted, I prove first because to give thus 'the keys of the kingdom of heaven' to St. Peter, and to his successors, (as is there proved,) is to give power of removing any bar that may shut us out of heaven; whether this bar be the sin itself, which excludes us eternally, (if not removed,) or whether it be the guilt of pain for our sins forgiven; which excludeth us only until such time as due satisfaction is made for that pain. Satisfaction may be made for this pain either by ourselves performing sufficiently for this effect such satisfactory works as are enjoined, or which may be performed for us by others. For as I may pay my debts by myself, so I may pay them by a friend.

["5. And the proof of this is, a second proof of indulgences out of Col. i. 24: 'I, Paul, who now rejoice in suffering for you, and do accomplish those things which want of the passion of Christ in my flesh for his body, which is the church.' Whence it appears, that notwithstanding the fulness and superabundance of Christ's passion in itself, yet, in order to our being made completely partakers of several fruits thereof, something may be (and often is) wanting on our part. What is this? It is the adjoining of those satisfactory works which Christ expects at our hands. And, until such works be performed, either by us in person, or for us in the person of some other, we still stand liable to the pain due to our sins forgiven. Now that another may offer such works for us, is made evident by the text we cited out of St. Paul, affirming that he rejoiced in doing this deed of charity, which consisted in suffering (that is, in doing a work most satisfactory) for them, and by it 'to make up, or to accomplish in his flesh that which was yet behind,' or as yet wanted, of 'the passion of Christ;' that is, what 'was wanting,' not on Christ's part, but on the part of his body, 'which is the church.' Now as St. Paul (as then confirmed in grace) had few sins and many sufferings, which he could well spare, and give away to pay his brother's debt; so had St. John Baptist; so had Our Lady; so the Apostles; so the holy martyrs, and many others. But, above all, Christ's sufferings alone had an inexhaustible superabundance; which sufferings, although Christ, by his ordinary course of providence, doth not apply to the full cleansing of our sins, and of the pain due to our sins, unless we do what is required on our part; yet he hath left power to his Vicar on earth, upon just causes, and with due circumspection, to impart, by way of special favour or indulgence, those superabundant satisfactions of Christ and his saints unto us, that by this superabundancy our wants may be supplied, if we duly dispose ourselves by his grace to be partakers of that great favour.

["6. A third proof of indulgences out of Scripture is to show St. Paul exercising in the person of Christ this special favour or indulgence towards the incestuous Corinthian; whom (in his First Epistle to the Corinthians) he had given over to Satan by excommunication. But afterwards moved to be more favourable unto him by his great repentance, he doth not only absolve him from the sin, and from the excommunication; but having enjoined him a most severe public penance, (which was to have lasted for a great time before the pains due to his enormous offence would have been fully cancelled,) he, notwithstanding, out of the plenitude of his apostolical power, graciously pardons the remnant of his penance. Now this pardon would have been no favour nor grace, unless at the same time he had pardoned the remnant of the pain still due, according to divine justice. Therefore he declares expressly, that he doth it in the power of Christ; so he saith, 'To whom you forgive any thing, I forgive also in the person of Christ;' (2 Cor. ii. 10;) that is, by Christ's commission I give this pardon, Christ notifying the pardon or indulgence, which I give to one so well disposed, as I see this delinquent to be.

["7. And hence comes in a fourth proof: 'Receive the Holy Ghost: whose sins you shall remit, they are forgiven, and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained.' (John xx. 23.) Behold power in the Church, not only to forgive the remnant of the pain due to the sins forgiven, (which is all that is done by indulgences,) but also behold a power to forgive the very sin itself, and consequently to take quite away the very eternity of pain, which before was due to the sin. Whence you cannot wonder to see power of taking away only temporal pain due to sin, when such conditions be fulfilled." *

[We proceed to show, in the language of a writer in Bishop Gibson's Preservative against Popery, what opinion hath been had of these indulgences, in the Romish Church; wherein some have freely confessed, they have no foundation in Scripture or antiquity; others, that they are only pious frauds; and those who have gone about to defend them, have been driven to miserable shifts in the defence of them.

["1. Some have confessed that they have no foundation in Scripture or antiquity. Durandus saith,† that

[* The Catholic Scripturist: or, the Plea of the Roman Catholics. Showing the Scriptures to hold the Roman Catholic Faith in above forty of the chief Controversies now under debate. By Joseph Mumford, Priest of the Society of Jesus. London, 1686. Permissu Superiorum. Pp. 251—260.

[† "De indulgentiis pauca dici possunt per certitudinem, quia nec Scriptura expresse de eis loquitur. Quod enim dictum est Petro, Matt. xvi., 'Tibi dabo claves regni cœlorum. Et quodcunque ligaveris,' &c., intelligitur de potestate ei data in foro pœnitentiæ. De collatione autem indulgentiarum non est clarum quod debeat intelligi: sancti etiam, ut Ambrosius, Hilarius, Augustinus, Hieronymus, minime loquuntur de indulgentiis."—Durand. a Portiano in Sent. Theol. P. Lombard., lib. iv., Dist. xx., quæst. 3.

'very little can be affirmed, with any certainty, concerning indulgences, because neither the Scripture speaks expressly of them; and the Fathers, Ambrose, Hilary, Augustine, Hieron, speak not at all of them.' And therefore he hath no more to say, but that the common opinion is to be followed therein. The same is said by another Schoolman, who adds this, that 'though it be a negative argument, yet it is of force, because in the time of those Fathers they were very much skilled in the Scriptures; and it were very strange, if indulgences were to be found there, that they did not find them.'

["This is likewise affirmed by Cajetan, Dominicus Soto, and all those who assert that the use of indulgences came into the Church, upon the relaxing the severity of the primitive discipline; which they say continued in use for a thousand years after Christ. But the most express testimonies in this case are those of Bishop Fisher, who saith that the use of indulgences came very late into the Church; and of Polydore Virgil, following his words; and of Alphonsus á Castro, who ingenuously confesseth, that among all the controversies he writes of, there is none which the Scripture or Fathers speak less of than this; but, however, he saith, 'Though the use of them seem to have come very late into the Church, they ought not to be contemned; because many other things are known to latter ages, which the ancient writers were wholly ignorant of;' for which he instanceth in transubstantiation, procession from the Son, and purgatory. But he ought to have remembered what himself had said before, in a chapter of finding out heresies; that 'the novelty of any doctrine makes it of itself to be suspected, because Christ and his Apostles did give sufficient instruction for attaining eternal life; and after the law given by Christ, no other law is to be expected, because his testament is eternal.' Let this be applied to his own confession of these doctrines, and the consequence is easily discerned. And it is an excellent saying of Bellarmine, that 'in things which depend on the will of God, nothing ought to be affirmed, unless God hath revealed it in the holy Scriptures.' *

["Therefore, according to the opinion of these persons, who assert the doctrine of indulgence to have no foundation in Scripture or antiquity, it can be no other than a notorious cheat.

["2. Some in the Church of Rome have called them 'pious frauds.' This appears by the controversies which arose upon indulgences, at the same time when they began to grow common. For Aquinas and Bonaventure tell us that there were some in the Church who said, that the intention of the Church in indulgences was only by a pious fraud to draw men to charitable acts,† which otherwise they would not have done; as a mother which promiseth her child an apple to run abroad, which she never gives him, when she hath brought him to it: which is the very instance they used, as Gregory de Valencia confesseth. But this Aquinas rejects as a very dangerous opinion; because this is, in plain terms, to make the Church guilty of a notorious cheat; and, as he saith from St. Augustine, 'if any falsehood be found in Scripture, it takes away the authority of the whole;' so if the Church be guilty of a cheat in one thing, she will be suspected of all the rest. *

["'This,' saith Bonaventure, 'is to make the Church to lie and deceive, and indulgences to be vain and childish toys.' But for all these hard words, they had a great deal of reason on their side; for the indulgences were express for the remission of the sins of those who did such and such things, as the giving a small sum of money towards the building of a church or an hospital; they therefore asked whether the indulgences were to be taken as they were given, or no. If they were, then all those had full remission of sins on very easy terms; if not, then what is this else but fraud and cheating? and can be only called 'pious,' because the work was good which they did. This put the defenders of indulgences very hard to it. Præpositivus, one of the eldest of the Schoolmen, confesseth that it looks a little oddly for a man to be absolved from all his sins for threepence, given in three several places; and that the rich, by this means, have a mighty advantage over the poor: but he resolves it all into the power of the Church. Petrus Cantor confesseth the difficulties great, but only for the Church's authority; and especially in those general indulgences which are pronounced without any distinctions. Therefore he saith, Gregory IV., as he calls him, (Morinus thinks Gregory VIII.,) in the dedication of the church of Benevento, told the people that it was much safer for them to undergo their penance than to receive an indulgence from him of any part of it; and another Bishop, being desired an indulgence, would give it but for two days; but if any one asks whether the remission of sins were presently obtained after indulgence, or only when they are incapable of penance, namely, after death, for his part, he saith, he desires them to consult the Pope, or the Bishop that gives the indulgence, whether of these opinions is true; and when the Bishop of Paris showed him the magnificent church he had built by virtue of indulgences, Cantor told him he had done much better if he had let them alone, and persuaded the people to undergo their penance.

["But because the form of indulgences ran in such large and general terms, it grew to be a great question among the Schoolmen, whether the validity of indulgences was as great as the words of them. Which, in other terms, is, whether the Church did cheat or not in giving them. For if they were not to understand them according to the plain words of them, what is this but a gross imposture to abuse the credulous people, and laugh in their sleeves at them for their simplicity? For while the people have so good an opinion of their Church, as to believe the truth of what she declares, and to take indulgences according to the sense of the words; if their meaning who give them be otherwise than is expressed, it is one of the most abominable cheats that ever was invented by men.

["For picking purses, forging deeds, or betraying men, are tolerable things in comparison; but to abuse and ruin their souls, under a pretence of pardoning their sins, is the utmost degree of fraud and imposture. Let us now see how these hucksters defend their Church in this case; for the question hath been debated among the Schoolmen ever since indulgences came up. Some resolve it thus: that indulgences do signify as much as the [* "Non est de rebus, quæ pendent a divina voluntate, aliquid asserendum, nisi Deus ipse in Scripturis sanctis tale aliquid revelaverit."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. iv.; De Amiss. Grat., lib. vi., cap. iii.; Resp. Obj. Sext., fol. Colon., 1619.

[† "Errant, qui dicunt indulgentias tantum valere, quantum fides, et devotio recipientis exigit: et ecclesiam ideo sic eas pronunciare, ut quadam pia fraude homines ad bene faciendum alliciat."—Thom. Aquin. Summæ Theol. Supp. Tert. pars., quæst. xxv., art. iv. 4to. Colon., 1620.

[* "Si in Scriptura sacra, ait August., inveniatur aliquid falsitatis, jam ejus auctoritatis robur perit: idem dicas de Ecclesiæ auctoritate, si quid falsum diceret."—Idem.

Church declares, but with these conditions; that there be sufficient authority in the giver, and necessity in the receiver; that he believe the Church hath power to forgive him; that he be in a state of grace, and give a sufficient compensation; which is to overthrow what they said, unless those conditions were expressed in the indulgences.

["Some say that common indulgences held only for sins of ignorance; others, for venial sins; others, for penances negligently performed; others, for purgatory pains. Some, again, said, that these could signify no more than a relaxation of canonical penance, whatever the words were, and that they were introduced for no other end, and they do not reach any farther than the Church's canonical power or judgment doth, and not to the judgment of God.

["But this opinion, saith Gregory de Valencia, doth not differ from the heretics: and withal, he saith, upon this principle, indulgences do more hurt than good; for if it were not for them, the sinner, by his penance, might take away some part of his punishment; but now he relies upon his indulgences, and does no penance, and so undergoes his whole punishment. Albertus Magnus saith, they are much mistaken who say that indulgences are to be understood as large as their words are, without any further condition; and that this is to enlarge the court of God's mercy too far; and says, many conditions are to be understood which are not expressed in them. This gave the first occasion to the treasure of the Church, invented by Aquinas to satisfy this argument of Albertus, concerning the mercy of God being extended too far by indulgences; for hereby, what punishment is taken away from one, is made up by the punishment of another, which is reckoned upon his account. And therefore, he saith, the cause of the remission of punishment is not the devotion, work, or gift of the receiver, but the treasure of merits which was in the Church, which the Pope might dispense; and therefore the quantity of the remission was not to be proportioned to the acts of the receiver, but to the stock of the Church. This rich bank of the Church's stock being thus happily discovered, they do not question now, but to set all accounts even with it: and therefore Aquinas confidently affirms, that indulgences are to be understood simply, as they are expressed; for God, saith he, doth not need our lie or deceit; which he grants must have been, if indulgences had not been meant as they were expressed; and all men would sin mortally who preached indulgences. Yet, to obtain the indulgence, he saith, that every man must give according to his ability; for the objection being put, concerning an indulgence being given to three several places, that whosoever gives a penny towards the building of a church in every one of these places, shall for each of them have the third part of his sins forgiven him; so that for threepence a man gets a plenary remission; he answers, that a poor man may indeed have it so; but it is to be understood that a rich man ought to give more. For it is all the reason in the world that a rich man should pay greater use for the stock of the Church than a poor man can do; and it is reasonably to be presumed, that he had more sins to be pardoned than the other; and therefore, whatever the general terms are, there must be some reserve to hook in more from the rich than was expressed in the first bargain. But if the rich man should plead law in the case, and cry out it was coven and fraud to demand more than the first contract was; I am not skilful enough to determine what action the Church can have against him.

["But there is another shrewd objection mentioned by Bonaventure, which is, that a man gets by sinning: as suppose two men to receive the remission of a third part of their sins by an indulgence; one owes, it may be, but ninety years penance for his sins, and another hath run upon the score so far that he owes nine hundred years; both receive a third-part indulgence; in which case, we see plainly, the greater sinner hath mightily the advantage of the other, and where one gets but thirty, the other gets three hundred. And therefore Bonaventure is fain to run back again, and to say, that indulgences are not to be understood as they are expressed, and that they are not equal to all; but it was not fit to express it so, because this would hinder the people's esteem of the indulgence. Which in plainer terms is, that it is necessary to cheat the people, or else there is no good to be done by indulgences.

["Thence Petrarch called them nets wherein the credulous multitude were caught; and in the time of Boniface IX., the people, observing what vast sums of money were gathered by them, cried out, they were mere cheats and tricks to get money with; upon which Paulus Langius (a Monk) exclaims, 'O God, to what are these things come! Thou holdest thy peace, but thou wilt not always; for the day of the Lord will bring the hidden things of darkness to light.' Conrad Urspergensis saith, that Rome might well rejoice in the sins of the people, because she grew rich by the compensation which was made for them: 'Thou hast,' saith he to her, 'that which thou hast always thirsted after; sing and rejoice, for thou hast conquered the world, not by religion, but by the wickedness of men, which is that which draws them to thee, not their devotion and piety.'

["Platina saith, the selling indulgences brought the ecclesiastical authority into contempt, and gave encouragement to many sins. Urspergensis complains that plenary indulgences brought more wickedness into the world: for, he saith, men did then say, 'Let me do what wickedness I will, by them I shall be free from punishment, and deliver the souls of others from purgatory.' Gerson saith, none can give a pardon for so many years as are contained in the Pope's indulgences, but Christ alone: therefore what are they but cheats and impostures? In Spain, indulgences were condemned by Petrus de Osma, a Divine of Salamanca, and his followers, as appears by the Pope's Bull against them, A. D. 1478. In Germany by Johannes de Vesalia, a famous Preacher of Mentz; for Serrarius reckons this among the chief of his opinions, that indulgences were only pious frauds and ways to deceive the people, and that they were fools who went to Rome for them. About the same time flourished Wesselus Groningensis, incomparably the best scholar of his age, and therefore called Lux Mundi; he was not only skilled in school divinity, (almost the only learning of that time,) but in the Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic; having travelled into Greece, Egypt, and been in most Universities of Europe, and read the most ancient authors, in all kinds of learning; on the account of his talents he was much in favour with Sixtus IV., and was present and admired at the Council of Basil; but he was so far from being a friend to indulgences, that in his Epistle he saith, that no Popes could grant an indulgence for an hour, and that it is a ridiculous thing to imagine that for the same thing done, sometimes an indulgence should be granted for seven years, sometimes for seven hundred, sometimes for seven thousand, and sometimes for ever, by a plenary remission; and that there is not the least foundation in Scripture for the distinction of remitting the fault and the punishment upon which the doctrine of indulgences is founded; that the giving them was a design of covetousness; and, although the Pope once sware to the Ambassador of the King of France, that he did not know the corruption of the sellers of indulgences, yet, when he did know them, he let them alone, and they spread farther; that God himself doth not give plenary remission to contrition and confession, and therefore the Pope can much less do it. But if God doth forgive, how comes the Pope to have power to retain? And if there be no punishment retained when God forgives, what hath the Pope to do to release? Against him writes one James Hoeck: he confesseth there is nothing in Scripture or antiquity expressly for indulgences; but that ought to be no argument, for there are many other things owned in their Church as necessary points, which have as little foundation as this; namely, St. Peter's being at Rome, and sacramental confession; and therefore at last he takes sanctuary in the Pope's and Church's authority.

["To this Wesselus answers, that indulgences were accounted pious frauds before the time of Albertus and Thomas; that there was a great number of Divines who still opposed the errors and practices in the court of Rome in this matter; that supposing the Church were for them, yet the authority of Scripture is to be preferred before it, and no multitude of men whatsoever is to be believed against Scripture; that he had not taken up this opinion rashly, but had maintained it in Paris thirty-three years before, and in the Pope's Penitentiary Court at Rome, and was now ready to change it if he could see better reason for the contrary; that the doctrine of indulgences was delivered very confusedly and uncertainly, by which it appeared to be no Catholic doctrine; that it is almost impossible to find two men agree in the explication of them; that the doctrine of indulgences was so far from being firmly believed among them, that there was not the strictest person of the Carthusian, or other Orders, that should receive a plenary indulgence at the hour of death, that yet would not desire his brethren to pray for his soul; which is a plain argument he did not believe the validity of the indulgence; that many in the court of Rome did speak more freely against them than he did; that the Pope's authority is very far from being infallible, or being owned as such in the Church, as appeared by the Divines at Paris condemning the Bull of Clement VI. about indulgences, wherein he took upon him to command the angels, and gave plenary remissions both from the fault and punishment. Which authentic Bull, he saith, was then to be seen at Vienna, Limoges, and Poictou. It is notorious to the world what complaints were made in Germany, after his time, of the fraud of indulgences, before any other point of religion came into dispute; and how necessarily, from this, the Pope's authority came to be questioned, that being the only pretence they had to justify them by: and with what success these things were then managed, it is to no more purpose to write now than to prove that it is day at noon. The Council of Trent could not but confess 'horrible abuses in the sale of indulgences;' yet, what amendment hath there been since that time? Bellarmine confesseth, that it were better if the Church were very sparing of giving indulgences. I wonder why so, if my adversary's experience and observation be true, that they prove great helps to devotion and charity. Can the Church be too liberal in those things which tend to so good an end?

["But Bellarmine would not have the people too confident of the effect of indulgences; for though the Church may have power to give them, yet they may want their effect in particular persons; 'and therefore,' saith he, 'all prudent Christians do so receive indulgences, as withal to satisfy God themselves for their sins;' that is, in plain terms, that all prudent Christians are too wise to believe them, and none but fools do rely on them. For if there were any thing but fraud and imposture in them, why may not a prudent Christian trust a Church which he believes infallible? If the head of the Church publishes an indulgence, wherein he remits to all that are confessed and contrite, upon doing such actions of charity and piety, the remaining temporal punishment of their sins; I desire to know why a prudent Christian of that Church may not, yea, ought not to, rely upon his word? Doth he suspect the head of his Church may cheat and abuse him? If he doth, what becomes of infallibility? If he verily believe that the Pope cannot err, and will not deceive, why must not his word be taken? And how can his word be taken for the remitting of a debt, when they take as much care of payment as if he had said nothing? I know not how those things pass among the prudent Christians of that Church, but to me they look like the greatest suspicion of a cheat that may be. As suppose a great person out of kindness to one that is in danger of lying in prison for debt, gives him a note under his hand, that upon the acknowledgment of his debt to his attorney, and paying him his fees, he will see his debt wholly discharged; and a friend of the prisoner tells him openly, he ought to receive that favour in an extraordinary manner with all thankfulness; for that person is one who can never fail of his word, and he need not question his ability, for he hath a vast treasure in his hands, to be disposed of for such uses; can we otherwise think, but that the poor man would be strangely surprised with joy at it? and if he hath any money left, he will be sure to give it to the person employed in so good a work. But withal, if he should secretly whisper him, that he advises him as a friend, that he would look out all other ways imaginable to satisfy his creditors, and that all prudent persons in his case had taken the same course; what must the thoughts of such a man be of such a large and noble offer? Truly, that the gentleman was a great courtier, but a man must have a care of believing him too far; and his friend understood the world, and that one thing was to be said and done in show, not to disoblige so great a person; but for all that a man must mind his own business, or he may be choused at last, if he trust too far to such large promises. This is just the case of indulgences in the Romish Church: a man is affrighted with the dreadful prison of purgatory, as the temporal punishment of his sins, which God will certainly exact from him, either here by satisfactions and penances, or there in the pains of that state; while the man considers with himself the hardness of his condition, he hears of indulgences to be had; and after he hath inquired the meaning of them, is very well satisfied that if he can get one of them he shall do well enough. For he is told that His Holiness is infallible, and that he cannot cheat, or lie, or deceive, like other men; and therefore of all persons in the world, he would soonest trust him. But because many others are in the same condition with him, he may a little question whether his stock will hold out or no: here his friends assure him the treasure of the Church (of which the Pope hath the keys) is so large, that if it were a thousand times more he need not fear it; only he must confess his sins, and have contrition for them, and do some charitable acts, and pay some customary fees and duties, and he shall have a total discharge. Well, says the man, in a transport of joy, this is the bravest Church in the world for a man to sin in, if he may escape thus; and what need I question, since the Pope is infallible, and the treasury of the Church is inexhaustible? How am I freed now, not only from the fears of hell and purgatory, but from crabbed and hateful penance! That honest and kind-hearted gentleman the Pope hath struck a tally for me in his exchequer, and I shall have my share in my course and order without lashings, and whippings, and fastings, and mumblings, and I know not how many odd tricks besides.

["'But soft and fair,' saith Bellarmine's prudent Christian to him; 'be not too confident of your ease and discharge: you must use as great severities with yourself, and undergo as many penances, and say as many prayers, as if you had no indulgences at all.' 'Say you so? I pray what benefit, then, have I,' saith he, 'by this which you call an indulgence? What is it an indulgence of? Is there not a full remission of sins contained in it? And I have always been told, by that is meant the discharge of the temporary punishment due to sin either here or in purgatory. Shall I be discharged, or shall I not, upon it? If I shall, why do you tell me of that which I am discharged from? If not, the indulgence is a spiritual trepan, and the Pope an infallible cheat.' I cannot see how a man can think otherwise that made such account of the great benefit of indulgences, and at last finds they come to nothing but deceiving the people and getting money.

["By this we see already what miserable shifts they are put to, who defend indulgences as an honest contract; but they who will justify them, as containing something divine and satisfactory for the punishment of men's sins, are fain to build the doctrine of them upon such absurd and unintelligible notions, that it is almost as hard to understand as to believe it. It cannot be denied that there are some in the Church of Rome whose doctrine of indulgences is easy enough; but then it mars the whole market, and this doctrine is therefore condemned by others as heretical in sense; which is, that indulgences are nothing else but a relaxation of the ancient severity of church discipline according to the old penitential canons; which doth not respect the justice of God, but the discipline of the Church over offenders.

["This is a doctrine that we cannot complain of any difficulty in understanding; but we know not to what purpose (if this be all) any particular indulgences are ever given, since there is so general an indulgence, by the practice of the whole Church among them; wherein they cannot pretend to observe any of the old penitential canons. And to give a man an indulgence to omit that which nobody requires, and is wholly out of use, would be like the King's giving a man a patent not to wear trunk hose and ruffs, when it would be ridiculous to use them.

["And if this were all intended, why is it not so expressed, if they meant honestly? But they know, if their pardons ran so, no one would give a farthing for them. What need any talk of the Church's treasure for this, which Clement VI. made the ground of indulgences in his Bull, and hath been asserted by the most zealous defenders of them? This way of explaining indulgences, then, though it be easy and intelligible, yet it is not reconcilable with the practice of the Church of Rome, nor with the suppositions on which that practice is built. We are therefore to inquire, what they can make of it who go about to defend it as it is practised and generally understood among them. To this end they tell us, that 'although the fault be remitted, upon the sacrament of penance, yet the temporal punishment of sin remains, which God must be satisfied for; that this temporal punishment is either to be undergone here or in purgatory; that every man must have undergone it himself, if there had not been a treasure of the Church made up of the satisfactions of Christ and the saints, to make amends to God for every one to whom that treasure is applied; that the dispensing of this treasure is in the hands of the Pope, who gives it out by indulgences; which being applied to any person upon the condition required, he is thereby discharged from the debt of temporal punishment which he owed to God.'"*]

II. We proceed to examine by what authority indulgences are granted.

1. The Church of Rome having made this part of the system an article of faith, by embracing it as one of the portions of the Creed of Pope Pius, and by dogmatically teaching it with the authority of the Council of Trent, the reader will naturally expect that this doctrine is supported by most unequivocal scriptural authority. Dens, in attempting to establish this dogma, adduces the decision of the Council of Trent, sacred Scripture, and continued ecclesiastical use.

2. As it regards the decision of the Tridentine Synod in this matter, it has no weight with Protestants; inasmuch as it is a species of authority which cannot establish any article of faith.

3. The principal passages of Scripture which the logical and wily Dens, and other of the Romish theologians, adduce for the sale of indulgences, are the following:—"And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." (Matt. xvi. 19.) "He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? Peter was grieved because he said unto him the third time, Lovest thou me? And he said unto him, Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus saith unto him, Feed my sheep." (John xxi. 17.) It is only necessary on this point to observe, that these portions, as interpreted and quoted by Roman Catholics, are made to support almost every doctrine, usage, and rite of the Papacy. The supremacy of the Pope, the power of absolution, the infallibility of the Church, and many other things besides, are all said to be proved from two or three choice texts. It is sufficient to say, that to employ two or three isolated verses to prove every thing is proof that such portions are not properly interpreted. The truth is, they are aware that Scripture does not authorize this article of their creed; and it is because they are opposed so strongly by the Protestants that reference is made to the word of God. Dens commences his vindication by alluding to the authority of the Council of Trent; he then proceeds to quote the preceding texts; and as if aware that Scripture was against him, he reverts to ecclesiastical in the place of divine authority; though he changes the form, by departing from that authority which is conciliar, to that which is derived from the usages of the Church.

[* Gibson's Preservative against Popery, vol. ii., tit. viii., chap. iv.]

Let us investigate this ecclesiastical usage of indulgences, and trace it, if possible, to its origin.

[Dr. Hales observes, that "the high importance of the first commandment of the second table 'with promise,' or an express sanction annexed, and which includes duty to all our superiors, who exercise a parental care and authority over us, appears from our Lord's censure of the Scribes and Pharisees, for annulling the law of Moses, by their vain traditions, which he illustrates by their breach of this commandment, as the prominent example: Ye say, or teach, if a man say to his father or mother in want, 'It is corban,' (or 'a gift,' dedicated to sacred uses,) 'whatever support thou mightest receive from me;' ye no longer suffer him to do any thing for his father or mother: 'and many such like things do ye.' (Mark vii. 8—13.) We learn from Lightfoot that they made no scruple of violating this vow of Corban. For though it prohibited the party from relieving the wants of his father or mother, he was not at all bound to dedicate his property to sacred uses; and he was at liberty to relieve any others, except his parents, who were not included in the vow. We learn also from Josephus, that these corrupt teachers of the law were accustomed to grant pecuniary dispensations from the vow of Corban, where it related to personal services; fifty shekels for a man's discharge, and thirty for a woman's. And if they were not able to pay so much, the Priests were allowed to rate them at discretion according to their ability. It is truly remarkable that both these usages were adopted by the see of Rome in the table of rates for dispensations from vows in their Court of Chancery, and exceeded in indulgences for crimes."*] But more of this anon.

The incestuous Corinthian is quoted, but certainly to no purpose. To as little effect Dens and others refer to a custom that early obtained in the primitive church, by which the lapsed were restored to the communion of the saints, through the entreaties or letters of martyrs.† But all this, however, is wide of the mark; and we proceed to prove, from Romanists themselves, that indulgences are an innovation, and a substitute for the ancient canonical penances.

Dens, speaking of these canonical inflictions, says, "Which being abrogated, the use of indulgences became more common, and succeeded, as it were, in their place: and thus the mode was introduced of measuring or determining indulgences, not according to months or weeks, but by days and years, just as the canonical penances were appointed."‡ The same author acknowledges that the use of indulgences abrogated the primitive discipline: "But the use of indulgences began to be more common when the rigour of the canonical penances was relaxed, to the abrogation of which this gave occasion."§ Thus Roman Catholics are compelled to acknowledge that this article which they deem necessary to salvation, was not originally in the Church, but actually succeeded the abrogation of the primitive discipline! Overwhelming testimonies could be added to the above, were they necessary. It will be, however, proper to trace the origin and establishment of this anti-scriptural traffic in indulgences.

[With such a fearful assemblage of what was superstitious and profane, we are not surprised to find that a corrupt priesthood endeavoured to turn the whole to their secular advantage. To this end the various ranks and orders of the Clergy directed their attention. Bishops who, in the gratification of their unlawful pleasures, or in the aggrandizement of their spiritual influence and tyranny, had impoverished their coffers, granted to their flocks the power of purchasing the remission of the penalties which had been imposed upon transgressors for a sum of money, which was ostensibly to be applied to certain religious purposes; or, in other words, they published indulgences, which became an inexhaustible source of opulence to the Episcopal orders, and enabled them, as it is well known, to form and execute the most difficult schemes for the enlargement of their authority, and to erect a multitude of sacred edifices, which augmented considerably the external pomp and splendour of the Church. The Abbots and Monks, who were not qualified to grant indulgences, had recourse to other methods of enriching their convents. They positively carried about the country, as medicinal quacks formerly hawked their specifics, the carcasses and relics of the saints, and permitted the multitude to behold, touch, and embrace these sacred and lucrative remains at certain fixed prices. These monastic orders gained often as much by these raree-shows as the Bishops pocketed by their indulgences. In process of time, the Roman Pontiffs cast a Naboth-eye upon the immense treasures which the inferior rulers of the Church were accumulating by the sale of indulgences, and very speedily limited the power of the Bishops in remitting the penalties imposed upon transgressors, and assumed almost entirely the traffic to themselves. In consequence of this measure, the court of Rome became the great emporium of indulgences; and the "successor of St. Peter," and "servant of servants," when either the wants of the Church, the emptiness of his coffers, or the demon of avarice, prompted him to look out for new subsidies, published, not only an universal, but also a complete, or what they were pleased to call a plenary, remission of all temporal pains and penalties which the Church had annexed to certain transgressions. They went still further, and not only remitted the penalties which the civil and ecclesiastical laws had enacted against transgressors, but most impiously usurped the authority which belongs to God alone, and presumptuously pretended to abolish even the punishments which are reserved in a future state for the workers of iniquity; a step which the Bishops, with all their grasping and mercenary projects, never ventured to take.

[The progress of a corrupted faith to acts of fraud and oppression, is not only easy, but rapid. Although truth and error be opposite to each other, the distance between them is not always distinctly perceived; and when the intervening space is filled up with sophistry or mysticism, thousands may be led from one to the other without fear or resistance. The doctrine of indulgences arose, as a natural consequence, out of the system of discipline established in the Church of Rome. It was found necessary in the apostolic age to institute rules for the punishment of evil-doers, and the correction of thoughtless, and even weak, professors of the faith. These rules applied immediately to the preservation of

[* A new Analysis of Chronology and Geography, History and Prophecy, &c. By W. Hales, D.D. Vol. iii., pp. 336, 337. 8vo. Second edition. 1830.]

† Cyprian Oper., Epist. xv. Ad Martyres et Confessores.

‡ "Quibus (canonicis pœnitentiis) abrogatis, cœpit indulgentiarum usus esse communior, et in earum locum quasi successit: et ita modus inductus est mensurandi seu determinandi indulgentias, non secundum menses aut hebdomadas, sed per dies et annos, quemadmodum pœnitentiæ canonicæ præscribebantur."—Dens Theologia, tom. vi.; De Indulg., No. 31; De Divisione Indulgentiarum.

§ "Cœpit autem usus indulgentiarum esse communior, quando rigor Canonum pœnitentialium relaxatus est, cui abrogationi usus ille occasionem dedit."—Idem, No. 32; De Potestate concedendi Indulgentias.

that purity of manners, and steady adherence to the doctrines originally given to the saints, to which the Christian temple must in all ages be indebted for its security. But as the spirit of piety evaporated from the Church, and its rulers sought authority for the sake of personal emolument, the principle of discipline lost its original value, and laws were multiplied in order to make up by their numbers what had been sacrificed in strength.

[Whatever the authority of a Church may be, it cannot support itself against the ordinary wants and wishes of mankind without rendering homage, in its turn, to the general necessities of nature: the consequence is, that such of its laws as are not intrinsically moral have frequently to be relaxed; reasons are found in individual cases for granting exemptions from its penalties; and the interests of the Church, it is seen, are better preserved by lenity, than they could possibly be by a too severe and unindulgent discipline. In this respect the heads of the Church have only followed the example of other legislators. Laws must be general, and the allowed punishment of guilt must be equivalent to the enormity of the specified crime in its worst forms and circumstances: but as the same species of crime may be committed with different degrees of turpitude, and in a manner more or less aggravating, it ought evidently to be in the power of those who judge and award the punishment to determine the amount of the penalty due from the offender. The Church, moreover, owes its origin and authority to a voluntary association, and its members are taught to expect the ultimate punishment of their crimes in another world. This renders it doubly necessary that no force should be exercised without the most careful adjustment to the expediency of discipline. Whenever a punishment is inflicted which the interests of good order do not require, the rulers of the Church overstep their authority, and palpably violate every safe and prudent maxim of ecclesiastical government.

[From these considerations it will be evident that, as the Church continued to increase and extend its dominion over densely-populated countries, much caution would be necessary in the administration of its laws. The punishments of a spiritual government are strictly sanatory, and are inflicted not so much for the safety of the community, as the deliverance of the offender from a sorer evil. From this it may be concluded, that where the infliction of the penalty would plunge the sufferer into despair, or otherwise impose a burden upon him too heavy for his strength, the authority and wisdom of the Church are profitably employed in modifying the rigour of its justice.

[The expediency of admitting a penitent to communion, without pressing the penal discipline beyond the appearance of genuine sorrow, was acknowledged in the earliest ages of the Church. Some there were who would not allow that the soul which had sinned against the faith could ever be fully purified from its guilt; but this opinion was opposed both by the principle and the practice of the Church; and in the primitive times the trembling offender knew, from the beginning of his penitence, that the door of mercy would be opened to him, as soon as he proved himself sincere in his confession and humiliation.

[Dr. Wiseman, who, in his Lectures on the principal Doctrines and Practices of the Church of Rome, endeavours to present this doctrine in its most favourable aspect, and loses sight of those extraordinary characteristics which lead all good men to deprecate and abhor the dogma, says, "The chief ground of indulgence or mitigation, and the one which most exactly includes all the principles of a modern indulgence, was the earliest perhaps admitted in the Church. When the martyrs, or those who were on the point of receiving the crown, and had already testified their love of Christ by suffering, were confined in prison, those unfortunate Christians who had fallen and were condemned to penance, had recourse to their mediation; and upon returning to the Pastors of the Church with a written recommendation to mercy from one of those chosen servants of God, and witnesses of Christ, were received at once to reconciliation, and absolved from the remainder of their penance."*

[The deceptive character of this representation, and the utter fallacy of the assertion, that it "exactly includes all the principles of a modern indulgence," we shall exhibit as we proceed. One grave charge against the Papacy on the subject of indulgences is, that she considers a breach of discipline, which is but of human authority, equal in turpitude with a transgression of the divine and moral law, and inflicts punishment and grants remission accordingly. The breach of a divine and moral law is one thing, and the violation of a rule of discipline is another; and although the latter offence may, in many cases, be strongly imbued with moral delinquency, they can never be confounded without serious injury both to religion and government. In no one point did the Papal hierarchy sin more against the interests of Christianity, than in confounding things which ought always to be viewed with the most cautious discrimination. It unsettled thereby the grand principles of human conscience, and, opening the door to the most rapacious of invaders, left no man free from robbery and oppression. Why the redoubtable Dr. Wiseman hesitated to grapple with this question in a fair and manly contest in his Lecture on Indulgences, it is not for us to say: for want of such discussion, that part of his production is miserably defective.

[The fatal effects of so fearful and voluntary an error could not long remain concealed; but it was many ages before the evil grew to its full proportions. At first the punishments inflicted by the Church were little more than an extension of that severe discipline which the sternest professors of the faith, in early days, were willing to impose upon themselves. They were then gradually increased in severity till they resembled the inflictions of legal justice; and no sooner had penance assumed this character, than the system of indulgences demanded greater caution than ever, both in its establishment and in its application.

[To secure submission was the first object; to give an appearance of fitness and propriety to the penance was the next. Bodily mortification afforded the readiest, and seemingly the most useful, method of punishing sin. It was soon found that the rich and the delicate shrunk from the payment of such a penalty, and that great care was necessary in compelling them to undergo a species of suffering which might lead to their defying, out of mere terror and disgust, the bitterest anathemas of the Priest. Some means, therefore, had to be devised, whereby the Church, without yielding its rights, might soften the rigour of its inflictions. The precept of the Apostle, therefore, was not forgotten; and, "Charity shall cover a multitude of sins," appears to have furnished the Clergy of the middle ages with a valuable guide in cases of difficulty and danger.

[* Lectures on the Doctrines and Practices of the (Roman) Catholic Church, vol. ii., p. 79.

[D'Aubigné, in his celebrated History of the Great Reformation, tells us that, to other various penances, "in the eleventh century were added voluntary flagellations; a little after they became an absolute mania in Italy, which was then in a very disturbed state. Nobles and peasants, old and young, even children of five years old, went in pairs, through the villages, the towns, and the cities, by hundreds, thousands, and tens of thousands, without any other covering than a cloth tied round the loins, visiting the churches in procession, in the very depth of winter. Armed with scourges, they lashed themselves without pity, and the streets resounded with cries and groans, which drew forth tears of compassion from all who heard them. And yet, long before the evil had arrived at this height, men sighed for deliverance from the tyranny of the Priests. The Priests themselves were sensible that if they did not devise some remedy, their usurped power would be at an end. Then it was that they invented the system of barter, known by the name of 'indulgences.' It is under John, surnamed the Faster, Archbishop of Constantinople, that we see its first commencement. The Priests said, 'O penitents, you are unable to perform the penances we have imposed upon you. Well, then, we, the Priests of God, and your Pastors, will take upon ourselves the heavy burden. Who can better fast than we? Who better kneel and recite psalms than ourselves?' But the labourer is worthy of his hire. 'For a seven weeks' fast,' said Regino, the Abbot of Prum, 'such as are rich shall pay twenty pence, and in the same proportion for other things.' Some courageous voices were raised against this traffic, but in vain."*

[Had the heads of the Church only applied that scriptural principle, "Charity shall cover a multitude of sins," from a wise and honest consideration of human depravity and infirmity, much good might have been derived from such a commutation of their penances. The sacrifice of luxury, the necessity of self-denial, imposed by the withdrawal of the means for immediate indulgence, is, in itself, no inapt retribution for thoughtless folly; and when the punishment of error is made available to the important purposes of aiding the distressed, and instructing the ignorant, the Church has done its best in adopting such a method of correcting its erring children. But ecclesiastical jurisdiction had been extended beyond its due limits. Penance, it was unblushingly asserted, might atone for offences, while the Scriptures were teaching them that forgiveness must ever depend upon the will and mercy of God, and the conviction of their sinfulness must always be impressed deeply upon the mind. A breach of the ordinances of the Church, as such, might be atoned for by any satisfaction which the Church chose to specify; but the law of God is pre-eminently a law to the Church, and a sin against this law "who can forgive, but God only?" A penance might be imposed, and excommunication pronounced, against the offender; and on his repentance the Church might declare, according to the authority which Christ had given it, that the sin will be pardoned; but, even in this case, it possessed no power beyond that of expressing its horror of sin, and declaring the good-will and pleasure of God towards those who truly repent, and unfeignedly believe the Gospel. The corruption of which we deeply complain required that these weighty truths should be forgotten, that the tribunal of the Almighty should be removed from heaven, and set up on the earth, utterly regardless both of his power and his law.

[The assertion of a right to commute the penance for one species of offence being supported on the equal plea of mercy and necessity, the right of modifying the whole system of punishment, according to apparent expediency, was soon asserted without any danger of immediate contradiction. As offences against discipline, therefore, might be atoned for by the payment of a fine to the Church; the next step was to allow the transgressor of the divine law to buy himself off from the expected anathema; and, as the Church had undertaken to punish or absolve the greatest of sinners by its own laws and authority, the Church had but to be satisfied by giving to the offender a perfect feeling of security as to any future consequences.

[It will, doubtless, be asked by many, where was the conscience of the broken-hearted penitent during this process? It appears that the anxiety of the soul could not always be appeased by the Church's exercise of such assumed authority. A want was felt which required a personal and individual reference to the love, and goodness, and sacred operations of the Holy Spirit to satisfy; and when the humbled suppliant for pardon remained, after all these penances and satisfactions, sorrow-stricken and dismayed, notwithstanding these mercenary Priests had assured him that he had atoned for his offences, what means were left, or what steps did the Church pursue, to sooth and convince his troubled and inquiring mind? Hear it, ye Protestants, and learn to be grateful for your own privileges, in being emancipated from such a hellish system of fraud and imposture. Hear it, and behold these wolves in sheep's clothing, leading the thirsty lambs of Christ's flock to "cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." The resources of the Papal hierarchy were not exhausted. The irrefragable Doctor, Alexander De Hales, promulgated a doctrine well suited to extricate the Ecclesiastics from the dilemma in which they were placed; whilst a Bull of Pope Clement VI. declared the new doctrine an article of faith. Christ, it was affirmed, had done much more than was required to reconcile God and man. One single drop of his blood would have sufficed for that; but he shed his blood abundantly, that he might form for his church a treasury, that eternity itself should never exhaust. The supererogatory merits of the saints, the reward of the works they have done, beyond and additional to the obligations of duty, have still further enriched the treasury. Was this superabundant holiness to be treated as a valueless commodity? and if it be regarded as a treasury, under whose keeping was it to be placed, and in what manner was it to be employed? The answers were obvious, To the Roman Doctors and casuists. It pertained to the Church, was properly at the disposal of its Prelates, and ought to be distributed among those who needed it, to make up for their own wants and infirmities. They reasoned, in short, as if the distribution of manna in the wilderness had been an intended type of the mode in which holiness was to be used at a later period. "He that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack."

[It has long been a favourite maxim with the Popish Church, that when sin is forgiven, though the guilt thereof and the eternal punishment due on account of it are wholly remitted, there always remains some temporal punishment to be remitted or endured for which satisfaction must be made by the penitent either before his death, or in purgatory. The fasts, alms, penances, and other meritorious works performed in obedience to priestly injunction, are supposed to have this power of satisfaction. Yet even these are insufficient; and the most obedient and dutiful son of the Church finds that there is a heavy balance against him, which, if not discharged, will sadly lengthen the purifying process. Hence the language contained in the Instructions and Directions for gaining the grand jubilee, 1825: "As it is to be feared that all our penitential and satisfactory works are inadequate and incompetent to the discharge of the debt due from us to the divine justice, the Church comes in to our aid and relief by applying to us, on the conditions prescribed, the benefit of the satisfactions of Christ, and the superabundant satisfactions of the saints towards the remission of this debt." Distressing, however, as the state of the penitent may be, the Church of Rome kindly makes provision for him out of that immense treasure of unapplied merit, partly the Saviour's, and partly accruing from works of supererogation performed by the saints now in a state of glory. All this is said to be at the disposal of the Pope, having been originally deposited in the hands of St. Peter, who transmitted the privilege to his successors. The Pontiff has, therefore, it is said, the power of granting a remission of the temporal punishment due to him on such terms and conditions as he may choose to prescribe. This may be limited, in which case the indulgence is granted for a specified number of years; or plenary, releasing the individual from all the pains and penalties incurred by him up to the time of receiving the boon. The efficacy of these indulgences, it is pretended, reaches even to the souls in purgatory, so that a kind friend or relative may enjoy the satisfaction of procuring the release of those whom he loves, or, at any rate, of some considerable remission of the period of their sufferings. The terms vary according to times and circumstances: sometimes a devotional exercise is sufficient; but, on most occasions, money, in hard cash, laid down, is the sine qua non.* It will therefore be immediately perceived, that through this doctrine the Popes were invested with a vast control over the human conscience, even in the moderate exercise of their power, because it was a power which overstepped the limits of the visible world; but when they proceeded, as they soon did, flagitiously to abuse it, and when, through the progress of that abuse, people were at length taught to believe, that perfect absolution from all the penalties of sin could be procured from a human being, and that, not through fervent prayer and earnest contrition, but by military service, or by pilgrimage, or even by gold, it was then that the evil was carried so far as to leave the historian doubtful whether any thing be any where recorded more astonishing than the wickedness of the Clergy, except the gross credulity of the people.†

[* D'Aubigné, History of the Great Reformation, vol. i., p. 28.

[The exact date of plenary indulgences cannot be ascertained; but the canons of the Council of Clermont accelerated the practice. Scales of offences and punishments were therefore framed, which should be consulted by all those Legislators whose principle of penal law is retribution, and not the good of society. As the world grew older, vices multiplied, and neither certainty nor severity of punishment seemed to be of use. Offences were so numerous, that the longest life could not expiate them, and whenever death came there was always a long, unsettled arrear. The Papal hierarchy now declared that retribution could be made by substitute as well as in person, and a new scale of crimes and expiations was forthwith introduced. The people commuted their offences for gold, and the Priests acted as their deputies in repeating the prayers which they ought to have uttered. Kings and Princes, for the good of their souls, gave lands to the Church. Those unfortunate people who could not pay were obliged to submit to flagellation; but it was at the option of a great man whether he would give his money to the Church for prayers, or procure some callous mercenary to bear his sins upon his back. From the statement we have given respecting the practice of ecclesiastical censures, the importance of plenary indulgences is evident. The plenary indulgence affected various descriptions of men. The Barons of the eleventh century lived in the daily commission of crime, and the Clergy often visited them severely for the plunder of the churches, and of the poor. The punishment most deeply felt by these ruffians of quality, was the not being allowed to bear arms, or to appear on horseback. When, therefore, the crusade was preached, it was joyfully received by the nobles. They might pursue their usual course of life, and a repetition of crime would atone for former sins. To wear those arms of which it had been a penance to be deprived; to turn them against a foreign, instead of a domestic, foe; to engage in a mighty and soul-inspiring enterprise, instead of contesting the boundaries of a manor, or the fosse of a fortress;—these were the previous habits of the crusaders; and a system which offered pardon on joining the crusade, must have acted with many as a positive encouragement to sin.

[Such, indeed, was the case. The Roman Pontiffs first employed this pretended prerogative in promoting the holy war, and shed abroad their indulgences, though with a certain degree of moderation, in order to encourage the European Princes to form new expeditions for the rescue of Palestine out of the hands of the Saracens. In process of time the charm of indulgences was practised upon various occasions of much less consequence, and merely with a view to filthy lucre. Their introduction, among other things, destroyed the credit and authority of the ancient canonical and ecclesiastical discipline of penance, and occasioned the removal and suppression of penitentials, that is, books in which the degree and kind of penance that was annexed to each crime was registered, and on account of which the reins were let loose to every kind of licentiousness and vice.

[Some of the earliest indulgences of which we have received information were those which were granted by certain authorities of Papal Rome in favour of those who assisted in her quarrels against her adversaries. For instance: we meet with that of Anselm, Bishop of Lucca, and Legate of Gregory VII., which he vouchsafed to those who would enlist under his banner against the Emperor, Henry IV., wherein he promised remission of sins to all who would engage in that contest; while Gregory himself, in an Epistle to the Monks of Marseilles, who adhered with firmness to his cause, promised an indulgence of all their sins to those who would fight against the Saracens in Africa; and also that of Victor, who afterward succeeded Gregory VII. under the title of Victor III. To this Pontiff, succeeded Urban II., who granted an indulgence of all their sins to those who engaged in the war to the Holy Land; and Tyrius hesitates not to say, that in the enumeration were expressly mentioned such sins as the [* Cramp's Text-Book of Popery, pp. 336, 337.

[† Waddington's History of the Church, p. 674.

Scriptures say exclude from the kingdom of heaven. This indulgence not only absolved them from all the penances which they merited on account of their sins, but actually exhorted them not to doubt of eternal life beyond the grave. On account of this provision, we are informed that all thieves, pirates, and rogues, came in great numbers and enlisted, having been confessed of their sins; and, as Bernard said, "there was a double cause of joy in this step, for they not only left the country in which they had hitherto lived, and which they had disgraced by their crimes, but they were upon an enterprise which would conduct them to heaven."

[This money-getting scheme thus introduced was afterwards liberally employed, on similar occasions, by Pope Calistus II., A. D. 1122; by Pope Eugenius III., A.D. 1145; by Pope Clement III., A. D. 1195; and others, who systematically promised the same kind of indulgence as that which Urban had given. Morinus, in his Sacrament of Penance, justly observes, that these indulgences cannot be understood of a mere relaxation of canonical penances, because that remission of sins is granted upon which eternal life is vouchsafed, and therefore they must have reference to God, and not merely to the Church. The plenary indulgences were not given to encourage an expedition to the Holy Land only, but also to engage assistance against private foes and adventurers. Pope Gelasius II., A. D. 1118, granted an indulgence to the Christian soldiers at the siege of Saragoza. Pope Honorius II., in the quarrel in which he was engaged with Roger of Sicily, gave a similar one to all who, having confessed their sins, should die in that war; but if they escaped with their lives, only half their sins were forgiven. Pope Alexander III. gave to his friends at Ancona, who should visit the twelve churches, and their own cathedral, as full an indulgence, as if they went to Jerusalem, and also every first Sunday in the month as great an indulgence as "a man could take up sands in both hands." This even Cardinal Baronius thought rather too much, and rejected it as fabulous. Dr. Stillingfleet, however, observes, that the Popish historian did not consider the peculiar position which the inhabitants of Ancona held in the estimation of the Pope on account of the relief they administered to His Holiness in the time of his distress; remarking, also, that the indulgence which Baronius disputes was transcribed from a manuscript much better attested than many other things, the authenticity and genuineness of which he has not thought proper to call in question.

[The lucrative character of these abominations soon induced numerous inferior Bishops to make use of them, not, indeed, to the extent to which the Popes employed it, but for their own personal aggrandizement, or the benefit of the diocess over which they held the crozier. Indulgences were granted to those who would give money towards the building or repairing of churches, or other public works, for which they were promised a pardon of the seventh, or fourth, or third part of their sins, according as the liberality of the purchaser might determine. Pope Gelasius II. was the first to commence this kind of traffic for the building of the church at Saragoza, A. D. 1118, which example was speedily followed by other needy mitred heads. This assumed power of the Bishops was soon abridged by the Popes, who, perceiving the immense wealth which might be made to flow into the pontifical coffers, resolved to keep the keys of this treasury in their own hands, complaining that by the indiscreet use of indulgences by the Bishops, the keys of the Church were contemned, and discipline was lost; so that Pope Innocent III., in the Council of Lateran, decreed, that in the dedication of a church where several Bishops were assembled, the indulgence should not extend beyond one year, and where only one Bishop was present, the indulgence should be limited to forty days. We need scarcely observe, that the canons which restricted the Bishops were not intended to reach the Popes, who were anxious to reap as great a harvest as possible from the sins of their deluded and benighted followers. Hence Boniface VIII. instituted the jubilee A. D. 1300; and in the Bull connected with that jubilee granted not only a plenary and larger, but a most plenary, remission of sins to those who should visit the churches of the Apostles. This jubilee was afterwards brought by Pope Clement VI. to every fifty years; and afterwards to twenty-five years. "It is worth while," says Dr. Stillingfleet, "to understand the difference between a plenary, larger, and most plenary, indulgence; since Bellarmine tells us, that a plenary indulgence takes away all the punishment due to sin. But these were the fittest terms to let the people know that they should have as much for their money as was to be had; and what could they desire more? And although Bellarmine abhors the name of selling indulgences, yet it comes all to one: the Popes give indulgences, and they give money; or they do it not by way of purchase, but by way of alms. But commend me to the plain honesty of Boniface IX., who, being not satisfied with the oblations of Rome, sent abroad his jubilees to Cologne, Magdeberg, and other cities, but also sent his collectors to take his share of money that was gathered, without which, as Gobelinus saith, no indulgences were to be had; who also informs us, that the Preachers of the indulgences told the people, in order to encourage them to purchase, that they were not only a pœna, but a culpa, that is, they not only delivered from temporal, but from the fault itself which deserved eternal, punishment. This made the people look into them, and not finding those terms, but only the words 'a most plenary remission,' they were dissatisfied, because they were told that the fault could be forgiven by God alone; but if they could but once find that the Pope would undertake to clear all scores with God for them, they did not doubt but they would be worth their money. Whereupon he saith, those very terms were put into them. Then the wiser men thought these were counterfeit, and made only by the pardon-mongers; but, upon further inquiry, they found it otherwise. How far this trade of indulgences was improved afterwards, the Reformation, to which they gave rise, will be a lasting monument."* And yet, notwithstanding this declaration of Gobelinus, the wily historian, John Lingard, a member of the Benedictines, coolly states, that these indulgences were merely exemptions from certain canonical penances to which their sins otherwise exposed them.†]

"The Bishops," says Mosheim,‡ "when they wanted money for their private pleasures, or for the exigencies of the Church, granted to their flock the power of purchasing the remission of the penalties imposed upon transgressors, by a sum of money, which was to be applied to certain religious purposes: or, in other words, they published indulgences, which became an inexhaustible source of opulence to the episcopal orders, and enabled them, as is well known, to form and execute the most difficult schemes for the enlargement of their authority, and to erect a multitude of sacred edifices which augmented considerably the external pomp and splendour of the Church.

[* Gibson's Preservative, vol. ii., tit. viii., chap. iv., p. 81.
[† Hist. of Eng., vol. vi., p. 89. 12mo. edit. London, 1838.]
‡ Eccl. Hist., cent. xii., part ii., chap. iii., sec. 3.

"To justify, therefore, these scandalous measures of the Pontiffs, a most monstrous and absurd doctrine was now invented by St. Thomas in the following century, (the thirteenth,) and which contained, among others, the following enormities:—'That there actually existed an immense treasure of merit, composed of the pious deeds and virtuous actions which the saints had performed beyond what was necessary for their own salvation, and which were therefore applicable to the benefit of others; that the guardian and dispenser of this precious treasure was the Roman Pontiff; and that, of consequence, he was empowered to assign to such as he thought proper a portion of this inexhaustible source of merit, suitable to their respective guilt, and sufficient to deliver them from the punishment due to their crimes.' It is a most deplorable mark of the power of superstition, that a doctrine, so absurd in its nature, and so pernicious in its effects, should yet be retained and defended by the Church of Rome."

The foundation-stone of indulgences was laid by Clement VI., in his Bull Unigenitus, De Pœnitentiis et Remissionibus, A. D. 1350. This constitution was published fifty years after the first jubilee, and was a new device to bring in customers to Rome at the second jubilee. But it had not yet passed into a Catholic doctrine; for it was disputed by Franciscus de Majorinis and Durandus, not long before this Bull. The opinion was not formed into a doctrine till the controversies in Germany concerning indulgences made Leo X. set his theologians to work, to study the point and form it into a proper shape. Ambrose, Hilary, Jerome, and Austin, say nothing of indulgences. It is strange that if this power of granting them, to take off the punishment reserved by God after the sin is pardoned, were given by Christ to the Church, none of the ancient Doctors should know any thing concerning it. But it was a doctrine wholly unknown to the Church for about one thousand two hundred years after Christ; and Cardinal Cajetan told Pope Adrian himself, that to him that readeth the Decretals it plainly appears, that "an indulgence is nothing else but a dispensation of that penance which the Confessor hath imposed," and, therefore, can be nothing like Popish indulgences.

It is true the canonical penances were lessened and altered by commutations; and the ancient discipline of the Church, in imposing penances, was made so loose that the indulgence was larger than the imposition. It became a trumpet and a levy for the holy war in the time of Pope Urban II.; for he gave a plenary indulgence and remission of all sins to those who would fight against the Saracens.

Though the Fathers of the Church could not be supposed, in direct terms, to speak against indulgences, because in their days they were unknown; yet they have said many things which oppose this innovation. They teach repentance producing a good life; a faith that entirely relies on the merits of Christ; a hope depending on the promises of the Gospel; a labour of love; a religion of justice, piety, and virtue. They also expressly teach that pilgrimages to holy places, and such inventions, are not the way of salvation. The sense of the Fathers is well expressed in these words of Austin: "God said not, 'Go to the east, and seek righteousness;' 'Sail to the west, that thou mayest receive indulgences:' but, 'Indulge thy brother, and it shall be indulged to thee.' Thou hast need to inquire for no other indulgence to thy sins; if thou wilt retire into the closet of thy heart, there thou wilt find it."*

The Papal advocates, from the shock occasioned by the Reformation, and the exposure by Protestants of the sale of indulgences, have endeavoured to soften them down, and keep out of sight their real nature, affirming that they are chiefly used to mitigate penance or Church censures. To decide this point, we shall quote specimens of the indulgences granted from time to time, that the reader may see how far Romanists are misrepresented by Protestants in the article of indulgences.

It was mentioned above, that according to the doctrine of the Church of Rome, the treasury of the Church, composed of the merits of Christ and of the saints, was committed to Peter and his successors, the Popes, who may open the treasure and dispense it at their will. For a sum of money, or some penitential act, a pardon is conveyed to any particular person, or a release from the pains of purgatory, for any one in whose happiness he is interested. Such indulgences were granted by Urban II., in the eleventh century, as a recompence to those who went on the meritorious expedition of conquering the Holy Land. They were afterward extended to those who hired a soldier for that purpose; and in process of time came to be bestowed on all those who gave money for accomplishing any pious work enjoined by the Pope. Julius II. had bestowed indulgences on all who contributed toward building the church of St. Peter, at Rome; and Leo X., in order to complete this great fabric granted them for the same purpose.

Robertson, in his history of Charles V., gives an account of these indulgences, and the form of them, as they were used in the beginning of the sixteenth century. The following is his statement of their promulgation:—"The right of promulgating these indulgences in Germany, together with a share arising from the sale of them, was granted to Albert, Elector of Mentz, an Archbishop of Magdeburg, who, as his chief agent for retailing them in Saxony, employed Tetzel, a Dominican Friar, of licentious morals, but of an active spirit, and remarkable for his noisy and popular eloquence. He, assisted by the Monks of his order, executed the commission with great zeal and success, but with little discretion or decency; and, though by magnifying excessively the benefit of their indulgences, and by disposing of them at a very low price, they carried on for some time an extensive and lucrative traffic among the credulous and the ignorant, the extravagance of their assertions, as well as the irregularities in their conduct, came at last to give general offence. The princes and nobles were irritated at seeing their vassals drained of so much wealth, in order to replenish the treasury of a profuse Pontiff. Men of piety regretted the delusion of the people, who, being taught to rely for the pardon of their sins on the indulgences which they purchased, did not think it incumbent on them either to study the doctrines taught by genuine Christianity, or to practise the duties which it enjoins."

[The unheard-of presumption and arrogance of the Popish Church, appear in the prospective operation of those indulgences which they have imposed upon the credulity of the multitude. Indulgences, the virtue of which was to extend for a million of years, were to be obtained at Rome, on no very difficult terms. Bellarmine, who appears to have been ashamed of such gross impositions, denied that they were for so many years, throwing himself into the subterfuge, very common among Popish controvertists of the present day, the unauthorized character of the historian. We, however, refer to Onuphrius, who transcribed from the archives of the Churches, and to Cæsar Rasponi, a canon of the Lateran church, and a Cardinal, who, in a book dedicated to Alexander VI., tells us, "there is so vast a bank of the treasure of the church, laid up there, that no one needs go any further to get full pardon of all his sins; and that it is impossible for any one to reckon up the number of the benefits to be had there by it." In the feast of the dedication of the Lateran church, a Roman might obtain a pardon, which would hold good for a thousand years; a Tuscan, a pardon, the benefit of which should endure two thousand years; and if the devotee came from beyond the sea, he could obtain one of three thousand years' value. Boniface IX. declared, if men would visit certain churches, either for devotion or pilgrimage, they should be clear from all sin. There appear to have been particular seasons for the opening of this treasury, when benefits in still richer abundance were conferred. All who went to that church, when the image of our Saviour was exhibited, received a full pardon of all their sins.

* The reader is referred to Ferraris on the word Indulgentia, Bibliotheca Prompta, Appendix, where the rise and progress of indulgences are treated with considerable clearness and ability, but with great partiality.

[To give a general idea of the nature of what are called indulgences, of the extent of their alleged efficacy, of the frivolous and really ludicrous circumstances (for an indulgence is ostensibly a thing of most sacred importance, one of the solemn and beneficent provisions of this apostate Church for her erring sons) with which they have been frequently connected, we shall introduce the following:—

["(1.) To all them that, before this image of pity, devoutly say five Pater-nosters, five Aves, and a Creed, piteously beholding these arms of Christ's passion, are granted thirty thousand seven hundred and fifty years of pardon.

["(2.) Our holy Father Sixtus IV. granted to all them that be in a state of grace, saying this prayer following, immediately after the elevation of the body of our Lord, clean remission of all their sins, perpetually enduring. And also John III., Pope of Rome, at the request of the Queen of England, hath granted unto all them that devoutly say this prayer before the image of our Lord crucified, as many days of pardon as there were wounds in the body of our Lord, in the time of his bitter passion, the which were five thousand four hundred and sixty-five.

["(3.) Pope Adrian VI. granted that whoever, lying at the point of death, should hold a hallowed wax candle in his hand, and depart out of this life holding the same, shall obtain a plenary indulgence of all his sins, if so be that before his death he have but once repeated the Psalter, or the Rosary.

["(4.) Pope Gregory XIII., at the request of the English seminary, having consecrated certain grains, beads, &c., did attach to them very large indulgences. He that at the point of death shall once say 'Jesus' in his heart, if he is not able to pronounce it, and shall have about him, or shall kiss, one of these hallowed things, obtains a full indulgence of all his sins. Whoever, having one of these grains, shall devoutly fast, according to the custom of the Church, on the eve of all the feasts of Our Blessed Lady, (that is, about four or five times a year,) shall gain an hundred years of indulgence; but if he fasts on bread and drink only, he shall obtain a thousand years of indulgence."*

[On this subject Bishop Burnet declares, that "he has seen an indulgence which was to extend ten hundred thousand years;" observing that "some of these indulgences are granted by special tickets upon the treasury of the Church, like tallies; sometimes they are affixed to particular churches and altars, to particular times or days, chiefly to the year of jubilee. They are also affixed to such things as may be carried about, to an Agnus-Dei, to medals, to rosaries and scapularies; they are also affixed to some prayers, the devout saying of them being a mean to procure great indulgences. The granting these is left to the Pope's discretion, who ought to distribute them as he thinks may tend most to the honour of God, and the good of the Church; and he ought not to be too profuse, much less to be too scanty, in dispensing them."† Such are the "refuges of lies" to which the too credulous and unsuspecting people were driven by a crafty and wicked priesthood.

[If the oppression of Rome were now generally felt and acknowledged throughout Europe, if the scandals of the Court of Rome were now becoming every where notorious, and the vices of the Monks and Clergy had inflamed the general hatred of Christendom, there was no country in which either the tyranny or the licentiousness of the Church was so shamelessly exhibited, and so deeply detested, as in Germany. While the first of the Othos imitated the policy of Charlemagne in exalting the sacred order, that he might counterpoise the power of the Barons, —a deed for which he was invariably praised by the ecclesiastical and condemned by the civil historians,—the latter exceeded his generosity; and some of the leading German ecclesiastics became, at the same time, Bishops and powerful Princes. Nor was there any region more pregnant with popular superstition, and with the fruits so diligently gathered from it, by a worldly priesthood. From these causes the wealth of the German Clergy had grown to an inordinate excess, and their secular habits and vulgar vices are stigmatized on the page of history. The proceedings of the Council of Vienne, the remonstrance of the Emperor Charles IV. to the Archbishop of Mayence, and, above all, the prophetic denunciations of Cardinal Julian at the Council of Basle, display at the same time the immorality and the insecurity of the German Church.

[From the time of Gregory VII., the political interests of the empire and the popedom had been at perpetual variance; and not only was Italy divided between the conflicting parties, but even the internal concord of Germany had been incessantly disturbed by Pontifical interference. Its Emperors had been insulted and deposed. Italian intrigues had distracted all its provinces. Children had been raised up against their parents, and the battles and miseries of four centuries had been inseparably associated with the name and enmity of Rome. It was the consequence of this inveterate hostility, not only to nourish public animosity, but also to raise up private opponents against the See. who had at various times uncloaked its abuses, and denounced them to the people. So that when the appointed season came, the prejudices of the lower classes had been in a great degree removed, and they listened without repugnance, and frequently with intense satisfaction, to any thing that reflected upon the See or Court of Rome.

[* History of Popery, pp. 112, 174. London, 1735.
[† Burnet on the Articles, p. 282.

[The Germans had endeavoured to protect their Church against the Pontifical depredators by the Concordats of Constance and Aschaffenburg; and, however narrow the field of amendment which they comprehended, still, had they been strictly observed, some advantage would have been produced, and some irritation allayed. But so far were the Popes from any desire to correct usurpation by timely concession, or sincerely to conciliate those whom they had injured, and whom they ought to have feared, that they made it their policy to elude the conditions which they had reluctantly accorded, and to resume in substance the spoils which they had in semblance restored. By this conduct they not only nourished without any remission the prevalent animosity against them, but they inflamed it still further, when they aggravated former oppressions by recent perfidy. There was, indeed, no part of Christendom wherein the whole machinery of the Apostolical Chancery had worked with such pernicious efficacy as in Germany. So much so, that about the time of the Diet of Augsburg, 1518, an Archbishop of Mayence declared, during his last moments, that his greatest regret in dying, was to leave to his poor subjects the burden of buying the pallium of his successor. About twenty-seven thousand florins appear to have been advanced on those occasions, and it was chiefly levied upon the poor. Robertson, in his History of Charles V., asserts, that companies of merchants openly bought the benefices of different districts from the Pope's agents, and retailed them at advanced prices. The privileges of the jubilee, so fruitful to the see which granted, so expensive to the districts which enjoyed them, were dispensed, during the schism, principally to that country. The Fathers of Constance and Basle published, though they failed to remove, its complaints, and the circumstances of its oppression; and the "Hundred Grievances" which were afterwards presented to the Diet of Nuremberg, A. D. 1523, formed only a catalogue of hereditary wrongs, the subjects of perpetual remonstrance, and of remonstrance which was perpetually despised. The Papal usurpations, enumerated in that celebrated document, their "Centum Gravamina," are severally placed under three heads: such as tended to enthral the people, such as impoverished and despoiled them, and such as withdrew them from the secular jurisdiction. Among the grievances complained of, and there specified, were payments for dispensations and absolutions, sums of money drawn by indulgences, appeals to Rome, reservations, commendams, annates, exemptions of Ecclesiastics from legal punishments, excommunications and unlawful interdicts, secular causes tried before ecclesiastical tribunals, great expenses in consecrating churches and cemeteries, pecuniary penance, fees for sacraments, burials, &c., &c. Such being the extortionate tyranny of Rome, it is not difficult to comprehend the nature or the result of the conflict which followed. On the one side we are led to expect a succession of just demands, commencing in moderation, and rising in exact proportion to the contempt with which they were rejected; on the other, a fierce and selfish determination to maintain the established system in its full integrity, without distinction of good or evil, of use or abuse, of truth or falsehood, of divine or human authority. And the conclusion was such, as must certainly follow sooner or later, from collision between such principles.

[Leo X. now filled the Pontifical chair. At the age of seven years, he was admitted into holy orders, and when only thirteen years old, he received the dignity of Cardinal, and was but thirty-seven years of age when he assumed the tiara. He was accomplished, refined, and liberal; one who as a private gentleman, unless ruined by extravagance, would have been thought superior to most in his station. As an Ecclesiastic, his deficiency in professional knowledge, his utter indifference to the restraint of his character, the reputed laxity of his principles, his proneness to dissimulation, his deeply-rooted voluptuousness, and his fondness for the society of musicians, jesters, and buffoons, rendered him contemptible, or something worse. By a course of lavish expenditure in the indulgence of his own taste for luxury and magnificence, by the part which he took in the troublous politics of the day, and by a spirited perseverance in his predecessor's scheme for the dignifying of Rome, by the erection of St. Peter's church, Leo completely drained the Papal treasury.

[The Pope had precedents in luxuriant abundance to encourage him in pursuing the measures he was about to adopt, and speedily resolved to employ a more systematic method than preceding Popes, in granting indulgences as a source of revenue. In forming his plans, he was mainly assisted by his relative Laurentius Pucci, whom he had made Cardinal of Santaquatro. This Ecclesiastic possessed considerable ability, was learned, acute, and active; and, though pretending to no skill in theology, appeared at this juncture of affairs to be endowed with qualities which might render him a highly valuable servant of the Church. Germany presented a wide and open field for successful experiment. To his favourite sister Magdalena, who had married Francisco Cibo, the natural son of Pope Innocent VIII., Leo assigned the entire profits of the sale of indulgences in Upper and Lower Saxony. At the same time he transmitted his orders to Albert of Brandenburg, Archbishop of Magdeburg and Mentz, to publish the sale by means of authorized Preachers through various parts of the country. These orders were received by the Bishop with no little satisfaction. The Church had scarcely a Prelate more given to expensive pleasures, or by whom money was more anxiously sought, than Albert of Brandenburg. In the agreement entered into, between him and the Pope, a full half of the receipts was assigned as his share; and the agent appointed to execute the design for these powerful principals, was the head of the Cordeliers of Mayence. Such, however, had been the feeling inspired in the minds of the Clergy, by previous sales of indulgences, that the favoured Monks seconded their guardian in avoiding any participation in the affair. To elude the explanation which might have been necessary, had they stated their opinions too abruptly, they recommended a Dominican, named John Tetzel, as well fitted to perform the required duties. This man had already exercised a similar office at the command of the Teutonic Knights in Prussia, and had succeeded so well in his extortions, that the infamy of his conduct was readily pardoned and forgotten.

[The preliminaries being settled, Tetzel, and a chosen band of collectors, began their appointed labours. Never has fraud been veiled by more shameless audacity than that assumed by these Preachers of indulgences. The press teemed with pamphlets, from the pulpit sounded earnest discourses, puffing off, in no measured terms, the venal powers transmitted from Rome. So recently, however, had contributions been levied upon the people by means of indulgences, that these draughts upon the inexhaustible fund of supererogatory merit were very far from being in the best repute; but notwithstanding men are so little inclined to undergo needless mortifications, in the Romish mind is seated such a horror of the middle state, which, as it is believed, awaits the disembodied soul, and those who thought that individuals whom they loved were then expiating their transgressions, were so eager to terminate their pains, that Tetzel and his coadjutors were enabled to carry on a very extensive and lucrative traffic. It appears that the perquisites of these retailers kept pace with the disposal of their wares; for their personal habits were marked by a profuse expense. The tavern, the gaming-table, and the brothel, were often known to occupy the evenings of men whose mornings had been devoted to pathetic declamations upon penance and purgatory: nay, the Emperor Maximilian, being at Inspruck, was so offended at the wickedness and impudence of Tetzel, who had been convicted of adultery, that he intended to have him seized upon, and put into a bag, and thrown into a river; and would have done so, if he had not been hindered by the solicitations of Frederick, Elector of Saxony, who happened to be there very opportunely for Tetzel. Such notorious indecencies gave very great offence; but it was probably only among those who could see in the offer of indulgences merely a fiscal expedient of which the Pope ought to be ashamed: by the credulous and vulgar, Tetzel's merchandise was purchased with avidity; and the tide of immorality rolled through Germany with augmented force. For since priestly absolution, extreme unction, and the eucharist, render those who learn religion from accredited agents of the Holy See secure, in their own opinion, as to the final condition of their souls, to remove the terrors of purgatory and penance is, in effect, to open wide the flood-gates of iniquity upon a Popish population.

[" The indulgence-dealers," says D'Aubigné, " passed through the country in a gay carriage, escorted by three horsemen, in great state, and spending freely. One might have thought it some dignitary on a royal progress, with his attendants and officers, and not a common dealer or a begging Monk." When the procession approached a town, a messenger waited on the Magistrate: " The grace of God and of the holy Father is at your gates," said the envoy: instantly every thing was in motion in the place. The Clergy, the Priests, the Nuns, the Council, the Schoolmasters, the trades, with their flags, men and women, young and old, went forth to meet the merchants with lighted tapers in their hands, advancing to the sound of music, and of all the bells of the place; " so that," says an historian, " they could not have given a grander welcome to God himself." Salutations being exchanged, the whole procession moved towards the church. The Pontiff's Bull of Grace was borne in front on a velvet cushion, or on cloth of gold. The chief vender of indulgences followed, supporting a large red wooden cross; and the whole procession moved in this manner amidst singing, prayers, and the smoke of incense. The sound of organs, and a concert of instruments, received the monkish dealer and his attendants in the church. The cross he bore with him was erected in front of the altar; on it was hung the Pope's arms; and, as long as it remained there, the Clergy of the place, the Penitentiaries, and the Sub-Commissioners, with white wands in their hands, came every day after vespers, or before the salutation, to do homage to it.

[As soon as the cross was elevated, and the Pope's arms suspended upon it, Tetzel ascended the pulpit, and with a bold tone began, in the presence of the crowd whom the ceremony had drawn to the sacred spot, to exalt the efficacy of indulgences. The people listened, and wondered at the admirable virtues ascribed to them. A Jesuit historian says himself, in speaking of the Dominican Friars whom Tetzel had associated with him, " Some of these Preachers did not fail, as usual, to distort their subject, and so to exaggerate the value of the indulgences as to lead the people to believe that, as soon as they gave their money, they were certain of salvation, and of the deliverance of souls from purgatory."

[Hear one of the harangues which Tetzel pronounced after the erection of the cross:—" Indulgences are the most precious and sublime of God's gifts. This cross " (pointing to the red cross) " has as much efficacy as the cross of Jesus Christ. Draw near, and I will give you letters duly sealed, by which even the sins you shall hereafter desire to commit shall be all forgiven you. I would not exchange my privileges for those of St. Peter in heaven; for I have saved more souls with my indulgences than he with his sermons. There is no sin so great that the indulgence cannot remit; and even if any one should (which is doubtless impossible) ravish the holy mother of God, let him pay, let him only pay largely, and it shall be forgiven him. Even repentance is not indispensable. But more than all this, indulgences save not the living alone, they also save the dead. Ye Priests, ye nobles, ye tradesmen, ye wives, ye maidens, and ye young men, hearken to your departed parents and friends who cry to you from the bottomless abyss: 'We are enduring horrible torment! a small alms would deliver us.' You can give it, and you will not!" A shudder ran through his hearers at these words uttered by the formidable voice of the mountebank Monk.

[" The very moment," continued Tetzel, " that the money clinks against the bottom of the chest, the soul escapes from purgatory and flies to heaven. O senseless people, and almost like to beasts, who do not comprehend the grace so richly offered! This day heaven is on all sides open! Do you now refuse to enter? When, then, do you intend to come in? This day you may redeem many souls. Dull and heedless man, with ten groschen you can deliver your father from purgatory, and you are so ungrateful that you will not rescue him. In the day of judgment my conscience will be clear, but you will be punished the more severely for neglecting so great a salvation. I protest, that though you should have only one coat, you ought to strip it off, and sell it to purchase this grace. Our Lord God no longer deals with us as God: he has given all power to the Pope."

[Then, having recourse to other inducements, he added, " Do you know why our holy Lord distributes so rich a grace? The dilapidated church of St. Peter and St. Paul is to be restored, so as to be unparalleled in the whole earth. That church contains the bodies of the holy Apostles, Peter and Paul, and a vast company of martyrs. Those sacred bodies, owing to the present condition of the edifice, are now, alas! continually trodden, flooded, polluted, dishonoured, and rotting in rain and hail. Ah! shall these holy ashes be suffered to remain degraded in the mire?" This touch of description never failed to produce an impression on many hearers. There was an eager desire to aid poor Leo X., who had not the means of sheltering from the rain the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul!

[The speaker next proceeded to declaim against the disputers who should question, and the traitors who should oppose, his mission :—"I declare them all excommunicated." Then turning to the docile souls among his hearers, and impiously perverting the Scriptures : "Blessed," said he, "blessed are the eyes that see what you see ; for I tell you that many Prophets and many Kings have desired to see the things which ye see, and have not seen them, and to hear the things which ye hear, and have not heard them." And, as a finish to his address, pointing to the strong box in which the money was to be received, he generally concluded his moving discourse by thrice calling on the people, "Bring your money, bring money, bring money !" "He uttered this cry with such a dreadful bellowing," observes the great Reformer, "that one might have thought some wild bull was rushing among the people, and goring them with his horns." The moment he had made an end he came down the steps of the pulpit, ran towards the strong box, and, in sight of all the people, threw in a piece of silver with a loud sound. "Such," says our author, "were the discourses that Germany heard with astonishment in the days when God was preparing Luther."

[Confessionals, surmounted with the Pope's arms, were prepared. The Sub-Commissioners and Confessors chosen, were held to represent the Apostolic Penitentiaries, or absolving Priests of Rome, at the period of a great jubilee ; and on each of their confessionals were inscribed their names and titles. Confession being gone through, (and it was soon despatched,) the faithful hastened to the vender. Only one was commissioned to sell. He had his counter close to the cross. He turned a scrutinizing glance on those who came. He examined their manner, step, and attire, and demanded a sum in proportion to the apparent circumstances of the party presenting himself. Kings, Queens, Princes, Archbishops, Bishops, &c., were to pay according to the regulation, for an ordinary indulgence twenty-five ducats ; Abbots, Counts, Barons, &c., ten. The other nobles, superiors, and all who had an annual income of five hundred florins, were to pay six ; those who had an income of two hundred florins, one ; the rest, half a florin. And, further, if this scale could not in every instance be observed, full power was given to the Apostolical Commissary, and the whole might be arranged according to the dictates of sound reason and the generosity of the giver. For particular sins, Tetzel had a private sale. Polygamy cost six ducats ; sacrilege and perjury, nine ducats ; murder, eight ; and witchcraft, two. Samson, who carried on in Switzerland the same traffic as Tetzel in Germany, had rather a different scale. He charged, for infanticide, four livres tournois ; for parricide or fratricide, one ducat.

[We give one of these letters of absolution. It is worth while to know the contents of these diplomas, which gave occasion to the Reformation.

["Our Lord Jesus Christ have mercy on thee, N. N., and absolve thee by the merits of his most holy sufferings ! And I, in virtue of the apostolic power committed to me, absolve thee from all ecclesiastical censures, judgments, and penalties that thou mayest have merited ; and, further, from all excesses, sins, and crimes that thou mayest have committed, however great and enormous they may be, and of whatever kind, even though they should be reserved to our Holy Father the Pope, and to the Apostolic See. I efface all the stains of weakness, and all traces of the shame that thou mayest have drawn upon thyself by such actions. I remit the pains thou wouldest have had to endure in purgatory ; I receive thee again to the sacraments of the Church ; I hereby re-incorporate thee in the communion of the saints, and restore thee to the innocence and purity of thy baptism ; so that, at the moment of death, the gate of the place of torment shall be shut against thee, and the gate of the paradise of joy shall be opened unto thee. And if thou shouldest live long, this grace continueth unchangeable till the time of thy end. In the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen. The brother, John Tetzel, Commissary, hath signed this with his own hand." In this document we see with what art presumptuous and false doctrines were interspersed among sacred and Christian expressions.

[Tetzel found but few sufficiently enlightened, and still fewer bold enough, to resist him. In general he could easily manage the superstitious crowd. He had erected the red cross of indulgences at Zwickau, and the good people of the place had hastened to pour in the money that was to liberate souls. He was about to leave with a full purse. The evening before his departure, the Chaplains and their Acolytes called upon him to give them a farewell repast. The request was reasonable ; but what was to be done ? the money was already counted and sealed up. In the morning he had the large bell tolled. A crowd hurried to the church : every one thought something extraordinary had happened since the period of the station had expired. "I had intended," said he, "to take my departure this morning ; but last night I was awakened by groans. I listened, they proceeded from the cemetery. Alas ! it was a poor soul that called me, and entreated to be delivered from the torment that consumed it. I therefore have tarried one day longer, that I might move Christian hearts to compassion for this unhappy soul. Myself will be first to contribute ; but he who will not follow my example will be worthy of all condemnation. What heart would not answer to such an appeal ? Besides who can tell what soul thus cries from the tomb ?" The gifts were many ; and Tetzel, with the Chaplains and Acolytes, sat down to a merry feast, paid for by offerings for the poor soul of Zwickau.

[The dealers in indulgences had established themselves at Hagenau, A. D. 1517. The wife of a shoemaker, profiting by the permission given in the instruction of the Commissary-General, had procured, against her husband's will, a letter of indulgence, and had paid for it a gold florin. Shortly after she died ; and the widower omitting to have mass said for the repose of her soul, the Curate charged him with contempt of religion, and the Judge of Hagenau summoned him to appear before him. The shoemaker put in his pocket his wife's indulgence, and repaired to the place of summons. "Is your wife dead ?" asked the Judge. "Yes," answered the shoemaker. "What have you done with her ?" "I buried her, and commended her soul to God." "But have you had a mass said for the salvation of her soul ?" 'I have not : it was not necessary ; she went to heaven in the moment of her death." "How do you know that ?" "Here is the evidence of it." The widower drew from his pocket the indulgence ; and the Judge, in presence of the Curate, read in so many words, that, in the moment of death, the woman who received it would go, not into purgatory, but straight into heaven. "If the Curate pretends that a mass is necessary after that," said the shoemaker, "my wife has been cheated by our Holy Father the Pope ; but if she has not been cheated, then the Curate is deceiving me." There was no reply to this defence, and the accused was acquitted. It was thus that the good sense of the people disposed of these impostures.

[A Saxon gentleman had heard Tetzel at Leipsic, and was much shocked by his proceedings. He went to the Monk, and inquired if he were authorized to pardon sins in intention, or such as the applicant intended to commit? "Assuredly," answered Tetzel, "I have full power from the Pope to do so." "Well," returned the gentleman, "I want to take some slight revenge on one of my enemies without attempting his life. I will pay you ten crowns if you will give me a letter of indulgence that shall bear me harmless." Tetzel made some scruples: they struck their bargain for thirty crowns. Shortly after the Monk set out from Leipsic. The gentleman, attended by his servants, laid wait for him in a wood between Jüterboch and Treblin, fell upon him, gave him a beating, and carried off the rich chest of indulgence-money the Inquisitor had with him. Tetzel clamoured against this act of violence, and brought an action before the Judges. But the gentleman showed the letter signed by Tetzel himself, which exempted him beforehand from all responsibility. Duke George, who had at first been much irritated at this action, upon seeing this writing, ordered that the accused should be acquitted.

[This traffic, D'Aubigné says, everywhere agitated the minds of the people, and was everywhere discussed. It was the subject of conversation in castles, academies, and private houses, as well as in inns, taverns, and all places of resort. Opinions were divided: some believed, some were indignant. But the sober part of the nation rejected with disgust the whole system of indulgences. This doctrine was so opposed to the Scriptures and to sound sense, that all men who possessed any knowledge of the Bible, or any natural acuteness, had already condemned it in their hearts, and only waited for a signal to oppose it. On the other hand, mockers found abundant cause for ridicule. The people who had been irritated for so many years by the ill conduct of the Priests, and whom the fear of punishment had alone retained in any outward respect, gave loose to all their animosity, and on all sides were heard complaints and sarcasms upon the love of money that infected the Clergy.*]

The foregoing cannot be denominated an exaggeration of the practice at the time of Luther; for, after his opposition to the doctrines of Tetzel, Leo X. issued a Bull, in which he magnifies the virtue and efficacy of indulgences in terms as extravagant as any of his predecessors, and in perfect accordance with the preaching of Tetzel and his associates, as well as with the form given above. He also required all Christians to assent to what he delivered as the doctrine of the Catholic Church, under pain of an anathema.

Nor can this abominable traffic, as practised by Leo X. and Tetzel, be considered an abuse of the doctrine of indulgences. So far is this from being the case, that it is the true use or practical effect of the doctrine itself. When pardons are provided on such terms, and for such purposes as the indulgence provides for, the practices mentioned above are the legitimate result of the doctrines laid down. Although since the Reformation the Papists have in many places, both in respect to indulgences and other things, greatly modified their practices, they have never yet effectually disclaimed their principles. The explanations given by Divines, the declarations of faith made by the English Roman Catholic Bishops, and adopted or recognised elsewhere, are futile when the Bulls of Popes stand unrepealed. Their explanations are nothing more than mere evasions, while the decisions of infallibility, as they pretend, are silent on the subject. Let us have the highest authority of their Church on this and other points, on which that authority has already decided, and we will then acknowledge that the decisions of former Popes have been erroneous.

[* See D'Aubigné's Hist. of the Great Reform., vol. i., p. 279.]

["We are not told by the Council of Trent," says Mr. Townsend, "whether or no a plenary absolution was to be confined only to sins which were past: sometimes pardons were granted for many thousand years. It is doubtful, whether those pardons referred only to the remission of the temporal punishments of purgatory, for the designated period; or whether the purchaser, or possessor, of the indulgence, might go on to sin, till he had taken out the appointed amount of pardon. If, for instance, he had committed only so many sins as deserved six thousand years of purgatory, and had obtained an indulgence for twelve thousand, the Church had not decided whether he might commit other sins, to deserve the pardon still remaining,—or whether these six thousand years of remission might be sold to another person who required them,—or whether they reverted to the bank of the saints' merit from which they were drawn,—or whether they went up to the limbo of vanity, with all the other trumpery. The effect of such indecision was, however, soon felt upon the public morality. The Princes of Germany, assembled at Nuremberg, in 1522 and 1523, in their enumeration of grievances, complain of the Priests for selling indulgences and pardons, not only of sins already committed, but of sins that shall be committed. They complain, that licences were openly sold to commit every abominable and scandalous wickedness with impunity. And where was the Romanist, at that period, who would have dared to deny the authority of the Church to sell these licences? and what Spaniard or Italian will venture to deny them at present?

["The ridiculous absurdity and the impudent fraud of these pretexts are perfectly obvious to reasoning people; while those who have first surrendered reason, know, of course, no reason why they should not next surrender also their money to the Priest.

["In the Centum Gravamina, or Exposition of Grievances by the Popish Princes of the German empire, the third grievance complains 'of the increase of the intolerable burden of indulgences, when, under show of piety for building churches, or an expedition against the Turks, the Pope sucks the marrow of their estates; and, to heighten the imposture, by their hireling criers and Preachers, Christian piety is banished; while, to advance their market, they extol their wares for granting of wonderful, unheard of, positive pardons, not only of sins already committed, but of sins to be committed, by those who are alive, and of the sins of the dead.....By sale of these wares, together with being stripped of our money, Christian piety is extinguished; whilst any one may promise himself impunity, by paying the tax set upon the sin he has a mind to commit: hence fornications, incests, adulteries, perjuries, murders, thefts, and all manner of crimes, are at once engendered. What wickedness will mortals fear to commit when they may promise themselves licence and impunity of sinning while they live; and for a little more money, indulgences may be bought for them after they die?' The fifth grievance is, 'that the Pope, Bishops, and pillars of the Romish Church, have always some reserved cases for which you must make a fresh bargain, and pay more money, or no dispensation.' The sixth is, 'that if any one has wherewith to pay, he may not only be indulged in a present transgression of these constitutions, (about reserved cases,) but he may be permitted to transgress them in future; whence those who have a dispensation, take occasion to commit perjuries, murders, adulteries, &c." *] †

[With equal disgust and consternation did the Christian church behold this terrible violation of the truth as it is in Jesus. A boldness of spirit, a clearness of understanding, and a self-denying devotedness of soul, were necessary to resist the evil, and rouse mankind to appreciate the imposture, and mark with abhorrence the agents of such diabolical wickedness. These properties seldom or ever meet in one man, unless given from on high to consecrate and prepare him for a work of extraordinary eminence and difficulty. The chosen vindicator of Christian truth and holiness was Martin Luther, born in humble life, at Eisleben in Saxony. His father, who had originally been obliged to earn his bread by severe labour as a miner, was rendered almost independent at a later period of his life, and obtained, through his high character for virtue and probity the rank of a Magistrate in the little town of Mansfeld, the place of his abode.

[Luther's profession was to have been the law; but when about to enter on its practice, a tempest overtook him in the fields, and a flash of lightning laid a youthful friend breathless at his feet. The vanity of human hopes was, by this mournful accident, so forcibly impressed upon the ardent mind of Luther, that he resolved to devote himself to a life of retirement and religious study amidst the monotonous austerities of a cloister. He entered the order of Augustine Monks; and, in the deep seclusion of a monastery, began that course of meditation and inquiry which elevated him to the highest rank, not only among the scholars, but the thinkers, of his country. Among the neglected volumes in the library of his monastery he discovered a Bible, which he read with avidity, and in a few months his opinions underwent a vital change: those which could stand the test of that light which "shineth in a dark place," leaving nothing doubtful or obscure wherever its beams are shed, found a new and fixed foundation; and those which supplied the place of old errors and superstitions, had an evident worth and completeness of relation to the mighty interests of truth, which can belong to nothing less holy or divine.

[The talents and learning of Luther soon attracted the notice of Staupitz, the Vicar-General of his Order, who recommended him for a Professor's chair at Wittemberg, where an University had been recently founded. At this place the learned Friar first taught philosophy, and afterwards theology, with great applause; and was besides distinguished as an eloquent and indefatigable Preacher. While he was thus honourably discharging the duties of his office, Tetzel, with his venal indulgences, appeared in the neighbourhood of Wittemberg; and for once the Popish practice of confession proved advantageous to mankind. The inhabitants of Wittemberg were not less eager than the rest of their countrymen to obtain, at the cheapest rate, the remission of the pains and penalties due for their sins. Crowds accordingly hastened to the place where the indulgences were to be purchased; and the same lamentable instances of fraud and human folly were exhibited, as in the other towns of the diocess. It was impossible that a teacher of theology should witness such occurrences without noticing them in his addresses.

[* Dupin, Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 182, et seq. Dublin, 1723.]
[† Reformer's Library, vol. v., pp. 284—287.]

Neither the learning nor the acuteness of so great a man as Luther was required to discover the infamous advantage taken of the credulity of the people; and it would have been a violation of the most obvious duty, for a theologian to suffer them to remain uninstructed in the doctrines so shamefully set at nought. The measures which he took on the occasion were not those of either pride or enthusiasm, for the subject of indulgences had not occupied his attention; and he appears to have been prompted, in the first discourses which he made respecting them, by the simple desire of warning the people against a manifest danger. What, indeed, could a Preacher on justification by faith do in such a case?

[The state of affairs soon assumed a decisive aspect. Some individuals applied to Luther when seated in the confessional, and after confessing iniquities of no common atrocity, demanded absolution. He refused; impressing on their minds that before such sins as theirs could be remitted, deep contrition must be felt, and severe penances undergone. To his exhortations they replied, by producing a diploma of indulgence. Luther cautioned them against a reliance upon any thing unless attended by sincere repentance, and still declined to grant the desired absolution. His refusal was then communicated to Tetzel; and that wretched tool of Papal avarice pronounced his opinions as heretical, adding, that as an Inquisitor, he felt himself bound to proceed against one who ventured thus to impugn the authority of the Roman See. So far was Luther from heeding this menace, that, being unacquainted with the precise grounds upon which the Popes had founded their power of granting indulgences, he applied himself with his habitual industry to the consideration of the question; and, taking the Scripture, not the Schoolmen, for his guide, he became fully convinced that the Roman See had no power whatever to remit any penalties or restrictions but such as it had itself imposed. As, however, his reverence for the Papacy was still unimpaired, he did not doubt that the Pontiffs had never pretended to exercise any other privilege than the one which he considered was their right, and that the representations of indulgence-dealers were merely the mercenary artifices of unprincipled agents. Having come to these conclusions, Luther scorned to dissemble or deliberate. He felt that his faithfulness as a Christian Minister was at stake; and he lost no time in thundering, from the pulpit at Wittemberg, irresistible invectives against the ruinous folly of trusting to these Papal pardons, as the means of escaping from any thing beyond canonical penances.

[Thus as a Preacher Luther discharged his conscience; nor did he neglect his duty as a Professor. He digested the results of his inquiries upon the subject of indulgences under ninety-five heads, which he published, with a declaration that he should appear, on a given day, prepared to maintain openly, against any opponent, the positions which he had then reduced to writing; and he invited scholars who dissented from his views of the case, but who were unable to attend at Wittemberg, to transmit to that place written arguments in support of their opinions. He only desired it to be understood, that no proofs drawn from Thomas Aquinas, or any other Schoolman, would satisfy him, unless these agreed with the declarations of Scripture and of the Fathers. In conclusion, he said, that in his theses he affirmed nothing; that he had put forth the positions merely for the sake of arriving at the truth; and that the decision of the questions proposed, he referred wholly to the government of the Church. Besides publishing this paper, Luther enclosed it in a letter written to Archbishop Albert, in which, after stating the infamous conduct and profligate representations of the indulgence-mongers, he entreated that Prelate to suppress the pamphlets published by these men, as well as to impose those regulations upon them which the case evidently required. Of this letter the Archbishop took no notice,—a circumstance peculiarly to his discredit; because for his use was reserved a share of the profits derived from the sale of indulgences in Germany: nor on the day in which Luther had announced his intention of appearing, prepared for a disputation, did any one come forward to controvert his opinions, and thus he found himself fairly master of the field. Thus commenced the glorious Reformation from the idolatrous superstitions, and anti-scriptural dogmas, of Popery, the benefits of which we so plentifully realize in the present day.

[The treatment which Luther received from various portions of the Popish hierarchy savoured of the spirit which was from beneath, illustrating the fact, that "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God." Eccius, a celebrated Popish theologian of Germany, applied to Luther the epithets of "drunken, heretical, seditious, saucy, rash, silly, and ignorant." Sylvester di Prierio, a Dominican Friar, and Master of the Sacred Palace, as it is called, published at Rome a Dialogue against Luther, in which that courageous Divine was called "an heresiarch, a mischief-maker, a devil, a dolt, a blasphemer." Another of Luther's early adversaries was a Dominican Friar of Brabant, named Hoogstrat, whose advice was answerable to the office which he held, that of an Inquisitor; for he coolly admonished Leo, to exterminate the adventurous Saxon by fire and faggot! *

[We are anxious now to attempt the justification of our undaunted Reformer from certain charges which would affect his moral and religious character, in proportion as they were accredited and received. A revengeful and malicious spirit, and disappointed ambition, have been charged upon Luther by several Popish authorities, whose chief object in so doing appears to be the depreciation of the Reformation, by striking at those who were the chief agents in promoting it. Magdalena, to whom Leo granted the German indulgences, being desirous of turning the gift to the best account, intrusted the management of it to Arcemboldi, then a Bishop, but formerly a Genoese merchant, and therefore thought likely to have some skill in the art of trade. "These statements appear to have been drawn from Guicciardini; and to them, Father Paul, the Tridentine historian, has added, from Cochlæus, that Arcemboldi, thinking the Dominicans more likely to find customers for the Papal merchandise than the Augustinians, who had been used to conduct that traffic, intrusted the business to the former Order; a transfer which so offended the Augustinians, that Martin Luther was induced to come forward for the purpose of decrying the indulgences which he and his brethren had lost the profit of publishing." Hume, in his History of England, has adopted the whole of these statements, so little creditable to any of the clerical personages mentioned in them. He says, "Martin Luther, an Austin Friar, Professor in the University of Wittemberg, resenting the affront put upon his Order, began to preach against these abuses in the sale of indulgences; and being naturally of a fiery temper, and provoked by opposition, he proceeded even to decry indulgences themselves, and was thence carried by the heat of dispute to question the authority of the Pope, from which his adversaries derived their chief arguments against him." * The statements respecting the two orders of Friars are also, without any ambiguity, adopted by Du Pin; † but not a word is said about the Pope and the ladies. Bossuet affects a little more cautiousness; he does not mention Guicciardini's part of the story, and gives an interrogative form to that of Cochlæus:—"Here," says the Bishop of Meaux, "I should relate the beginnings of the quarrel in A.D. 1517, were they not known by all mankind. For, who is ignorant of the publication of the indulgences of Leo X., and the jealousy of the Augustinian Friars against the Dominicans, who, on this occasion, were preferred to them? Who does not know that Luther, an Augustinian Doctor, being selected to maintain the credit of his Order, first attacked the abuses many made of indulgences, and the extravagances that were uttered from the pulpit on that subject? But he had too much fire to keep himself within these limits: from the abuses of the thing he came to the thing itself." ‡ Dr. Lingard observes, "It has been generally supposed that he was actuated by a spirit of opposition to the Dominicans, whether that opposition sprung from any previous rivalry between the two institutes, or from resentment that the lucrative office of collecting the contributions had been bestowed on Tetzel instead of himself." § While Milner, the Vicar-Apostolic of the Midland District, asks no questions on the subject, but unblushingly asserts, "It was a private quarrel between Luther's Order, the Augustinian Friars, and a rival Order, the Dominicans, in a matter of honour and profit, which first occasioned him to commence Reformer." ‖ The authorities cited for this assertion are Luther's own words, of which the following is a translation,—"I call God to witness, I fell into these disturbances from chance, not from inclination;" and the first book of Sleidan's Commentaries, of which work the second paragraph describes the opposition of Luther from its commencement, in words which may be rendered thus:—"He (Luther) being roused by those sermons and pamphlets of the indulgence-dealers, began to admonish people to act prudently, and not to purchase those wares at so great a price, since what they spent upon such things might be much better bestowed." In a letter which he afterwards wrote to Pope Leo, "he exposed the unadvised doctrine, and the rapacious conduct, of the indulgence-traders, who relied upon, or rather abused, the Papal authority: he did not doubt, he said, that he" (Luther) "was charged with grievous faults; but that if so, an injury was done to him, since he had been compelled to act as he had acted by the harangues and the very silly books of the indulgence-dealers." ¶ From these words we only learn that Luther's conduct was not premeditated, but accidental; and that it was forced upon him by the atrocious proceedings of the mercenary and licentious traders. The particular accident which led to this result is not mentioned; since, if it really was something which occurred in his character of Confessor that occasioned the prominence of Luther, he would be likely to avoid such [* See D'Aubigné's Hist. of the Great Reformation.

[* History of England, vol. v., p. 215. 12mo. edit. London, 1793.
[† Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 152, fol. Dublin, 1723.
[‡ Hist. of Variations of the Protestant Churches, book i., sect. vi., vol. i., p. 23. Dublin, 1829.
[§ History of England, vol. vi., p. 91. 12mo. edit. London, 1838.
[‖ Letters to a Prebendary, p. 113.
[¶ Sleidan, ii.

an avowal as must call for the production of names, and expose him to the charge of having abused a confidence reposed in him.

[Now, although there is no great need to be very solicitous about the springs which first set in motion the chief actors in the Reformation, provided that the principles which these remarkable men established are sound, yet still it is a satisfaction to know, that corrupt motives cannot be fixed upon individuals to whose judgment we have been accustomed to defer. Especially is it desirable to possess this information respecting the Reformers, because Romanists appear to consider that their best chance of discrediting the doctrines of these eminent persons, is by attacking the purity of their motives. It may then be asserted, with perfect safety, that unworthy motives cannot be fixed upon many, perhaps not upon any, of the leading Reformers; certainly not upon Luther. In the first place, it is not true that the Austin Friars had been usually employed in Saxony to preach indulgences. It is well known that the commission had been offered alternately, and sometimes jointly, to all the Mendicants, whether Austin Friars, Dominicans, Franciscans, or Carmelites; nay, from the year 1229 that lucrative commission was principally intrusted to the Dominicans; and in the records which relate to indulgences, we rarely meet with the name of an Austin Friar, and not one single act by which it appears that the Roman Pontiff ever named the Friars of that Order to the office under consideration. More particularly it is remarkable that for half a century before Luther, that is, from A. D. 1450 to A. D. 1517, during which period indulgences were sold with the most scandalous marks of extortion and impudence, we scarcely meet with the name of an Austin Friar employed in that service, if we except a Monk named Palzius, who was no more than an underling of the Papal Quæstor, Raymond Peraldus.

[Secondly, in the time of Luther the preaching of indulgences had become such an odious and unpopular matter, that the very commission, which is supposed to have excited the envy of Luther, was offered by Leo to the General of the Franciscans, and was refused both by him and his Order. And, thirdly, Luther was never accused of any such motives either in the edicts of the Pontiffs of his time, or amidst the reproaches of contemporary writers who defended the cause of Rome, and who were far from being sparing of their invectives and calumnies. All the contemporary adversaries of Luther are absolutely silent on this head. From the year 1517 to 1546, when the dispute about indulgences was carried on with the greatest warmth and animosity, not one writer ever ventured to reproach Luther with these ignoble motives of opposition. Even Cochlæus, one of the most virulent of all Luther's opponents, was silent on this head, during the life-time of the great Reformer; but such was the scandalous character of this man, who was notorious for fraud, calumny, lying, and their sister vices, that Pallavicini, Bossuet, and other enemies of Luther, were ashamed to make use either of his name or his testimony.* The negative testimony against the truth of Cochlæus's tale is, however, something more than mere silence in the works of Luther's contemporaries. Sleidan's account of the matter has been already cited. Guicciardini, speaking of Luther's attack upon indulgences, thus expresses himself:—

"From these beginnings, perhaps honest, or at least from the just occasion that was given to him, (it was) in some measure excusable." Now the noble historian surely would never have designated Luther's first steps as honest, just, or excusable, if he had judged them to be a mere ebullition of interested jealousy. Guicciardini, it is to be remembered, calls the Reformer's doctrine "a pestiferous poison." Our countryman, John Foxe, in his Acts and Monuments, gives no hint of this accusation against Luther, as he most probably would have done had he ever heard of it; since it is his way to insert the offensive statements of the Romanists, and then to render them ridiculous by some biting sarcasm. He, however, after mentioning Tetzel's preaching, merely says, "Luther, much moved with the blasphemous sermons of this shameless Friar, and having his heart earnestly bent with ardent desire to maintain true religion, published certain propositions concerning indulgences."* The discreditable motives commonly assigned to the first steps in the Reformation, must therefore be wholly rejected as mere calumnies, invented after the time to which they refer, and altogether fictitious.†

["While we are upon this subject it will be remembered, that Dr. Milner charged the Reformer with having 'preached up adultery in his sermons;'‡ which accusation has been repeated by Dr. Thomas Butler, Chamberlain to His Holiness Pope Gregory XVI., and formerly President and Professor of Divinity in St. Clement's College, Rome,§ and also by others of the inferior Clergy, in their ignoble and disingenuous attempts to defame the hitherto unblemished character of the champion of the Reformation; for whatever may have been his faults, in combating the awful and devastating errors of the Papacy, he displayed the possession of most exalted virtues, and endowments of intellect, which rendered him a successful instrument in the hand of divine Providence in accomplishing a much needed and a most important work. In noticing the unjust assertion of the Popish Prelate, we regret that we have to accuse him of the most dishonourable and unfair procedure, utterly unworthy the conduct of any polemic, much less of one who, during his life-time, was considered possessed of qualifications which characterized the Christian gentleman;—we accuse Dr. Milner of being guilty of the mean and disgraceful trick of detaching a passage of five words from the Reformer's sermon De Matrimonio, and then holding it up to the world, without any reference whatever to the paragraph from whence these words are so nefariously abstracted. Messrs. Berington and Kirk, in their work, The Faith of Catholics, &c., were unblushing and shameless adepts [* Mosh. Eccl. Hist., cent. xvi., sect. i., chap. ii., note (p.) 8vo. edit. London, 1825.

[* Acts and Monuments, vol. iv., p. 262. 8vo. edit., 1837.

[† Soames's Hist. of Reform., vol. i., p. 125—128. London, 1826.

[" Dr. Robertson, in a note to his Charles V., (ii., p. 86,) has also shown that the grant, said to have been made by Leo to his sister, has not been found, although a search has been made for that purpose among the Papal archives. It is time, therefore, that these tales should be abandoned; but, if the Romanists cannot make up their minds to part with the quarrel between the rival Orders of Friars, it is fit that they should be reminded of the Pope who kept a mistress, of the young gentleman who was made a Cardinal at fourteen, and of the lady who was appointed door-keeper to the German quarter of purgatory; relations, coupled at an early date with the legend of Luther's anger, and of which two parts out of three are true; whereas the whole account of the jealousy subsisting upon the subject of indulgences between the rival Orders, is a pure fiction." —Soames's Hist. of Reform., vol. i., p. 128.

[" ‡ End of Controversy, Letter liii., p. 359.

[" § The Truths of the (Roman) Catholic Religion proved from Scripture alone; by Thomas Butler, D. D. Vol. ii., p. 267. 12mo. Second edit. London, 1843."

in this old and often-practised Popish manœuvre; but for a Romish Bishop to be addicted to such malpractices, is most severely to be reprehended.

[" Martin Luther, in the discourse in question, is treating of the subject of divorce, and makes use of the following language:—'When either party withdraws, so as to be unwilling to pay the other due reverence; here it is fit, that the husband should say to the wife, If you be unwilling, another may not; if the mistress refuse, let the maid come;' (si domina nolit, adveniat ancilla;) 'let him use frequent admonition, so that her obstinacy be exposed, and herself publicly censured in the presence of the whole Church. If she still refuse, repudiate her; and, instead of Vashti, let Esther succeed, after the example of Ahasuerus.'* This is the language of the Reformer; and I ask," says Mr. Grier, "what becomes of the expression pointed to by Dr. Milner as exhortative to adultery? Torn from the context, the passage in Italics seems, indeed, at first view, to bear such an interpretation; but, embodied in it, it loses that effect. He evidently did not mean, that the marriage-vow should be violated on the mistress's refusal; but that after the divorce was pronounced, in consequence of the non-fulfilment of the marriage-contract, the husband should woo the maid. His subsequent reasoning corroborates this view of the case; since, in the event of either party being sick, he most pointedly condemns a new matrimonial alliance, as bringing with it no less a punishment than the loss of eternal happiness.† He also cites 1 Cor. vii., where marriage is praised; and then lauds Metellus, who recommended chastity to the Roman youth. Indeed, throughout his entire discourse, he dwells so forcibly on the sacredness and inviolability of the marriage-vow, that no man, who did not shut his eyes to the fact, could mistake his meaning. I now ask, in return, whether Luther would have used language like this, had he, as the Romanist Prelate declares, 'preached up adultery.'"‡

[As illustrative of the peculiar circumstances in which Luther was placed, while strenuously opposing the corrupting practices of the Romish hierarchy, we give the following graphic description of his appearing before the Pope's Legate, Cardinal Cajetan, at Augsburg, as recorded by D'Aubigné, in his History of the Great Reformation:—

[" The Legate, apprized that Luther would appear the next day before him, called together those in whom he had confidence, both Italians and Germans, that he might concert with them how he ought to treat the German Monk. Opinions were divided. One said, 'We must compel him to retract.' Another, 'We must arrest him, and throw him into prison.' A third was of opinion that it would be better to put him out of the way. A fourth, that it would be expedient rather to win him over by gentleness and mildness. The Cardinal seems to have resolved, in the first instance, to make trial of this last method.

[" At length the day of conference arrived. The Legate, knowing that Luther had declared himself willing to retract whatever should be proved contrary to the truth, was sanguine as to the result: he did not doubt that one of his rank and learning would, without much difficulty, reclaim the Monk to obedience to the Church.

[" Luther repaired to the house of the Legate, accompanied by the Prior of the Carmelites, his friend and host, by two Friars of the convent, by Dr. Link, and by an Augustine, probably the same that had accompanied him from Nuremberg. Scarcely had he entered the Legate's palace, when all the Italians, who composed the train of this Prince of the Church, flocked round him, desiring to see the famous Doctor, and pressed him so closely, that he could hardly proceed. On entering the room where the Cardinal was waiting for him, Luther found him accompanied by the Apostolical Nuncio and Serra Longa. His reception was cool, but civil; and, according to Roman etiquette, Luther, following the instructions of Serra Longa, prostrated himself before the Cardinal; when the latter told him to rise, he knelt; and when the command was repeated, he stood erect. Several of the most distinguished Italians of the Legate's household entered the room, in order to be present at the interview, impatient to see the German Monk humble himself before the Pope's representative.

[" The Legate was silent. He expected, says a contemporary, that Luther would begin his recantation. But Luther waited reverently for the Roman Prince to address him. Finding, however, that he did not open his lips, he understood his silence as an invitation to open the business, and spoke as follows:—

[" 'Most worthy Father, upon the summons of His Holiness the Pope, and at the desire of my gracious Lord, the Elector of Saxony, I appear before you, as a humble and obedient son of the holy Christian Church; and I acknowledge that it was I who published the propositions and theses that are the subject of inquiry. I am ready to listen with all submission to the charges brought against me, and, if I am in error, to be instructed in the truth.'

[" The Cardinal, who had determined to assume the tone of a kind and compassionate father towards an erring child, answered in the most friendly manner, commended Luther's humility, and expressed the joy he felt on beholding it; saying, 'My dear son, you have filled all Germany with commotion by your dispute concerning indulgences. I hear that you are a Doctor well skilled in the Scriptures, and that you have many followers. If, therefore, you wish to be a member of the Church, and to have in the Pope a most gracious Lord, listen to me.'

[" After this exordium the Legate did not hesitate to tell him all that he expected of him, so confident was he of his submission: 'Here,' said he, 'are three articles which, acting under the direction of our most holy Father, Pope Leo X., I am to propose to you:—

[" 'First, you must return to your duty; you must acknowledge your faults, and retract your errors, your propositions, and sermons. Secondly, you must promise to abstain for the future from propagating your opinions. And, thirdly, you must engage to be more discreet, and avoid every thing that may grieve or disturb the Church.'

[" LUTHER.—'Most worthy Father, I request to be permitted to see the Pope's Brief, by virtue of which you have received full power to negotiate this affair.'

[* " Tertia ratio est, ubi alter alteri sese subduxerit, ut debitam benevolentiam persolvere nolit, aut habitare cum renuerit. Reperiuntur enim interdum adeo pertinaces uxores, quæ etiamsi decies in libidinem prolaberetur maritus, pro sua duritia, non curarent. Hic opportunum est ut maritus dicat, 'Si tu nolueris, alia volet. Si domina nolit, adveniat ancilla:' ita tamen ut antea iterum et tertio uxorem admoneat maritus, et coram aliis ejus etiam pertinaciam detegat ut publice et ante conspectum Ecclesiæ, duritia ejus et agnoscatur et reprehendatur. Si tum renuat, repudia eam, et in vicem Vasti, Ester surroga, Assueri regis exemplo."—Luther, Opera, tom. v.; Serm. de Matrimonio, p. 123, fol. Witebergæ, 1554.

[† " Nullo pacto ni salutis tuæ nullam rationem habere velis," &c.—Idem, p. 124.

[‡ A Defence of the Reply to the End of Religious Controversy. Being an Answer to the Rev. Dr. Milner's Vindication of the Principles of Popery; by the Rev. R. Grier, D.D. 8vo. Pp. 247, 248. London, 1825.

["Serra Longa and the rest of the Italians of the Cardinal's train were struck with astonishment at such a demand; and, although the German Monk had already appeared to them a strange phenomenon, they were completely disconcerted at so bold a speech. Christians, familiar with the principles of justice, desire to see them adhered to in proceedings against others or themselves; but those who are accustomed to act according to their own will are much surprised when required to proceed regularly and agreeably to form and law.

["De Vio.—'Your demand, my son, cannot be complied with. You have to acknowledge your errors; to be careful for the future what you teach; not to turn to your vomit; so that we may rest without care and anxiety; and then, acting by the command and on the authority of our most holy Father the Pope, I will adjust the whole affair.'

["Luther.—'Deign, then, to inform me wherein I have erred.'

["At this request, the Italian courtiers, who had expected to see the poor German fall upon his knees and implore mercy, were still more astonished than before. Not one of them would have condescended to answer so impertinent a question. But De Vio, who thought it scarcely generous to crush this feeble Monk by the weight of all his authority, and trusted, moreover, to his own learning for obtaining an easy victory, consented to tell Luther what he was accused of, and even to enter into discussion with him. We must do justice to the General of the Dominicans. It must be acknowledged, that he showed more equity, a greater sense of propriety, and less irritation, than have subsequently been exhibited in the majority of similar cases. He assumed a tone of condescension, and said,—

["'My beloved son, there are two propositions put forward by you, which you must, before all, retract:—First. The treasure of indulgences does not consist of the merits and sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ:—Secondly. The man who receives the holy sacrament must have faith in the grace offered to him.'*

[* "Cardinal Cajetan, who was a strenuous opponent of Luther, published two treatises on indulgences, in which he teaches, that 'by indulgences the temporal punishment is pardoned; that this punishment cannot be pardoned,—no, not in baptism, but by virtue of the sufferings of Jesus Christ; that therefore we must suppose that the Church dispenses the treasures of his merits by indulgences, and, likewise, those of the superabundant merits of the saints,'—that is, their satisfactory and painful works, which they have performed and endured, without being indebted, upon their own accounts, to the justice of God for temporal punishments; that the Pope and the Bishops may dispense this treasure separately from the sacraments; that it is necessary that the indulgence be granted for a good reason, but that it ought always to be presumed that the reason expressed in the Bull, is good and valid; and to the end that the person who receives the indulgence may reap advantage thereby, the Cardinal requires, 'that he be in a disposition to make as much satisfaction to God as he can, and that he be in a state of grace, when he performs what is prescribed to him for receiving the benefit of an indulgence.' We have two other treatises from the pen of Cardinal Cajetan, which speak more at large on the subject of indulgences. He says 'that the rise of indulgences is very uncertain,—that we have no account of it either in the Scriptures, or in the writings of the ancient Doctors, whether Greek or Latin: all we know is, that St. Gregory (A.D. 601) instituted the indulgences of stations; that after him some Popes granted indulgences very imprudently, and to no purpose; that afterwards indulgences were granted to those who went to the Holy Land; and though we find nothing of it in the law, yet nobody doubts that the Crusade was accompanied with a plenary indulgence.'

["The definition which he gives of an indulgence is, 'that it is an absolution from the penance that is enjoined in the penitential courts.' And as to the Bull of Pope Boniface VIII., in relation to the jubilee, A.D. 1300, in which that Pope declared, that it was his intention to free those who should take the benefit of it from all punishment, whether enjoined or to be enjoined, he answers, 'That the Pope spake on that occasion like a private Doctor, and that he was mistaken in that particular, as he also was when he said, in the same place, that vows are dispensed with by indulgences. He confesses, that if the Popes had pleased, they might have given indulgences for all appointed penances, whether enjoined or not, provided that the guilt be forgiven; but he does not think that the Popes ever exercised this power.' He adds, that 'those who, by the indulgence, are absolved from the penances enjoined by the Priests, are consequently absolved from the punishment which they owe to God, because it is by this penance that the penitent man makes satisfaction to God, and that the indulgence is instead of the penance.' As for the souls departed, Cajetan is of opinion, that 'indulgences do not extend to them, unless it be by way of suffrage or intercession,' as he explains it in another place. One of the principal questions he there treats of is this, 'Whether the souls in purgatory are ever delivered from their pains by indulgences?' He says that 'indulgences are effectual for delivering the souls in purgatory from their pains, per modum suffragii satisfactorii; but this is owing only to the mercy of God, who is graciously pleased to accept of satisfactory suffrages for the relief of those souls; so that the dead cannot derive any benefit from those indulgences, according to the rigour of divine justice, but only on account of God's mercy in accepting them.' He adds, that 'all those in purgatory may receive benefit by indulgences, but especially those who in this life have merited that they should receive benefit by them.' He says, that 'it is probable that those who in this life were forgetful of the souls departed, and neglected to satisfy for their sins, receive no advantage from those suffrages.' It is, in fine, his opinion, that 'the Pope grants indulgences to the souls in purgatory, by the same power that he grants them to the living, though they be applied to the souls departed by way of suffrage, and to the living by way of absolution.' Cardinal Cajetan was selected by Pope Leo X. to go into Germany and oppose the doctrines of Luther, A.D. 1518: the above developement of his opinions on the subject of indulgences will, therefore, tend to throw considerable light on the views of the Church of Rome at that period; and, consequently, on the somewhat ambiguous decree of the Tridentine Council on the same subject."—Brit. Mag., vol xxiii., p. 405.

["* This name is given to certain Constitutions of the Popes, collected and appended to the Canon Law.

["The doctrine of Indulgences, which had been gradually growing up for many years, was at length fully developed by Pope Clement VI., in the year 1343, in the Bull Unigenitus. The Church, he says, has a treasure of infinite merit, which she has received from Christ, and which she is ready to dispense to the faithful, as far as is necessary for their salvation, either in this life or in purgatory. This treasure consists of the merits of Christ, and of the saints, who have gone to heaven with more than enough to save themselves. Christ's merits are infinite, and the saints' merits are beyond calculation. The Church has the power of dispensing this treasure, and she has delegated it to the Pope. The Pope, therefore, can grant indulgences, and he has granted them to the Crusaders, and to those who have gone to Rome in the Jubilee year. Such was the doctrine of Indulgences, as it was established by Clement VI. in the year 1343. Now, let us see how it was practised. Let us see how it was practised in the year 1517, when Luther began to preach against it. Let us see how it was practised in the year 1517, when Luther began to preach against it. Let us see how it was practised in the year 1517, when Luther began to preach against it

Divines. The discussion turned at its outset upon this Constitution of the Pope in favour of indulgences. Luther, indignant at hearing what authority the Legate attributed to a decree of Rome, exclaimed:—

["'I cannot receive such Constitutions as sufficient proofs on subjects so important. For they wrest the holy Scriptures, and never quote them to the purpose.'

["DE VIO.—'The Pope has authority and power over all things.'

["LUTHER (warmly).—'Save the Scriptures.'

["DE VIO (in derision).—'Save the Scriptures!..... Do you not know that the Pope is higher than the Councils? for he has recently condemned and punished the Council of Basle.'

["LUTHER.—'But the University of Paris has appealed against his decision.'

["DE VIO.—'Those gentlemen of Paris will receive their desert.'

["The Cardinal and Luther then proceeded to discuss the second article; namely, the faith that Luther declared to be necessary to render the sacraments efficacious. Luther, pursuing his usual method, quoted, in favour of the opinion that he maintained, several passages of Scripture. But the Legate received them with derision. 'It is of faith in general that you are speaking now,' said he. 'Not so,' replied Luther. One of the Italians, the Legate's Master of the Ceremonies, provoked at Luther's resistance and answers, was burning with desire to speak. He often attempted to interrupt the conversation; but the Legate commanded silence. At last he was obliged to reprove him in so authoritative a tone, that the Master of the Ceremonies left the room in confusion.

["'As to indulgences,' said Luther to the Legate, 'if you can prove to me that I am mistaken, I am ready to receive instruction. We may leave that subject open, without compromising our faith as Christians. But as to that other article concerning faith, if I yielded any thing there, I should be denying Christ. I cannot, therefore, and I will not, yield that point; and by God's help I will hold to it to the end.'

["DE VIO (beginning to lose temper).—'Whether you will or not, you must this very day retract that article; or else, for that article alone, I will proceed to reject and condemn all your doctrine.'

["LUTHER.—'I have no will but the Lord's. He will do with me what seemeth good in his sight. But had I a hundred heads, I would rather lose them all than retract the testimony I have borne to the holy Christian faith.'

["DE VIO.—'I am not come here to argue with you. Retract, or prepare to endure the punishment you have deserved.'

["Luther clearly perceived that it was impossible to end the affair by a conference. His adversary was seated before him as though he himself were Pope, and required a humble submission to all that he said to him, whilst he received Luther's answers, even when grounded on the holy Scriptures, with shrugs, and every kind of irony and contempt. He thought the most prudent plan would be to answer the Cardinal in writing. This means, thought he, offered at least one consolation to the oppressed. Others might then give their judgment of the affair; and the unjust adversary, who, by clamour, remained master of the field, might be overawed by the public voice.

["Having, therefore, shown a disposition to withdraw: 'Do you wish,' said the Legate to him, 'that I should give you a safe-conduct to repair to Rome?'

["Nothing would have pleased Cajetan better than the acceptance of this offer. He would thus have got rid of an affair of which he began to perceive the difficulties, and Luther and his heresy would have fallen into the hands of those who would have known how to deal with them. But the Reformer, who was sensible of the dangers that surrounded him even at Augsburg, took care to refuse an offer that would have delivered him up, bound hand and foot, to the vengeance of his enemies. He rejected the proposal as often as De Vio chose to repeat it; which he did several times. The Legate concealed the chagrin he felt at Luther's refusal; he assumed an air of dignity, and dismissed the Monk with a compassionate smile, under which he endeavoured to hide his disappointment, and, at the same time, with the politeness of one who hopes to have better success another time.

["Hardly had Luther reached the court-yard of the palace, when the loquacious Italian, the Master of the Ceremonies, whom the Cardinal's reprimands had obliged to leave the hall of audience, delighted at being able to speak to him out of the hearing of Cajetan, and eager to confound the abominable heretic by his overpowering arguments, ran after him, and, before he came up with him, began to deal out his sophisms. But Luther, disgusted with the man's folly, answered him with one of those sarcastic rebukes which he always had at command; and the Master of the Ceremonies, quite confounded, turned back and returned abashed to the Cardinal's palace.

["Luther had not been impressed with a very high opinion of his dignified adversary. He had heard from him, as he afterwards wrote to Spalatin, assertions which were quite contrary to sound theology, and which, in the mouth of another, would have been considered archheresies. And yet De Vio was looked upon as the most learned of the Dominicans. Next to him stood Prierias. 'We may judge from this,' said Luther, 'what those must be who fill the tenth or the hundredth rank!'

["On the other hand, the noble firmness of the Doctor of Wittemberg had greatly surprised the Cardinal and all his courtiers. Instead of a poor Monk, suing abjectly for pardon, they had beheld a man of independent spirit, an undaunted Christian, an enlightened Doctor, who required them to bring proofs to support their unjust accusations, and courageously defended his own doctrine. The inmates of Cajetan's palace exclaimed with one voice against the pride, obstinacy, and effrontery of the heretic. Luther and De Vio had learned to know one another, and both were preparing themselves for a second interview.

["A joyful surprise awaited Luther on his return to the convent of the Carmelites. The Vicar-General of the Order of the Augustines, his friend, his father, Staupitz, had arrived there. Not having been able to prevent Luther from going to Augsburg, Staupitz gave his friend a new and affecting proof of his attachment, by joining him in that city, with the hope of rendering him some service. This excellent man foresaw that the conference with the Legate would have momentous results. His fears and his friendship for Luther combined to disturb him. It was a balm to the Reformer's heart after that trying conference, to embrace so precious a friend. He related to him how he had found it impossible to obtain a satisfactory answer, and how he had been required to recant without even an attempt to convict him of error. 'You must absolutely,' said Staupitz, 'answer the Legate in writing.'

["After what he had heard of this first interview, Staupitz expected no good result from any succeeding one. He therefore determined upon a step which he thought present circumstances made necessary: he decided to release Luther from the obligation of obedience to his Order. Staupitz proposed by this means to attain two objects: if, as he could not but forebode, Luther should fail in his undertaking, this proceeding would prevent the disgrace of his condemnation from being reflected on his whole Order; and if the Cardinal should enjoin him to oblige Luther to silence or to a recantation, he would have an excuse for non-compliance. This ceremony was gone through in the usual forms. Luther clearly perceived all that it foreboded. His mind was deeply affected by the breaking of ties that he had formed in the enthusiasm of youth. The Order he had chosen now rejected him. His natural protectors forsook him. Already he was become a stranger to his brethren. But though his heart was oppressed with sorrow at the thought, he recovered his serenity by looking to the promises of a faithful God, who has said, 'I will never leave thee; I will never forsake thee.'

["The Imperial Counsellors, having intimated to the Legate, through the Bishop of Trent, that Luther was provided with the Emperor's safe-conduct, at the same time cautioning him against taking any steps against the Reformer's person, De Vio in a violent passion abruptly answered in the true Romish style: 'Be it so; but I shall do what the Pope enjoins me.' We know what the Pope's injunctions were.

["The next day (Wednesday, Oct. 12th) both parties prepared for a second interview, which seemed likely to be decisive. Luther's friends, intending to accompany him to the Legate's palace, repaired to the convent of the Carmelites. The Dean of Trent, and Peutinger, both Imperial Counsellors, and Staupitz, arrived one after the other. Besides these, Luther soon had the pleasure of welcoming the Knight Philip von Feilitzsch and Dr. Ruhel, Counsellors of the Elector, who had received orders from their master to be present at the conferences, and to watch over Luther's personal safety. They had arrived at Augsburg on the previous evening. They were commissioned to keep close to him, says Mathesius, as the Knight Chlum stood by John Huss, at Constance. The Doctor also took a notary with him, and, accompanied by all his friends, repaired to the Legate's palace.

["As they set out, Staupitz drew close to Luther: he felt all that his friend would have to endure; he knew that if his eye were not directed towards the Lord, who is the Deliverer of his people, he must sink under his trial: 'My dear brother,' said he, solemnly, 'ever bear in mind, that you entered on these struggles in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.' It was thus that God encompassed his humble servant with consolations and encouragement.

["Luther, on arriving at the Cardinal's, found there a new opponent: this was the Prior of the Dominicans of Augsburg, who was seated beside his Superior. Luther, in conformity with his resolution, had put his answer in writing. The customary salutations being gone through, he read, with a firm voice, the following declaration:—

["'I declare that I honour the holy Roman Church, and, moreover, that I will continue to do so. I have sought after truth in my public disputations; and what I have taught I, to this hour, regard as right, true, and Christian. Nevertheless I am but a man, and I may be mistaken. I am therefore willing to be instructed and corrected wherever I may have erred. I declare myself ready to answer, by word of mouth, or in writing, all objections and all charges that the illustrious Legate may bring against me. I declare myself willing to submit my theses to the decision of the four Universities of Bâle, Fribourg in Brisgau, Louvain, and Paris, and to retract whatever they shall declare to be erroneous. In a word, I am ready to do all that can be required of a Christian man. But I solemnly protest against the method that has been pursued in this affair; and against that strange assumption which would oblige me to retract, without having convicted me of error.'

["Undoubtedly nothing could be more consonant with reason than these proposals of Luther; and they must have greatly embarrassed a Judge who had been previously instructed what judgment he was to pronounce. The Legate, who was quite unprepared for this protest, endeavoured to hide his confusion, by affecting a laugh, and putting on the semblance of mildness.

["'This protest,' he said to Luther with a smile, 'is quite unnecessary: I will not dispute with you in public or in private, but my wish is to settle the whole affair with paternal tenderness.'

["It was the policy of the Cardinal to lay aside the strict forms of justice, which afford protection to the accused, and to treat the matter as an affair of administration between a superior and his inferior;—a convenient method, as it leaves the fullest scope to the exercise of arbitrary power.

["Continuing in the most affectionate tone:—'My dear friend,' said De Vio, 'I beseech you to abandon this useless design; but rather return to a sense of duty, acknowledge the truth, and behold me ready to reconcile you to the Church, and to the supreme Bishop.....Retract, my friend, retract: such is the Pope's will. Whether it be your will or not, matters little: you would find it hard to kick against the pricks.....'

["Luther, who saw himself already treated as a rebellious child, rejected by the Church, exclaimed: 'I cannot retract! but I offer to answer, and in writing. We had enough of contention—yesterday.'

["De Vio was provoked at this expression, which reminded him that he had not acted with sufficient discretion; but he recovered himself, and said, smiling,— ["'Contention! my dear son; I did not contend with you. I am as little inclined as yourself to contention; but to gratify His Highness the Elector Frederic, I am ready to hear you, and exhort you as a friend and a father.'

["Luther did not understand why the Legate should have taken umbrage at the phrase he had made use of; for, thought he to himself, if I had not wished to be courteous, I should not have said 'contend,' but 'dispute' and 'quarrel,' for that was what we really did yesterday.

["However, De Vio, who felt that, before the respectable witnesses present at the conference, he must at least appear to convince Luther, and endeavour to crush him by argument, reverted to the two propositions which he had pointed out as fundamental errors, fully resolved to allow the Reformer the fewest possible opportunities of reply. Relying on Italian volubility, he overwhelmed him with objections, without waiting for an answer. Sometimes he sneered, sometimes he chided; he declaimed with passionate energy; he jumbled together the most incongruous things; quoted St. Thomas and Aristotle; exclaimed and raved against all who differed from them; and broke out in invective against Luther. Again and again the latter attempted to reply; but the Legate instantly interrupted him, and overwhelmed him with threats. 'Recant! recant!' was the burden of his harangue: he stormed, enacted the dictator, and put down all effort to reply. Staupitz undertook to stop the Legate. 'Deign to allow Dr. Martin time to answer,' said he. But the Legate resumed his harangue: he quoted the Extravagances, and the opinions of St. Thomas: he had resolved to have all the talk to himself. Unable to convince, and fearing to strike, he would at least stun by his violence.

["Luther and Staupitz clearly perceived that they must not only forego all hope of enlightening De Vio by the discussion, but also of making any useful confession of the faith. Luther, therefore, renewed the request he had made at the beginning of the interview, and which the Cardinal had then eluded. And not being permitted to speak, he requested that he might be allowed at least to put his answer in writing, and send it to the Legate. Staupitz seconded his request; several of the company present joined in his solicitations; and Cajetan, in spite of his dislike to written documents, (for he remembered that such documents are lasting,) at length consented. They separated. The hope which had been conceived that the affair might be terminated at this interview, was thus adjourned, and it was necessary to await the result of the ensuing conference.

["The permission granted to Luther by the General of the Dominicans to take time for reflection, and to write his answer to the two distinct allegations brought against him relating to the indulgences, and to faith, was undoubtedly no more than strict justice; and yet we must give De Vio credit for it, as a mark of moderation and impartiality.

["Luther left the Cardinal's palace rejoicing that his just request had been granted. In his way to and from the palace, he was the object of general attention. Enlightened men were interested in his cause, as if they themselves were about to stand upon their trial. It was felt that it was the cause of the Gospel, of justice, and of liberty, which was then to be pleaded at Augsburg. The lower orders alone sided with Cajetan; and they, doubtless, gave the Reformer significant proofs of their disposition, for he took notice of it.

["It daily became more evident that the Legate would hear nothing from him, save the words, 'I retract;' and those words Luther was determined not to utter. What issue could be looked for in so unequal a struggle? How could it for a moment be thought that the whole power of Rome, arrayed against one man, could fail in the end to crush him? Luther saw all this; he felt the pressure of that heavy hand under which he had dared to place himself; he despaired of ever returning to Wittemberg, of seeing his dear Philip again, and once more finding himself encircled by those noble youths in whose hearts he so delighted to sow the seeds of everlasting life. He saw the sentence of excommunication suspended over his head, and did not doubt that it would shortly fall upon him. These forebodings distressed him, but did not cast him down. His trust in God was not shaken. God may, indeed, destroy the instrument he has hitherto made use of; but he will maintain the truth. Whatever may happen, Luther must defend it to the last. With these feelings, therefore, he began to prepare the protest that he intended to present to the Legate. It seems that he devoted to that purpose a part of the 13th of October.

["On the following day, Luther returned to the Cardinal's palace, attended by the Counsellors of the Elector. The Italians crowded round him as usual, and a number of them were present at the conference. Luther stepped forward, and presented his protest to the Legate. The Cardinal's attendants gazed intently on this writing, in their eyes so daring and presumptuous. The following is the declaration which the Doctor of Wittemberg handed to their master:—

["'You charge me upon two points. And first you bring against me the Constitution of Pope Clement VI., in which it is asserted that the treasure of indulgences is the merit of the Lord Jesus Christ, and of the saints; an assertion which I deny in my theses.

["'Panormitanus,' continues he, (applying that designation to Nicolao Tudeschi, Abbot of Palermo about the middle of the fifteenth century, and author of a famous commentary upon the Decretals,) 'Panormitanus in his first book declares, that, in what pertains to our holy faith, not only a General Council, but even a private Christian, is above the Pope, if he can adduce clearer testimony from the Scriptures, and better reasons. The voice of our Lord Jesus Christ is far above the voice of all men, by whatever names they may be called.

["'What most disturbs me, and excites my most painful reflections, is, that this Constitution contains in it many things altogether contrary to the truth. First, it asserts that the merits of the saints form a treasury;—whilst the whole volume of Scripture testifies that God rewards us far more richly than we have deserved. The Prophet exclaims: Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord; for in thy sight shall no man living be justified. (Psalm cxliii. 2.) Woe to man, says St. Augustine, however honourable and praiseworthy his life may be, if God were to pronounce a judgment upon him from which mercy should be excluded.

["'Thus, then, the saints are not saved by their merits, but solely by the mercy of God, as I have declared. I maintain this, and I take my stand upon it. The words of holy Scripture, which teach us that the saints have not merits enough, ought to be more regarded than those words of men, which affirm that they have merits in superabundance. For the Pope is not above, but under, the authority of the word of God.'

["Luther did not stop there: he showed that if the indulgences could not consist in the merits of the saints, neither could they consist in the merits of Christ. He proved that the indulgences were barren and unprofitable, since they had no other effect than to excuse men from good works, such as prayer, alms, &c. 'No,' he exclaimed, 'the righteousness of Christ Jesus is not a treasure of indulgences excusing us from good works, but a treasure of grace quickening us to perform them. The righteousness of Christ is applied to the faithful, not by indulgences, not by the keys, but by the Holy Ghost alone, and not by the Pope. If any one holds an opinion resting on better foundations than mine,' added he, in concluding what referred to this first point, 'let him make it known, and then will I retract.'

["'I have affirmed,' said he, adverting to the second charge, 'that no man can be justified before God except by faith; so that it is necessary that a man should believe with a perfect confidence that he has received pardon. To doubt of this grace is to reject it. The faith of the just is his righteousness and his life.'

[" Luther supported his proposition by many texts from Scripture.

[" 'Deign, then, to intercede in my behalf with our most holy Lord the Pope Leo X., that he may not treat me with so much severity. My soul seeks the light of truth. I am not so proud, nor so set upon vain-glory, that I should be ashamed to retract, if I had taught what is not agreeable to the truth. My greatest joy will be to see the triumph of that doctrine which is according to the mind of God. Only let me not be forced to do any thing that is against my conscience.'

[" The Legate took the declaration which Luther presented, and, after looking it over, said coolly: 'You have wasted many words, and written what is little to the purpose: you have replied very foolishly to the two charges brought against you, and you have covered your paper with numerous passages from the holy Scriptures that have no reference whatever to the subject.' De Vio then with a contemptuous gesture threw down Luther's protest, as if unworthy of his regard; and resuming the tone which had in some degree been successful in the last interview, he renewed the cry that Luther must retract. The latter was inflexible. 'Brother! brother!' cried De Vio in Italian, 'when you were last here you were very docile; but to-day you are altogether intractable.' Then the Cardinal began a long speech, borrowed from the writings of St. Thomas: he again extolled with all his might the Constitution of Clement VI.; he persisted in maintaining that, in virtue of that Constitution, the very merits of Christ are distributed to the faithful by means of the indulgences: he thought he had silenced Luther. The latter at times attempted to speak; but De Vio scolded and thundered on without intermission, and, as on the previous occasion, claimed the sole right to be heard.

[" This manner of proceeding had on the first occasion been in some measure successful; but Luther was not the man to bear with it a second time. His indignation at length broke forth, and it was now his turn to astonish the by-standers, who thought him already conquered by the Prelate's volubility. He raised his sonorous voice; he took up the Cardinal's favourite objection, and made him pay dearly for his temerity in entering the lists against him. 'Retract! retract!' repeated De Vio, showing him the Constitution of the Pope. 'Well!' said Luther, 'only prove to me, by this Constitution, that the treasure of indulgences is the very merit of Christ, and I consent to retract, according to the will and pleasure of your Eminence.....'

[" The Italians, who had not expected this, exulted at his words, and could not repress their joy at seeing the adversary at length taken in the toils. As to the Cardinal, he was like one beside himself; he laughed aloud, but it was an indignant and angry laugh; he stepped forward, took up the volume containing the famous Constitution, turned over the leaves, found the passage, and, elated with the advantage he thought he had secured, read it aloud with breathless eagerness. The Italians were now triumphant; the Counsellors of the Elector were anxious and embarrassed; Luther waited the right moment. At last, when the Cardinal came to these words, 'The Lord Jesus Christ acquired this treasure by his sufferings,' Luther interrupted him: 'Most worthy Father,' said he, 'deign to consider this passage well, and to meditate upon it carefully: He has acquired. Christ has acquired a treasure by his merits: the merits, then, are not the treasure; for, to speak with philosophic precision, the cause is a different thing from that which flows from it. The merits of Christ have acquired for the Pope the power of giving such indulgences to the people; but they are not the very merits of the Lord which the Pope distributes. Thus, then, my conclusion is true, and this Constitution, which you so loudly appeal to, testifies with me to the truth which I declare.'

[" De Vio still held the book in his hands; his eyes still rested on the fatal passage: the inference was unanswerable. Behold him taken in the very net he had spread for another; and Luther, with a strong hand, held him fast, to the utter astonishment of the Italian courtiers who surrounded him. The Legate would have eluded the difficulty; but all retreat was closed. From an early stage of the discussion he had given up the testimony of the Scriptures, and that of the Fathers; and had sheltered himself under this Extravagance of Clement VI., and now he was taken in his strong hold. Still, he was too artful to betray his embarrassment. In order to conceal his confusion, the Cardinal abruptly changed the subject, and vehemently attacked Luther on other points of difference. Luther, who detected this skilful manœuvre, drew tighter on every side the net in which he had taken his opponent, making it impossible for him to escape: 'Most reverend Father,' said he, in a tone of irony, veiled under the semblance of respect, 'your Eminence must not suppose that we Germans are altogether ignorant of grammar: to be a treasure, and to purchase a treasure, are two very different things.'

[" 'Retract!' exclaimed De Vio, 'retract! or I will send you to Rome, there to appear before the Judges commissioned to take cognizance of your cause. I will excommunicate you, and all your partisans, and all who shall at any time countenance you; and will cast them out of the Church. Full power has been given to me for this purpose by the Holy Apostolic See. Think you, that your protectors will stop me? Do you imagine that the Pope can fear Germany? The Pope's little finger is stronger than all the Princes of Germany put together.'

[" 'Condescend,' replied Luther, 'to forward the written answer I have given you to Pope Leo X., with my most humble prayers.'

[" The Legate, at these words, glad to have a momentary respite, again assumed an air of dignity; and, turning to Luther, said in a haughty and angry tone,— [" 'Retract, or return no more!'

[" The expression struck Luther. He must now answer in another manner than by words. He made an obeisance, and withdrew. The Counsellors of the Elector followed; and the Cardinal and his Italians, left alone, looked at each other, utterly confounded at such a result of the discussion.

[" Luther and De Vio never met again: but the Reformer had made a powerful impression on the Legate, which was never entirely effaced. What Luther had said concerning faith, what De Vio read in the subsequent writings of the Doctor of Wittemberg, considerably changed the Cardinal's sentiments. The theologians of Rome saw with surprise and dissatisfaction the opinions touching justification which he brought forward in his commentary upon the Epistle to the Romans. The Reformation did not recede, nor did the Reformer retract; but his judge, who had so repeatedly commanded him to retract, changed his views, and himself, indirectly, retracted his errors. Thus the unshaken fidelity of the Reformer was crowned with reward." *]

[* D'Aubigné's Hist. of Reform., vol. i., pp. 443—467.]

III. Specimens of Indulgences.

How far Popery has properly moderated in the matter of indulgences will appear, if we take a survey of them according to the following divisions:—1. Such as have been annulled or repealed. 2. Those granted to certain Orders. 3. Such as are designed for all Christians. 4. And some of recent date.

1. Such as have been annulled or repealed.

Romanists teach, that any indulgence can be revoked or repealed by the grantor, his successor, or superior. But an indulgence which has accomplished its effect cannot be revoked as far as that effect is implied. Pius V., in 1567, revoked all the indulgences which had been granted for lucrative purposes. Paul V., in 1606, repealed all those which were granted by his predecessors to the Regulars of every Order, and gave others in their place.* Innocent XI., in 1678, also withdrew many indulgences, (plurimas indulgentias,) as false, forged, and apocryphal.†

In a collection of these cancelled indulgences, of which the reader may find several in Ferraris,‡ they are classed under each month of the year; nearly all of them are plenary; they are connected with certain stations; and are such as every member of the religious Orders, to whom they were originally given, may obtain. They include pardons for twenty-five thousand years, eighteen thousand, ten thousand, &c. Some grant the privilege of an indulgence for a certain number of years, and the liberation of a soul from purgatory. (Et liberatio animæ e purgatorio.) Others grant, with the indulgence of certain years, (say twenty-eight thousand,) a remission of the third part of the sins. (Remissio tertiæ partis peccatorum.) The list to which we refer contains the titles of ninety distinct forms of indulgences which were revoked, the loss of which was soon compensated by the institution of others; so that it would not be difficult to use some of those which had been pronounced by Innocent XI., ut falsas, confictas, et apocryphas, "as false, forged, and apocryphal;" for an imposition of this description would not be worse than what is practised in a greater or less degree by him who grants the indulgence.

2. Those granted to certain Orders.

Leo X. granted to all the Brethren Minors of the Regular Observance, to the Monks of St. Clara, and of the Third Order, that in saying five times Pater-noster, &c., with Ave Maria, and in the end of each a Gloria Patri to the intention of the Pope, and another Pater and Ave Maria and Gloria Patri for him who gives the indulgence, he should obtain all indulgences, plenary as well as non-plenary, conceded to the Roman churches, the Jerusalem, Compostella, and Partiuncula churches, during every hour of the day and night. These indulgences, they maintain, were not cancelled by Paul V., because he did not revoke the local indulgences, nor those granted to churches, but only those which were personal. Nor did he withdraw those granted for the souls of the Regulars then in purgatory; or those granted to them indiscriminately for all the faithful. This indulgence obtains the name of the Station of the Holy Sacrament, because the Patres Nostri, the Ave Mariæ, and the Gloriæ Patri, six in number, are said at the sacrament of the altar.

Plenary indulgences of the above description were to be obtained in former times at Rome, (and there is no material change now,) in as many as thirty-eight churches; besides many extraordinary ones every month, which amounted to six hundred and sixty-nine in the aggregate. The non-plenary indulgences were innumerable.

[In an account of the indulgences belonging to the seven principal churches in the city of Rome, we meet with the following singular history:—"St. Sylvester, in his Canonical, writes that in Rome there were a thousand five hundred and five churches, of which the greater part are now defaced; and also, that in the same city, there were four hundred and sixty and seven parish churches privileged with grace and holiness, which are called Royal Churches, because they were built by Popes or Emperors. In the high altars of these churches no man can lawfully celebrate or say mass, but only the Pope, or he to whom the Pope gives or grants a license for that purpose. Among these churches there are seven which are privileged with still greater holiness, grace, and dignity, and which are more royal than the rest; of which seven the first and principal is called the Church of St. John the Lateran, which is the head of all the world, and is dedicated to the honour of St. Saviour, of St. John the Baptist, and of St. John the Evangelist, in which there are daily forty-eight years of indulgence, as many quarantains,† and remission of a third part of all sins. Also, Pope Sylvester and Pope Gregory, who consecrated this church, gave and granted unto it, so many indulgences as none can number but God alone, according to the testimony of Pope Boniface, who says, 'that if men but knew the number of the indulgences belonging to the Church of St. John, they would not travel beyond the sea to the holy sepulchre in Jerusalem, where they [* "Pius V. Pontifex Maximus, Constit. incip. Etsi Dominici, edita sexto ante kalendas Februarii, 1567, revocavit omnes indulgentias, quæ quæstum continebant.

["Paulus V. Summus Pontifex, Constit. incip. Romanus Pontifex, edita 23 Maii, 1606, revocavit omnes indulgentias per suos prædecessores Summos Pontifices concessas quibuslibet Regularibus cujusvis Ordinis, et alias de novo concessit; quæ Constitutio, ut ab omnibus præ oculis habeatur, hic ad litteram datur."—Ferraris. Biblioth. Prompt. Indulgentia, art. iv., sect. 5, 6; where the Decree of Paul V. is quoted in full.]

[† "Innocentius XI. Summus Pontifex, anno 1678, 7 Martii, in Decreto, quod incipit, Delata sæpius, plurimas indulgentias revocavit, et ut falsas, confictas, apocryphasque declaravit; unde, ut ab omnibus, quæ sit, percipiatur, datur hic ad litteram ipsummet," &c. —Idem, art. iv., sect. 14, et seq.]

[‡ "E. g. In Januario. In Circumcisione Domini, Statio ad S. Mariam Trans-Tiberim: indulgentia plenaria, et 25,000 annorum. In Epiphania Domini, Statio ad S. Petrum, indulgentia plenaria, et 18,000 annorum, et totidem quadragenarum.

["In Februario. Dominica Septuagesimæ, Statio ad S. Laurentium extra muros, et indulgentia plenaria. Dominica Sexagesimæ, Statio ad S. Paulum, et indulgentia plenaria, et 10,000 annorum, et totidem quadragenarum. Dominica Quinquagesimæ, Statio ad S. Petrum, et indulgentia plenaria, et 28,000 annorum, cum totidem quadragenis, et remissione tertiæ partis peccatorum.

["In Quadragesima. Statio ad S. Joannem in Laterano, et indulgentia plenaria cum 18,000 annis, et liberatione animæ e purgatorio. Dominica Palmarum, Statio ad S. Joannem in Laterano, et indulgentia plenaria cum 25,000 annis, et totidem quadragenis, ac liberatio animæ e purgatorio.

["In Decembri. In Festo S. Joannis Apostoli et Evangelistæ, Statio ad S. Mariam Majorem, et indulgentia plenaria, item 50,000 annorum, et liberatio animæ e purgatorio. Cum multis aliis."—Idem, art. iv., sect. 16.]

[* "This Church is the regular cathedral of the Bishop of Rome, and as such assumes the priority of all others, and the pompous title of the Parent and Mother of all churches: Ecclesiarum urbis et orbis mater et caput. It was founded by Constantine; but it has been burnt, ruined, rebuilt, and frequently repaired since that period. Its magnitude corresponds with its rank and antiquity, and the richness of its decorations are equal to both."—Eustace's Classical Tour through Italy, vol. ii., p. 109. Sixth edit. London.

[† Quarantain, an indulgence multiplying the remission of penance by forties.

are absolved a pœna et culpa; for this they may attain in the Church of St. John aforesaid.' St. Boniface also says, that coming devoutly to pray on the day of the consecration of our Saviour, the Saviour visibly appeared to all the people of Rome, which was the ninth day of November, when there is granted a remission of all sins, and this was obtained on the supplication of Constantine the Emperor; for after he had been cleansed of his leprosy by receiving holy baptism, he said to St. Sylvester, 'Holy Father, I have consecrated my house a church: do thou therefore infuse and pour upon this edifice thy rich blessings, for the benefit of all that shall repair and come into it.' The holy Sylvester answering, said, 'The Lord Jesus Christ, who of his own mercy healed and cleansed thee from thy leprosy, purify from their sins all who come to this place, without mortal sin, at whatsoever time of the year it may be. And we, by the authority of the blessed Peter and Paul and our own, do remit and pardon them, granting unto them remission of all their sins.'

["St. Gregory also, who consecrated this church after its reparation, having been defaced by heretics, confirmed all the indulgences which had been granted by Sylvester. Boniface, the Pope, also asserts, that the indulgences which were to be obtained in the Church of Lateran, no man is able to enumerate; nevertheless, (said he,) I confirm them all."*]

The indulgences granted to those who visit the Holy Land were very numerous. In the list of plenary indulgences granted for visiting several places in Judea, we find not less than twenty-two. The non-plenary indulgences given for visiting various places in Palestine, amount to sixty-two. Those who wish to see the catalogue, may consult Ferraris on Indulgences,* where they will find great spiritual privileges granted to such as visit the place where the Virgin learned her alphabet, a certain monastery where there is part of the cross of Christ, the fountain where Mary washed his clothes, &c., &c.

We have before us many forms, containing plenary and other indulgences to the Brothers Minors of the Regular Observance and others, on the condition of teaching the Roman Catholic religion to others, confessing and receiving the sacrament; or, if they are unable to do this, invoking the name of Jesus at the hour of death with a contrite heart. The concord of Catholic Princes, the extirpation of heresy or Protestants, and the exaltation of the Church, being topics of prayer, entitle the suppliant to the highest plenary indulgence; and, certainly, the instrument can have no meaning, unless the remission of the guilt of sin, as well as the temporal punishment, is embraced in the indulgence. To give an example from the decree of Innocent XI., under date of May 20, 1680, commencing, "Pietatis," &c., the following is the mode of expression, and is the same which runs through nearly all indulgences:—"We mercifully, in the Lord, grant a plenary indulgence and remission of all their sins."† Indulgence and remission of sins are every where united, so as to convey the idea that pardon of guilt, as well as a remission of temporal pain, is included in the boon.‡

The following is extracted from a book of devotion, entitled, "The Excellence of the Devotion to the Holy Scapulary," printed at Lyons, in France, in the French language, in 1824.§ It is an indulgence granted to those who belong to the religious Order of the Scapulary. We insert the document both in English and in French.

"FORMULARY OF THE GENERAL ABSOLUTION AND PLENARY INDULGENCES GRANTED BY THE SOVEREIGN PONTIFFS TO THE BRETHREN, WHEN IN THE ARTICLE OF DEATH.

"I remind the Brethren, that this indulgence has the power to remit sin, not only in reference to its guilt, but also as to its punishment, and to restore the soul to the same state of innocency in which it was placed by baptism, so that a Brother who shall have received it will go to heaven without passing through purgatory. I have thought it necessary to remind them of this, in order to show them with what contrition they ought to receive it. The formulary is as follows:—

"The sick man, clothed with a scapulary, having repeated the 'Confiteor,' if he is able to repeat it, or if otherwise, one of the assistants having repeated it for him, the Confessor shall say:

"'God Almighty have compassion on thee, and forgive thee all thy sins, deliver thee from all evil, preserve and

[* "Sanctus Sylvester scribit in sua Canonica, quod Romæ fuerunt mille quingentæ quinque ecclesiæ, quarum major pars nunc destructa est; et fuerunt ibidem quadringenta sexaginta septem ecclesiæ parochiales privilegiatæ gratia et sanctitate, et dicuntur Regales, quia a Summis Pontificibus et Imperatoribus sunt constructæ. In quarum summis altaribus solus Papa, vel cui ipse licentiam dederit vel concesserit, licite potest celebrare. Inter istas ecclesias sunt septem privilegiatæ majori gratia, sanctitate, et dignitate, et magis omnium regales; in quas prima et principalis dicitur Ecclesia Sancti Johannis in Laterano, quæ est caput totius orbis. Item Ecclesia Sancti Johannis est dedicata in honore Sancti Salvatoris et Sanctorum Johannis Baptistæ et Evangelistæ. Et sunt ibidem quotidie xlviii. anni indulgentiarum, et tot carenæ, et tertiæ partis omnium peccatorum remissio. Item Papa Sylvester et Papa Gregorius, qui eandem ecclesiam consecraverunt, dederunt tot indulgentias quot nemo numerare potest nisi solus Deus, testante Papa Bonifacio, qui dicit quod si homines scirent indulgentias Ecclesiæ Sancti Johannis quot essent, non transirent ad sanctum sepulchrum in Jerusalem ultra mare, ubi absolvuntur a pœna et culpa: nam sic etiam absolvuntur in Ecclesia Sancti Johannis prædicta. Item dicit Sanctus Bonifacius, qui devote venit ad orandum in die consecrationis Salvatoris, qui visibiliter apparuit omni populo Romano, cujus dies est nona die mensis Novembris, et est ibi remissio omnium peccatorum, Constantino Imperatore supplicante: Postquam Constantinus Imperator a lepra mundatus fuit per sacri baptismatis susceptionem, dixit beato Sylvestro Papæ, Pater sancte, domum meam in ecclesiam ordinavi, infunde in ecclesiam tuam largam benedictionem omnibus venientibus ad eam. Respondens Sanctus Sylvester dixit: Dominus Jesus Christus, qui te per suam misericordiam sanavit et mundavit; et purificet omnes venientes sine peccato mortali ad locum istum quocunque tempore anni ab eorum peccatis. Et nos, auctoritate beatorum Petri et Pauli, atque nostra, remittimus et concedimus eis remissionem omnium peccatorum. Item, Sanctus Gregorius, qui hanc ecclesiam consecravit reparatam post demolitionem per hereticos, confirmavit indulgentias prædictas positas per beatum Sylvestrum. Item, Bonifacius Papa dixit: Indulgentias Ecclesiæ Lateranensis nullus numerare potest, ego tamen omnes confirmo."—Fiscus Papalis, sive Catalogus Indulgentiarum et Reliquarum septem principalium Ecclesiarum Urbis Romæ. Ex vetusto Manuscripto Codice vero et fideliter descriptus. London: printed by Bernard Alsop, and sold at his house at the signe of the Dolphin in Distaffe-Lane, 1621.]

* Ferraris. Prompt. Bib. Indulg., art. v., sect. 8, Indulg. plen. Terr. Sanct.

† "Plenariam omnium peccatorum suorum indulgentiam et remissionem misericorditer in Domino concedimus."—Idem, art. v., sect. 16.

‡ Idem, art. v., sect. 16, 17.

[§ "L'Excellence de la Devotion au St. Scapulaire, Ouvrage très instructif. Où l'on explique le caractère qui distingue ce saint Habit, son origine, les grâces qu'il attire, les devoirs qu'il impose, et les indulgences dont il a été enrichi par les souverains Pontifes qui l'ont érigé en Confréries. Composé par le Rev. P. Thomas Chais.

"Dignare me laudare te, Virgo sacrata;
Da mihi virtutem contra hostes tuos.

["Nouvelle edition. A Lyon, chez Rusand, Libraire, Imprimeur du Roi, Grand Rue Mercière. 1824."]

confirm thee in every good work, and bring thee to eternal life. Amen.

"'The Lord, most mighty and merciful, grant thee the pardon, absolution, and remission of all thy sins. Amen.'

"The Confessor adds:—

"'Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who underwent unspeakable torments for sinners, that he might restore them to life; who saves all, and would have no one to be lost; neither willeth the death of sinners, but always seeks their life; may he now regard thee with his godly compassion, turn away all wrath and indignation, and through the tenderness of his mercy forgive thee all thine iniquities, and whatever punishments are due from the rigour of his justice. And I, the unworthy servant and Minister of Jesus Christ himself, our Lord, and by the authority of the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, and of the holy Roman Church; likewise by the privileges granted to the Brethren and Associates of the most holy Mary of Mount Carmel, by the sovereign Pontiffs; as far as I am able, and ought, I pronounce thee to have full pardon and the remission of all thy sins, if thou shalt now depart this life; otherwise I reserve the same pardon for thee till the moment of thy death. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.'

"The sick man having then invoked, either in words or mentally, the sacred names of Jesus and of Mary, the Priest proceedeth:—

"'By the same authority I exempt thee from all negligence, if thou hast contracted any, by deferring that sacred habit; and I declare and signify thee to be a creature of God absolved here, and before the tribunal of our Lord Jesus Christ, from all the punishments due to thee in purgatory, on account of the sins which thou hast committed against the goodness of the living and true God; and I pronounce thee to be restored to that innocency with which thou wast invested in baptism, by the sacred washing of the Saviour. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.'"*

["* FORMULE DE L'ABSOLUTION GENERALE ET DE L'INDULGENCE PLENIERE, ACCORDEES PAR LES SOUVERAINS PONTIFES AUX CONFRERES QUI SONT A L'ARTICLE DE LA MORT.

["J'avertis les Confrères, que cette indulgence a la vertu de remettre le péché, non-seulement quant à la coulpe, mais encore quant à la peine, et de rétablir l'âme dans la même innocence qu'elle avoit reçue par le baptême; en sorte qu'un Confrère qui mourroit après l'avoir gagnée iroit au ciel sans passer par le purgatoire. J'ai cru devoir leur donner cet avis, pour leur apprendre avec quel empressement ils doivent la demander, et avec quelle contrition ils doivent la reçevoir. En voici la formule.

["Le malade, revêtu d'un scapulaire, ayant dit le 'Confiteor,' s'il peut le dire, ou s'il ne le peut, quelqu'un des assistants l'ayant dit pour lui, le Confesseur dira:

["'Misereatur tui omnipotens Deus, et dimittat tibi omnia peccata tua, liberet te ab omni malo, conservet et confirmet in omni opere bono, et perducat ad vitam æternam.'—R. 'Amen.'

["'Indulgentiam, absolutionem, et remissionem omnium peccatorum tuorum tribuat tibi omnipotens et misericors Dominus.'—R. 'Amen.'

["Le Confesseur ajoute:—

["'Dominus noster Jesus Christus, Dei Filius, qui mirabilia tormenta pro peccatoribus subiit, ut eos ad vitam revocaret; qui salvat omnes, et neminem vult perire; nec mortem peccatorum, sed vitam semper inquirit; ipse nunc sua piissima misericordia te respiciat, avertat omnem iram et indignationem, atque per indulgentissima misericordiæ suæ viscera tibi remittat universas iniquitates tuas et quascunque pœnas ex rigore justitiæ suæ debitas. Ego autem ipsius Domini nostri Jesu Christi indignus famulus et Minister, et auctoritate sanctorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, ac sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ, item ex privilegiis per Summos Pontifices concessis Fratribus et Confratribus sanctissimæ Mariæ de Monte Carmelo; in quantum possum, et debeo, declaro te consequi indulgentiam plenariam, et remissionem omnium peccatorum tuorum, si tamen hac vice e vita migraveris; alias eamdem tibi reservo indulgentiam pro ultimo articulo mortis tuæ. In nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti.'—R. 'Amen.'

["Le malade ayant ensuite invoqué, de bouche ou de cœur, les saints noms de Jésus et de Marie, le Prêtre poursuit:—

["'Ego eadem auctoritate tibi dispenso super omni negligentia, si quam contraxisti, istum sacrum habitum deferendo, et declaro ac significo te creaturam Dei fore absolutam hic, et ante tribunal Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ab omnibus pœnis tibi in purgatorio debitis propter peccata quæ contra bonitatem Dei vivi et veri commisisti, teque manifesto restitutam illi innocentiæ, qua in baptismo per sacrum Salvatoris lavacrum induta fuisti. In nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti.'—R. 'Amen.'"]

3. Indulgences granted to the faithful in general.

The following are found in Ferraris, in the sixth article under that head:—"Those who salute others by saying in Latin or in their own language, 'Let Jesus Christ be praised;' and those who answer, 'For ever,' or 'Amen,' or 'Always,' shall obtain fifty days' indulgence. Those who name reverently the name of Jesus, or the name of Mary, shall obtain twenty-five days'. Those who possess a pious disposition thus to salute, to respond, or to name the name of Jesus; so that if in the article of death, with the mouth or heart, they invoke that name, shall obtain a plenary indulgence. Those who recite the litanies of the blessed name of Jesus will obtain three hundred days' indulgence. Those who recite the litanies of the Virgin Mary will receive two hundred days'. Preachers, who in their sermons shall exhort their hearers to observe this mode of salutation, invocation, or recitation of the name of Jesus and Mary; and whosoever shall duly respect this form of salutation, shall obtain the same indulgences.

"Those who devoutly hear or recite mass shall obtain thirty thousand eight hundred years' indulgence, applicable by way of suffrage to souls in purgatory. The thirty thousand were by the grant of Innocent IV.; and the eight hundred by the grant of Urban IV., Martin V., Sixtus IV., and Eugenius IV., each of whom granted two hundred for each mass.

"Those who recite the Pater and Ave five times, in honour of the passion of our blessed Saviour, and of the sorrows of the blessed Virgin, shall obtain ten thousand years of indulgence, by the grant of Leo X., to all the faithful, obtained at the instance of the Brothers Minor.

"Those who recite the third part of the Rosary will obtain five years' and two hundred days' indulgence, by the grant of Sixtus V. Moreover, if, according to the custom of those who recite the Crown of St. Bridget, they recite the Lord's prayer, they obtain one hundred days' indulgence for every such recitation, and one hundred for each angelic salutation. And if daily, during the whole year, they thus recite, and if once a year, on such day as they may choose, they confess, receive the holy sacrament, and pray for the concord of Christian (Popish) Princes, the extirpation of heresy, (Protestantism,) and the exaltation of holy Mother Church, they shall obtain a plenary indulgence, which will also be applicable to the souls in purgatory. But then the Rosaries ought to be blessed according to the custom of the Fathers of the Order of Preachers.

"Those who recite five times the Pater and Ave, for such as live in mortal sin, shall obtain the third part of the remission of their sins, and that as often as they shall recite.

"Those who repeat the Ave Maria shall obtain thirty days' indulgence, by the grant of John XXII., and as many others by the grant of Urban IV. Those saying Salve, Regina, 'Hail, Queen,' will obtain forty days'. Those who bow the head at the venerable names of Jesus and Mary shall obtain twenty days'. Those bowing at Gloria Patri shall obtain thirty days'. Those who bow in presence of the most holy sacrament, two hundred; those kissing the holy cross, forty days' by grant of the same John XXII., and one year from the grant of Clement IV. Those reciting or saying, 'Blessed be the holy and immaculate conception of the blessed Virgin Mary,' will obtain an indulgence of one hundred years, by the grant of Gregory XV., in the year 1621, which was also confirmed by Clement XII. in 1731.

"The Priests, who, before celebrating mass, recite, Ego volo celebrare missam, &c., 'I desire to celebrate mass,' &c., shall obtain an indulgence of fifty days by the grant of Gregory XIII. Priests reading mass, before they go to the altar to celebrate it, shall obtain an indulgence of forty days by the concession of John XXII. Those reciting, in the end of the canonical hours to which they are bound, the prayers composed by St. Bonaventura, our Seraphic Doctor, to wit, To the Most Holy and Undivided Trinity, with a Pater and Ave, shall obtain the remission of the sins contracted in recitation from human infirmity, by the grant of Leo X.

"From the concession of Clement VIII., those Priests obtain the remission of all the sins of commission or omission contracted in saying mass, also two thousand three hundred years of indulgence, on reciting the following prayer:—

"'I beseech thee, most sweet Lord Jesus Christ, that thy passion may be to me virtue, by which I may be fortified, protected, and defended: let thy wounds be my food and drink, by which I shall be fed, inebriated, and delighted; let the sprinkling of thy blood be an ablution from all my sins; let thy death be my eternal glory; in these let me have refreshing, exultation, soundness, and sweetness of heart. Who livest and reignest, for ever. Amen.'

"John XXII. hath conceded to Priests who devoutly, after mass, recite the following prayer, the pardon of the guilt contracted by one thousand deadly sins; and also for the genuflexions, an indulgence of ten thousand years:—

"'Soul of Christ, sanctify me; body of Christ, save me; blood of Christ, make me drunk; water of Christ, purify me; sweat of Christ, vivify me; passion of Christ, comfort me. O good Jesus! hear me; hide me within thy wounds, permit me not to be separated from thee, from the malicious enemy defend me, in the hour of my death call me, command me to come to thee, and place me beside thee, that with thy holy angels I may praise thee for ever. Amen.'

"Those who accompany the sacred viaticum with a light, when it is carried to the sick, obtain an indulgence of seven years and two hundred and eighty days. Those who accompany without light, obtain an indulgence of five years and as many quadragenies. Those who are lawfully hindered, but send a light or torch to be carried on the occasion, shall obtain an indulgence of three years, and as many quadragenies.

"Those who are present at the prayer of forty hours, during the space of one hour, obtain an indulgence of three years. Those who are present at a procession, either in the beginning or at the end of the said prayer, if in a cathedral church, obtain an indulgence of ten years, and if in other churches, an indulgence of five years. Those who go through the before-mentioned pious exercises, once in a year, on a day prescribed by the Bishop, having also confessed and received the holy communion, obtain a plenary indulgence, and remission of all their sins. This indulgence was granted by Gregory XIII., on the 5th of April, 1580." *

[* "Quia non est aliud nomen sub cœlo, in quo nos oporteat salvos fieri, nisi nomen Jesu, idcirco omnibus et singulis Christi fidelibus, qui hoc modo salutaverint alios, nempe suo vulgari seu Latino sermone, Laudetur Jesus Christus, et his qui sic responderint, In Sæcula, vel Amen, aut Semper, utique tam salutantibus quam respondentibus, quinquaginta, ubicumque id factum fuerit. Qui autem nomen Jesu nominaverint reverenter, vel nomen Mariæ, viginti-quinque dies. Qui vero in mortis articulo, ore, vel corde, (si ore non potuerint,) idem nomen invocaverint, dummodo ante habuerint consuetudinem sic salutandi, vel nominandi idem nomen Jesu, plenariam omnium peccatorum indulgentiam et remissionem; quique Litanias ejusdem S.S. nominis recitaverint, trecentos. Qui Litanias ejusdem B. Virginis Mariæ, ducentos; nec non prædicatoribus verbi Dei, qui inter prædicandum ad hunc modum salutandi, invocandi, vel recitandi, seu nominandi nomen Jesu et Mariæ, auditores monuerint, et quicumque hanc salutationis formam usui esse curaverint, easdem indulgentias, ac peccatorum remissiones consequantur, quas auctoritate et tenore præmissis concedimus et largimur.

["Missæ sacrificium devote audientes aut celebrantes lucrantur triginta mille et octocentos annos indulgentiæ applicabilis per modum suffragii animabus purgatorii: triginta mille ex concessione Innocentii IV., octocentos ex concessione Urbani IV., Martini V., Sixti IV., et Eugenii IV., quorum quilibet concessit pro omni missa ducentos annos.

["Quinquies Pater et Ave recitantes in honorem passionis Christi Domini, et B. Virginis amaritudinum, lucrantur decem mille annos indulgentiæ, ex concessione Leonis X., omnibus fidelibus facta ad instantiam Fratrum Minorum.

["Recitantes tertiam Rosarii partem lucrantur quinque annos et totidem quadragenas indulgentiæ, ex concessione Sixti IV. Et insuper ad instar recitantium Coronam St. Brigittæ, lucrantur centum dies indulgentiæ pro qualibet Oratione Dominica, et centum pro qualibet salutatione angelica; et si quotidie per integrum annum recitaverint, semel in anno, die per unumquemque eligenda, confessi, ac sacra communione refecti, et orantes pro Christianorum Principum concordia, hæresum extirpatione, ac S. Matris Ecclesiæ exaltatione, consequuntur indulgentiam plenariam, etiam applicabilem animabus in purgatorio existentibus; Rosaria tamen debent esse juxta solitum benedicta a P.P. Ordinis Prædicatorum.

["Recitantes quindecim Pater et Ave pro iis, qui in mortali degunt, consequuntur tertiam partem remissionis peccatorum, idque toties quoties recitaverint.

["Recitantes Ave Maria lucrantur triginta dies indulgentiæ ex concessione Joannis XXII., ac totidem alios ex concessione Urbani IV. Recitantes Salve Regina lucrantur quadraginta dies. Caput inclinantes ad veneranda nomina Jesu et Mariæ lucrantur viginti dies. Caput inclinantes ad Gloria Patri lucrantur triginta dies. Genuflectentes coram S.S. sacramento lucrantur bis centum dies; osculantes sanctam crucem lucrantur quadraginta dies ex concessione ejusdem Joannis XXII., et unum annum ex concessione Clementis IV. Recitantes, seu dicentes, Benedicta sit sancta et immaculata conceptio B. Virginis Mariæ, lucrantur indulgentiam centum annorum ex concessione Gregorii XV., anno 1621, et novissime confirmata a Clemente XII., mense Novembris, anno 1731.

["Sacerdotes ante celebrationem sacri recitantes, Ego volo celebrare missam, &c., lucrantur indulgentiam quinquaginta dierum ex concessione Gregorii XIII. Sacerdotes legentes missam, priusquam pergant ad altare ad celebrandum, lucrantur indulgentiam quadraginta dierum ex concessione Joannis XXII. Recitantes in fine horarum canonicarum, ad quas tenentur, orationem a S. Bonaventura, Doctore nostro Seraphico compositam, videlicet, Sacrosanctæ et individuæ Trinitati, cum Pater et Ave, consequuntur remissionem culparum in recitatione ex humana fragilitate contractarum, ex concessione Leonis X.

["Ex concessione Clementis VIII., consequuntur remissionem omnium commissorum seu omissorum in missa, nec non duorum mille et trecentorum annorum indulgentiam, Sacerdotes omnes recitantes sequentem orationem:—

["'Obsecro te, dulcissime Domine Jesu Christe, ut passio tua sit mihi virtus, qua muniar, protegar, atque defendar; vulnera tua sint mihi cibus, potusque, quibus pascar, inebrier, atque delecter; aspersio sanguinis tui sit mihi ablutio omnium delictorum meorum; mors tua sit mihi gloria sempiterna; in his sit mihi refectio

[We refer to the history of our own country. "Elizabeth and her kingdom did not choose to have any thing to do with the Pope; and what right had he to issue his anathemas against them? King John had, indeed, made a gift of the kingdom to him about two hundred and fifty years before. But as John had presumed to give away what was not his own, (for even at that early period the people of England understood and maintained the principle, that the King was made for the people, not the people for the King,) and as the Pope had obtained the gift by means of imposition, it was in course of time lawfully wrested from him. In short, Pius V. had no more right to curse Queen Elizabeth, than Gregory XVI. has to curse Queen Victoria.

["The enlightened part of the English population were, in a great measure, prepared for a change in the public profession of religion, before King Henry VIII. was ready to lead the way. The doctrines of the word of God, as taught by Wickliffe and the Lollards, a century before, were extensively propagated, and many thousands in England believed them; so that when Henry himself became Reformer, he found little difficulty, except with some of the Clergy and nobility, in causing his subjects to go along with him. Indeed, his chief difficulty arose from the forwardness of the people, who were disposed to reform faster, and more thoroughly, than he chose to allow them, and to go farther from Rome than he wished. He did, however, go far enough to incur the anger of the Pope, whose predecessor had created him 'Defender of the Faith;' not being able, with all his infallibility, to foresee that Henry would soon renounce the faith, and that this fine title should be borne for three hundred years by a race of heretical Princes; and the Pope, whose misfortune it was to hear of the defection of Henry, assailed him with all the terrors of the Holy See, by means of a Bull which is before me, and which fills fifteen quarto pages of closely printed Latin, under the title of 'Damnatio et Excommunicatio Henrici VIII. Regis Angliæ.' The Pope was evidently very angry with the King. He declared him, by this Bull, to be a heretic, and his crime was greatly aggravated by the consideration of his having been styled 'Defender of the Faith.' He excommunicated and deposed him. He commanded all Christian Princes to take up arms against him. He gave the soldiers who should engage in so godly a work, all the goods of the heretics, wherever they could find them. The King, notwithstanding, maintained his ground, and maintained the Reformation too, so far as he chose to carry it; and had he proceeded much farther, he would have had not only the support but the gratitude of his people.

["By Elizabeth's time, it had advanced considerably; so that the great bulk of the nation were decidedly Protestants, and firmly resolved in their separation from Rome, and in attachment to Elizabeth and her government. The interference of the Pope, therefore, was no better than the attempt of an incendiary to sow discord, and excite war and bloodshed, in a great and prosperous nation. He persevered in these attempts for many years, both openly and secretly, and employed numerous agents for carrying into effect his insidious and cruel designs. In short, it is difficult to imagine a fiend of darkness more obstinately set upon promoting measures of wickedness and cruelty, than this holy Father of the Romish Church; and yet I believe he was not worse than the average of Popes for a thousand years.

["He took other measures, besides denouncing the Queen, for subverting the government of England. He wrote a letter to the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, exciting them to rebellion against their Sovereign. This letter, of which an English translation is given in a work entitled 'Free Thoughts,' is written in the most insidious and flattering style. He addresses the two Earls as 'men dear to us and eminent, as well by the study of Catholic piety, as by nobleness of birth.' He praises them for having determined 'to renew and confirm the ancient union of the Roman Church with that kingdom,'—'delivered from the vile servitude of a woman's lust, to the ancient obedience of the holy Roman See.' He assures them 'that the omnipotent God, whose works are perfect, and who hath excited you to deserve well of the Catholic faith in that kingdom, will be assisting you. But if, in asserting the Catholic faith, and the authority of this Holy See, you should suffer death, and your blood be spilt, it would be much better, for the confession of God, to fly, by the compendium of a glorious death, to life eternal, than, living basely and ignominiously, to serve the lust of an impotent woman, with the loss of your souls.' It is worthy of remark, that this letter is dated February 20th, 1570, that is, about three months previous to the issuing of the Bull against the Queen. This was giving the rebel Earls time to collect their forces, that they might be ready to strike the blow, and dethrone the Queen, when the Bull should arrive, and when all the superstitious and Popish part of the nation should be afraid to serve an excommunicated Sovereign. The rebellion, however, had broken out prematurely, perhaps before the Pope's Bull arrived, and it was soon suppressed.

["Some years after, the Pope excited Sir Thomas Stuckley to raise rebellion in Ireland. Stuckley engaged to conquer this kingdom for the Pope; and the holy Father furnished him with a number of crucifixes, by selling which he was to make his own fortune. The following indulgences were granted to these crucifixes, which were evidently meant to excite the subjects of Elizabeth to rebel against her.

[" '(1.) Whoso beholdeth, with reverence and devotion, one of these crosses, as oft as he doth it getteth fifty days of indulgence. As oft as he prayeth upon or before exultatio, sanitas, et dulcedo cordis mei. Qui vivis et regnas in sæcula sæculorum. Amen.'

["Joannes XXII. concessit Sacerdotibus devote, post missam, orationem sequentem recitantibus veniam pœnæ debitæ mille peccatis lethalibus, nec non genuflexis indulgentiæ annorum decem mille:—

[" 'Anima Christi, sanctifica me; corpus Christi, salva me; sanguis Christi, inebria me; aqua lateris Christi, munda me; sudor Christi, vivifica me; passio Christi, conforta me. Oh! bone Jesu, exaudi me; intra vulnera tua absconde me, ne permittas me separari a te; ab hoste maligno defende me, in hora mortis meæ voca me, jube me venire ad te, et pone me juxta te, ut cum sanctis angelis tuis laudem te in sæcula sæculorum. Amen.'

["Comitantes sacrum viaticum cum lumine accenso, quando defertur ad infirmos, lucrantur indulgentiam septem annorum, et totidem quadragenarum. Comitantes sine lumine lucrantur indulgentiam quinque annorum, et totidem quadragenarum. Legitime impediti lumen seu facem per alios ea occasione deferendam mittentes lucrantur indulgentiam trium annorum, et totidem quadragenarum.

["Intervenientes orationi quadraginta horarum per spatium unius horæ lucrantur indulgentiam trium annorum. Intervenientes processioni factæ, sive in initio, sive in fine dictæ orationis, si fuerint in cathedrali, lucrantur indulgentiam decem annorum; et si in aliis ecclesiis, indulgentiam quinque annorum. Consueti dictis piis exercitiis, semel in anno, die præscripta ab Episcopo, confessi, et sacra communione refecti, lucrantur indulgentiam plenariam, et remissionem omnium suorum peccatorum: sic concessit Gregorius XIII., die v Aprilis, 1580."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt. Indulgentia, art. vi, sect. 5—13.]

it, for the good and prosperous state of the holy Catholic Church, and for the increase and exaltation of the holy Catholic faith, and for the preservation and delivery of Mary Queen of Scotland, and for the extirpation of heretics, he shall have fifty days of indulgence, and, upon festival days, one hundred.

" '(2.) In going to any conflict or feat of arms, against the enemies of our holy faith, he shall obtain seven years and seven quarantains of indulgence. And if he die there, at least being confessed and houseled at the beginning of the war, with contrition of his sins, and calling upon the name of Jesus with mouth or heart, he shall obtain full indulgence and remission of all his sins.

" '(3.) As oft as he shall be confessed and houseled, making his prayers by word or mind, before the most holy crucifix, and praying for the prosperous state of the holy Church, and for the Chief Bishop, and for the delivery and preservation of the aforesaid Mary Queen of Scots, and for reducing of the aforesaid realms of England and Scotland, he shall obtain all the indulgences that are granted for visiting all the holy places that are both within and without the gates of Rome.

" '(4.) Any night or evening that he shall examine his own conscience, with repentance of sins, and intend to amend the same, saying the general confession, and bowing or kneeling before the holy crucifix, saying three times Jesus, obtains a year and a quarantain of indulgence.

[" '(5.) Whoso shall use a crucifix and accustom himself to behold it with devotion, saying five Pater-nosters, five Aves, and other prayers to our Saviour, or to our Lady, for the exaltation of the holy Church, for the preservation of Mary Queen of Scotland, and for the reducing of the aforesaid realms, he shall obtain once in his life full indulgence of all his sins, besides the other indulgence of fifty days for each time that he prayeth.

[" '(6.) Moreover, in the pain and peril of death, what person soever, being confessed and contrite, or giving signs of contrition, shall kiss the feet of the most blessed crucifix, saying, Jesu, with heart, not being able to say it with mouth, shall obtain full indulgence and remission of all his sins.

[" '(7.) Item. One day in the year, named and appointed by them that shall have one of the said crucifixes, with the license of the Ordinary of the place, it may be put in any church, or chapel, or oratory; and whosoever shall come to visit with devotion the said holy crucifix, in the said church, chapel, or oratory, saying five Pater-nosters, and five Aves, praying for the prosperous state of our Church, and for the preservation of Mary Queen of Scots, and for the reducing of the aforesaid realms, shall obtain free indulgence of all their sins, being confessed, or having the mind and purpose to be confessed in due time or place, and to amend their former lives and sins.

[" '(8.) Item. That every Friday that mass is said, or caused to be said, upon any altar where one of these crucifixes is set, one soul shall be released out of purgatory.

[" 'Item. That those indulgences cannot be revoked by any high Bishop, except express mention be made of the same.' *

[" Such were the artifices of the See of Rome for subverting the English government. The Pope excommunicated and deposed the Queen; relieved her subjects from their oaths of allegiance; stirred up the disaffected by flattering promises; and sent a number of little idols in the form of crucifixes throughout Ireland, to cherish among the people the superstitious belief, that if they should die in so good a cause as attempting to dethrone an heretical Queen, and deliver a Popish one, they should receive the free pardon of all their sins. These efforts were powerfully seconded by a host of Jesuit Priests, who spread themselves all over the kingdom, and who never ceased to plot the destruction of the Queen, insomuch that it is truly astonishing that she escaped the fate of some other Monarchs of that age, from the hands of these incendiaries.

[" 'The reign of Elizabeth,' says a modern writer, * 'displays a rapid succession of plots against her life, either designed or executed by Jesuits, and from which nothing but the peculiar protection of Providence could have delivered the Queen and the country.' The following is an extract from the Brief Account:—'Elizabeth wrote with her own hand to Henry III. of France, after the conspiracy against her life, informing him that the Jesuits had contrived it, who, says she, hold it meritorious to kill a Sovereign whom the Pope has deposed; and she then warns him against them; and he would have done well if he had observed her caution. In 1591, the Queen published a declaration against the Society, in which, after describing at length the designs of Spain and Rome, she says, that she has the most undoubted information, that the Jesuits form the nests and lurking-places of those who are in rebellion against her person and government; that their General had himself been to Spain, and armed the King against her; that Parsons, who taught among them, and was the General of the English Seminary at Rome, had done the same; and that the Jesuits, as a Society, had been the life and soul of the armies which had been raised against England.' "] †

" In kingdoms subject to the King of Spain, whoever celebrates [mass] on the day of the commemoration of the dead, can deliver a soul from the pains of purgatory, by the grant of Innocent XI., on the 30th of September, 1679.

" Those who recite on their knees, in the evening, at the sound of the bell, Angelus Domini, 'Angel of the Lord;' Ecce ancilla Domini, 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord;' Verbum caro, &c., 'The Word was made flesh;' with three Ave Mariæ, &c.; will obtain a plenary indulgence by the grant of Adrian VI." ‡

The following, as issued by Pope Benedict himself, is given at length:—

" INDULGENCES GRANTED TO THOSE WHO RECITE DEVOUTLY, AT THE SOUND OF THE BELL, IN THE MORNING, EVENING, OR NOON, 'ANGEL OF THE LORD,' &C.

" Benedict XIII. Pope.—To the perpetual memory of the thing.

" The nature of the apostolic service divinely enjoined on us requires, that we should faithfully dispense the [" * Strype's Annals, vol. ii., p. 535. 1724.

[" * Christian Observer, 1815, vol. xv., p. 22.

[† M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. i., pp. 161—165. Tenth edition.]

[‡ " In Regnis Regi Hispaniarum subjectis quicumque die commemorationis defunctorum celebrat, animam liberare potest a pœnis purgatorii ex concessione Innocentii XI., die xxx Septembris, 1679.

[" Recitantes flexis genibus vespere ad pulsum campanæ, Angelus Domini, Ecce ancilla Domini, Verbum caro, &c., cum tribus Ave Maria, &c., lucrantur indulgentiam plenariam ex concessione Adriani VI."—Ferraris, Indulgentia, art. 6, sect. 16, 17.]

treasury of celestial gifts, committed by the Lord to our dispensation, when we might hope in the Lord, that this would be profitable both to increase veneration on earth toward the most blessed and most august Queen of heaven, the Virgin Mary, mother of God, our patron and advocate, as well as to cherish toward her the devotion of the faithful, and to promote the salvation of souls: so that, confiding on the mercy of the omnipotent God, and by the authority of St. Peter and Paul his Apostles, we mercifully grant in the Lord a plenary indulgence and remission of all their sins, to all the faithful in Christ, who are truly penitent, have confessed and received the holy communion, and have in the morning, noon, or evening, at the sound of the bell, on their knees devoutly recited, 'The Angel of the Lord announced to Mary, and she conceived by the Holy Spirit;' 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord, let it be done to me according to thy word;' and, 'The Word became flesh, and dwelt with us;' with three Ave Mariæ; and hath poured out pious prayers to God, for the concord of Christian (Catholic) Princes, the extirpation of heresy, (Protestantism,) and the exaltation of holy Mother Church, to be obtained, on one day of each month only, for any faithful person, at the choice of the person thus praying. But on other days of the year, to all the faithful in Christ, who are truly penitent, as often as they do this, we relax one hundred days' penitence from those enjoined or owed in any other manner, and these to be valid for all coming time. We will also, that transcripts or copies of this present letter, also printed copies subscribed by the hand of any public notary, and impressed by the seal of any person placed in ecclesiastical dignity, may be received as possessing altogether the same authority, when exhibited or shown, as our own copy hath.

"Given at Rome, at holy Mary Major, under the ring of the fisherman, on the 14th of September, 1724. In the first year of our pontificate."*

* "INDULGENTIÆ CONCESSÆ DEVOTE RECITANTIBUS AD PULSUM CAMPANÆ MANE, AUT MERIDIE, SEU VESPERE: 'ANGELUS DOMINI,' &c.

"Benedictus Papa XIII.—Ad perpetuam rei memoriam.

"Injunctæ nobis divinitus apostolicæ servitutis ratio postulat, ut cœlestium munerum thesauros, dispensationi nostræ a Domino creditos, fideliter erogemus, cum id ad augendam in terris beatissimæ atque augustissimæ cœli Reginæ, Virginis Deiparæ Mariæ, patronæ et advocatæ nostræ, venerationem excitandamque et confovendam erga illam fidelium devotionem, ac ad animarum salutem, speramus in Domino profuturum: itaque de omnipotentis Dei misericordia, ac beatorum Petri et Pauli, Apostolorum ejus, auctoritate confisi, omnibus et singulis Christi fidelibus, vere pœnitentibus, et confessis, ac sacra communione refectis, qui mane, aut meridie, seu vespere, ad pulsum campanæ, Angelus Domini annunciavit Mariæ, et concepit de Spiritu Sancto: Ecce ancilla Domini: fiat mihi secundum verbum tuum: Et Verbum caro factum est, et habitavit in nobis, cum tribus Ave Mariæ flexis genibus devote recitaverint, et pro Christianorum Principum concordia, hæresum extirpatione, sanctæ Matris Ecclesiæ exaltatione, pias ad Deum preces effuderint, plenariam, in uno die cujuslibet mensis dumtaxat, per unumquemque fidelem, ad sui libitum eligendo, lucrifaciendam, omnium peccatorum suorum indulgentiam ac remissionem, misericorditer in Domino concedimus. In reliquis vero anni diebus, iisdem Christi fidelibus, vere contritis, quoties id egerint, centum dies de injunctis iis, seu alias quomodolibet debitis pœnitentiis, in forma Ecclesiæ consueta, relaxamus, præsentibus perpetuis futuris temporibus valituris. Volumus autem ut earundem præsentium literarum transumptis seu exemplis, etiam impressis, manu alicujus notarii publici subscriptis, et sigillo personæ in ecclesiastica dignitate constitutæ munitis, eadem prorsus fides ubique habeatur, quæ ipsis præsentibus haberetur, si forent exhibitæ vel ostensæ.

"Datum Romæ apud Sanct. Mariam Majorem sub annulo piscatoris die 14 Septembris, 1724. Pontificatus nostri anno primo."—Vide Dens Theologia, tom. viii., No. 287, p. 429. Ferraris, Bibliotheca Prompta Indulgentiæ, art. vi., sect. 19.

The reader, by referring to Roman Catholic authorities, may find indulgences in great variety and number. The terms on which they are granted are also easy. Dens, who inserts several specimens,* informs us that some indulgences are obtained without difficulty, and are very useful. Our limits forbid us enlarging.

4. Indulgences of recent date.

How far Popery has reformed in regard to this nefarious practice, may be known by referring to indulgences which have been recently promulgated. It is true, in countries where Protestant influence is felt, great caution is used in their adoption. But in Catholic countries, and especially in Italy, the traffic is carried on with all the unblushing effrontery of Tetzel's days, and to as great a length as Protestant writers represent. We give a few specimens.

Pope Pius VII. sent to Dr. Moylan, Bishop of Cork, a plenary indulgence on the 14th of May, 1809, which was published in Cork, in 1813, as appears from the following extracts of a Pastoral Letter published by Bishop Moylan to his diocess:—

"BELOVED BRETHREN,—Animated with the warmest desires of promoting your eternal welfare, we resolved, immediately on completing our cathedral chapel, to establish a Mission in it, of pious exercises and instructions for the space of a month, and in order to induce our brethren to attend thereat, and to profit by those effectual means of sanctification, we applied to the Holy See for a solemn plenary indulgence, in the form of a jubilee, which the holy Father was most graciously pleased to grant by a Bull, as follows:—

"'Pius VII., by divine Providence, Pope, grants unto each and to every one of the faithful of Christ, who, after assisting at least eight times at the holy exercise of the Mission, (in the new cathedral of Cork,) shall confess his or her sins, with true contrition, and approach unto the holy communion; shall visit the said cathedral chapel, and there offer up to God, for some time, pious and fervent prayers for the propagation of the holy Catholic faith, and to our intention, a plenary indulgence, applicable to the souls in purgatory, by way of suffrage, and this in form of a jubilee.'

"Such, beloved brethren, is the great, the inestimable grace offered to us by the Vicar of Jesus Christ. Prepare, beloved, prepare your hearts to receive the fulness of the divine mercy: it is offered to all,—let no one refuse to accept of it. Let sinners, by its means, become just; and let the just, by it, become more justified. It is written, 'God will hear us in the acceptable time:' surely this holy time of indulgence must be that most acceptable time. Those days of grace and mercy must be the days of your salvation. Ah! profit by them; be reconciled to your offended God. If you neglect this grace—if you suffer this holy time of indulgence to pass without profiting by it, there is every reason to fear that the time of God's mercy shall pass away from you, never more to return. Behold the treasures of God's grace are now open to you! The Ministers of Jesus Christ, invested with his authority, and animated by his Spirit, expect you with a holy impatience, ready to ease you of that heavy burden of sin under which you have so long laboured. Were your sins as red as scarlet, by the grace of the absolution and application of this plenary indulgence, your souls shall become white as snow, &c.

* Dens Theologia, tom. vi., De Indulgentiis. No. 41, De quibusdam Indulgentiis. Indulgentiæ quædam faciles et utiles.

"Wherefore, dearly beloved, that you may all know that which, according to the Bull of His Holiness, is necessary to gain the benefit of this plenary indulgence, granted in the form of a jubilee, you will observe,

"First, That it will commence in the new cathedral chapel, on the first Sunday in Advent, being the 28th day of November instant, and to continue to the festival of St. John the Evangelist, the 27th day of December. Second, To gain this plenary indulgence it is necessary to be truly penitent, to make a good confession, &c., according to the above Bull and intention of our holy Father, the Pope; five Paters, and five Aves, and a Creed, to the above intention, will fulfil the above obligations. Thirdly, All Priests, approved of by us to hear confessions, can, during the above time, absolve all such persons as present themselves with due dispositions at confession, in order to obtain this plenary indulgence, from all sins and censures reserved to the Holy See, or to us; they enjoining on such persons as are thus absolved a salutary penance.

"We order this Pastoral Letter and Instruction to be read in every chapel of our diocess, in town and country, at every mass, on Sunday the 14th, 21st, the 28th of November instant, and on Sunday the 5th of December next. Given at Cork, Nov. 2, 1813.

"FRANCIS MOYLAN."

[The following is a Bull of indulgence, granted by His Holiness the Pope, to the ancient house of Kilravak, the existence of which had long been denied by the abettors of Popery in Scotland. The individual who furnished the indefatigable M'Gavin with it observes, "I have very unexpectedly placed my hands upon the original of the subjoined document, signed by the proper authorities at Rome, and stamped with the Sigillum Officii Sacri. It may be necessary to mention, that these powers of absolution are given by His Holiness only to dignitaries of the Church, such as Archbishops and Bishops of the different diocesses; as also to a few who are high in favour with the Court of Cardinals. I am not at liberty to say how I obtained it, or to give the name of the favoured one to whom it is addressed; but I give you it word for word, even to its errors." From prudential considerations the name of M'Gavin's correspondent is withheld, on account of the danger in which English gentlemen are placed by writing to their friends what they see and hear, especially if it happen to meet the eye of any Jesuit, who could soon communicate the fact to his brother Jesuits in any part of Europe, and the hapless traveller might pay dearly for his temerity in the dungeons of the Inquisition. The authenticity of the document is indisputable. The errors in the style have rendered it difficult to construe some parts of it into English. The whole of the document is given without hesitation.

["POPISH INSTRUMENT.

["Endorsed,

["'To thee, ———, beloved in Christ; health in the Lord. From the Holy Penitentiary, Grace.'

["Entitled within,

["'Michael, by divine mercy, Bishop of Albania, of the Holy Roman Church, Cardinal de Petro, and Superior Penitentiary of our Holy Lords, the Pope and the Apostolic See.'

["And commencing,

["'To thee, ———, beloved in Christ, Confessor, legally approved by the Ordinary of the place for receiving the sacramental confessions of both sexes, we grant the undermentioned powers, which thou art authorized to use for a court of conscience, and in sacramental confession by apostolical authority, and not otherwise. So, however, that thou oughtest not to exhibit them to any one, unless necessity or utility should require it.

["'First. Power of absolving from excommunication on account of having laid violent hands on the Clergy or Presbyters, whether secular or regular: in cases, however, that have not been brought, or that cannot easily be brought, before the Court of the Ordinary, provided that death has not ensued, or mutilation, or a mortal wound, or a fracture of the bones; a heavy and salutary penance being enjoined, with the obligation of carefully and sufficiently satisfying the party injured.

["'Second. Of absolving from the censures pronounced upon duellists; provided that the cases have not been brought before the Court of the Ordinary; a heavy and salutary penance being enjoined, and all other things which ought of right to accompany it.

["'Third. Of absolving all the penitent, whether men or women, (except avowed hereties, or those who openly teach their doctrines,) from all kinds of sentences, censures, and ecclesiastical penalties, on account of heresy, whether when no person heard or observed it, or when thrown out in the hearing of others; for infidelity, and abjuration of the Catholic faith, privately avowed; sorcery and witchcraft committed with accomplices; also for invocation of the devil, and an agreement of consigning to him their soul; for idolatrous worship paid him, and unhallowed rites; and, in short, for every kind of false doctrine inculcated; after, however, the penitent, as of right he ought, has disclosed his accomplices in the aforementioned crimes, if he has any, to the Ordinary of the place, or to the officer of the Holy Inquisition, in those places where the authority of the Holy Inquisition prevails. In other places, however, let the penitent come under a solemn engagement of communicating this disclosure, as soon as possible, and in the way which shall seem to you the best, before the Ordinary of the place. And after he shall, in every instance, have secretly abjured the heresies before you, and recalled the compact entered into with the evil one; and have delivered to you the written agreement executed, if any; with the other symbols of superstition, that they may all be burned; having enjoined according to the degree of his wickedness a severe and salutary penance, with a frequent use of sacraments, and exacted an obligation of retracting his sentiments according to your prudent advice, in presence of those before whom the heresies were uttered; and of removing the scandal so produced.

["'Fourth. Of absolving from censures incurred by the violation of the residences of Religious Orders of either sex, provided that it was not done intentionally for a wicked purpose, and without any event having followed from it; and whilst the cases have not been brought before the Court of the Ordinary; with a suitable and salutary penance. And, moreover, of absolving women only, from the censures and ecclesiastical penances incurred by having violated for a wicked purpose the residence of religious men, whilst only the cases remained concealed: having prescribed a severe and salutary penance, with a prohibition from entering any church, convent, or monastery of the said Religious Orders, during the continuance of the penance.

["'Fifth. Of absolving from the censures incurred for retaining and perusing prohibited books: after, however, the penitent shall have delivered up the prohibited books which he may have in his possession, or intrusted them to thee that they may be delivered up, to the Ordinary of the place, or to some other person lawfully authorized to receive them; a suitable and salutary penance being enjoined.

["'Sixth. Of absolving from a case reserved for the determination of the Apostolic See, for gifts received from Regulars of either sex, penance being enjoined. And when the case is concerning gifts under the value of ten scuta,* some charitable donation is to be required, at thy discretion, and carefully exacted as soon as possible, for the benefit of religion, to which restitution was to have been made; provided always that it does not appear that these gifts were of the proper effects of religion. In so far, however, as the accepted gifts were either above the value of ten scuta, or appear to have been given out of the proper effects of religion, restitution is to be previously made, which if the individual cannot immediately perform, an obligation is to be lodged in thy hands that this shall be done within a certain limited time to be fixed by thy judgment; otherwise according to circumstances.

["'Seventh. Of absolving the Religious of every Order, (except nuns, unless thou hast been approved of, or authorized, by the Ordinary of the place, to act for them,) not only from the aforesaid, but also from cases, and censures, reserved for the determination of their own community.

["'Eighth. Of commuting, on having considered the causes, all simple vows, into others of penance, or works of piety, with the exception of the five vows reserved for the Apostolic See; namely, of chastity, of religion, of the three pilgrimages, namely, to the sacred threshold of the holy Apostles, to St. James in Compostellis, and to Jerusalem; and from the penal vows to restrain themselves from sin; and from the vow against indulging in amusement; and from vows made with respect to prejudice and the Jus Tertii.

["'Ninth. Of granting a dispensation to a transgressor of the vow of chastity, who has contracted a matrimonial connexion with this vow upon him, to obtain the debitum conjugale; such a penitent being admonished that in every other respect except the lawful matrimonial privilege, this vow is to be considered binding; as also in the event of surviving the husband or wife respectively.

["'Tenth. Of granting a dispensation to an incestuous man or woman, to obtain the debitum conjugale, which right he or she had lost from a supervening secret affinity, by a carnal connexion having taken place with a male or female relation, whether in the first, or in the first and second, or in the second degree of his wife or her husband respectively; the occasion of the sin being removed, and a severe and salutary penance being enjoined, and sacramental confession once every month, for a period to be appointed according to thy judgment.

["'Eleventh. Of granting a dispensation with regard to a secret impediment of the first, also of the first and second, and of the second degree of affinity by itself, arising from unlawful connexion, when the question is concerning matrimony already contracted with that impediment existing. So, however, that if an affinity of this kind arises from connexion with the mother of the espoused woman, the birth of the espoused shall have preceded that connexion; the penitent being admonished of the necessity of a secret renewal of the compact with his supposed wife, or the woman with her supposed husband, or assured of the nullity of the former compact; but so cautiously that the delinquency shall by no means be made public; the cause of crime being removed, and a severe and salutary penance being enjoined, and sacramental confession once a month, for a period to be fixed by thy judgment.

["'Twelfth. Of granting dispensation with regard to the secret impediment of a crime, provided that it has occurred without any evil design, and the question is respecting matrimony already contracted; the supposed spouses being admonished of the necessity of a secret renewal of the bond, and a severe and salutary penance being enjoined, and sacramental confession once every month, for a period to be fixed by thy judgment.

["'Thirteenth. Likewise of granting dispensation concerning a secret irregularity contracted by a violation of censures, namely, with Priests, or those in holy orders, whether secular or regular.

["'It is our will, however, that thou shouldst be authorized to use the above-mentioned powers by licence from the proper Ordinary for three years only, from the date of these presents; and that thou shouldst abstain from granting absolution from cases reserved for the Ordinaries of the various places, unless power to do so is obtained from them.

["'Given at Rome, from our palace, on the ninth day of December, 1819.

["'(Signed) R. MAZIO,

["'Corrector of the Holy Church.'

["And on the reverse,

["'J. PIO,

["'Secretary of the Holy Penitentiary.'"*]

["* It is endorsed,

["'Tibi dilecto in Christo, ———, Salutem in Domino. Ex S. Pœnitentiaria Gratis.' (Probably for Gratia.)

["Its title within is,

["'Michael miseratione divina Episcopus Albanensis, S. R. E. Cardinalis de Petro, SS. DD. Papæ et sedis Apostolicæ Major Pœnitentiarius.'

["And then commences,

["'Tibi dilecto in Christo Confessario ab Ordinario loci ad excipiendas utriusque sexus sacramentales confessiones legitime approbato infrascriptas concedimus facultates, quibus, pro foro conscientiæ, et in sacramentali confessione, auctoritate apostolica, uti valeas, et non aliter; ita tamen ne debeas illas cuilibet manifestare; nisi necessitas aut utilitas id exegerit.

["'I. Absolvendi ab excommunicatione ob manus violentas injectas in Clericos, aut Presbyteros, sive sæculares, sive regulares, in casibus tamen non deductis, nec de facili ad Forum Ordinarii deducendis; dummodo non sit sequuta mors, vel mutilatio, seu lethale vulnus, aut ossium fractio; et injuncta congrua pœnitentia salutari, cum obligatione caute et competenter satisfaciendi parti læsæ.

["'II. Absolvendi a censuris contra duellantes inflictis, dummodo casus ad Forum Ordinarii non fuerint deducti: injuncta gravi pœnitentia salutari, et aliis injunctis, quæ fuerint de jure injungenda.

["'III. Absolvendi quoscumque pœnitentes sive viros, sive mulieres, (exceptis hæreticis publicis, sive publice dogmatizantibus,) a quibusvis sententiis, censuris, et pœnis ecclesiasticis ob hæreses tam nemine audiente, vel advertente; quam coram aliis externatas, ob infidelitatem, et Catholicæ fidei abjurationem private admissas, sortilegia, ac maleficia etiam cum sociis patrata, necnon ob dæmonis invocationem cum pacto donandi animam, eique præstitam idololatriam, ac superstitiones exercitas, ac demum ob quæcumque insinuata falsa dogmata incursis, postquam tamen pœnitens complices, si quos in præmissis habeat, Ordinario loci, vel Sacræ Inquisitionis ministro in locis, in quibus viget Sacræ Inquisitionis auctoritas.

["* A scuta or scudo is about four shillings sterling.

[It appears that on the 3d of May, 1822, some Popish laymen formed a Society at Lyons, having for its object to assist, by prayers and alms, the Roman Catholic Missionaries among foreign nations. Their bond of union consisted in the recital of a very short prayer every day, and a weekly subscription of one sous towards the support of the Missions. We are informed by the authorities of this institution, which is entitled, "L'Œuvre de la Propagation de la Foi," that it "has risen into maturity and strength. The grain of mustard-seed is grown into a great tree, and overshadows nations with its branches. The strenuous efforts made by various sectaries in these countries to disseminate their respective creeds; the continually-increasing demand for new Missionaries of the true faith; the urgent necessities of those who already labour there; the diminished resources of the Roman College 'De Propaganda Fide,' on whose support these Missions chiefly depend; and the cordial and grateful approbation of sovereign Pontiffs frequently expressed;—all operate to swell the number of the young Society." The supreme head of the Romish Church assures the members that "this Society for the Propagation of the Faith is, in the midst of the afflictions that oppress him, 'the consolation reserved to his heart; that its successes are his joy, and that he counts on the members of this Association for the support of the Missions.'* In the distribution of indulgences Popes can afford to be liberal; and hence the way in which they testify their approval of this Society, and also encourage it. Four, namely, Pius VII., Leo XII., Pius VIII., and Gregory XVI., have given it their approbation and many favours. On the 15th of March, 1823, Pius VII. granted for ever to its members in all the dioceses of France in which it was established, with the consent of the Ordinary, the following indulgences applicable to the souls in purgatory:—First, A plenary indulgence on the festivals of the finding of the holy cross, and of St. Francis Xavier, and once a month on whatever day each associate might choose, on condition of his reciting every day in that month the prayers indicated. To gain this indulgence, it is required that the person, being truly penitent, and having confessed, and received the holy communion, should visit devoutly the church or oratory of this institution, if there be one; but if not, that in his own parish; and there address fervent prayers to God for the prosperity of the Church, according to the intentions of the sovereign Pontiff. The indulgence attached to the two festivals above mentioned may be gained at the choice of each associate, either on the day of the festival, or on that of the octave, or, finally, on the day which the Ordinary of each diocess may have fixed for the celebration. Secondly, An indulgence of one hundred days every time that one recites the prescribed prayers, having at least a contrite heart, giving some alms in favour of the Missions, or exercising any other work of piety and charity. Thus a plenary indulgence can be gained fourteen times every year, and a partial indulgence many times each day.

prout de jure, denunciaverit: in aliis vero locis, facta a pœnitente seria promissione denunciationem peragendi cum primum, et meliori modo quo judicio tuo fieri poterit, coram Ordinario loci; et postquam, in singulis casibus hæreses coram te secrete abjuraverit, et pactum cum maledicto dæmone initum expresse revocaverit, tradita tibi syngrapha forsan exarata, aliisque mediis superstitiosis, ad omnia comburenda, injuncta pro modo excessuum gravi pœnitentia salutari cum frequentia sacramentorum, et obligatione se prudenti judicio tuo retractandi apud personas coram quibus hæreses manifestavit, et reparandi illata scandala.

["'IV. Absolvendi a censuris incursis ob violationem clausuræ Regularium utriusque sexus, dummodo non fuerit cum intentione ad malum finem, etiam effectu non sequuto, et dummodo casus non fuerint ad Forum Ordinarii deducti; cum congrua pœnitentia salutari. Et insuper absolvendi mulieres tantum a censuris, et pœnis ecclesiasticis, ob violationem ad malum finem clausuræ virorum Religiosorum incursis, dummodo tamen casus occulti remaneant; injuncta gravi pœnitentia salutari, cum prohibitione accedendi ad ecclesiam, et conventum, seu cœnobium dictorum Religiosorum, durante occasione peccandi.

["'V. Absolvendi a censuris ob retentionem et lectionem librorum prohibitorum incursis, postquam tamen pœnitens libros prohibitos, quos in sua potestate retineat, Ordinario loci, seu alii, cui de jure consignaverit, vel consignandos, tibi dederit; injuncta congrua pœnitentia salutari.

["'VI. Absolvendi a casu Sedi Apostolicæ reservato ob accepta munera a Regularibus utriusque sexus; injuncta pœnitentia, et quando agitur de muneribus infra valorem decem scutorum, aliqua eleemosyna judicio tuo taxanda, et caute eroganda, cum primum poterit, in beneficium religionis, cui facienda esset restitutio; dummodo tamen non constet, quod illa fuerint de bonis propriis religionis: quatenus vero accepta munera vel fuerint ultra valorem scutorum decem, vel constet fuisse de bonis propriis religionis, facta prius restitutione, quam si de præsenti adimplere nequeat, præstita in tuis manibus obligatione restituendi intra terminum tuo arbitrio præfiniendum, alias sub re incidentia.

["'VII. Absolvendi Religiosos cujuscumque Ordinis, (exceptis monialibus, nisi fueris pro ipsis ab Ordinario loci approbatus vel deputatus,) non solum a præmissis, sed etiam a casibus, et censuris in sua religione reservatis.

["'VIII. Commutandi, consideratis causis, omnia vota simplicia, in alia pœnitentiæ, seu pietatis opera: exceptis quinque votis Sedi Apostolicæ reservatis, scilicet castitatis, et religionis, ac trium peregrinationum, nempe ad sacra SS. Apostolorum limina, ad S. Jacobum in Compostellis, et ad Jerusalem; necnon votis pœnalibus ad sese arcendum a peccatis; et insuper voto non ludendi; ac votis, in quibus agitur de præjudicio, vel de jure tertii.

["'IX. Dispensandi ad petendum debitum conjugale cum transgressore voti castitatis, qui matrimonium cum dicto voto contraxerit: monendo hujusmodi pœnitentem, ad idem votum servandum teneri, tam extra licitum usum matrimonii, quam si marito seu uxori respective supervixerit.

["'X. Dispensandi cum incestuoso, sive incestuosa, ad petendum debitum conjugale, cujus jus amisit ex superveniente occulta affinitate per copulam carnalem habitam cum consanguinea, vel consanguineo, sive in primo, sive in primo et secundo, sive in secundo gradu suæ uxoris, seu respective mariti: remota occasione peccandi; et injuncta gravi pœnitentia salutari, et confessione sacramentali semel quolibet mense, per tempus arbitrio tuo statuendum.

["'XI. Dispensandi super occulto impedimento primi, necnon primi et secundi, ac secundi tantum gradus affinitatis provenientis ex illicita copula, quando agatur de matrimonio cum dicto impedimento jam contracto: ita tamen, ut, si hujusmodi affinitas proveniat ex copula cum matre desponsatæ, nativitas desponsatæ copulam ipsam antecedat: monito pœnitente de necessaria secreta renovatione consensus cum sua putata uxore, vel suo putato marito, certiorato seu certiorata de nullitate prioris consensus, sed ita caute, ut ipsius delictum nusquam detegatur: remota occasione peccandi; atque injuncta gravi pœnitentia salutari, et confessione sacramentali semel in mense, per tempus arbitrio tuo statuendum.

["'XII. Dispensandi super impedimento occulto criminis dummodo sit absque ulla machinatione, et agatur de matrimonio jam contracto: monitis putatis conjugibus de necessaria secreta renovatione consensus; ac injuncta gravi pœnitentia salutari, et confessione sacramentali semel quolibet mense, per tempus arbitrio statuendum.

["'XIII. Item dispensandi super occulta irregularitate contracta ex violatione censurarum, dumtaxat cum Sacerdotibus, vel in sacris ordinibus constitutis, tam sæcularibus, quam regularibus.

["'Volumus tamen, ut supradictis facultatibus de licentia proprii Ordinarii uti valeas tantummodo per triennium, a data præsentium computandum; et abstineas absolvere a casibus reservatis locorum Ordinariis, nisi facultatem ab iisdem obtinueris.

["'Datum Romæ ex Ædibus Nostris, die 9 Decembri, 1819.

["'(Signed) R. Mazio,

["'S. E. Corrector.'

["And on the reverse,

["'(Signed) J. Pio,

["'S. Pœnitentiariæ Secretarius.'—M'Gavin's Protestant, vol. iii., pp. 338—343.]

[* Annals of the Propagation of the Faith, a periodical Collection of Letters from the Bishops and Missionaries employed in the Missions of the Old and New World. This Collection serves as a continuation of the Lettres Edifiantes, vol. i., p. iii., et seq. London, 1840.

[" Leo XII., who paid particular attention to the Institution for the Propagation of the Faith, recommends 'with all his soul in the Lord, to all Christians to favour it; and he embraces all its members in his paternal charity.' These are his words. Moreover, by a rescript of the 11th of May, 1824, he has dispensed sick or infirm subscribers from the visit to the parish church prescribed by Pope Pius VII. for gaining the plenary indulgence, provided, following the advice of their Confessor, they endeavour to accomplish the other conditions required.* Finally, by rescripts of the 18th of September, 1829, and of the 29th of September, 1831, the Popes Pius VIII. and Gregory XVI. (the present Pontiff) confirmed all the indulgences above announced, and extended them to all the faithful of both sexes 'who will unite themselves to the Institution established in France, and fulfil the required conditions in whatever country they may live.' "†]

The following Bull of Pope Leo XII., issued in the year 1824, in reference to the observance of the jubilee for the year 1825, will serve to show that the practice of Rome is in reality as erroneous as it ever was, in reference to the doctrine of indulgences. "We have resolved," says Leo, "by virtue of the authority given to us from heaven, fully to unlock that sacred treasure, composed of the merits, sufferings, and virtues of Christ our Lord, and of his virgin mother, and of all the saints, which the Author of human salvation has intrusted to our dispensation. To you, therefore, venerable brethren, Patriarchs, Primates, Archbishops, Bishops, it belongs to explain with perspicuity the power of indulgences, what is their efficacy in the remission, not only of canonical penance, but also of the temporal punishment due to the divine justice for past sin, and what succour is afforded out of this heavenly treasure, from the merits of Christ and his saints, to such as have departed real penitents in God's love, yet before they had duly satisfied by fruits worthy of penance for sins of commission and omission, and are now purifying in the fire of purgatory, that an entrance may be opened for them into their eternal country, where nothing defiled is admitted."

["The wealth which has flowed into the lap of Rome, in exchange for indulgences, is incalculable. Even in the decline of her influence, she still looks for a considerable part of her revenues from this source: to which also she owes the degree of subjection in which she keeps the Roman Catholic Governments. My unfortunate native country," says Mr. White, "shows the nature and extent of this influence in a striking manner. I have already mentioned the Bull of the Crusade, through which the barter of indulgences and dispensations for money is carried on in a manner worthy of the darkest ages. The Spanish Government has two or three paltry fortresses on the coast of Africa, which are employed as places of punishment for criminals. The existence of a few soldiers in these garrisons is construed into a perpetual war against the infidels, with whom, in the mean time, the King of Spain is mostly at peace, from inability to oppose to them an effectual resistance. The See of Rome, which wants but a slight pretext to spiritualize whatever may open a market for its wares, calls this state of things between the Spaniards and the Africans 'a perpetual war against infidels;' which being, according to the principles of that See, a meritorious Christian act, deserves its pastoral encouragement. For this purpose every year are printed Summaries of a Papal Bull, which the Spaniards purchase at different prices, according to their rank and wealth, in order to enjoy the indulgences and privileges granted by the Pope in exchange for their alms. The benefits to be derived from the possession of one of these Bulls are several plenary indulgences, and leave to eat, during Lent, milk, eggs, and butter, which are otherwise forbidden, under pain of mortal sin, at that season. The sale of these privileges having been found most valuable and extensive, a second, third, and even a fourth, Bull, of a similar kind, were devised. 'The flesh Bull,' as it is called in Spain, allows the purchasers to eat meat during Lent, every Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, and Thursday, except in Passion-Week. The third Bull is called 'the compounding Bull.' By possessing one of these documents, and giving a certain sum, at the discretion of any Priest authorized to hear confessions, to the fund of the Holy Crusade, any property may be kept, which, having been obtained by robbery and extortion, cannot be traced to its right owners for restitution. This composition with the Pope and the King, is made by depositing the sum appointed by the Confessor in an iron chest fixed outside the doors of churches: a comfortable resource indeed for the tender consciences of peculators and extortioners, two very numerous classes in Spain. The fourth Bull is to be purchased for the benefit of the deceased, and is called 'the defunct Bull.' The name of any dead person being entered on the Bull, a plenary indulgence is, by this means, believed to be conveyed to his soul, if suffering in purgatory. To secure, however, a double sale, the three latter Bulls are made of no effect, unless the original Summary of the Crusade be possessed by the person who wishes to enjoy the dispensations and privileges therein set forth. It is also a very common practice to bury these Bulls with the corpses of those whom they are intended to benefit. The tax thus levied upon the people of Spain is divided between the King and the Pope: yet it is not the money which, in this and similar transactions, proves most beneficial to Rome; the habit of spiritual dependence which it supports among the Spaniards is, no doubt, its most valuable result to that See. The Spanish Cortes, who were bold enough to reduce the tithes by one-half, when struggling hard to shake off the silent yet formidable influence of the Pope, found their power inadequate to the task; well knowing, that were he to withdraw one of these Bulls, the mass of the people would instantly rise against them. I have selected this fact among thousands, that prove the accession of power which the doctrine of indulgences produces to the See of Rome." *

["The system of taxation pursued at this day by Rome, with regard to her spiritual subjects spread over the world, appears in the Memoirs of Dr. Villanueva, a learned dignitary of the Church of Spain, whose adherence to the late Constitution has deprived him of his honours and emoluments in Spain, and forced him to live an exile in London.

[* Glance at the Institution of the Propagation of the Faith, (L'Œuvre de la Propagation de la Foi,) and at the Motives to induce all good (Roman) Catholics to sustain and extend it, pp. 44, 45. London, 1837.

[† "Other testimonies of His Holiness's approbation have since been given. The precious relics of St. Exuperius lately discovered in the Roman Catacombs have been sent, adorned in the richest manner, to the church of the Council at Lyons, to remain there 'as a public and solemn pledge of His Holiness's goodwill and gratitude for the services rendered to Catholicity by this Association.' "

[* White's Practical and Internal Evidence against Catholicism, pp. 83—86. London, 1826.

[" The Cortes of 1820 appointed a Committee of their Members to propose a plan of reform on points of ecclesiastical discipline. Dr. Villanueva, the leading Member, and Reporter of that Committee, gives, in his own Memoirs, the following curious facts relating to the pecuniary demands of Rome on the Spaniards.*

[" The Report recommended, that to the annual contribution of three hundred and fifty thousand reals, paid by Spain, towards the repairs of the churches of St. Peter, and St. John of Lateran, an addition of two hundred thousand reals should be made, for the present, and till the nation should be allowed, by circumstances, to think of a further increase of that yearly tribute. In the mean time the Pope was entreated to accept this sum as a composition of all demands on individual Spaniards for Bulls, dispensations, &c.

[" This Report was agreed to by the Cortes, and a law made in consequence, prohibiting any remittances of money to Rome. The note written by the Pope's Minister, on that occasion, deserves particular attention :—'His Holiness,' said Cardinal Gonsalvi, 'has been surprised at the contents of your note, not only on account of its object, but of the principles it lays down. He could not suspect that Spain, a nation so thoroughly Catholic, could, without any previous communication with the Holy See, pass a law forbidding all payment for dispensations, and appointing instead thereof nine thousand dollars, and that, not to fulfil the duty of contributing towards its dignity, but only as a free-will offering.' The note then proceeds to state, that every Spanish family contributes to the Holy See only at the rate of between two to three pence per annum ; that the payment of such contributions is grounded on the most sacred rights, and that His Holiness will never submit to the decree of the Cortes.

[" Dr. Villanueva, in answer to this note, collects from Spanish history the complaints made by the ancient Cortes, on the incessant and exorbitant exactions of Rome. He reminds the Pope of the enormous sums which 'exhausted, spoiled, dilapidated Spain' had poured into his lap. He refers to the detail of those sums, as it appears, officially, in one of the documents appended to the Report of the Ecclesiastical Committee, dated March, 1821. It is therein shown, that from the year 1537 to 1820, the regular contribution of three hundred and fifty thousand reals above mentioned, had been paid by the Government of Spain. The annual sums paid by private individuals, during that period, might be conjectured from the fact, that from 1814 to August, 1820, the payment for Bulls exceeded five millions of reals ; and the cost of dispensations for marrying within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity, affinity, and spiritual relationship,† was more than four-and-twenty millions of the same money.

[" The account which Dr. Villanueva gives of the tariff of prices for this sort of dispensations, as negotiated by the Spanish Ambassador Azara in 1781, shows the principles on which the Roman laws are made and dispensed with. The price of the dispensation rises in proportion to the proximity of the relationship, and the absence of a sufficient plea for obtaining it. In this manner, a dispensation, which, with a cause, is valued at nine hundred and thirty-six reals, without a cause rises to twelve thousand and thirty-six reals and fourteen maravedis : another, which, with a reasonable cause, amounts to fifteen hundred and seventy reals and twelve maravedis, if wantonly and causelessly granted, must be paid at the rate of thirty-two thousand one hundred and thirty reals and one maravedi. Thus His Holiness expects to be rewarded in proportion to the degree of liberty he takes with the ordinances of his infallible Church, and calculates that the unreasonableness of one of his usual grants may be such, as to require that the pecuniary motive shall be increased from fourteen reals (about two shillings, the price of a certain dispensation, with a cause) to thirty-two thousand reals, or £320."*]

What traveller in Roman Catholic countries does not report concerning the various gross indulgences, notices of which are set up on every church-door, and in the most public places ? [We refer to the following as the record of a modern traveller :—

[" Plenary indulgence and remission of sins are liberally offered here on very easy terms. I was at first rather startled with the prodigal manner in which that full pardon of all transgressions which the Gospel promises ..... was bestowed at Rome, in consideration of repeating certain prayers before the shrine of certain saints, or paying a certain sum of money to certain Priests.

[" I was surprised to find scarcely a church in Rome that did not hold up at the door, the tempting inscription of Indulgenzia plenaria. Two hundred days' indulgence I thought a great reward for every kiss bestowed upon the great black cross in the Coliseum ; but that is nothing to the indulgences for ten, twenty, and even thirty thousands of years, that may be bought, at no exorbitant rate, in many of the churches ;† so that it is amazing what a vast quantity of treasure may be amassed in the other world with very little industry in this, by those who are avaricious of this spiritual wealth, into which, indeed, the dross or riches of this world may be converted with the happiest facility imaginable. We are told that 'it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God ;' but in Rome, at least, it would seem to be difficult, nay, impossible, to keep a rich man out."‡]

IV. How indulgences apply to the dead.

Several curious questions are proposed and solved by Roman Catholic Divines, respecting the manner in which indulgences are applicable to the departed.

Dens asserts that there is a difference between an indulgence for the dead and one for the living ; that for the living being not only solutio, "a solution," or "loosing," but also an absolution ; while that for the dead is only a solution, and not an absolution.

He affirms, also, that indulgences may be available to souls in purgatory, because, 1. Private Christians can apply to these their own satisfactions, while the Pope

[" * See Vida Literaria de Don Joaquin Lorenzo Villanueva. 2 vols. London, 1825.

[" † The baptismal sponsors, the child baptized, and the parents of the child, become spiritually related, according to the doctrine of the Church of Rome.

[* Blanco White's Practical and Internal Evidence against Catholicism, pp. 259—261.]

[" † You may buy as many masses as will free your soul from purgatory for twenty-nine thousand years at the church of St. John Lateran, on the festival of that saint ; at Santa Bibiana, on All-Souls'-Day, for seven thousand years ; at a church near the Basilica of St. Paul, and at another on the Quirinal Hill, the names of both of which I have unluckily forgotten, for ten thousand and for three thousand years, and at a very reasonable rate. But it is vain to particularize ; for the greater part of the principal churches in Rome and the neighbourhood are spiritual shops for the sale of the same commodity."

[‡ Rome in the Nineteenth Century, vol. ii., Letter xlii., pp. 253—255. Edinburgh, 1820.]

alone can render effectual to them the satisfactions of Christ and of the saints, from the treasury of the Church. 2. The Pope can vouchsafe indulgences for the living, and consequently for the dead, inasmuch as they are members of the same body.*

It has been a subject of severe controversy among the Romanists, whether indulgences are infallibly applied to the dead when awarded in their favour by the living. Bonacina, Neesen, Billuart, &c., deny this. Sylvius, Steyaert, Daelman, Collet, Dens, and Leo X., affirm it.† Leo says, "that all the living as well as the dead, who truly obtain indulgences, are liberated from so much temporal punishment due for their actual sins according to the divine justice, as is equivalent to the indulgence conceded and obtained."

In cases where the soul is lost or happy, the fruit of the indulgence is to go into the common treasury, or is applied to other souls, or to the more indigent or worthy among the living. ‡

It is disputed whether the Pope judicially applies the indulgences to the dead, or whether he does it in a different manner. §

It is a matter of controversy whether it is more meritorious to apply an indulgence to the dead or to one's self.*

We give insertion to the above solely for the purpose of exhibiting the foolish trifling into which the unhallowed doctrine of indulgences leads.

[On the manner in which indulgences are applicable to the dead, Andrew Willet has the following observations, in which he states the opinions of certain Popish authorities, and afterwards refutes the errors into which they have fallen. He says, "First, Papists affirm, 'that the Pope may judicially absolve the souls in purgatory, and that they do belong unto his jurisdiction, and so he may extend his indulgences unto them, as unto the living.' Bellarmine, with other Papists, misliketh this opinion; who deny not, 'but that the Pope may apply indulgences to the dead, but not judicially, or as exercising any jurisdiction over them.'†

["Secondly, Bellarmine affirmeth, that indulgences are profitable to the dead, per modum suffragii, 'after the manner of the suffrage' of the Church, that as the suffrage or prayer of the Church do help, by way of merit, impetration, satisfaction; so indulgences are granted to the dead, as they are satisfactory, and so per modum suffragii tantum satisfactorii, 'after the manner of a suffrage as it is satisfactory.'‡

["Thirdly, Some of them think that indulgences do profit the dead, ex condigno, 'of condignity' and worthiness. Others of them rather think, that indulgences are not available for the dead, otherwise than by the mercy of God, and so of congruity rather than of condignity; so Cajetanus, Petrus a Soto, Cordubensis, to whom Bellarmine subscribeth: their reason is, because one living cannot satisfy for another of condignity, much less for the dead. §

["Fourthly, To apply indulgences to the dead, there is required a supreme and high authority; and therefore Bishops, and other inferior Prelates, cannot apply indulgences to the dead, but only the Pope. ‖

["Fifthly, The Pope cannot deliver at his pleasure, souls out of purgatory; but there must be some particular, just cause belonging to the glory of God, and the profit of the Church, &c. A general cause is not sufficient; for then Christ himself should have delivered all the souls already out of purgatory. ¶

["Sixthly, Indulgences directly belong to the living;

[* "Estne aliqua differentia inter indulgentiam pro vivis et pro defunctis?—R. Affirmative; in eo scilicet, quod indulgentia pro vivis non solum sit solutio, sed etiam absolutio, indulgentia autem pro defunctis est solum solutio, non absolutio. Probatur: quia licet Prelatus Ecclesiæ concedens indulgentias offerat et porrigat Deo ex thesauro Ecclesiæ satisfactiones æquales pœnis per indulgentias relaxandis, sicut, v. g., dum pro incarcerato propter debita solvitur ex bonis communibus ob illum finem relictis, attamen etiam in indulgentia pro vivis ulterius nomine Christi easdem satisfactiones acceptat et applicat, sicque consideratione earum remittit pœnas debitas, quod nihil aliud est quam absolutio seu remissio judicialis vel auctoritativa, quæ exerceri non potest in defunctos, cum Prelatus Ecclesiæ in eos nullam jurisdictionem habeat; unde indulgentia pro defunctis non est absolutio, sed mera solutio; hinc dici solet, quod indulgentiæ defunctis applicari possint per modum suffragii.

["An indulgentiæ possunt applicari et prodesse animabus in purgatorio pro liberatione a pœnis?—R. Certum hoc omnino est: 1. Quia fideles privati possunt applicare animabus in purgatorio satisfactiones suas: ergo Pontifex potest eis applicare satisfactiones Christi et sanctorum ex thesauro Ecclesiæ. 2. Potest Pontifex applicare indulgentias vivis: ergo etiam defunctis, cum sint ejusdem corporis membra; unde dicit S. Thom. loco cit. in Corp., 'Non est aliqua ratio, quare Ecclesia transferre possit communia merita, quibus indulgentiæ innituntur, in vivos, et non in mortuos.' 3. Idem, probatur ex praxi et traditione Ecclesiæ. Vide Bellarm. de Indulgentiis, lib. i., cap. xiv."—Dens Theologia, tom. vi.; De Indulgentiis, No. 39; De Indulgentiis pro Defunctis.]

[† "An indulgentiæ pro defunctis infallibiliter habeant suum effectum?—R. Negant Bonacina, Neesen, Billuart, &c., quia indulgentiæ defunctis tantum prosunt per modum suffragii, hoc est auxilii, seu per modum ablatæ solutionis; adeoque quod prosint, tantum innititur Dei misericordiæ, qui utique non tenetur solutionem ex thesauro Ecclesiæ a Pontifice sibi pro mortuis exhibitam acceptare.

["Affirmant Sylvius, Steyaert, Daelman, et Collet: quia cum Ecclesiæ concessa sit potestas conferendi indulgentias tam mortuis quam vivis, ita videtur dicendum, quod sicut vivi, ita etiam mortui consequantur infallibiliter, positis ponendis, earum effectum: quod confirmat Leo X., in Epist. ad Cajetanum, ubi non distinguit inter efficaciam indulgentiæ pro vivis et pro defunctis, sed dicit utrosque a pœna temporali liberari secundum divinam institutionem."—Dens Theologia, tom. vi., De Indulgentiis, No. 40.]

[‡ "Quid fit, dum anima illa, cui indulgentiæ applicantur, damnata est, vel jam beata?—R. Tunc fructus ille vel cedit in communem thesaurum Ecclesiæ, vel aliis animabus applicatur juxta judicia Dei nobis incognita; v. g., magis indigentibus, vel iis, quæ in terris existentes id specialiter meruerunt per opera misericordiæ tum vivis, tum defunctis impensa: porro observant hic aliqui, applicantem recte facturum faciendo secundam applicationem conditionatam, si forte prior applicatio effectum sortiri non possit."—Idem.]

[§ "An indulgentia tam defunctis quam vivis applicata sit actus jurisdictionis clavium?—R. Affirmative: nam quamvis indulgentia pro defunctis non sit actus jurisdictionis in subditos sicut est indulgentia concessa pro vivis, cum in indulgentia pro defunctis solum offeratur Deo pretium sufficiens, ut Deus pœnam remittat; in indulgentia pro vivis autem remittitur pœna a concedente illam tanquam a judice locum Dei tenente: est tamen ipsa indulgentia pro defunctis actus jurisdictionis ad bona communia, id est, ad thesaurum Ecclesiæ dispensandum."—Idem.]

[* "Petitur, utrum sit magis meritorium indulgentias defunctis quam sibi applicare, in supposito, quod indulgentia sit libera, hoc est, quod vi Bullæ sibi vel defunctis applicari possit?—R. Juxta communiorem sententiam affirmative: probatur, 1. Quia, ubi major est charitas, ibi etiam majus est meritum; atqui major est charitas dare bona sua proximo, qui patitur, ut liberetur ab illa pœna, quam sibi illa reservare; ergo majus bonum est lucrari indulgentias defunctis, ut liberentur a pœnis, quam sibi applicare. 2. Nunquam aliquis plus meretur, quam dum alterum juvando seipsum exponit periculo patiendi; sic Apost., ad Philip., cap. i., v. 23, ardenter desiderabat regnum cœlorum, ex cujus dilatione multum certo patiebatur; amabat tamen pro salute fratrum hic permanere: deinde non magna virtus est dare pauperibus ex superfluo status, sed major est dare ex necessario status. 3. S. Thom., lib. iii., contra Gentes, dicit: 'Affectio in eo, qui pro amico patitur, facit magis satisfactionem acceptam Deo, quam si pro se pateretur; hoc enim est promptæ charitatis, illud autem necessitatis.'"—Idem.]

["† Bellarm. Opera, tom. vii.; De Indulg., lib. i., c. xiv., qu. 2, col. 460. Colon., 1617.

["‡ Ibid., cap. xiv., qu. 3.

["§ Ibid., cap. xiv., qu. 4.

["‖ Ibid., cap. xiv., qu. 5.

["¶ Ibid., cap. xiv., qu. 5.

indirectly to the dead, no otherwise than as the living do perform the works enjoined for the dead.*

["Seventhly, Indulgences do not profit the dead in common, otherwise than as they rejoice one for another's good; but only those souls are delivered thereby, to whom they are particularly intended.†

["Eighthly, The Pope may release unto a man living, by indulgence, the pain of purgatory, which otherwise he were subject unto.‡

["Ninthly, Concerning the greatness of the pain of purgatory, Bellarmine thinketh, that though it be greater than all the pains of this life, yet the voluntary punishment of this life is more effectual for the expiation of sin, than the more grievous pain of purgatory; because this is a time of mercy, that of justice: others do think contrary, that one day of pain in purgatory is more available than many years of most severe penance in this life.§

["Protestants reply, 1. That the Pope hath no power to extend his indulgences any way at all to the dead, either judicially, by way of absolution, or indulgently, by way of dispensation; for the Scripture is evident, 'Whatsoever ye bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven.' (Matt. xviii. 18.) Gelasius urgeth these words: super terram, 'upon the earth:' in hac ligatione defunctum nusquam dixit absolvi; 'he nowhere saith, that a man dying being bound, can afterwards be absolved.' And whereas Bellarmine telleth us, that this is spoken only of judicial absolution: the words are general of all binding and loosing, that it must be done upon earth, and therefore cannot be extended to them which are dead.

["2. Yet, contrary to this doctrine of Bellarmine, the Pope taketh upon him as a Judge, to absolve and condemn the dead. (1.) Because he doth excommunicate the dead, which, although Bellarmine saith is nothing else but a declaration of that sentence which should have been pronounced while they lived; yet it is evident by their own law, that indulgentiæ non prosunt non subditis, 'indulgences, absolutions (and so, consequently, ligations, excommunications) do not profit (and so likewise disprofit or prejudice) them that are no subjects.'‖ Wherefore, if the dead be not subject to the Pope's jurisdiction, the sentence of excommunication or absolution doth not bind or loose them. (2.) It is Bellarmine's own position, Ut indulgentiæ dentur, requiritur jurisdictio: 'That indulgences may be granted, there is required a jurisdiction.'¶ If the Pope then have no jurisdiction over the dead, he can grant no indulgences unto them. (3.) One of their own Doctors saith: Animæ existentes in purgatorio, sunt de jurisdictione Papæ: 'Souls being in purgatory, are of the Pope's jurisdiction.' (4.) And though they will not be bound to the opinion of one Doctor, yet they cannot refuse the judgment of the Pope. Clemens VI. thus saith in his Bull, Mandamus angelis paradisi: 'We command the angels of paradise,' to carry the souls delivered out of purgatory to the glory of paradise, &c. If the Pope then do command angels, and so do exercise jurisdiction over them, much more over purgatory souls: the Pope then cannot give indulgence but where he hath jurisdiction; but their new Doctors, ashamed of the grossness of the elder Papists, allow the Pope no jurisdiction over the dead; then consequently he cannot grant them any indulgence.

["Secondly. 1. We deny the suffrages and the prayers of the living are satisfactory for one another, but only deprecatory and impetratory; for prayer receiveth all the force thereof from faith: 'The prayer of faith:' (James v. 15:) and faith is grounded upon grace and favour; as the Apostle saith, 'By grace are ye saved through faith.' (Eph. ii. 8.) It is one thing to pray and intreat, another to satisfy; as Origen showeth the difference: Cæteri precibus, peccata Christus solus potestate dimisit: 'Others by prayers, Christ by his power only remitteth sins.'* If then we cannot satisfy by our prayers for the living, much less for the dead.

["2 Some of the Papists do think, that indulgences do not profit the dead, but sola vi suffragiorum, 'only by the force of suffrages or prayers.' If indulgences then are not available but by prayer, indulgences are superfluous and needless. But I have showed before, that neither prayers profit for the dead.

["Thirdly. 1. If an indulgence be an application of Christ's merits, it must needs be available ex condigno, 'of condignity;' for Christ, I trust, hath worthily satisfied, and done all necessary things to our redemption. 'Thou art worthy.' (Rev. v. 9.) 2. A satisfaction must be ex condigno, 'of condignity' or worthiness; for how can a man facere satis, 'satisfy,' that is, fully content, if he do it not sufficiently? An acceptation is not properly a satisfaction: the one is of favour, the other of debt: 'To him that worketh, the wages is not counted by favour, but by debt.' (Rom. iv. 4.) But satisfaction is a work; therefore what is due unto it is by debt; and so of condignity: congruity is of favour. 3. But we affirm, that neither indulgences nor any other works of the living do benefit the dead at all; and so neither of congruity nor condignity. 'They that die in the Lord, their works follow them:' (Rev. xiv. 13:) their own works, and not any bodies' else. Multum utile et necessarium est, ut peccatorum reatus ante ultimum diem Sacerdotali supplicatione solvatur: 'It is very profitable and necessary, that the guilt of sins should be loosed by the supplication of the Priest before the last day;' that is, the day of death, &c.: if it be necessary before, then it cometh too late afterward.

["Fourthly. 1. That the Pope hath no more jurisdiction in the Church than other Bishops in their diocess, I have showed before in the confutation of a former error, so that I need not repeat the same here. 2. If the Pope have no jurisdiction at all over the souls in purgatory, and so no more than any other Prelate hath, he hath no more authority to confer indulgences upon them than others. 3. All the authority that St. Peter had was to feed his sheep; when Christ said, Pasce oves, 'Feed my sheep.' (John xxi.) But the souls in purgatory are not his sheep, because they cannot be fed, as Bellarmine confesseth: 'Therefore neither Peter, nor the Pope from Peter, can challenge any prerogative more than other over the dead.'† 4. That prerogative which Peter had over hell, when Christ said, 'Hell shall not prevail against ["* Bellarm., cap. xiv., qu. 5.

["† Ibid., cap. xiv., qu. 6.

["‡ Bellarm. Opera, De Indulg., lib. i., cap. vi., resp. ad object. 1.

["§ Bellarm., De Indulg., lib. i., cap. ix.

[‖ "Quod autem consuluisti, utrum remissiones, quæ fiunt in dedicationibus ecclesiarum, aut conferentibus ad ædificationem pontium, aliis prosint, quam his, qui remittentibus subsunt; hoc volumus tuam fraternitatem tenere, quod eum a non suo judice ligari nullus valeat, vel absolvi, remissiones prædictas prodesse illis tantummodo arbitramur, quibus ut prosint, proprii judices specialiter indulserunt.

["Item, remissiones vel indulgentiæ illis tantum prosunt qui remittenti vel indulgenti subsunt."—Decretal. Gregorii, lib. v., De Pœnit. et Remiss., tit. xxxviii., cap. iv. Fol. Taurini, 1621.

["¶ Bellarm., De Indulg., lib. i., cap. xiv., qu. 3.

["* Origen. Opera, tom. ii., in Numeros, hom. xxiv., fol. edit Bened., Paris, 1733.

["† Bellarm., De Indulg., lib. i., cap. xiv., qu. 2.

it,' (Matt. xvi. 18,) was given to his faith and confession, and so is common to all the faithful; as Ambrose well expoundeth: Non de carne Petri, sed de fide dictum est, quia portæ mortis non prevalebunt, sed confessio vicit infernum: 'Not of the flesh of Peter, but of his faith, it was said, the gates of hell shall not prevail, &c.: his confession overcame hell.'

["Fifthly. 1. If the Pope cannot deliver all souls out of purgatory, then is one of your great Doctors proved a liar and a false prophet: Papa si vellet posset totum purgatorium evacuare: 'The Pope if he would, could evacuate and empty all purgatory.' 2. But what particular cause, I pray you, doth move the Pope to deliver some souls, more than other? Hath he some special revelation, to know the particular needs of the purgatory souls? or is not the general cause of Christ's glory in sending so many souls to be angels' fellows, to be preferred before the Pope's particular cause, in bringing so many angels to his purse? For if they would speak plainly, this is the particular cause that moveth the Pope, when he or his are particularly waged and fee-ed, to deliver some particular souls. 3. Wherefore this old objection against the Pope's purgatory is not yet answered: that if the Pope can deliver all souls at once, and will not, he is uncharitable; if he would, and cannot, then St. Peter's keys do fail, and are not available. 4. But concerning your respect of particular cause, Clemens VI. derideth it; for he in his Bull giveth authority cruce signatis, 'to those that took upon them the cross,' ut tres vel quatuor animas, quas vellet, 'to deliver out of purgatory three or four souls, which they would,' &c.: this power was left to the liberty of their will, not tied to the necessity of the cause. 5. And do you doubt whether Christ hath cleared purgatory? You say, that by his descent he harrowed hell, and delivered all the Patriarchs: hath he done less for believers since his death, than for those which before, by faith, expected his death? The Apostle saith, 'The blood of Christ doth cleanse us from all sin.' (1 John i. 7.) What remaineth then to be cleansed in purgatory? St. Ambrose saith, Qui hic non acceperit remissionem peccatorum, illic non erit, quia vita æterna remissio peccatorum est: 'He that hath not received here the remission of sins, shall not be there,' that is, in heaven; 'for eternal life is the remission of sins.'* He then that hath here received remission of sins, is presently in heaven, and so not in purgatory: he that hath not, shall never come to heaven, and so is in hell.

["Sixthly. 1. It is strange doctrine, that satisfactory works may be enjoined (upon) the living in behalf of the dead. Bellarmine himself reporteth this to have been an erroneous practice of the Montanists and Marcionites, to baptize the living in the name of the dead; to the which custom some think St. Paul had relation, where he saith, 'Why are they then baptized for the dead?' (1 Cor. xv. 29.) But if a man may pray and fast, and give alms for the dead, why not also be baptized for them? 2. The disciples, when Dorcas was dead, did not undertake any works for her of theirs, but only showed her own works, 'the coats and garments which she had made;' (Acts ix. 39;) whereof St. Cyprian saith, Non pro defuncta suis vocibus, sed ipsius operibus deprecantes: 'Not making request for the dead with their voices, but with her works.'† And again: Confiteantur singuli quæso vos fratres dilectissimi, delictum suum, dum adhuc, qui deliquit, in sæculo est, dum admitti confessio ejus potest, dum satisfactio et remissio per Sacerdotem facta apud Dominum grata est: 'Confess, beloved brethren, I pray you, every one his fault, while he that sinned is yet in the world, while his confession may be admitted, while satisfaction and remission given by the Priest are accepted with God.'* Ergo, satisfaction done afterward, is not accepted.

["Seventhly. 1. What reason have you to think that your limbus was emptied all at once at Christ's coming, and that purgatory shall be but successively (gradually) cleared, and one after another delivered? If some are freed, while others fry in purgatory, because of some particular prayers, the same reason may be alleged for the fathers that were in limbus, that they also might have been holpen by particular prayers. If you say, Christ was not then come, and therefore hell could not be harrowed; so neither is Christ yet come to judgment, before which time you say all purgatory shall not be cleansed. 2. To see others exempted from pain, and themselves still in bondage, it can be no great joy. The Scripture saith, 'There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when they see all the Prophets in the kingdom of God, and yourselves thrust out at the doors.' (Luke xiii. 28.) The beholding then of other men's felicity doth not minister joy, but increase torment to them that are still in misery. 3. And why are not the common prayers of the whole Church for all souls, as effectual to deliver all, as particular prayers are of some to deliver their friends? What letteth then, but all souls should be let loose by common prayers? unless it be this, as the truth is, then the Pope should want utterance for his jubilee pardons, and soul-Priests for their masses for the dead. 4. That all the souls of the faithful and just men (for as for unbelievers, they have their part in the lake, Apocal. xxi. 8) are altogether in heaven, the Apostle witnesseth: 'We are come to celestial Jerusalem, to the congregation of the first-born,' &c., 'to the spirits of just and perfect men.' (Heb. xii. 22.) I ask, where these just men are, if not in celestial Jerusalem? They are, then, all out of purgatory. St. Cyprian saith: Ad refrigerium justi vocantur, ad supplicium rapiuntur injusti; datur velocius tutela fidentibus, perfidis pœna: 'The just are called to rest and refreshing, the unjust are haled to pain; pardon is quickly given to the believing, to the perfidious, pain.'† All men then are either just or unjust; the just are speedily carried to heaven, the unjust to punishment; no just men then are out of heaven, nor none unjust shall come thither. 5. If the Pope know how to deliver some, and not all, out of purgatory, he hath not St. Peter's spirit, of whom St. Ambrose thus saith: Hic est Petrus, qui respondit pro cæteris Apostolis, &c., quia novit non solum proprium sed commune servare, &c.: 'This is Peter, which answered for the rest of the Apostles, and therefore is called a foundation, (or a rock, or stone,) because he knew how to save not himself only, but in common.'‡

["Eighthly. 1. No thanks to the Pope to deliver a man from that which he shall never taste of; for, 'there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus.' (Rom. viii. 1.) Such need fear neither hell nor purgatory. 2. And is it in the Pope's power to deliver a man, that he shall never go to purgatory? How cometh it then to ["* Ambros. Opera, tom. i.; De Bono Mortis, cap. ii., col. 295. Paris, 1661.

["† Cypriani Opera, De Opere et Eleemosynis, cap. ii. 8vo. edit. Paris, 1836.

["* Idem, Liber De Lapsis, cap. v.

["† Idem, Liber De Mortalitate, cap. iii.

["‡ Ambros. Opera, tom. iv.; De Incarnat. Domin. Sacram., cap. iv., col. 290. Paris, 1661.

pass, that he cannot deliver his own soul from thence? For you do not think otherwise, but that some of your Popes are in purgatory: it were in vain else to say so many masses for the Pope when he is dead. The Scripture thus reasoneth: 'Noe, Job, Daniel, though they were in the midst of it, shall neither deliver son nor daughter, but only their own souls.' (Ezek. xiv. 20.) A man may save himself, though he save not another; but if he save others, not instrumentally, as one that giveth counsel; but efficiently, as one having power, as they imagine of the Pope, he must needs also save himself. He therefore that seeth the Pope's soul broiling in purgatory, will never think he can pull others out of the fire. 3. It is not the Pope's pardon, but a man's own faith, that preserveth him from condemnation: 'He that believeth shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death to life.' (John v. 24.) St. Ambrose well saith, Aliæ cruces nihil mihi prosunt; sola crux Christi mihi utilis est, et vere utilis, per quam mihi mundus crucifixus est, et ego mundo: 'Other crosses profit me little; only the cross of Christ is profitable to me, whereby I am crucified to the world, and the world to me,' &c.* Wherefore no crosses of penance, of any satisfactory or painful works, but only faith in Christ's cross, doth deliver us.

["Ninthly. 1. Bellarmine saith truly, that repentance in this life is more effectual to do away sin, than penance or punishment afterward; for Augustine well saith, Ibi erit pœnitentia dolorem habens, sed medicinam non habens: 'There shall be repentance having grief, but no relief.'† 2. For it is evident, that, after this life, there is no place at all for repentance, but for judgment. 'Where there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a horrible looking for of judgment.' (Heb. x. 26.) But after this life, there is no sacrifice for sins: ergo, an horrible expectation of judgment. Augustine again saith, Corrigant se, qui tales sunt, dum vivunt, ne postea velint et non possint, quia subito venit mors, et non est qui corrigatur, sed ut in ignem mittatur: 'Let them that are such, correct themselves while they live, lest afterward they would, and cannot, because death cometh suddenly, that they can be no more corrected, but committed to the fire.' 3. When they are so divided themselves about purgatory, some holding that a man cannot, though he be a notable sinner, be above twenty years in purgatory; others, that purgatory pains may continue a hundred, yea, a thousand years;‡ some, that purgatory pain exceedeth all pain in this life; others, that the penance of this life is more effectual:—do they not now by this, their uncertainty, make all the world believe, that purgatory fire is but a drowsy dream of their own? 4. For if there were any such purgatory pain, it should far exceed all the grief of this life, and so consequently more effectually purge sin; as Origen saith, Ut vehementius corpus cruciant verbera nudam, quam vestitum; sic anima carnis indumento deposito, subtilius sentiet tormenta: 'Like as the body naked feeleth stripes more than clothed; so the soul being unclothed of the flesh, hath a more lively sense of torment.'§ 5. Bellarmine's reason is very good, utterly to overthrow purgatory penance, because that is a time of justice, this of mercy; this showeth well not that repentance only is more effectual in this life, but that it is only here to be found. As St. Augustine well applieth these words of the Apostle: 'Behold now the accepted time, behold now the day of salvation.' (2 Cor. vi. 2.) Ecce nunc tempus salutis, tempus est nunc remissionis pœnitentibus; sed tempus erit post mortem vindicationis negligentibus confiteri peccata: 'Behold now the time of salvation, the time of remission to the penitent; but after death it is a time of vengeance to all them that neglected here to confess their sins.' 6. Lastly, because Bellarmine seemeth to extenuate the pains of purgatory, preferring the sufferings of this life before the torments thereof, I will to the same purpose adjoin the notable testimony, and most godly sentence, of the blessed servant of God, Master Latimer, a reverend Bishop and holy Martyr; who doubteth not to say, that he had rather be in purgatory than in Lollard's Tower, the Bishop of London's prison, for divers reasons, whereof some I will set down:—

In that I could not.

["'1. I might in the one, die for lack of meat and drink, but not in the other.
["'2. In this I might lack charity.
["'3. Lose my patience.
["'4. I might be in peril of death.
["'5. I might be without surety of salvation.
["'6. In this I might murmur against God.
["'7. I might displease God.
["'8. I might be judged to perpetual prison.
["'9. I might be brought to bear a faggot.
["'10. I might be separated from Christ.
["'11. I might be a member of the devil.
["'12. An inheritor of hell.

In that they could not.

["'13. In this, my Lord and his chaplains might manacle me by night.
["'14. They might strangle me, and say I hanged myself.
["'15. They might have me to their Consistory, and judge me after their fashion.

["'Ergo, I had lever* be there than here: for though the fire be called never so hot, yet and if the Bishop's two fingers can shake away a piece, a Friar's cowl another part, and scala cœli altogether; I will never found abbey, college, nor chantrey for that matter.' Thus much Master Latimer.†

["Thus this godly martyr derided long since this Popish scare-bug of purgatory fire, making it inferior to the Bishop's prison. And Bellarmine much dissenteth not, making the penance which a man may suffer in this life of greater efficacy and virtue than purgatory pains. This being so, men may learn to be wiser, and seek to be reconciled to God in this life, and not much care for Popes' pardons, which are not so much worth, as to be set free out of their Bishops' prisons, and Inquisitors' purgatory."]‡

V. The jubilee.

["The term among the Jews, denoted every fiftieth year; being that following the revolution of seven weeks of years, at which time all the slaves were made free, and all lands reverted to their ancient owners. The political design of the law of the jubilee was to prevent the too great oppression of the poor, as well as their being liable to perpetual slavery. By this means the rich were pre-

["* Ambros. Opera, tom. iii.; Comment. in Luc., lib. vi., col. 119. Paris, 1661.

["† August. Opera, tom. vi., Appendix; De Rectitud. Cathol. Convers., col. 278. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1685.

["‡ Bellarm. Opera, tom. vii.; De Indulg., lib. i., cap. ix.

[§ Origen. Opera, tom. iv.; Spectantia, S. Pamphili Martyris Apol. pro Orig., p. 43. Paris, 1759.

[* Lever, liefer, that is, more glad, or more desirable: I had as leave; that is, I had rather.

["† Eccles. Hist., by John Foxe, vol. iii., p. 464, fol. London, 1631.

[‡ Willett's Synopsis Papismi, book v., of Indulgences, part viii., quest. 2. Fol. London, 1600.]

vented from accumulating lands for perpetuity, and a kind of equality was preserved through all the families of Israel. The distinction of tribes was also preserved, in respect both to their families and possessions; that they might be able, when there was occasion, on the jubilee year, to prove their right to the inheritance of their ancestors. Thus, also, it would be known with certainty of what tribe or family the Messiah sprung. It served also, like the Olympiads of the Greeks, and the lustra of the Romans, for the readier computation of time." *]

1. The word "jubilee," in a more modern sense, denotes a grand Church solemnity or ceremony celebrated at Rome, in which the Pope grants a plenary indulgence to all sinners who fast, pray, and give alms, and especially to as many as visit the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome. "A jubilee," says Dens, "properly signifies that plenary indulgence which, with certain solemnity, is granted by the Roman Pontiff, with various favours and particular privileges, to those who perform the good works prescribed." †

2. The jubilee was first established by Boniface VIII., in 1300, which was only to return every hundred years. But the first celebration brought in such store of wealth that Clement VI., in 1343, reduced it to the period of fifty years. Urban VI., in 1389, reduced it to thirty-three years, that being the age of our Saviour. At length Paul II. brought it, in 1475, to every twenty-five years, that every person might have the benefit of it once in his life. ‡ Boniface IX. granted the privilege of holding jubilees to several Princes and monasteries; for instance, to Monks of Canterbury, who had a jubilee every fifty years, when people flocked from all parts to visit the tomb of Thomas a Becket. Afterwards jubilees became more frequent. There is generally one at the inauguration of a new Pope; and the Pope grants them whenever himself or the Church stands in need of their privileges. The jubilee Bull gives the Priest power to absolve in all cases, even to those otherwise reserved to the Pope; to make commutation of vows, &c., in which it differs from a plenary indulgence. During the time of jubilee most other indulgences are suspended.

["As regards our own country, the commission sent to England at that period by Alexander VI., A. D. 1500, for the sale of these 'jubilees,' was one Jasper Powe, or Pons, D.D., a Spaniard, 'a man of excellent learning and most civil behaviour,' in the reign of Henry VII.; and the rates and sums paid may be learnt from the following extract from an old roll in Weaver's Funeral Monuments. The roll contains: 'The articles of the Bull of the holy jubilee of full remission and great joy, granted to the realm of England, Wales, Ireland, Jersey, and Guernsey, and other places under the subjection of King Henry VII., to be distributed according to the true meaning of our holy Father unto the King's subjects.' The Bull states, that 'whereas His Holiness provides for all such perils and jeopardies as may fall to the King's subjects, by granting great indulgence, and remission of sins and trespasses; and whereas His Holiness considers the infinite number of people, both spiritual and temporal, who were desirous to have had the said remission in the holy year of grace just passed,—that is to say, the year of remission of all sins, and who would have visited the Court of Rome, but were let, either by sickness, poverty, feebleness, long distance, and great jeopardy, or business, and charges of spiritual or temporal occupation, or who, being then not desirous, now feel anxious to obtain and purchase the said remission of all sins; and whereas His Holiness is unwilling, that any should be excluded from this great grace and indulgence, it is granted that those above-mentioned shall have for them, and all their household, the said indulgence, remission, and grace, as if they had visited the said churches; first compounding effectually with the Commissioner or his deputy for the same, and thereby putting into the chest such gold or silver as may be ordered by the Right Rev. Father in God, Jasper Powe.' For the purpose of this composition, there were chests placed in the several churches of every city and diocess in England, where, according to the order of Jasper Powe the Commissioner, those who desired grace and indulgence were to pay in their 'tax,' upon each of which was inscribed the following:—'The tax that every man shall put into this chest, that will receive the great grace of this jubilee. First, Every man and woman, of whatever condition, degree, or state soever, whether Archbishop, Duke, or any other dignity, spiritual or temporal, having lands to the yearly value of £2,000 or above, if he or she will receive the great grace of indulgence of this jubilee for themselves, their wives, and their children, not married, shall, without deceit, effectually put into the chest, ordained for that intent, of true and lawful money, £3. 7*s.* 8*d.*; and, secondly, having £1,000, to pay £2; £400, to pay £1. 6*s.* 8*d.*; and so on; all of which were clearly specified. Those whose property was under £200, and above £20, were to pay one shilling; and those whose goods were under £20, were to pay according to their generosity and devotion.' We may here remark, that home-indulgences were not esteemed so powerful and effectual as those which were 'far-fetched and dearly bought;' and the profit accruing to the Popes and Court of Rome, by virtue of these, was excessive, and always esteemed one of the cardinal supports of the revenues of that See. And hence Franciscus Soderinus, Cardinal of Præneste, called Cardinal Volterra, told Pope Adrian VI., A. D. 1522, that 'no reformation could be made that would not notably diminish the rents of the Church, which, having four fountains, one temporal, namely, the rents of the ecclesiastical estate,—the other three spiritual, namely, indulgences, dispensations, and collation of benefices,—none of them could be stopped, without one quarter of the Church revenue being lost.' Bede says, 'Romam adire magnæ virtutis æstimabatur;' and there was at all times observed a greater proportion of English to flock thither, upon those accounts, than of any other nation; distance always increasing such kind of devotion. Stavely tells us, that 'as the occasions of going to Rome were infinite, so many that went there never came back again, resolving to lay their bones in that holy ground; and many others, under the influence of superstitious zeal, would leave England to reside at Rome, as at the fountain of grace; and their revenues were, of course, sent to them

[* Watson's Bib. and Theolog. Dictionary, in loco.]

[† "Quid intelligitur per jubilæum?—R. Proprie significatur illa indulgentia plenaria, quæ cum certa solemnitate a Romano Pontifice conceditur cum variis favoribus et privilegiis particularibus iis, qui opera bona præscripta præstiterint."—Dens Theologia, tom. vi., De Indulgentiis, No. 43, De Jubilæo.]

[‡ "Bonifacius VIII., anno 1300, jubilæum restaurans (non instituens, ut constat ex Extravag. ANTIQUORUM de pœn. et remiss.) constituit, ut concederetur anno quovis 100, ad normam anni sæcularis gentilium; postea Clemens VI. reduxit ad annum 50, exemplo jubilæi Judaici, Christiani figurativi, unde nomen habet; deinde Urbanus VI. reduxit ad ann. 33, pro numero ætatis annorum Christi; tandem Paulus II., considerans brevitatem vitæ, et flagella quibus Deus hominum crimina punit, reduxit ad annum 25, et sic etiamnum observatur. Vide Sandinum in Vitis Romanorum Pontificum, et Collet in Opere de Jubilæo."—Dens Theol., ibid.]

'to be spent in the Papal dominions.' The English women also were induced to make pilgrimage; and with what intent may be learnt from the famous letter of advice from Boniface, Archbishop of Mentz, to Cuthbert, Archbishop of Canterbury, A. D. 750, in which he tells the Archbishop to keep the English women at home, for the following reason:—'Perpaucæ enim sunt civitates in Longobardia, vel in Francia, aut in Gallia, in quibus non sit adultera, vel meretrix, generis Anglorum; quod scandalum est magnum, et turpitudo, totius ecclesiæ vestræ.'"*

["One of our Kings, namely, Edward III., caused his birth-day to be observed in the manner of a jubilee, when he became fifty years of age, in 1362, but never before nor after. This he did by releasing prisoners, pardoning all offences except treason, making good laws, and granting many privileges to the people. In 1640, the Jesuits celebrated a solemn jubilee at Rome, that being the centenary, or hundredth year, from their institution; and the same ceremony was observed in all their houses throughout the world."†]

Time, however, would fail to enumerate the various points of distinction which Roman Divines have introduced concerning indulgences. The want of Scripture authority is attempted to be supplied by curious theological questions respecting their privileges, by decisions of Popes, and by almost an endless multiplicity of rituals employed during the jubilee. We must, however, refer the reader, who has opportunity to turn his attention to this point, to those authors who have treated upon the subject. ‡

3. The last jubilee was in 1825, which was styled by Leo XII., in his Bull of 1824, announcing the festival, "The year of expiation and pardon, of redemption and grace, of remission and indulgence." He profanely asserts: "During this year of jubilee, by the authority of Almighty God, we mercifully, in the Lord, grant and impart the most plenary and complete indulgence, remission, and pardon of all their sins to all the faithful in Christ, of both sexes, who are truly penitent, and have confessed, and who have likewise refreshed themselves with the holy communion." The conditions were, visiting the churches specified, and "pouring forth pious prayers to God for the exaltation of holy Church, the extirpation of heresies, the concord of Catholic Princes, and the salvation and tranquillity of Christendom." The benefits of this jubilee were extended to other countries in the following year, and continued six months after the publication of the Bull in each diocess. To the Priests it was a jubilee indeed. How many confessions were to be heard, and absolutions granted, often, doubtless, with much affected difficulty; and penances to be imposed, entirely at the discretion of the Confessor! The whole Romish Church was prostrate at the feet of the priesthood, receiving at their hands "the grace of their absolution and pardon, the grace of their re-instatement in the favour of God, and of their restoration to their lost title to the kingdom of heaven." §

[We lay this Bull of Indiction before our readers.

[* British Magazine, vol. xxii., pp. 389, 390.

[† Buck's Theological Dictionary, by Dr. Henderson, in loco.]

‡ Dens Theologia, tom. vii., Tractatus de Indulgentiis. Bailly Theol. Dogmat. et Moral., tom. iv., De Pœnit., cap. iii., de Jubilæo. Ferraris Biblioth. Prompta, tom. iv., Art. Jubilæum. Benedicti XIV. Bullarium, tom. vii., et cum multis aliis.

§ See Cramp's Text-Book of Popery, pp. 341, 344; and also for specimens of the instructions and directions of the Vicar Apostolical of the London District.

["BULL OF INDICTION,* FOR THE JUBILEE OF THE YEAR 1825.†

["LEO, Bishop, servant of the servants of God, to all the faithful in Christ who shall inspect these presents, health and apostolical blessing!

["The Lord, in the exercise of his compassion, has at length granted to our Lowliness to announce to you with gladness the near approach of that which may now be felicitously celebrated according to the usages and institutions (majorum) of the ancients, but which, through the dreadful asperity of the times, was omitted at the commencement of this century, an omission which we deeply lamented. That most auspicious year is near, a year to be most religiously venerated, in which there will be a concourse from the whole world, to this our fair and holy city, and the see of the blessed Peter; and in which all the faithful, being excited to (officia) the duties of piety, have all the most ample succours of reconciliation and grace proposed to them for the salvation of their souls. For in this year, which we properly call 'an acceptable time and (a day) of salvation,' we rejoice at the grand opportunity afforded to us, after the deplorable series of ills over which we have groaned, to strive to restore all things in Christ, by the salutary (saving) expiation of all Christian people. We have therefore decreed, according to the authority which is divinely committed to us, to open, as widely as possible, that heavenly treasury, which, being purchased by the merits, sufferings, and virtues, of our Lord Christ, of his Virgin mother, and of all saints, the Author of human salvation has intrusted the distribution of it to us. It becomes us, indeed, on this subject, to extol the abundant riches of the divine clemency, with which Christ, having 'prevented us by the blessings of his goodness,' has willed the infinite virtue of his merits to be diffused to the (various) parts of his mystical body, so that these parts, by their mutual operation among each other, and by the wholesome junction of their usefulness, may be mutually assisted, through the unity of that 'faith which works by love;' and that through the infinite price of our Lord's blood, and by reason and in virtue of it, also by the merits and intercession of the saints, they may obtain the remission of temporal punishment, the whole of which, as the Fathers of the Council of Trent have taught, cannot always, as in the case of baptism, be remitted by the sacrament of penitence.

["Let the earth, therefore, listen to the words of our mouth, and let the whole world with gladness listen to the clangour of the sacerdotal trumpet, which loudly announces a sacred Jubilee to the people of God. We proclaim the arrival of the year of expiation and pardon, of redemption and grace, of remission and indulgence; in which, we know, are renewed those benefits which the old law, the announcer of 'good things to come,' formerly brought among the people of the Jews every fiftieth year; but they are renewed in a manner much more sacred, for the greater accumulation of spiritual blessings, by Him 'through whom came grace and truth.' For if those estates which had been sold, and the goods which had been rendered the property of another person, were all restored in that year of salvation; we now, through the infinite liberality of God, receive the virtues, merits, and gifts, of which we had divested ourselves by the commission of sins. If the legal rights of human servitude at that time ceased; after the present severe yoke of diabolical domination has been cast off, we are called forth into the 'liberty of the sons of God,' into that liberty which Christ has bestowed on us. If, finally, according to the prescript of the law, pecuniary debts were forgiven to those who owed them, and the debtors were thus absolved from every bond; we are now absolved from the debt of our sins, and by the divine compassion we are delivered from their punishment.

["* 'Bull' is derived from bulla, 'a seal,' and that from bulla, 'a bubble.' Persius has the phrase bullatæ nugæ, 'swelling, empty expressions.' In this sense it is not unappropriate to the present instrument. The bulla, or Pope's seal, has on it a cross, with St. Peter on one side, and St. Paul on the other.

["† This is the title of the French translation: that of the Latin is expressed with greater nicety and elegance, than has been usual with the former fulminators of Popish Bulls. It is, 'The Universal Indiction (or Proclamation) of the Jubilee of the sacred Year 1825.'

["Advancing therefore by our wishes these numerous and great advantages to souls; and having in confidence of mind asked in prayer of God, the Giver of all good, by the bowels of his mercy, that which is required by a regard to the appointed time, and which is pointed out by the pious institutions of the Roman Pontiffs our predecessors; treading also in the footsteps, with the consent of our brethren, the Cardinals of the holy Romish Church, by the authority of the omnipotent God, and of the blessed Apostles, Peter and Paul, as well as by our own, for the glory of God himself, for the exaltation of the Catholic Church, and for the sanctification of all Christian people, we proclaim and publish the universal and great jubilee to commence in this holy city, from the first Vespers of the next Eve of the Nativity of our most holy Saviour, Jesus Christ, and to continue through the whole of the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five. During this year of jubilee, we mercifully in the Lord grant and impart the most plenary and complete indulgence, remission, and pardon of all their sins, to all the faithful in Christ, of both sexes, who are truly penitent, and have confessed, and who have likewise refreshed themselves with the holy communion,—provided (if Romans, or inhabitants of the city) they shall have devoutly visited these churches of the city, that of the blessed Peter and Paul, of St. John Lateran, and that of St. Mary Major, at least once a day, for thirty days, whether successive or (interpolatos) at intervals, natural or even ecclesiastical, to be computed from the first Vespers of one day, to the complete evening twilight of the succeeding day; but if they be foreigners, or in any respect strangers, they must have visited these churches, at least fifteen days, as already described; provided, also, that they shall have poured forth pious prayers to God for the exaltation of the holy Church, the extirpation of heresies, the concord of Catholic Princes, and the salvation and tranquillity (Christiani populi) of Christendom.

["And because it may happen, that of those persons who may, on this account, have commenced the journey, or who may have actually arrived at the city, some of them on the road, and others of them in the city, may be detained by illness, or some other legitimate cause, or may be prevented by death, before the completion, and perhaps before the commencement, of the specified number of days, and may thus be incapacitated from complying with the preceding requisitions, and from visiting the churches which we have mentioned; being desirous benignantly to show favour, as far as we possibly can in the Lord, to their pious and prompt intentions, we declare it as our will and pleasure that these persons, who may have been truly penitent, and may have confessed, and who may likewise have refreshed themselves with the holy communion, be made partakers of the before-mentioned indulgence and remission, exactly as though they had in reality visited the above-named churches on the days which we have prescribed; and, since they are prevented by the preceding urgent impediments, that they obtain, by the gift of the Holy Spirit, the effects of their desires.

["We make this announcement to you, our sons, from our paternal affection, that those of you 'who are weary and heavy laden,' may fly to the place where you know for a certainty that you will receive rest and be refreshed. For (neque fas est) it is criminal to be idle and negligent in applying for saving riches, out of those eternal treasures of divine grace, which are opened by our most holy and indulgent mother, the Church, when such an intense desire is manifested to procure earthly riches, which the moth corrupts, and the rust destroys. But since, even from ancient times, it has been a prevalent custom for immense and perpetual concourses of men of all ranks, from every part of the wide world, (although their route was long and dangerous,) to visit this principal (domicilium) seat and abode of the fine arts, upon which they look almost as on a prodigy, glittering and effulgent in the magnificence of its edifices, the majesty of its situation, and the beauty of its monuments; it would therefore be shameful, and most contrary to a desire of eternal blessedness, to urge, as pretences for declining a journey to Rome, the difficulties on the road, the accidents of fortune, or other causes of this description. There is, my beloved children, there is that which will most abundantly compensate every species of inconvenience; nay, if by chance any sufferings occur, they will not be 'worthy (to be compared with) the weight of future glory,' that, by the blessing of God, 'will be wrought out for you' by those aids which are prepared for the benefit of souls. For you shall reap from this journey a most ample harvest of penitence, out of which you may offer to God the castigation of your bodies, through the long continuance of your (molestorum actuum) painful acts of mortification, may in holiness perform the conditions prescribed by the laws of the indulgences, and may add this new advantage to the determination, which you have formed and constantly hold, of punishing and repelling your crimes.

["Come up, therefore, with your loins girt, to this holy Jerusalem, to this priestly and royal city, which has become the capital of the world by its being the see of the blessed Peter, and is conspicuously seen to exercise a wider presidency by its divine religion, than by its earthly dominion. 'This is indeed the city,' said St. Charles, when exhorting his people to undertake a journey to Rome during the sacred year, 'this is the city, whose soil, walls, altars, churches, the sepulchres of its martyrs, and whatever objects present themselves to the sight, suggest something sacred to the mind, as those persons experience and feel who, after due preparation, visit those sacred recesses.' Reflect how greatly a walk round those ancient places, which, through the majesty of religion, wonderfully recommend themselves, may contribute to excite faith and charity in the minds of spectators. There, many thousands of martyrs are presented to their view whose blood has consecrated the very ground; they enter their churches, behold their (titulos) epitaphs, and (venerari) do reverence to their relics. Besides, as St. John Chrysostom has said, 'Since the heavens are as resplendent when the sun emits his rays, as the city of the Romans which contains those two lights, Peter and Paul, who transmit their rays through the whole earth;' what person (auserit) will have the audacity to approach the (places where those Apostles made their) confessions, to prostrate himself before their tombs, and to kiss their fetters, which are far more precious than gold or jewels, unless (he be impelled) by a feeling of the most intense devotion? And who can refrain from tears either while beholding the cradle of Christ, and recollecting at the same time the cries of the infant Jesus in the manger; or while adoring the most sacred instrument of our Lord's passion, and then meditating on the Redeemer of the world hanging on the cross?

["Since, by the singular liberality of divine Providence, these august monuments of religion are united together in this city alone, they are, in reality, certain most sweet and pleasant pledges of that affection, by which 'the Lord loveth the gates of Sion above all the tabernacles of Jacob;' and they most affectionately invite all of you, my beloved children, to lay aside all delay, and to ascend that mountain in which God has been pleased to dwell.

["But our solicitude requires us, in this place, to address ourselves especially to all orders and degrees of men in this fair and flourishing city, and to remind them of this circumstance, that upon them are fixed the eyes of the faithful who come here out of every part of the world; and that they ought, therefore, to exhibit in their conduct nothing except gravity, moderation, and that which becometh Christians; so that, from their manners, the rest may receive an example of modesty, innocence, and of every kind of virtue. By which behaviour this chosen people, among whom it has been the pleasure of the Chief Shepherd that the chair of the most blessed Peter should be placed, may instruct others to revere the Catholic Church and her authority, to obey her precepts, and constantly to pay great honour both to things and to persons ecclesiastical. In this city let the reverence which is due to the Church flourish, that foreigners may perceive nothing by which the divine worship and the sacred places themselves may be despised, or held in contempt; nothing contrary to honourable and chaste minds, or to unassumed modesty. Let these strangers rather admire the severe and holy discipline, (in the churches,) by which every one declares, in the calm and composed carriage of his body, that he is present at divine things, not only in body, but likewise in mind, and in devout affection of heart. We recommend and urge this behaviour likewise on the festivals, that none of those days which have been instituted for the performance of sacred offices, and for honouring God and the saints, may seem to be devoted in this holy city to the celebration of banquets and plays, of disorderly joys, and wanton licentiousness. 'Finally, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report,' let these shine resplendently in the inhabitants of Rome; that we may congratulate ourself, that the glory of faith and piety, (for examples of which they were commended by the Apostle Paul himself, and which they have received from their ancestors as the best of all inheritances,) not only has received no stain from the inhabitants of Rome, but that they have rendered this glory more illustrious by their studious care, and by their exemplary manners.

["We are truly refreshed with this good hope, that each of them will imitate the better (charismata) graces, and that the sheep of the Lord's flock, running into the embracing arms of their Shepherd, will become that well-ordered army whose standard is charity. 'Therefore, lift up thine eyes round about; and, behold, O Jerusalem! thy sons shall come from far; and thine heart shall wonder and be enlarged.' But it is our wish, that 'the sons also of them that afflicted thee, may come bending unto thee; and that all they who despised thee, may bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet!' (Isai. lx. 4—14.) It is to you, over whom we mourn and sigh, on account of your being still separated from the true Church of Christ, and from the way of salvation,—it is to you to whom we address ourself in all the affection of our apostolical heart. In this universal joy and gladness, concede, to a most loving parent, that which alone is wanting; that is, being 'called,' by the instinct of the Spirit from above, 'into marvellous light;' and, every snare of division having been removed, you may heartily coincide in sentiment with this Church, which is the mother of all, as well as the teacher, (or governess,) and out of which there is no salvation. We, expanding our heart, will gladly receive you into our paternal bosom; and we bless the God of all consolation, who shall have enriched us with these riches of his mercy, in the highest triumph of the Catholic verity.

["But do you, venerable brethren, the Patriarchs, Primates, Archbishops, and Bishops, aid us by your exertions in these our cares and endeavours; call together your congregations, assemble your people, that your children may be excited to receive those gifts which the Father of mercies (commisit) hath permitted to be dispensed to the children whom he loves, through the ministry of our Lowliness. Let them remember that the days of this our pilgrimage are short; and since we know not at what hour the Master of the house will come, we must, therefore, watch, carrying our lamps in our hands burning, and filled with the oil of charity, that we may make haste to meet with gladness the Lord at his coming. Let it also be your province, accurately to declare the great force and virtue of the indulgences; the amazing produce which may be obtained from them, in the remission, not only of the canonical punishment, but likewise of the temporal punishment, due to the divine justice on account of transgressions; and, finally, the vast succours which they will themselves derive from that heavenly treasury, through the merits of Christ and the saints. When these persons, as true penitents, shall have departed (out of this life) in the love of God, before they shall have, 'by fruits meet for repentance,' rendered satisfaction for their sins of commission and omission, yet their souls are already expiated by the fire of purgatory; so that an entrance lies open for them into the eternal country, into which nothing that is defiled and unholy can enter. Give attention, venerable brethren, to this matter; for there are persons who, following a wisdom which is not of God, and rolling themselves up in sheep's clothing, generally under a specious semblance of greater purity and piety, even now disseminate among the people depraved interpretations and comments about this matter. But now instruct your flocks in those things which they must perform, in those offices of piety and charity in which they ought to exercise themselves, and in the diligence and the feeling of grief with which they ought to examine themselves and their lives, and to reject and amend whatever is vicious in their manners, that they may obtain the most abundant and real profit from this very sacred indulgence.

["But this is the chief object of your care, venerable brethren, that those of your several flocks who shall have formed the design of undertaking this pilgrimage, complete it in a religious manner, that they avoid in the journey every thing which can disturb their pious desires, and which may seduce them from their holy purpose, and that they in preference earnestly pursue those objects which usually inflame and incite religion. But if, with regard to your persons and your situations, you be permitted to approach this citadel of religion, the sight of you will impart the highest splendour to this solemn exhibition; you will obtain the greatest riches of divine mercy; and, in imitation of those who convey the most costly merchandise, you will communicate these riches, with consummate delight, to the rest of your people.

["We entertain no doubt, that our very dear sons in Christ, all the Catholic Princes, will assist us in such a momentous affair as this, with all the authority (qua valent) which they possess, that these our designs for the salvation of souls may obtain their desired success. We therefore entreat and exhort them, according to the eminent zeal which they display towards religion, to second the diligence of our venerable brethren the Bishops, and to render the most efficient support to their care, and to see that a safe passage be in every direction afforded, and hospitable entertainment provided for those pilgrims who may enter within the boundaries of their dominions, lest any injury befall them in (performing) a work of the greatest piety. It has undoubtedly not escaped their observation, that a conspiracy has been every where formed to abolish the most holy laws both of civil and ecclesiastical government; and that God has performed wonders, for, stretching forth his hand, he hath humbled the arrogance of the strong. Let Princes, therefore, consider, that due thanks must continually be given to the Lord of lords, who hath achieved the victory; and the protection of the Divine mercy must be asked by humble and frequent prayer, that while the iniquity of the wicked is still spreading itself like a canker, God may, of his clemency towards us, perfect the work which he hath begun. Indeed, we had these reflections on our mind while we were deliberating about the celebration of the jubilee; for we knew well the sacrifice of praise which would be offered to God, by this general consent of all Christian people, to procure those gifts, all the treasuries of which we now open. For the attainment of these gifts let even Catholic Princes strive; and, since they possess great and elevated minds, let them protect this very sacred work with intense care and perpetual succour. They will learn, by experience, that principally in this manner they will call down upon themselves the divine mercies, and that they are in reality performing, in behalf of their several empires, whatever they may have done for promoting the safety (rei sacræ) of religion, and for cherishing piety, that, every seed of vice being destroyed, the meadows, fruitful in virtues, may abundantly flourish.

["But, in order that all these things may succeed according to our wishes, we ask the prayers, before God, of as many of you our sons as belong to the sheepfold of Christ. For we hope that, by the general vows and entreaties by which you earnestly beseech the divine compassion to be shown in the good of the Catholic faith, in the return of those who have wandered from the truth, and in the happiness of Princes, you will most effectually assist our Weakness in the discharge of our most important functions.

["But that the present letters may with the greater facility come to the knowledge of all the faithful, whatever may be the places of their abode, it is our pleasure, that even the printed copies of them (which yet must be subscribed by the hand of some notary public, and ratified by the seal of a person enjoying high ecclesiastical dignity) inspire the same confidence as would be given to these presents themselves, if they were to be exhibited or produced.

["Therefore, let no man whatever be permitted to infringe, or, by an audacious temerity, to act in opposition to this page of our indiction, promulgation, concession, exhortation, and pleasure. But if any one shall presume to make the attempt, let him know, that he will incur the indignation of the omnipotent God, and of his blessed Apostles, Peter and Paul.

["Given at Rome, in St. Peter's, in the year of our Lord's incarnation, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, on the 24th of May, and in the first year of our Pontificate."

[The French translator adds:—"This Bull is signed by two Cardinals, M. Antoine Gabriel Severoli, Pro-dataire, Vice-Chancellor, and Joseph Albani."

[The following Instructions and Directions for gaining the grand jubilee, were published by the Vicar-Apostolic of the London District:—"Embrace, dearly beloved, the benefit that is offered you by the indulgence of the present jubilee. This present life is a time granted you to prepare for heaven. Only sin can exclude you from that kingdom; only the debt of temporal punishment incurred by sin can retard your entrance into glory. Persevere in your career of penance to the end. Avail yourselves of every means of discharging your debt to divine justice. As no man knows whether he be worthy of love or hatred, no man knows what punishments he may still be liable to on account of his sins. The effect that each one will receive from the plenary indulgence will be in proportion to the perfection of the dispositions with which he prepares himself for it. Enter, enter now, dearly beloved, into the most perfect sentiments of salvation. Spare no pains to prepare yourselves for the remission of your sins, and for the benefits of this plenary indulgence. The happy effects of it will be felt by you in that peace of soul and spiritual joy which the world could never give; and in a well-grounded hope of eternal happiness."]

VI. Evil consequences of indulgences.

1. The conditions on which indulgences are granted are a strong argument against them. To visit a church, say a prayer, or the like, are the terms on which they are generally vouchsafed. It must occur to every reader of the Scriptures that to forsake sin, follow after holiness, and do good, are the great injunctions of the word of God; therefore the trivial, or comparatively useless, performances of Papal indulgences, are totally different from the duties divinely enjoined. But were they to be content with what was useless, trivial, or superstitious, the evil might be tolerated; they often grant indulgences on condition of doing evil: for instance, many have been dispensed to those who would fight against the Mohammedans, and extirpate heresy, or, in other words, Protestantism. We ask, What is this, but promising heaven to those who are willing to murder and persecute their fellow-men?

2. Uncertainty, danger, and deception connected with the remission of sin by indulgences.

Were the pretensions of the Church of Rome true, the many millions of indulgences, the various ways of releasing souls out of purgatory, the innumerable masses said daily, the power of the keys so largely employed, would, in a short time, have emptied purgatory of its inhabitants, or very few would go there, and they who were sent thither, would stay only a short time. There is, however, great uncertainty connected with this, and consequently much deception; from which it is to be inferred that danger attends the practice of the Church of Rome in the article of indulgences. This will appear, if the following topics are taken into consideration: for, when the sinner has deserved severe punishment for aggravated offences, and the guilt is taken away by absolution, as is supposed, or on account of the satisfactions of others, there is great doubt and uncertainty remaining, inasmuch as,

(1.) The remission of guilt depends in a considerable degree upon the indulgence. Suppose it is for a thousand years; yet, perhaps, according to the old penitential scale, your sins have deserved at the rate of forty thousand. If the penance of a thousand years be taken off by that indulgence, it does the work it was intended; but you can feel but little comfort, when there remains the debt of thirty-nine thousands to be paid. The abatement is like casting one devil out of a miserable demoniac, when there are left fifty others as bad as he.

(2.) But supposing you have purchased a number of quadragenes, or lents of pardon; it may be your quadragenes are not carenes or the severer penance. Then if your demerit arise to so many carenes, and you have purchased only quadragenes, you may remain longer in a state of punishment than you originally anticipated.

(3.) Again, provided a plenary indulgence is obtained, the applicant is not even then secure; for it may not accomplish all that is required. There is an indulgence more plenary, and one most plenary; and it is not agreed among the Doctors,* whether a plenary indulgence is to be extended beyond the removal of those penances enjoined by the Confessor, or how far it is efficacious.

(4.) Farther: all indulgences are granted upon some cause being shown, or upon some condition; and if the cause be not a reasonable one, they are invalid; but whether it be sufficient, it is difficult to ascertain; and if there be not a reasonable cause for the amount of indulgence vouchsafed, it is impossible to compute its real value.

(5.) When this difficulty is overcome, another arises. The person may not be capable of receiving the indulgence; for if he be not in a state of grace, all is futile; and if he be, yet not actually performing the conditions of the indulgence, his endeavours or good desires are useless: if the conditions were performed, it must be inquired whether the penitent were in charity, or, at least, whether the last act of the required conditions were so performed. If there be any imperfection in the act or in the disposition, there is a proportionate subtraction from the value of the indulgence: but here another difficulty presents itself; for if the indulgence avail only in proportion to the worthiness of the work done, that will avail of itself, without any grant from the Church; and then it is questionable whether the Pope's authority be of any use whatever in the whole affair.

(6.) We must be certain of the authority of the Priest who grants the indulgence, a point in which there are many doubtful questions; and when they are solved, it calls for investigation, whether venial sins may not, after all, prevent the fruit of the indulgence: if so, then all the advantages are forfeited.

(7.) If an indulgence relating to the article of death be obtained, and the invalid recover from that sickness which induced him to apply for the indulgence, he must consider whether he ought not to take out a new one for a future indisposition; or whether the first, without any sensible error, hold valid when he is again near death.

(8.) He must inquire, also, whether an indulgence granted on a certain festival will be valid when the day is changed, as was the case with all festivals by the Gregorian Calendar; or, if he travel into a foreign country where the feast is not kept on the same day, as it happens with all moveable feasts.

(9.) It must also be ascertained whether a succeeding Pope have power to revoke an indulgence granted by his predecessor: this has often been done as a favour or privilege.

(10.) Whether, in the year of jubilee, all other indulgences be not suspended; and, (11.) Whether indulgences are of any avail in reserved cases, which are very numerous.

Many other uncertainties are connected with indulgences; and there appears to be no remedy but to procure more masses, and none need fear that these services will ever become unnecessary by the multitude of indulgences. The Priest must be employed, because there are so many ways of making the indulgence good for nothing. The truth is, the system is based in fraud, and no one can be a partaker of such forbidden traffic without endangering his soul.

3. Indulgences operate as a commission to sin.

That this charge can be fully sustained, we have ample proofs. But before we adduce them, we must refer to some objections which are commonly brought forward against their immoral tendency.

It is affirmed by Roman Catholic Divines, that "the effect of indulgences is not to remit sin, whether mortal or venial, but the guilt of sin; and when in the indulgence we have the words 'remission of sins,' the word 'sins' is there to be taken for the punishment of sin. The effect of an indulgence is the remission of the remaining temporal punishment due to sins which are pardoned, as it respects their guilt."* On this we present the following observations:—

[* "Doctor of the Church is a title given to some of the Fathers, whose doctrines and opinions have been the most generally followed and allowed. In the Greek Church are Athanasius, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Chrysostom. In the Latin, Jerome, Augustine, Gregory the Great, Ambrose, and Bonaventure. In the Roman Breviary, there is a particular office for those that are Doctorated. Doctor is also an appellation, joined to several specific epithets, wherein the merit, of such as the schools acknowledged for their masters, consisted. Thus Alexander Hales is called the Irrefragable Doctor, and the Fountain of Life, as Possevinus said; Thomas Aquinas, the Angelical; Bonaventure, the Seraphic; Duns Scotus, the Subtile; Raimond Lully, the Illuminated; Roger Bacon, the Admirable; William Occam, the Singular; John Gerson and Cardinal Cusa, the Most Christian; Dionysius, the Carthusian, the Ecstatic Doctor; and an almost infinite variety of others, met with in ecclesiastical writers."—Farneworth's Translation of Leti's Life of Pope Sixtus V., p. 327. 8vo. Dublin, 1766.]

[* "Effectus indulgentiæ non est remittere peccatum, neque mortale, neque veniale; communis, cum Maldonato, ubi sic expresse dicit: Uno ore omnes theologi, nemine excepto, respondent, indulgentiam non esse remissionem culpæ, sed pœnæ. Unde quando in forma seu concessione indulgentiæ dicitur per illam concedi remissionem peccatorum, accipitur peccatum pro pœna peccati, juxta illud 2 Macc. xii., Ut a peccatis solvantur; et quando vocatur indulgentia a pœna, et culpa, intelligitur, quod per talem indulgentiam conceditur facultas absolvendi a culpa etiam reservata, ut fuit dictum art. 1, Num. 3. Effectus indulgentiæ est remissio pœnæ temporalis ex peccatis quoad culpam dimissis residuæ et restantis."—Ferraris Biblioth. Prompt. Indulgentia, art. 3, sect. i., ii.; Maldonati Opera, tom. i.; De Panit., qu. vi.; Tit. de Indulgent., pars i., quæst. i.]

The formula in which remission is invariably expressed in indulgences is, "an indulgence and remission of all sins;" and if this, in its obvious sense, does not embrace remission of sins, the language employed is the most unhappy that can be selected. Two words, "indulgence" and "remission," are joined by a conjunction, so as, according to the common rule of language, to present two distinct ideas; and the term peccatum, "sin," not culpa, "guilt," or pœna, "punishment," is uniformly employed in that document. Therefore, to every unprejudiced person, the expression in the indulgence asserts, that remission of sins forms an important part of its effects. Nor will it avail to say, as Maldonat does, that "with one voice all theologians, without exception, declare that an indulgence is not the remission of guilt, but of punishment." The reasons are, that the explanations of the theologians are hidden in the Latin tongue, and seldom, if ever, reach the ears of the people; whilst the arguments of the Protestants compelled the Romanists to give publicity to this view of the doctrine. The manner in which indulgences are still offered and accepted makes the impression on the mind of almost every one who receives them, that the remission of sin is so associated with, that it forms part and parcel of, the indulgence. Add to this, also, that the popular mode of distributing indulgences is directly calculated to make an impression on the mind of the unwary, that remission of sins is a prominent part of the privilege of an indulgence, and especially of that which is termed plenary.

Admitting that an indulgence means no more than a release of temporal punishment due for sin already pardoned, the consequences of such a boon must nevertheless be extremely pernicious. For while human nature remains as it is, the doctrine which holds out to men the certainty of obtaining pardon, and an indulgence whenever they choose to ask for it, must and will operate as a licence to commit sin.

We are told by the Romanists, that the Protestant doctrine of justification by faith, which holds out the prospect of pardon to the chief of sinners, through the merits of Christ, without any merits of their own, opens a door of licentiousness, and operates as an indulgence to transgress. This doctrine, however, is that of Scripture, against which Romanists and infidels raise their voice; and we fearlessly maintain that the practice of indulgences can legitimately be charged with licentiousness, and for the following reasons:—1. Popery furnishes encouragement for pardon without due reference to the atonement of Christ. This is accomplished by believing that the atonement of Christ leaves a portion of guilt, for which atonement is to be made by the sinner; and also by her favourite doctrine of human merit. 2. Popery provides pardon without securing, or even enjoining, the reformation of the sinner. It makes no provision for renewing the sinner to holiness: with them there is no regeneration but that which is effected by baptism; the pardoned and indulged sinner remains as great a transgressor as he was before; and his pardon and indulgence, so easily obtained, must operate as an encouragement to commit sin, and have all the effects of a commission or licence. The Douay Catechism, in reply to the question, "What is satisfaction?" gives the following answer:—"A faithful performance of the prayers or good works enjoined us by the Priest to whom we confess." Respecting a radical change of heart and character, Popery knows nothing. She dispenses pardons and indulgences when men are in love with sin, and thirsting for the commission of it; while they are accustomed to habitual perjury and blasphemy, and almost every other crime. Pardons and indulgences granted to such must be an encouragement to offend. To make this more plain, we add the following:—

The doctrine of indulgences takes away the fear of punishment. The facility and the conditions on which pardons and indulgences are granted furnish so ready a mode to obtain pardon, and release from punishment, that sinners stand in no dread of future consequences.

4. It is most unscriptural, and supposes sentiments and feelings which are averse to pure religion. He who purchases an indulgence knows not, or is imperfectly acquainted with, the boundless love and mercy of God, and the freedom of the Gospel. He knows not the nature of sin, its guilt and demerit; so deep its stain, that nothing but the blood of Christ could expiate it. He is ignorant of the holiness of God, and of his jealousy, and has no concern for his honour. He who purchases an indulgence knows not the love of Christ, his fulness, his suitableness as a Saviour to his wants as a sinner. He who purchases an indulgence is not aware of the power nor feels the influence of the Holy Spirit to enlighten, renovate, and purify. He knows not that in building on the human merits of the Virgin and of the saints, he builds on the sand, and that this foundation will finally deceive him.

5. That the sale or conferring of indulgences operates not only as an encouragement, but also as a licence, to commit sin, appears from the very nature of the grant, and the doctrine and practice of the Church of Rome concerning indulgences and penance. An individual guilty of the greatest crimes receives the sacrament of penance on the usual terms. He must indeed make some kind of confession before a Priest, profess contrition, and promise amendment; but all these are mere form and words. His heart remains as before; and he is as much in love with sin as ever. When the sacrament of penance is over, he is told that he must perform some good work, or suffer punishment, to satisfy divine justice for the sins which he has confessed; at the same time he is informed that he may have an indulgence, or, in other words, be released from the suffering, for a certain sum, which he cheerfully pays. Hence he sets out on a new course of sin, or continues his former practices, like the profligate seductress, who said: "I have peace-offerings with me; this day have I paid my vows. Come, let us take our fill of love." (Prov. vii. 14, 18.)

Independent of the facts of history and observation, an accurate knowledge of human nature would infer such result from the doctrine in question. Wicked men are generally superstitious. There is a tribunal in their own bosom which condemns them. They know not what it is, but are taught to believe that from its accusations a Priest can deliver them. Such an one, whether to gratify revenge, avarice, or lust, proceeds in the commission of sin at every opportunity, with all his heart, kn wing beforehand that the Priest can pardon, and if satisfaction be required, the purchase of an indulgence can accomplish it. The tribunal of the righteous Judge is purposely concealed from his view. He seeks no pardon but that which the Priest offers, and is taught to believe that no other is necessary. Such a doctrine, we aver, must operate on the corrupt nature of the human heart as an encouragement to the commission of all manner of unrighteousness.

6. That the doctrine of indulgences operates as a licence to commit sin, innumerable historical facts will also abundantly testify. The following quotation from Bellarmine, the great champion of the Popish cause, is worth many such, because it is an acknowledgment of the positive state of things in the Church, well known to himself, and, as he supposes, to all:—"We cannot deny but that many are bound by the Penitential Canons to several thousands of years' penance, some to three, others seven, &c.: to those who had accustomed themselves to perjury and blasphemy almost every moment, and frequently committed murders, thefts, sacrileges, and adulteries, the Popes had respect when they gave indulgences for ten or twenty thousand years."* Thus the greatest criminals easily obtained pardon from the Pope and his Clergy, by means of indulgences for this length of time.

A reference to facts will corroborate the declaration, that indulgences act as a licence to commit sin. Speaking of the notoriously depraved state of morals in Italy, Mr. Eustace, a keen-sighted son of the Church of Rome, asks: "May it not be ascribed to the corruptions of the national religion, to the facility of absolution, and to the easy purchase of indulgences?" † Facts furnish the best answer to these questions. "He who can murder his brother to-day, and appease the Church, and lull his own conscience, to-morrow, by penance, and a bribe to the Virgin, or some other saint, will have less scruple to kill his father the day after." "At Tivoli," says a modern traveller, "a man was pointed out to us who had stabbed his brother, who died in agonies within an hour. The murderer went to Rome, purchased his pardon from the Church, and received a written protection from a Cardinal, in consequence of which he was walking about unconcernedly, a second Cain, whose life was sacred. If then crimes are so easily got over, how much more may a monthly, or yearly, confession and absolution cover habitual vice?" ‡ Again: "Those that have interest with the Pope may obtain an absolution in full from His Holiness for all the sins they ever have committed, or may choose to commit." "I have seen one of these edifying documents, issued by the present Pope to a friend of mine. It was most unequivocally worded."

[The vivacious, but not unexceptionable, author of "Rome in the Ninteenth Century," observes, that "the keys of the kingdom of heaven are said to have been given to St. Peter, and are held by the Pope; and he opens the door freely to those who pay the Pater.

["The poor, indeed, have but a bad chance of admittance; for their souls depend upon the collections of the good Friars and penitents, that go about industriously begging, 'Per le Anime Sante in purgatorio;' and even this slender redeeming fund is shared with them by the rich. However, it is not always the wealthy alone that are saved. For, besides the pilgrimages and visitations of altars, &c., &c., that are open to the industry of all, those who have interest with the Pope may obtain an absolution in full from His Holiness, for all the sins they ever have committed, or may choose to commit.*

["St. Peter's, in common with the other three great basilicæ of Rome, St. John Lateran, St. Maria Maggiore, and St. Paolo, fuore le Mura, possess the privilege of the Porta Santa, a holy door by which, during the holy year, all may come in, but none may come out. It is literally, 'that bourn through which no traveller returns.'

["These holy years and holy doors were originally invented by Boniface VIII., at the termination of the thirteenth century, who proclaimed a jubilee throughout the Christian world, with 'plenary indulgence and remission of sins,' to all who, in the course of that year, should visit the shrines of the Apostles and Martyrs of Christianity at Rome; and commanded this festival to be held for evermore at the expiration of every century, in avowed imitation of the secular games of the Romans.† But it was found so lucrative to the Holy See, from the heaps of gold the piety of wealthy pilgrims poured on the altars, and so edifying to Christendom, that, instead of one, the number was gradually multiplied to four, jubilees or holy years in every age.

["In the Church of St. Bartholomew they offer plenary indulgence: nostrums for the cure of the soul have supplied the nostrums for the cure of the body, that used to be administered here. Corporeal is changed into spiritual quackery, Pagan into Catholic superstition, and Esculapius into St. Bartholomew.

["I soon grew tired at looking at some bad frescos by Antonio Caracci; and observing the inscription of Indulgenzia plenaria, I asked one of the young Friars why, since they had the power of giving 'unlimited indulgence' to all, he would not grant us the restricted indulgence of walking through the garden? He crossed himself in admiration of my extravagance, and ejaculated, 'Jesu Maria!' I then pressed him to explain to me, what plenary indulgence meant. He said it was 'a mystery,'—a thing incomprehensible to us, 'a spiritual good,' 'a blessing of the saints.' But all these, and all that followed, were separate and reluctant responses to my varied interrogations.

["'Did plenary indulgence give permission to perpetrate murder?' I inquired. 'No! No!' 'Could murder, when committed, be expiated by it?' That was again a mystery. Murder could be expiated. The Santo Padre, 'the Pope,' who had received from the Prince of Apostles the keys of heaven, and the power to forgive sins, could pardon that, or any crime; but how, he might not say: all that he would say to a heretic like me, after all my cross-questioning, was, 'that for hell, he believed, no indulgence was to be obtained; but from purgatory there was plenary indulgence accorded to the faithful, through the Madonna, St. Peter, or the Pope." ‡]

[* "Pontifices enim non solebant indulgentias concedere nisi tot annorum, quot annorum pœnitentiæ injungebantur: pœnitentiæ vero non solebant injungi, nisi unius, duorum, trium, quinque, septem, decem, viginti annorum, aut ad summum per totam vitam, quæ ultra centum annos porrigi non solet. Sed quidquid de hoc sit, non videtur negandum, posse aliquos reos fieri pœnitentiæ agendæ secundum canones per spatium aliquot millium annorum. Nam si peccatis lethalibus singulis debetur, secundum canones, pœnitentia trium, vel septem annorum; quis enumeret annos pœnitentiæ, qui secundum canones præscribi deberent iis, qui consuetudinem habent pejerandi, vel blasphemandi ad singula prope momenta, et frequentissime homicidia, furta, sacrilegia, adulteria perpetrant? ac denique, ut legimus in lib. Job, 'Bibunt quasi aquam iniquitatem.' Atque huc sine dubio respexerunt Summi Pontifices si qui sunt, qui revera indulgentias dederint decem, vel viginti millium annorum."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. vii.; De Indulg., lib. i., cap. ix.. Colon., 1617.]

† Classical Tour through Italy, vol. iii., p. 133. Sixth edit. London, 1821.

‡ Graham's Three Months' Residence in the Mountains East of Rome, p. 34. Second edit. London, 1821.

[* "Rome in the Nineteenth Century, vol. ii., pp. 253—257. 8vo. Edinburgh, 1820.

["† Vide Lettres sur les Jubilés. These secular games were sacred to Apollo and Diana, for the safety of the empire, and celebrated with the most astonishing pomp and splendour, generally at the end of a hundred or a hundred and three years.

[‡ Rome in the Nineteenth Century, Letter lii., vol. ii., pp. 342, 343. Edinburgh, 1820.]

The Tax-Book of the Roman Chancery fixes a price for the absolution of such crimes as the sovereign Pontiff only can forgive. Mr. Butler * may attempt to show, that this tax is only a fee of office for the document of the Pope, which gives the power of absolution to the Priest; but the truth is, that the absolution of those sins which are reserved for the Pope's pardon may be had for money.

[The Rev. J. Mendham, who has thoroughly investigated the subject of the Taxæ of the Roman Chancery and Penitentiary, justly observes, that "in the whole compass of literature there scarcely exists any book, or set of books, more curious, and for several reasons and purposes more important in themselves; more numerous in editions, and less concealed for some time after their first appearance, and more rare of occurrence in modern ages; more indispensable and profitable to their real parent, who yet most positively and earnestly disowns his progeny, certainly with good and obvious reason, but in defiance of undeniable proof of filiation; and, finally, of which the accounts, with the means of being much otherwise, are more defective, confused, erroneous, and unsatisfactory, than those extant of the books bearing for substance the title of 'TAXÆ CANCELLARIÆ APOSTOLICÆ,' and 'TAXÆ SACRÆ PŒNITENTIARIÆ APOSTOLICÆ.' It may be important to observe in the outset, that these two works, although frequently confounded, are really distinct, at least, as portions under the general denomination.

["The first author who examined the subject critically was Bayle, in his Dictionary, under the articles 'Banck,' 'Pinet,' 'Tuppius.' The first French edition, indeed, of a form of the TAXÆ by Antoine du Pinet, in 1564, under the title of Taxe des Parties Casuelles, &c., and the re-impressions previous to the time of Bayle, contain nothing that is calculated to satisfy the curiosity of the inquirer, who is desirous of becoming acquainted with the authorities upon which such documents were sent into the world, so as to prevent the most dexterous and practised artifice eluding or destroying them.

["All writers, however, have not been so unfortunate. The first of this class to which attention is directed, is Prosper Marchand, who, in his Dictionaire Historique, &c., published in 1759, under the word Taxæ, exhibits the fullest, the most correct, and in all respects the best and most satisfactory, account to be found of the extraordinary volumes now under consideration. He is the principal author upon this subject, and his work is considered the foundation, on which any future similar work is to be raised."

[With regard to the origin of these taxæ, and particularly to those of the Pœnitentiariæ, which are obviously of the chief importance, Mr. Mendham observes: "The power of absolving from sin in general, or from any particular sin, upon considerations deemed equivalent or satisfactory, comes under the general head of Indulgences, which the later Bishops or Pontiffs of Rome claim the prerogative of dispensing, on grounds which themselves have stated. The species of indulgence known by the name of jubilee, and which from being at first celebrated at the interval of fifty years, then at that of thirty-three, and afterwards, which has continued with one exception to the present time, at that of a quarter of a century, is allowed, without dispute, to have been first instituted by Boniface VIII., in the year 1300. In the short Bull appointing this first jubilee, the Pontiff begins by affirming, that anciently to the visiters of St. Peter's Church there were conceded great remissions and indulgences of sins; that these are renewed by him; and that this and every future hundredth year, he (and his successors, it is presumed) 'have granted and will grant, not only a full and abundant, but the fullest, pardon of all the sins' of those who are truly penitent and confess. (Non solum plenam et largiorem, imo plenissimam omnium suorum concedemus et concedimus veniam peccatorum.) The encouragement is added, that the more frequent and devout the visits, the more effectual. The terms here used are not very measured, no qualification is expressed of the kind of pardon; and if what seems to be admitted as a maxim in the interpretation of indulgences, tantum valent quantum sonant, be applied here, the receivers of the benefit were under no obligation to moderate their view of its extent.

["The next Bull, to the same purpose, was issued by Clemens VI., at the distance of only half a century; for to that period his concern that Christendom should not continue to be deprived of so great a blessing, had reduced it. And this instrument is of the more curiosity and importance, because it declares and describes, by the claimant of the power himself, the source from whence that power is derived. 'Christ,' says his infallible Vicar, 'shed, not a moderate drop of blood, which, from his Divinity, had sufficed for the universal redemption of man, but a copious flood, which he would not have to be useless and superfluous, but to constitute an inexhaustible treasury for the militant church.' 'This treasure he' did not put in a napkin, or hide in a field, but 'committed to St. Peter, the key-keeper of heaven, and to his successors, his own Vicars on earth, to be prudently dispensed to the faithful; and, for proper and reasonable causes, at one time for the total, at another for the partial, remission of the temporal punishment due for sin, as well generally as specially, in conformity with the known will of God, to be mercifully administered to those who are truly penitent and confess. To the accumulation of which treasure the merits of the holy mother of God, and of all the elect, from the first just one to the last, are known to contribute; of the consumption or diminution of which not the least fear needs be entertained, as well on account of the infinite merits of Christ, before stated, as from the consideration, that the greater number of persons are attracted to righteousness by the application of it, so much is the amount of the merits increased.' By this ingenious hypothesis, the same pipe which drains, returns into and replenishes the reservoir.

["The original of the most considerable part of the above is: 'Quem quidem thesaurum, per Beatum Petrum cœli clavigerum, ejusque successores, suos in terris Vicarios, commisit fidelibus salubriter dispensandum; et propriis et rationabilibus causis, nunc pro totali, nunc pro partiali remissione pœnæ temporalis pro peccatis debitæ, tam generaliter, quam specialiter, prout cum Deo expedire cognoscerent vere pœnitentibus et confessis misericorditer applicandum. Ad cujus quidem thesauri cumulum beatæ Dei genitricis, omniumque electorum, a primo justo ad ultimum, merita adminiculum præstare noscuntur; de cujus consumptione,' &c. *

["It is remarkable, that in the latter document either abatement of claim or prudence has limited the remission to temporal punishment. But in this, as in most other pretensions of the same nature, there is a convenient generality, or glorious uncertainty. The cloud may be made to assume any figure which the imagination or interest suggests.

* Book of the Roman Catholic Church, in a series of Letters addressed to Robert Southey, Esq., LL.D., by Charles Butler, Esq., p. 98. London, 1825.

["* Corpus Juris Canonici, Extravag. Commun., lib. v., tit. ix., cap. i., ii.

["To this power of granting indulgence," proceeds Mr. Mendham, "is to be assigned the power of pecuniary absolution, or the commutation of penance for money, which is the foundation of the Taxæ, and constitutes their essence. Simply to enjoin penitence and penance, and to absolve the offender on the performance of them, may be considered as an exercise of ecclesiastical authority emanating from the power of the keys; but to allow these to be commuted, to be compounded for, or redeemed by money, is certainly the exercise of a farther prerogative,—it is not an act of discipline, but of indulgence. And that such a prerogative was claimed by the Church, with respect to all sins, of whatsoever enormity, is evident from many, perhaps the greater part, of the ancient Penitentiary Canons.'

["This important subject will be elucidated by inquiring into a few of them.

["Theodorus, who was sent from Rome to be Archbishop of Canterbury in the seventh century, was the first who introduced Penitentiary Canons from the east into the west. His Penitentiale is extant; but not having," says Mr. Mendham, "the work before me, and the want of it being of little importance, as his successors copy from him, I pass to the next successor in that province,—the venerable Beda, our countryman. He has given a work of this description, under the title De Remediis Peccatorum. And here (which is all that answers our particular purpose to remark) the penance enjoined for all sorts, and the most infamous of crimes, might, in case of inability (not easily distinguishable from disinclination) to perform the penance, be commuted by alms-giving, which doubtless went through the hands of the Confessors or others. 'Item qui non potest sic agere pœnitentiam sicut superius diximus, in primo anno eroget in eleemosynam solidos viginti tres, pro uno anno in pane et aqua, donet in eleemosynam solidos viginti duos, et in unaquaque hebdomade unum diem jejunet ad nonam, et alium ad vesperum, et tres quadragesimas; in secundo anno viginti solidos; pro tertio anno decem et octo solidos; qui sunt sexaginta quatuor solidi.' (C. xiv.) We here see how naturally, and almost innocently, crept in a system which, in process of time, attained the most flagitious character.

["We are still," observes Mr. Mendham, "unfortunately, because not very honourably, detained in our own country; and the next instance is supplied by the Pœnitentiale of Ecgbert, Archbishop of York, in the eighth century. The work is of some length, and is extant in Saxon and Latin. Here, where we are likewise disgusted with the demoralizing particularization of the vilest iniquity, an advance is made in the compounding system. A consideration is had of the different capabilities of the rich and the poor; the penances are more accurately valued; and the alms are to be divided into three parts, one to the altar, the second for redeeming slaves, the third to be distributed to ecclesiastic necessities: ut ecclesiasticis necessitatibus distribuatur. After some other matter of the same character, there follows an enumeration of what are called the twelve remissions of sin.*

["In the ecclesiastic laws of Alfred, something of the same kind occurs; but it is in the nature of direct fine, not as the redemption of penance.

["We now return to the legitimate and congenial soil of such productions; and in the Pœnitentiale Romanum—a collection from a more ancient book of the same name, and others, and strongly characterized by its offensiveness; in an extract from the ancient work of Theodorus, (tit. ix., cap. xxvi.—xxix.,) we find the same pecuniary composition for declined penance, adapted in one case, in the proportion of three to one, to the different means of the rich and the poor. The canon derived from Theodorus is nearly, if not quite, the same as that given above from Beda." *

[* "Si quis cum vero Dei amore pro seipso intercedere velit, in sacris Scripturis dictum est, quod omnipotens Deus duodecim modis hominibus dat remissionem peccatorum. Prima remissio peccatorum est per lavacrum baptismi. Secunda remissio est per Dei et hominum amorem; ut quis diligat Deum ex toto corde, et tunc proximum suum, hoc est, quemlibet Christianum, uti seipsum. Tertia remissio est per distributionem eleemosynarum; quoniam scriptum est, quod sicuti cum aqua ignis extinguitur, ita eleemosyna delet hominum peccata. Quarta remissio est per psalmodiam et lachrymarum effusionem; ut quis peccatorum suorum pœnitentiam agat, et fleat, prouti quis facit propter amici sui obitum. Quinta remissio est per confessionem peccatorum; ut quis peccata sua confiteatur Confessario suo, et ei secreta sua revelet, et deinde compenset, prouti ipsi præscripserit. Sexta remissio est, ut quis ex amore Dei, et propter animæ suæ salutem, corporis sui injustas cupiditates superet, et seipsum adeo subjuget per jejunium et per alias virtutes, ut homo interior, hoc est, anima, pro pia habeatur. Septima remissio est, ut quis possessionem suam, et infantes suos, ac patriam suam ex amore Dei deserat, et in terram extraneam abeat, et ibi vitam suam finiat. Octava remissio est, cum quis ex hac vita decedit per supplicium; et amici ipsius, cum in vivis esset, eum redimere possunt, et ipsi remissionem apud Deum obtinere per vias servitiorum, et per possessiones suas mundanas. Nona remissio est misericordia, et bona fides. Decima remissio est, cum aliquem a peccatis suis ad Dei voluntatem convertimus. Undecima remissio est, ut quis ex amore Dei remittat illorum delicta, qui erga eum deliquerunt; quoniam Salvator in Evangelio suo dixit: 'Remittite, et remittetur vobis.' Duodecima remissio est martyrium, uti fiebat latroni ante passionem Domini, cum Salvator ipsi diceret: 'Verum est, quod tibi dico, Nunc hodie tu eris mecum in Patris mei regno.'"—Wilkins, Conc. Magn. Brit. et Hib., tom. i., Pœnitent. Ecgberti, Arch. Ebor., pp. 140, 141.

[* "Cap. xxvi. Qui in ecclesia genua centies flexerit, id est, si centies veniam petierit, si fieri potest ut in ecclesia fiat hoc, justissimus est; si autem hoc fieri non potest, secrete in loco convenienti eadem facit; si sic fecerit, eo die, excepto vino, carne et sagimine, sumat quod placeat.

["Qui Psalmos non novit, unum diem, quem in pane et aqua pœnitere debet, dives tribus denariis, et pauper uno denario redimat; et eo die, excepto vino, carne et sagimine, sumat quidquid velit.

["Cap. xxvii. Ex eodem. De illis qui jejunare non possunt, et Psalmos nesciunt, quo modo pœnitentiam unius anni, quem in pane et aqua jejunare debent, redimere possint. Qui vero Psalmos non novit, et jejunare non potest, pro uno anno, quem in pane et aqua pœnitere debet, det pauperibus in eleemosynam viginti duos solidos, et omnes sextas ferias jejunet in pane et aqua, et tres quadragesimas, id est, quadraginta dies ante Pascha, et quadraginta dies ante festivitatem Sancti Joannis Baptistæ, et si ante festivitatem aliquid remanserit, post festivitatem adimpleat, et quadraginta dies ante nativitatem Domini. In his tribus quadragesimis quidquid suo ori præparatur in cibo, vel in potu, vel cujuscumque generis illud sit, æstimet, quanti pretii sit, vel esse possit, et medietatem illius pretii distribuat in eleemosynam pauperibus, et assidue oret et roget Deum, ut oratio ejus, et ejus eleemosynæ apud Deum acceptabiles sint.

["Cap. xxviii. Ex Pœnitentiali Theodori. De redemptione illius anni, quem in pane et aqua jejunare debet. Item qui jejunare non potest, et observare quod in Pœnitentiali scriptum est, faciat hoc quod Sanctus Bonifacius Papa constituit. Pro uno die, quem in pane et aqua jejunare debet, roget Presbyterum, ut missam cantet pro eo, nisi sint crimina capitalia, quæ confessa prius lavari cum lacrymis debent, et tunc ipse adsit, et audiat missam, et devote ipse offerat propriis manibus panem, et vinum manibus Sacerdotis, et intente respondeat, quantum sapit ad salutationes, et exhortationem Sacerdotis, et humiliter Deum deprecetur, ut oblatio, quam ipse Presbyter pro se, et pro peccatis suis Deo obtulerit, Deus omnipotens misericorditer per angelum suum suscipere dignetur; et eo die, excepto vino, et carne et sagimine, comedat quidquid vult, et sic redimat reliquos anni dies.

["Cap. xxix. Ex eodem. De illis, qui jejunare non possunt, et habent unde redimere possint. Si quis forte non potuerit jejunare,

[In his investigations into the subject of these Taxæ, Mr. Mendham is indebted to Rusticus, in his three capital offences, for an important reference to the Antiquities of Muratori,* containing a dissertation De Indulgentiarum Origine, where the learned Romanist affirms, that "in process of time, men dedicated to God reduced the entire redemption of penances to pecuniary mulcts, which, for the most part, they did not allow to escape from their own hands." There is also the following passage, one of those no doubt which were not very acceptable to Benedict XIV. :—"Quare ex quo Canones Pœnitentiales in occidente prodierunt, et invecta fuit forma ejusmodi redemptionis : multis, ne dicam plerisque, e clero via lata aperta est ad suum sibi commodum procurandum, non minusquam alienum." But his most important communication is, the Penitential Canons of the Monastery at Bobbio, near Piacenza, entitled "Pœnitentiæ Ritus e Codd. MSS. Monasterii Bobiensis." There the rate of compensation, if a penitent could not fast, was twenty-six solidi for one year's fasting, provided he were rich, and three if poor, with a great deal more to a similar purpose. The usual enormities are included.

["The Roman tax-tables (for such they may very appropriately be called) are certainly a considerable advance and improvement upon the simple indulgence, under which they class; for there, absolution for the grossest crimes—perhaps for all crimes—is expressly set to sale at specified prices,—without any allusion or admonition respecting the two first parts of penance, although, if mentioned, they would probably occasion no impediment. But, in the penitentiary part, that which chiefly occupies us, the whole is nothing but bare absolution, or dispensation, or licence, &c., for grossi, or fiorени, or ducats; 'pounds, shillings, and pence.'

["To what times or persons the origin of these small and precious volumes is to be assigned is, perhaps, impossible to be determined. The least objectionable part, indicating only unprincipled cupidity and rapacity, the Chancery taxes, may, with certainty, be traced back to Pope John XXII., who reigned at the beginning of the fourteenth century, and is celebrated by Papal as well as other historians, for his immoderate extortion by the dexterous management of benefices, and by other means, and for the immense wealth which he accumulated and left behind him.

["Polydorus Virgilius indeed expressly ascribes the origin of some such taxes to him. 'At dein Johannes XXII., ineundæ rationis studiosus, qua rem angustam domi juvaret, Collegium scribarum Apostolicorum primus numero distinxit, qui literas proprio ingenio dictatas conscriberent, nonnullaque alia munia obirent, atque in illud suos scribas precio duntaxat adscitos voluit.' 'Taxationes item constituit, per quas taxatis, hoc est, æstimatis Sacerdotiis, quæ ipse contulisset, caperetur vectigal.' He proceeds: 'Rem vero omnem ad Apostolicæ pœnitentiariæ quam dicunt, curam pertinentem, Benedictus XII. omnium primus excogitavit, simul et taxationes literarum ordine constituit.'"*

[This high-principled and uncompromising adversary of the Papacy proceeds to the enumeration of the various editions of the Taxæ, pertaining to the Penitentiary, as well as to the Chancery of Rome, and extending from the year 1471, in which Sextus IV. occupied the pontifical chair, to the year 1820; during which period not less than FORTY-FIVE impressions appeared before the public.

[Mr. Mendham adverts to the manuscript collection of these Taxæ, which appears in the British Museum, from which he has made copious extracts; and having ourselves examined this document, and compared Mr. Mendham's quotations with the original manuscript, we can solemnly vouch for the fidelity and exactness of the transcript. The original is found in the Harleian department of that national depository, and is described in the last catalogue of the manuscripts in it, in four volumes, folio, 1808, in volume ii., p. 262, et seq. It consists of two volumes, small folio, Numb. 1850, 1852, written on vellum, having every appearance of genuineness and coeval antiquity; that is, the former part of the sixteenth century. These volumes were withdrawn from the archives of the Roman Chancery, on the death of Innocent XII., by John Aymon, Apostolic Prothonotary; and bought of him in Holland at a great price by the Earl of Oxford. They contain copies of the Taxæ, both Cancellariæ and Pœnitentiariæ, in various forms.

["And now," says Mr. Mendham, "it may fairly be asked whether, in the face of the evidence which has been adduced, the pretence can, with the slightest probability, be supported, that these infamous publications are not the genuine and authentic productions of the Papacy. We have seen the way prepared by the Penitentiary Canons; and to them have succeeded the regular Tax-Books, of the genuineness of which no reasonable doubt can be entertained: the first of these, to more than the number of twenty, issued from countries and places devoted to the Roman See; the very first, to the number of fifteen, from Rome itself, most of them attested by Audifredi in a professed work enumerating the first Roman editions, dedicated quite devoutly to Pius Sextus, Pont. Opt. Max. (quasi Deo Opt. Max.); the rest from Paris, Cologne, Venice, that from the last place under the auspices of Pope Gregory XIII. The printing—not the publication, with which perhaps Rome little deserves to be charged—was probably rendered necessary or expedient from the number of agents, or collectors of these taxes, employed by the successors of St Peter. And beyond Rome, in the countries subject to these impositions, it might be desirable for individuals to know what their vices would cost them, and how far they could sustain the expense. It appears from Mornay, that these books were made no matter of secrecy, but were publicly and openly exposed to sale.†

et habuerit unde possit redimere, si dives fuerit, pro septem hebdomadibus det solidos viginti; si non habuerit, unde tantum dare possit, det solidos decem; si autem multum pauper fuerit, det solidos tres. Neminem vero conturbet, quia jussimus dare solidos viginti, aut minus; quia si dives fuerit, facilius est illi dare solidos viginti, quam pauperi tres: sed attendat unusquisque cui dare debeat, sive pro redemptione captivorum, sive super sanctum altare, sive Dei servis, sive pauperibus in eleemosynam."—Canones Pœnitentiales quibus ordine succedunt hi tractatus, &c., cum quibusdam notis Antonii Augustini Archiep. Tarraconensis, tit. ix., cap. xxvi.—xxix. Venetiis, 1584.

["* Murator. Antiq. Ital. Med. Ævi, tom. v., col. 711. Edit. Milan., 1738.

["* Polydori Virgilii, Urbinatis, De Rerum Inventoribus, lib. viii., pp. 460, 461. Basil, 1544."

[The spiritual Venality of Rome. Taxæ Sacræ Pœnitentiariæ Apostolicæ; preceded by a historical and critical account of the Taxæ Cancellariæ Apostolicæ, and Taxæ Sacræ Pœnitentiariæ Apostolicæ, of the united Church and Court of modern Rome. By Emancipatus. (The Rev. Joseph Mendham.) Second edition. London, 1836, p. 1, et seq.

[† "Antichrist is properly called 'The Man of Sin,' not only because he daily practiseth sin, but because he seeketh gain by sin, because he soweth, planteth, produceth, and multiplieth sin, by innumerable cunning practices. In a word, if we believe him, he abolisheth all sins of omission and commission, be they never so

[" But we may and have been told that these works have been formally and publicly condemned by Papal authority in the Indices Prohibitorii. This is a matter worth inquiring into: it is both a literary and a Papal curiosity. By the year 1564, when the Trent Index was compiled and published, (to say nothing of preceding indices,) twenty-seven of the editions of the Taxæ had appeared, and there were probably more, now unknown—and yet no notice whatever was taken of them, not of a single instance! The first notice which was taken of them, or rather of something like one of them, was in the year 1570, just a century after the appearance of the first edition, and that not in a Roman Index, but in an Appendix to the Roman one, published by the authority of the King of Spain. And in what terms does it there appear? Praxis et Taxæ Officinæ Pœnitentiariæ, a work which, if it ever existed under that title, was probably never, and is certainly now not, known." * " It is, however, generally admitted to refer to the copy of the Centum Gravamina; as if this were the only edition, or none had proceeded from Rome and elsewhere, or were not known! But let us follow the story of this singular condemnation. With apparent misgiving, and possibly with some fear, that, in its simple form, it might involve what the Papacy knew to be its own offspring, the next Index published by Papal authority in Rome, that of 1596, by Clement VIII., adds,—'ab hæreticis depravata.' In the edition by Pius VI. in 1786, it is still further slightly, probably with some intention, altered,—'cum ab hæreticis sit depravata.' It is the same in Pius VII.'s in 1806, and in 1819. By this specification the condemnation is limited; but it is a virtual admission, that some copy or copies existed which were not so depraved. It would have been charitable to point out how they were depraved. In fact, in another and more important sense, the undoubted editions of this work were depraved enough. And this dilatory, ambiguous, condemnation of a poor solitary nondescript, is to be accepted as a proof of innocence, or acquittal from the guilt of having issued or authorized the abominable works in question! Further, how are we to account for the exemplary forbearance and deep silence of these organs of biblical condemnation, respecting all the other editions of the Taxæ but the one which is noticed, that of Banck, by known heretics, by Du Pinet, by Wolfius, by S. Du Mont, and other nameless editors at Paris and Amsterdam? * The fact is, the Taxæ, admitted plainly to have been published, if not for the first time, by a Pope, John XXII., stand very nearly upon the same ground as the Regulæ, Ordinationes, Constitutiones, &c., together with which they are often bound up, which have never been disputed as Papal productions, and with which, in all their divisions, they bear every mark and proof of strict alliance and fraternity." †

[Additional confirmation has been adduced by Mr. Mendham from a well-known passage in the writings of the celebrated Claude D'Espence, who particularly refers to the edition of the Taxæ published in Paris, 1520. Not doubting that it was a genuine production of Rome, he does not once hint that it proceeded from any heretical quarter, and very distinctly distinguishes it from the Centum Gravamina: the official situation which he held enabled him to decide correctly on this subject, so that he speaks of the whole affair in terms of unqualified reprobation. D'Espence was a Doctor of the Sorbonne, and Rector of the University of Paris. Paul IV. would have made him a Cardinal, had not the supposed interest of France prevented. Crashaw writes respecting him, "Of whom not only Thuanus, Bochellius, and other indifferent and moderate, but even Possevine the Jesuit, and Genebrard, that rough and bitter Papist, give most honourable testimony." ‡ heinous and horrible; yea, which is more, for, to get in greater store of money, that which is with God no sin, that which is indifferent, he by his laws and prohibitions maketh to be sin, and exaggerateth it far above that which is truly sin. Which things are sufficiently proved by the books of the Taxes of the Apostolical Chancery, and Sacred Penitentiaries, which yet are sold in Rome, printed at this very time in Paris, at the sign of the Golden Sun in St. Jaques-street; and these books are no less commonly used among his brokers, than Calendars with husbandmen, or the Book of Customs and Entries among merchants. In which books are sold and taxed, at a dear rate, dispensations and absolutions of all kinds, of consanguinity, carnal, spiritual, in regard of degrees, or for want of age, for imperfection, natural or accidental, or according as they are more or less noble or profitable, for irregularity, for vicious promotion, or ministry without promotion, (what kind of consecration by their own rules may thereupon follow?) for bastardy, for bigamy, for all manner of maims, or for murder of all kinds, of a Clergyman, of a layman, of father, mother, son, brother, sister, wife, &c. And these same much less taxed than of the least Priest. Also for empoisonings, enchantments, witchcraft, sacrilege, simony, and their kinds and branches, for lapsus carnis, fornication, adultery, incest, without any exception or distinction; (which I abhor;) for sodomy, brutality: so they particularly express them. Of which most horrible and enormous crimes the absolution is rated at a less price than is any, the least dispensation for the eating of flesh, of butter, milk, or cheese, on days forbidden by the Pope."—The Mysterie of Iniquitie; that is to say, The Historie of Papacie, &c.; by Philip Mornay, Knt., pp. 656, 657, folio. London, 1612.

[* Mendham's Literary Policy of the Church of Rome, exhibited, pp. 74, 75. 8vo. Second edition. London, 1830.

[* " This book has been several times printed, both in Popish and Protestant countries; and the Protestant Princes inserted it among the causes of their rejecting the Council of Trent. When the Papists saw what use the Protestants made of it, they put it into the list of prohibited books. But then they condemned it only upon the supposition of its having been corrupted by the (Protestants, or) heretics. But let them suppose as much as they please, that it has been corrupted by heretics; the editions of it which have been published in Popish countries, and which the Papists cannot disown; as that of Rome, 1514; that of Cologne, 1515; those of Paris, 1520, 1545, and 1625; and those of Venice; one in the sixth volume of Oceanus Juris, published in 1523; the other in the fifteenth volume of the same collection, reprinted 1584;—these editions, I say, are more than sufficient to justify the reproaches of the Protestants, and to cover the Church of Rome with confusion. The Popish controvertists, who have not a word to say against the authority of the edition of Rome, or that of Paris, &c., are under great perplexity. However, since the Protestants have made so great a handle of this book, the Papists pretend that, though some of the Popes have been guilty of such infamous practices, and suffered such books to appear, yet the Church of Rome in general abhors them. (A fine proof of the infallibility of their Popes!)

[" But the Church of Rome has never shown, by the suppression of these taxes, that she has had them in abhorrence. They have been printed, as has been already observed, thrice at Paris, twice at Cologne, and twice at Venice. And some of these editions have been published since Claude D'Espence, a Popish Doctor, exclaimed publicly against the enormities of the book. The Inquisition of Spain, and that of Rome, have condemned the book only as they (pretend) it to have been corrupted by heretics.

[" I must add, that the suppression of such a work is not a sure sign of disapproving the rules which it contains. This may only signify that they repented of the publication of it, as it gave so fair a handle for the Protestants to reproach the court of Rome, and to wound the Church of Rome through the sides of the Pope. These ought to be esteemed 'mysteries of the state,' arcana imperii, not fit to be divulged."—Dr. Benson's Dissertation concerning the Man of Sin. Wetson's Theolog. Tracts, vol. v., p. 274.

[† Mendham's Spiritual Venality of Rome, p. 71, et seq.

[‡ " See likewise Du Pin's Eccles. Hist., Sixteenth Cent., book v., p. 100, et seq. Lond., 1706; where Claude D'Espence, at the close, is described as 'one of the most learned and judicious Doctors of his time.' He was a right good, though not an ultra, Papist; cleared himself well enough from the charge of being heretically affected; thought it was a good action to kneel before a crucifix, or images of the blessed Virgin and saints, when praying to Christ or them; was an enemy to the unrestricted reading of the Scriptures; and approved the sanguinary prohibition of books by Henry II. The Catalogue was published in 1551, and an account of it may be seen in Mend-

[D'Espence has, in his Commentary on Titus i. 7, what he terms "Digressio Secunda," on the word αισχροκερδεια; and there having expressly referred to the Centum Gravamina, he proceeds to say, observes Mr. Mendham,* "that all those charges might be considered as the fiction of the enemies of the Pope, were it not for a book printed, and for some time publicly exposed for sale at Paris, entitled, Taxæ Cameræ seu Cancellariæ Apostolicæ, in which more wickedness may be learned than in all the summaries of all vices, and in which are proposed licence of sinning to most, and absolution to all who will buy it. He wonders that this infamous and scandalous index of iniquity should be so far from being suppressed by the friends and rulers of the Roman Church, that the licences and impunities for such abominations continue to be renewed in the faculties granted to the Legates from Rome, of absolving and rendering capable of ecclesiastical promotion all sorts, and even the most atrocious, of criminals. He then calls upon Rome to blush, and cease any longer to prostitute herself by the publication of so infamous a Catalogue."†

[When the Irish titular or Roman Catholic Bishop, Dr. Doyle, was examined before the Parliamentary Commissioners on the state of Ireland, he very adroitly retorted the charge of pecuniary penance on the Church of England, and referred to Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, under the word PENANCE, in proof of the fact. The instances adduced from that authority by the Romish Divine failed to establish his point. It cannot, however, be denied, that pecuniary fines have occasionally been imposed in Protestant Ecclesiastical Courts; but with what caution, will appear by a reference to the documents in Wilkins's Concilia.* "But," says Mr. Mendham, "if the practice be substantiated in the most objectionable form and degree, from whence came it? from whom did the Church of England receive it? At any rate, the solution of fees of office, which we shall see is the sheet-anchor of the Roman apologists, is, by this supposition of identity, perfectly destroyed; for, in the foregoing instances, it is plain mulct or commutation."†

[Notwithstanding the overwhelming evidence which has been brought forward by Mr. Mendham, in favour of the genuineness and authenticity of those disgraceful documents, modern Roman Catholic Divines have been anxious to deny both. Prelate Milner, in his "End of Religious Controversy," writes respecting what he terms "a curious account," and affirms that it "is borrowed from the Taxæ Cancellariæ Romanæ, a book which has been frequently published, though with great variations, both as to the crimes and the prices, by the Protestants of Germany and France, (!) and as frequently condemned by the See of Rome. (!!!) It is proper that Mr. Clayton" (the gentleman assailed by the veracious Bishop) "and his friends should know, that the Pope's Court of Chancery has no more to do with the forgiveness of sins, than His Majesty's Court of Chancery has. In case there ever was the least real ground-work for this vile book, (!) which I cannot find there ever was, the money paid into the Papal Chancery could be nothing else but the fees of office, on restoring certain culprits to the civil privileges which they had forfeited by their crimes."‡ If Bishop Milner were as ignorant as he pretends, what induces him to write in terms ex cathedra, and so dogmatic? But if he were acquainted with the history and mystery of these most unlucky productions of the Papal hierarchy, then we must leave him in the hands of that Being who judgeth righteous judgment. Will any of the apologists of Dr. Milner now living, (we allude to such men as Drs. Lingard, Wiseman, and Thomas Butler,) inform the Protestant public why the late Prelate never alluded to the Pope's Penitentiary, but confined his observations exclusively to the Pope's Chancery, which is comham's Literary Policy, &c., pp. 34, 35. D'Espence took a leading part in the Colloquy of Poissy, 1561: he likewise acted there as Prompter to the juvenile, and not very theologic, Cardinal of Lorraine."—Spiritual Venality of Rome, p. 77.

[* The original is as follows:—"Quæ scandala ex Gravaminibus Germanicis passim collecta, 1, 2, 5, 8, 67, 74, 75, 84, 91, 95. Hæc, inquam, lucra turpia odio Pontificis Romani ficta sint, si non, quod ait et conqueritur ille; velut, ["Prostat, et in quæstu pro meretrice sedet, liber palam ac publice hic impressus hodieque, ut olim, venalis, Taxa Cameræ seu Cancellariæ Apostolicæ, inscriptus, in quo plus scelerum discas licet, quam in omnibus omnium vitiorum summistis et summariis, et plurimis quidem licentia, omnibus autem absolutio empturientibus proposita: parco nominibus, nam, quod ait nescio quis, Nomina sunt ipso pene timenda sono.

Mirum hoc tempore, hoc schismate, non suppressum tot tamque fœdorum, tamque horrendorum scelerum velut indicem adeo infamem, ut non putem in Germania, Helvetia, et ubicumque a Romana sede defectum est, opus prostare majore hujus scandalo, et adeo tamen non supprimitur ab Ecclesiæ Romanæ favissoribus, ut tantorum ac talium facinorum licentiæ ac impunitates in facultatibus Legatorum illinc huc venientum bona ex parte innoventur atque confirmentur, adversus (si Deo placet) quæcumque fatalia restituendi, ac etiam quoscumque spurios, manseres, bastardes, ex quocumque illicito coitu, &c., cum his qui se per adulterium polluerint, ut connubere possint, perjuros, simoniacos, falsarios item, raptores, usurarios, schismaticos, hæreticos, sed ad cor reversos, non absolvendi tantum, sed et ad ordines, honores, dignitates, et beneficia quæcunque, quotcunque, qualiacunque, dispensandi, homicidas quoque, sed casuales, seu involuntarios, nam nec voluntarios quidem excepit Taxa superior, presbytericidas, parricidas, matricidas, fratricidas, sororicidas, uxoricidas, infanticidas, veneficas, incantatrices, concubinarios, adulteros, incestos, cum affinibus aut consanguineis, denique contra naturam, cum brutis, &c. Habeat jam Roma pudorem, et tam nullius frontis criminum omne genus Catalogum prostituere desinat." Parisiis, 1568, pp. 67, 68. "No wonder this work had soon the honour of insertion in an Index Expurgatorius, and this passage a particular reference. See the Index of Quiroga, General Inquisitor of Spain, Madriti, 1584, fol. 72, or the reprints. The expurgatory class of Indexes are very useful in directing Protestants at once to those passages, even in Papal writers, from which the Papacy receives some of her most mortal wounds. They were never, however, meant to come into our hands, and Rome has been more prudent than Spain."

[† Spiritual Venality of Rome, p. 78.

[* We allude to the "Form for regulating Proceedings," &c., by Convocation, dated April 30th, 1714, under sect. iii., and extract as follows:—"That in all crimes of ecclesiastical cognizance, the Judge and Register shall send out their citations," &c. "And that no commutation of penance be hereafter accepted or allowed of by any ecclesiastical Judge, without an express consent given in writing by the Bishop of the diocess, or other Ordinary having exempt jurisdiction, or by some person or persons to be especially deputed by them for that purpose; and that all commutations, or pretended commutations, accepted or allowed otherwise, than is hereby directed, be, ipso facto, null and void.

["That no sum of money, given or received for any commutation of penance, or any part thereof, shall be disposed of to any use, without the consent and direction in writing of the Bishop, or other Ordinary having exempt jurisdiction, if the cause hath been prosecuted in their Courts, or of the Archdeacon, if the cause hath been prosecuted in his Court; and all money received for commutation pursuant to the foregoing directions, shall be disposed of to pious and charitable uses" (not fees of office) "by the respective Ordinaries above named, whereof at least one third part shall by them be disposed of in the parish where the offenders dwell. And that a register be kept in every Ecclesiastical Court of such commutations, and of the particular uses, to which such money hath been applied; and that the account so registered be every year laid before the Bishop, or other exempt Ordinary having Episcopal jurisdiction, in order to be audited by them; and that any ecclesiastical Judge or officer offending in any of the premisses, be suspended for three months for the said offence."—Wilkins's Concil. Magn. Brit., vol. iv.

[† Mendham's Spiritual Venality of Rome, p. 82.

[‡ End of Controversy, Letter xli., p. 339, note. 12mo. Eighth edition. London.

paratively of little importance, when placed in juxtaposition with the former?

[The late Charles Butler, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn, in his Book of the Roman Catholic Church, in addressing Robert Southey, LL. D., says, "You have seen the Taxæ Cancellarii Romani; and you conclude that the sums of money, stated in that document to be paid for absolutions, are the purchase of them at those prices. The real state of the case is as follows:—There are some sins so enormous that, in order to raise the greater horror of them, the absolution from them is reserved to the Holy See. In these cases the Priest, to whom the penitent reveals them in confession, states them, without any mention of person, time, or place, to the Roman See; and the Roman See, when it thinks the circumstance of the case renders it proper, grants a faculty to the Priest to absolve the penitent from them. All this is attended with expense. An office or tribunal is kept up for that purpose; and, to defray the expenses attending these applications, a fee is required for the document in which the power of absolution is granted. Thus the sums of money are only fees of office: they are small: the lips of a Roman datary * would water at the sight of a bill of an English Proctor."† We ask the apologists above named, why were these documents condemned? and why was that poor scrupulous Papist, Claude D'Espence, so shocked and indignant?

["It is true," says the Jesuit Lingard, "that for the transaction of business in the Papal Chancery, as well as in the Ecclesiastical Courts in England, fees have been required by the officers; but fees are not paid as the price of sin, but for—the expedition of business. This circumstance, however, furnished a useful hint to some of the fathers of the Reformation, who had no objection to a pious fraud, when it might promote the godly work in which they were engaged. The Taxæ Cancellariæ Romanæ were ingeniously corrected, interpolated, and enlarged; the improved copy was circulated by the Reformers, as a proof that Rome was the great custom-house of sin; and the cheat was greedily devoured by the prejudices of their disciples."‡ All this may sound very plausible in the ears of Dr. Lingard's congregation at Hornby; but we must ask him, Why did Claude D'Espence, Doctor of the Sorbonne, and Rector of the University of Paris, wonder "that this infamous and scandalous index of iniquity should be so far from being suppressed by the friends and rulers of the Roman Church, that the licences and impunities for such abominations continue to be renewed in the faculties granted to the Legates from Rome, of absolving and rendering capable of ecclesiastical promotion all sorts, and even the most atrocious, of criminals?"

[It is, after all, truly amusing to witness the somewhat awkward dilemma into which the modern champions of Popery are brought on the subject of this abomination. "At one time," says Mr. Mendham, "it is the 'vile book,' which had no existence but in the invention of heretics, and was uniformly disavowed, abominated, condemned by the innocents upon whom it was charged. But this plan of attack, and this position, could not—there were shrewd fears—be maintained. The assailants, therefore, on a sudden get to the other side of the fortress, and endeavour to undermine and blow it up with 'fees of office.' Between the two, the besiegers hardly know which method to choose, or rather to adhere to, not considering themselves so attentively as perhaps others will do for them, that the two parties, as far as their efforts are effectual, annoy, and must eventually destroy, each other; for if the book is so vile as to be disowned, it cannot be so innocent as to contain only what morality allows. Mr. C. Butler (with Dr. Lingard) has adopted the fees-of-office defence: then he admits, which he cannot deny, the authenticity of the documents, with all their inseparable abominations. Utrum vis." *

["Now for the reasons which I myself have for considering it a spurious production," says Dr. Thomas Butler, Chamberlain to His Holiness Pope Gregory XVI., and formerly President and Professor of Divinity in St. Clement's College, Rome; and what are they?

["First, It is a palpable forgery, because even the printer has not dared to put his name to it. Secondly, Because it has not the Censor's approbation; and no work, as it is well known, can be printed in a Catholic country without such approbation. Thirdly, Because it is asserted to be printed at Rome in the year 1744,—a work, to be sure, printed at Rome more than two hundred years after the Reformation, to expose the infamies of Popes! Fourthly, Because it is said to be printed at Rome in Latin, and in French, forsooth, for the benefit of Italians. Fifthly, Because immediately after its first appearance it was condemned at Rome, at Paris, and at Madrid, as a manifest calumny against the church of Christ." +

[This learned Divine would fain have us believe, that the edition of the Taxæ Cancellariæ Romanæ to which he refers, namely, that of 1744, was the very first that had appeared. Can he seriously entertain this opinion? We can confidently assure him that long, very long, before his coming into the world was anticipated by his progenitors, numerous editions of these obnoxious Taxæ had been published by authority, and widely circulated, in Papal countries; and we would advise him, that, ere he again venture before the public in the character of a Popish disputant, to describe the production in question "one of the vilest fabrications ever invented by interested, designing, and faithless men," he become better acquainted with the history of his own Church, especially in reference to the iniquitous doctrine of indulgences, which she teaches; and then will he find that, anterior to the appearance of that solitary volume,—the only one of the kind which, he would have us to believe, he had seen, a copy of which is now before us,—forty-three impressions had been circulated, extending from the year 1471, to that of 1714. To notice any of the jejune reasonings of an advocate of Popery, confessedly so ignorant and vain, would be an insufferable absurdity!

[We have not altogether done with Dr. Milner. The decreed Impositions of the Chancery-Court of the Church of Rome, that "great custom-house for sin," were first published to the world, in an English dress, by Anthony Egane, B. D., who had been for some years the Pope's Apostolical Penitentiary or Confessor-General in Ireland, and who revealed this mystery of iniquity, after his conversion to the Protestant faith. The original pamphlet is now

[* Datary, Datarie. C'est une charge considérable dans la Chancellerie du Pape, exercée ordinairement par un Evêque, et souvent par un Cardinal.

[† Butler's Book of the Roman Catholic Church, pp. 111, 112. London, 1825.

[‡ Lingard's Remarks on the Charge of the Bishop of Durham, &c., p. 246. 12mo. Dublin, 1822.

[* Mendham's Literary Policy of the Church of Rome, p. 76 Second edition. London, 1830.

[† Butler's Truths of the (Roman) Catholic Religion proved from Scripture alone, vol. ii., p. 265. 12mo. Fourth edition. London, 1843.

before us, bearing the following title:—"The Book of Rates now used in the Sin Custom-House of the Church and Court of Rome, containing the Bulls, Dispensations, and Pardons for all manner of Villanies and Wickedness, with the several Sums of Monies given and to be paid for them. Published by Anthony Egane, B. D., late Confessor-General of the Kingdom of Ireland, and now, through the mercy of God, Minister of the Gospel according to the Reformed Religion. Licensed according to Order. London, 1674." A second impression appeared in 1678, and a fifth, in 1715; but having grown very scarce, it has been lately republished by the learned and public-spirited Francis Maseres, Esq., Cursitor Baron of the Exchequer, in his last volume of Occasional Essays; "thinking it can never be unseasonable to expose a religion so destructive to the peace and happiness of societies, so derogatory to the glory of God, so contrary to the main end and design of Christianity, and that persecutes with such an unrelenting barbarity (where it can) those that have the courage and honesty to oppose its innovations."*

[In reference to these tables of "decreed impositions," Egane observes, that "there are hundreds even of the ordinary Priests, that know not what it means; because that these arcana imperii are always kept close from them, and reserved on purpose for certain persons called Apostolic Penitentiaries, to whom the absolution of particular and heinous sins is committed; (as it was to myself in Ireland within these four years;) and of such persons there may be one or two in every city or diocess, which, before they receive that power, must take an oath of secrecy never to reveal the mysteries of their Church, and to keep them from the knowledge, not only of the laity, but also of the ordinary Priests and Friars, and especially from any man that is suspected to be of so acute parts, or of so much learning or honesty, as might make him scruple their authority; and neither may it, perhaps, have come to the knowledge of some half-witted fellows, who, either for lucre or liberty, neither stick to the one religion or the other, of which sort of people we have divers amongst us in this kingdom, whose names are not worth the mentioning by either party; but, as to those sins commonly called reserved cases, if any man shall acknowledge himself guilty of any such in confession to an ordinary Confessor, he can only tell him where the Pope's bankers reside, who are to absolve him, and will gladly receive him, so he bring with him the price of his sin; and this great Penitentiary is thereupon to procure a Bull of indulgence and pardon for all wicked persons offending in the cases here set down, and divers others."

[These assertions of Anthony Egane have been corroborated by Father O'Leary, in his "Caution to the common People against Perjury, so frequent at Assizes and Elections." This facetious and talented individual enables us to discover where those "detestable bankers,"† who traffic in these vile anti-Christian and anti-social crimes, are to be found. O'Leary, "the light and glory" of the Popish Clergy of Ireland, as his biographer styles him,‡ says, "In the diocess of Cork, and in several others, the crime of perjury is considered a reserved case, from which no man but the Bishop can absolve, let them be ever so penitent. This restraint shows the enormity of the guilt; whereas the inferior Clergy can reconcile ordinary sinners, upon sincere repentance, and a firm resolution of amendment. But the perjurer, having exceeded the ordinary bounds, let his repentance be ever so sincere, must have recourse to an extraordinary power." "Egane," Mr. Grier declares, "did not go farther than O'Leary does. The former says, that there is a Papal Missionary resident in each diocess in Ireland to absolve from heinous sins; while the latter unwittingly tells us, that the Popish Bishop is the 'detestable banker,' as it cannot be supposed that he exercises his spiritual functions without a reward."*

[Dr. Milner is evidently much chagrined on finding such overwhelming evidence against the practices of the Papacy, of which he endeavours to get rid by inveighing against Egane personally, with whom, he says, "this vile fabrication originated." (!!) The reason which the Bishop assigns for this assumption is, Egane's poverty!† "But what has the account of this man's vagrancy from Ireland to Oxford, and thence to Cambridge, so circumstantially reported from Wood's Athenæ, to do with the main question, which respects the genuineness of the book itself? Although, by the way, Egane does not deserve to have disrespectful mention made of him, since, on leaving the former University in 1673, he bore with him the attested certificate of its Vice-Chancellor and Provost for excellent conduct during his stay there. Be this as it may, the Taxæ went through numberless editions, both in Popish and Protestant countries, before Egane was born. Dr. Milner certainly must have known that a Paris edition of this book made its appearance about the commencement of the Reformation, in a thin

[* Maseres's Occasional Essays, p. 558. 8vo. London, 1809.

[† Milner's Vindication of the End of Religious Controversy, p. 246. London, 1822.

[‡ Life of Dr. O'Leary, by the Rev. Mr. England. 8vo. Cork, 1823.

[* Grier's Defence of his Reply to Dr. Milner, p. 254. London, 1825.

[† The head and front of Egane's offence was his abjuration of Popery, and the subsequent publication of a discourse entitled, "The Franciscan Convert: or, a recantation Sermon of Anthony Egane, late Confessor-General of the Kingdom of Ireland, and Guardian of the Friary of Monasteriores in the Province of Leinster, now a Minister of the Gospel according to the Ordination of the Church of England; preached in London, on April 6th, 1673." Offending in such a manner, would expose Egane equally to the vituperative and slanderous treatment of Anthony Wood, as to the unmeasured and bitter hatred of his quondam friends in the Papacy; the former of whom detested every advance toward Puritanism, and would rather that the Church of England became reconciled to Rome, than that there should be any approach within her pale to a general promulgation of those doctrines which drove Popery from the land, and which alone can keep it out,—especially that of justification by faith. The sneers of Wood at the poverty of Egane might have been spared: they are discreditable to the historian, and reflect upon the honour and honesty of his copyists. When truth is sought, whatever may be the custom of the Papists, Protestants lay but little stress either upon the wealth or poverty of the witness. The absorbing question is, "What is truth?" It is proposed to Anthony Egane: and after all that which Dr. Milner and Anthony Wood have said respecting him, his moral character is unimpeached; and therefore, with us, his testimony is as valid and acceptable as that of any of his opponents. The language adopted by Wood is ungenerous, pitiful, and mean, crowded with vile insinuations, altogether unsupported by fact. He says, "In the month of June this year came to the University of Oxon, from London, an Irishman called Anthony Egane, a Franciscan Friar, and in the beginning of July following he was entered a student in the public library. This person had lately left the Roman Catholic religion, wherein he had been educated and professed; and, under pretence of suffering for what he had done relating thereunto, came to the University more for the sake of relief than study. And after he had continued there about four months, in which time he obtained the charity of £60 or more from several Colleges and private persons, he went to Cambridge, thinking to obtain there the like sum, and when that was done, to return, as it was commonly then reported, to his former religion"—Wood's Athenæ Oxoniensis, vol. ii., Fasti, pp. 194, 195. Fol. London, 1721.

&c., with the French King's licence of sale for three years, from the press of T. Dennis, and that the Taxæ Pœnitentiariæ was published along with it at the same time; that D'Aubigné, in his Confession of Sanci, says that the See of Rome will not suffer this book to be destroyed; and that Richerus, a writer not of inferior note to Dr. Milner, tells us that it is 'a book not to be impeached or disproved.'" *

["We shall now proceed to select from the tables themselves, some of the most remarkable cases of dispensations of vows and oaths, and also of indulgences for crimes, omitting some that are too horrid to be named." †

["I. DISPENSATIONS OF VOWS.

	£.	s.	d.
["1. If a man has vowed, but not solemnly, to take the habit of some religious Order, for changing his vow, made in conscience only, he is to pay	15	4	0
["2. If a man has taken a vow of chastity, solemnly, he may have a dispensation, if necessary, for not keeping his vow, paying the Prelate	15	4	0
["3. For prolonging the term of vows to go to the holy sepulchre, or to St. Peter's, at Rome, upon a lawful cause assigned	9	2	9
["4. If the dispensation be only for two holy years	4	0	1
["5. For changing the pilgrimage to the sepulchre into another	12	3	6
["6. For changing one vow into another for a perpetuity, in the case of a chapter, convent, or great college	100	0	0

["II. DISPENSATIONS OF OATHS.

["7. For the breach of an oath or contract respecting civil employments or concerns.	7	2	3
["8. For a Bull containing both the inhibitory clauses, and absolution from infamy, in such cases	56	9	6
["9. And if several persons are included in the same act or contract, each must pay	3	0	0
["10. For the breach of an oath that cannot be kept without incurring everlasting damnation; as, for example, a dishonest vow, or a wicked promise	6	0	0

["N. B. You are to take notice, that there is a difference to be made between the tax of a Bishop, Abbot, or General of an Order, and of an ordinary person. The Prelates are to be left to the discretion of their Confessors (who best know their incomes).

["III. DISPENSATIONS OF CRIMES.

	£.	s.	d.
["11. For a marriage contracted in the first degree of affinity, and in conscience only, to be paid for according to the ability of the party	1000	2	6
["12. For a marriage in the second degree, beside a gratification to the Prelate, the Pope, or his Missionary, is to be paid	100	15	6
["13. For erecting a public Jewish synagogue	603	15	0
["14. For a private synagogue in a Jew's house	300	1	6
["15. For (a crusader, or) soldier in the Catholic cause, who neither kills nor wounds any (heretic) in war, nor (as an officer) causes another to do so	36	9	0
["16. For pardon and rehabilitation (or re-admission into the bosom of the Church) of a heretic in an ample form, with the inhibitory clause, before abjuration (of his heresy)	36	9	0
["17. For simony, or for fornication of Priests, Friars, or Nuns, each	36	9	6
["18. For incest in a layman	4	6	0
["19. For adultery in the same	4	0	0
["20. For adultery and incest together	6	2	0
["21. For the adulterer and adulteress jointly	6	6	0
["22. For absolution to keep a concubine at bed and board, with a dispensation to hold a benefice	4	5	6
["23. For striking a Clerk or Priest	6	2	2
["24. For striking an Abbot or Prelate	12	6	3
["25. For striking a Bishop or Archbishop	24	6	0
["26. For wounding a Priest in any of his members	18	4	9
["27. For wounding a layman	0	0	6
["28. For murder committed by a Bishop, Abbot, Chief of an Order, or Knight, each	50	12	6
["29. For murder by a Friar, or Guardian of a monastery	40	9	0
["30. For murder, by an ordinary person, to be rated according to circumstances at the discretion of the Prelates	0	0	0
["31. For the murder of a Priest by a layman	6	2	0
["32. And for commutation of public penance to private for the same	18	4	6
["33. For the murder of a layman by a layman	3	2	4
["34. For the murder of a father, mother, brother, sister, or wife, each	4	1	8
["35. For marrying another wife after murdering the former, &c., &c.	8	2	9

["The sole object of these horrible impositions upon the understanding and purses of the deluded followers of these 'merchants of souls,' evidently appears to be the 'unrighteous mammon.' In all the cases the rates are higher for the rich than for the poor; and the highest of all, Nos. 11—14, for what are no crimes in foro conscientiæ, nor the divine law. The marriages of first and second cousins were prohibited by the See of Rome from political motives, to levy a tax upon the Sovereigns of Europe, who necessarily intermarried among each other. And the refusal of the Court of Rome to gratify the haughty and imperious Henry VIII. with a divorce and dispensation to marry Ann Boleyn, brought about the Reformation in England; as the scandalous sale of indulgences in general to recruit the coffers of the profuse and unprincipled Pope Leo X., who uttered that profane speech, 'Quantum nobis lucri attulit hæc de CHRISTO fabula!' roused the indignation of Luther to protest against them, and to lay the foundation of the Reformation." *]

[* Grier's Defence of his Reply, pp. 251, 252.

[† See also Letters in the Roman Catholic Controversy, by W. C. Brownlee, D.D., p. 353, et seq. 8vo. Second edit. New-York, 1834.

[* Hales's Analysis of Chronology, &c., vol. iii., pp. 337—339. Second edit., London, 1830.]

7. Indulgences are employed in the Church of Rome for the purpose of obtaining money. It matters not what the variety or scale of prices may be. The following lines of one of the sons of Rome are but too descriptive of the Papacy:—

"Venalia nobis
Templa, Sacerdotes, altaria, sacra, coronæ,
Ignes, thura, preces: cœlum est venale, Deusque" Bapt. Mantuan. de Calam. iii.

"Temples, Priests, altars, sacred things, crowns, fires, frankincense, prayers, are sold with us: heaven is sold, and even God himself."

Were we to enumerate a small portion of the instances of sacrilegious sales practised by the Church of Rome, we could fill many pages with the recital. The foregoing is their own picture of the enormity, and it needs not to be exhibited in stronger colours.

The Council of Trent, however, decrees, that "all wicked gains accruing from indulgences shall be wholly abolished." But then the Council provides no effectual remedy for the monstrous practices connected with the distribution and sale of indulgences. And though wicked gains are forbidden, what Priest or Pope would ever confess that his gains were of that description?* The inquiry would also arise, If some gains are wicked, what kind of gains may be called right or just? This leads us to the conclusion, that gain is one object to be obtained in the distribution of indulgences. If the office of Papal Collectors, as administered by such men as Tetzel, were abolished, the same duties are performed by the Bishops, or those appointed by them, at the present day; so that the enactment respecting wicked gains and abuses is nugatory, because indulgences continue to form an important part of Papal revenue, and the chief support of the superstitions of the Church of Rome.

Nothing can be more abhorrent to a free Gospel, a free invitation, and free pardon, without money, and without price, than the traffic in indulgences. The severe reproof, addressed to Simon Magus, is applicable to every one that purchases or gives an indulgence: "Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money." (Acts viii. 20.)

Masses and indulgences alternately destroy each other. For if masses release souls, what need is there of indulgences? And if an indulgence will do, what need of masses? According to their doctrine, the deliverance from purgatory is not immediate, but an indulgence remits the debt at once.

["1. Let the Papists henceforth be ashamed of their absurd reproaches of the Reformed churches, as if they were not pure enough or strict enough for them. What doctrines have we that the devil himself can charge us with like theirs of indulgences? Those days are past with them, wherein it was harder for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven, than for a camel to go through the eye of a needle; (Matt. xix. 24;) for now those need never doubt of salvation; it is for such dull souls as we are, to harp upon harsh strings like these: 'They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches, none of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him; for the redemption of their soul is precious, and it ceaseth for ever,' &c.; (Psalm xlix. 6—8;) and that other word of Christ, 'What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?' (Matt. xvi. 26.) We dare not answer these scriptures with that interpretation of Prov. xiii. 8 which he doth, that glosseth upon Gerson, in the fore-cited place, 'The ransom of a man's life are his riches;' as if a man need do no more but purchase an indulgence, and all is well. We, like the Apostles, counsel better: 'Let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself, and not in another;' and that for the very reason which the Apostle gives, 'For every man shall bear his own burden.' (Gal. vi. 4, 5.) We are neither to be proud of being better than others, nor trust to share benefits with those that are better than we. The wise virgins had no oil to spare, when the foolish had their oil to seek. (Matt. xxv. 8, 9.) We bless God that we have a Christ to trust to, and not any that may, like Hermannus,* be many years worshipped for a saint, and then his bones dug up and burnt for an heretic, by that very Boniface who appointed the first jubilee, and that with a singular respect to the visiting the sepulchres of the saints: commend which you will, whether his worshipping or his burning of the bones of any they call saints, we think he might well have acknowledged, with Eugenius, that 'what key he had of opening and shutting, through his folly he did not prudently make use of it.' Our common people can read in their Bibles, that they are 'fools' which 'make a mock at sin,' (Prov. xiv. 9,) playing with it both in the commission and expiation; but we dare not do so; we dare not play the mountebanks in religion, to make some whiffling about the conscience, and then stupify it with a cheat. We ingenuously confess, we have not better esteem of indulgences than had the citizens of Prague, who put the indulgent-merchant into the same cart with some common whores, about whose breasts they hung the Papal indulgences, and so drew him and the whores with the indulgences hanging about their necks, exposing them to scorn through every street of the city; and then took the Bulls of indulgences, and publicly and solemnly burnt them. Such honour may they meet with wherever they come!

["2. I will no longer forbear acquainting you with that by way of use, which you might well expect in the opening of the doctrine; namely, to state how far God may be said to punish sin after he hath pardoned it. We deny not but those whose sins are pardoned, meet with many bitter calamities in this world; but the question between the Papists and us is, Whether they are punishments of sin, properly so called? We grant they are materially punishments, but not formally; that is, the same things when suffered by wicked men are punishments, but to them they are only fatherly chastisements, not judicial punishments; wholesome medicines, not penal executions. For example: a malefactor hath his hand cut off for striking in a court of judicature, that is properly a punishment; an innocent person hath his hand cut off, because it is gangrened, that is not a punishment, but a kindness. Plainly, a punishment is properly to satisfy revenging justice: a Judge (as such) hath no respect to the offender's repentance; but God always chastiseth 'for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness.' (Heb. xii. 10.) We deny not but God chastiseth for sin; but the question between the Papists and us, is not about the impulsive cause, but the final; that is, whether God, in punishing his children, do it to satisfy his justice with another satisfaction besides that he hath received by the death of his Son. The shortest and the plainest answer to this question will be to clear up those scriptures which they press into their service. They urge David's case, 'Because, by this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, the child shall surely die.' (2 Sam. xii. 14.) We grant, that because of David's sin, his child died; but we deny it was properly a punishment. Nathan makes a plain difference between the punishment due to David for the sin which is pardoned, ('The Lord hath put away thy sin, thou shalt not die,' verse 13,) and the discipline, whereby he would take off the scandal of wicked men; God, as it were, put off the person of a Judge, and assumed the person of a father. Whereas they say, David prayed against it, and therefore it was a punishment; the answer is easy: the sick man begs of his Physician that he may have no more nauseous physic, no more corroding plasters, &c.; are his medicines, therefore, punishments? God would cure David, and prevent others from taking encouragement to sin by his example: to this end God makes use of dreadful physic; yet it is but physic. The like may be said to Miriam's case, who was struck with leprosy: (Num. xii. 14:) God would have her to be ashamed, and repent of her molesting his servants in the discharge of their duty. But there are other instances of pardoned persons struck with death for their offences, of whom they jeeringly ask us, 'Did God strike them dead that they might mend their lives?' For example: Moses and Aaron, to whom God said, 'Ye shall not enter into the land which I have given unto the children of Israel, because ye have rebelled against my word,' &c. (Num. xx. 24.) I answer, Their death was not properly a punishment, but matter of instruction to other believers. There is a singular mystery in Moses's death, to teach that the law brings not into the heavenly Canaan, that must be done by Christ. That of the old Prophet, to whom the very person that deceived him said from God, 'Forasmuch as thou hast disobeyed the mouth of the Lord, thy carcass shall not come unto the sepulchre of thy fathers;—and when he was gone, a lion met him by the way, and slew him:' (1 Kings xiii. 21—24:) God by the threatening brought him to repentance, and by his death warns us to take heed how we swerve, though never so little, from his command; there was his own amendment to salvation, and the profit of the church, by so memorable a monument of God's severity. But what need I spend time in particular instances, while the Scripture speaks of believers in general, that death is to them a privilege, not a punishment? And death itself is inventoried among their treasures, (1 Cor. iii. 22,) that whenever or however it seizeth upon them, it will be their gain, (Phil. i. 21,) and matter of triumph. (1 Cor. xv. 55.) In a word, therefore, this, dear Christians, would I charge upon you: above all things secure your reconciliation with God, and then practically learn to answer God's ends in all your chastisements and trials; set yourselves to hate sin, to be exemplary in holiness, to live in the continual exercise and growth of grace, till God translate you to glory.

[* Cramp's Text-Book of Popery, p. 338.

["* Platina de Vit. Bonifac. VIII., p. 247.

["3. Thirdly: let us bless God for being delivered from the devilish delusions of that religion. 'Religion,' did I call it? How do they forfeit the very name, while they industriously strive to make men atheists that they may make them Papists! And what bait can be more alluring, than that they can afford them indulgence at so cheap a rate? Their seraphical Doctor tells us of some indulgences granted to help to build some church, or the like,—those that gave a penny towards it should be pardoned the third part of their repentance, and for another penny another third part, and for another penny the last third part:* so that for threepence, remission may be obtained. Among other proofs for the value of indulgences he brings this, that the head of John the Baptist was given to the damsel, by which damsel is meant the church of the Gentiles; so that the church of the Gentiles hath the head of John, that is, the head of grace, therefore she may grant indulgence to her subjects; a profound demonstration! Thus he may be discharged from the troublesome work of repentance; this the seraphical Doctor thinks to be false and ridiculous, and therefore he thus resolves the value of indulgences: in respect of him that grants them, they are of as much value as he says they are; but in respect of him that receives them, they are of more or less value, according as he is disposed; so, then, if they are fit for none, they are worth nothing. Angles reckons up six other opinions, but all such as will rather torment than satisfy an awakened conscience. O what a miserable plunge must that soul be in, that, trusting to indulgences, commits sin with greediness, and never considering till he comes to die, he finds too late that the largest indulgences are only valuable according to the disposition of the receiver, and so he that most needs them shall have least benefit by them! Some of the very Popes themselves have been ashamed of these cheats, and would have recalled them,† but their kindred opposed it with the same argument that Demetrius did Paul, 'By this craft we have our wealth.' (Acts xix. 25.) In short, though they tell us that Pope Gregory delivered Trajan out of hell, yet we dare trust to none but Christ to 'deliver us from the wrath to come:' and we bless God that we have no other to trust to. We had rather now cry to God for mercy, than too late cry out in our misery, 'Good God, upon what a frail spider's web doth hang the vast weight of Papal omnipotency!' Now we feel with a vengeance the Pope is not infallible. But I will close all with what may be more profitable than such fruitless complaints.

["4. In the last place, therefore, I would seriously caution you against that mock-religion, which is little else than an engine of carnal interest. As you love your souls, take heed of all sinful tendencies of either head, heart, or life, towards those pernicious doctrines, of which this is one of the chief. I freely confess, I see no cause of fear, (the Lord keep us from all confidence in any strength of our own,) that ever that religion shall reign in the consciences of those that have been once delivered from it; but it is an easy matter to persuade those that are of no religion to be of that religion. How many are there that walk in darkness in this noon-day light! and it is an easy process from ignorance to error, and to be devout, too, in that religion where ignorance is the mother of it. How many are there, that will rather part with heaven than with their lusts! An easy temptation must needs proselyte them to that religion that promiseth infallibly to secure both. In short, indulgences are the softest arguments for delicate sinners, and the Inquisition the most cogent argument for the refractory; to prevent, therefore, the charms of the one, and to establish against the knocking argument of the other, I shall only commend these two things to you.

["* Bonavent. in Sent., Venet. edit., tom. iv., p. 323.

["† Platina de Vit. Bonifac. IX., p. 275.

["First. Do not make light of sin, and you can never be a friend to indulgences. Augustine speaks like himself, when he saith, 'It is most difficult to find out, and most dangerous to define, what sins they are for which we may have indulgence by the merits of the saints our friends;'* he professeth, he could not by his search come to the knowledge of them; and the lesson he would learn and teach from it was this, to avoid all sin, and not at all to trust to the merits of others. We may cry out concerning this doctrine, 'Without controversy, great is the mystery of ungodliness!' I grant there is a great controversy between them and us about it; but yet when I consider, that I do not find two of them of a mind, but that they every one charge one another with something faulty in their particular sentiments about them; and their darling Council, before they made the decree about them,† censured all the money-gatherers upon them to be incorrigible, and that they had no hopes of their amendment; I need not fear to say, 'Without controversy, great is the mystery of ungodliness.' For one who is himself guilty of mortal sin,‡ at his pleasure to grant to as many as he pleases, guilty of the most prodigious villanies,§ as large indulgences as they can desire, if this be not to encourage and propagate wickedness, what is? I would therefore commend this to you: look upon sin to be not only the greatest, but the only, evil; and that not so much as the least can be pardoned without the blood of Christ; (Heb. ix. 22;) and that as ever you expect benefit by Christ, you must 'depart from iniquity;' (2 Tim. ii. 19;) and that whosoever saith, We may venture to 'do evil that good may come,' his 'damnation is just.' (Rom. iii. 8.) Whosoever, therefore, makes the remedies so light, so easy, so obvious, doth not only lessen but takes away the terror of the disease, and brings it into contempt. I would, therefore, with all possible importunity, beg of you to set yourselves against every sin. Watch against the temptations, occasions, and first risings of sin. Be as shy of sins of omission, and maladministration, as of open wickedness; and then indulgences will be no temptations to you to alter your religion; then the jubilee (next year) which Pseudo-Catholics esteem as the pleasant fantasies of Popery, the refuge of sinners, the grief of purgatory, the terror of devils, the mart of Rome, and the triumph of the Pope, will be no more to them than a Bartholomew-fair. Do you study the doctrine and practice of faith and repentance, and you will abhor all fellowship with this doctrine of devils.

["Secondly. Make use of your Bibles; and while you do so, you will neither be wheedled nor frighted out of your religion. Let but Scripture truth be your 'shield and buckler,' and you need not fear this Romish 'pestilence that walks in darkness,' and you may also hope, that God will preserve you from their barbarous 'destruction that wasteth at noon-day.' (Psalm xci. 4—6.) The sword of the Spirit is the only offensive arms in the Christian armoury; (Eph. vi. 17;) and there is no weapon wounds them like this, and therefore they wrap it in a cloth, and throw it behind the ephod; (1 Sam. xxi. 9;) but, my brethren, take it out, there is none like it; 'hold fast the form of sound words,' which the Scripture teacheth, 'in faith and love, which is in Christ Jesus,' and you can never be seduced; for there || can be no heresies but by the misunderstanding of Scripture, which we are not to hear only with our ears, but with our minds.* I take it to be a good way to prevent the perverting of Scripture, whenever a text is alleged for the proof of a doctrine in question, first, lay by that doctrine, and search what is the genuine meaning of the Holy Ghost in that place, and then consider what the mind of the Holy Ghost is in that question. But I will not be tedious: Bellarmine is the person I have most opposed,—I will make a fair offer; namely, to be determined by his decision of the question, if they will stand to what he hath left upon record, which is as applicable to this business as to that about which he wrote it, namely, 'Concerning those things which depend upon the divine will, we are not to assert any thing but what God himself hath revealed in the holy Scriptures.'† Do but stand to this, and farewell indulgences."‡]

["* Aug. Opera, tom. vii.; De Civit. Dei, lib. xxi., cap. xxvii., p. 664. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1685.

["† Conc. Trid., sess. xxv.; Decret. de Indulg.

["‡ Aquin. Suppl., pars iii., qu. xxvi., art. iv. Colon., 1620.

["§ Bellarm. Opera, tom. vii.; De Indulg., lib. i., cap. xii.

["|| Tertul. Opera, tom. ii; De Resur. Carn., cap. xi. Wirceb., 1780.

["* Ibid., tom. i., Advers. Gnostic., cap. vii., p. 278. Wirceb., 1780.

[† "Respondeo, Non est de rebus, quæ pendent a divina voluntate, aliquid asserendum, nisi Deus ipse in Scripturis sanctis tale aliquid revelaverit."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. iv., De Amiss. Gratiæ, et Statu Pecc., lib. vi., cap. iii., fol. 411, 412. Colon., 1619.

[‡ Morning Exercise against Popery, Serm. xix., pp. 696—700 4to. London, 1675.]

CHAPTER XIV.

EXTREME UNCTION.

I. Statement of the Doctrine. 1. Council of Florence. 2. Council of Trent cited.—II. Institution of the Sacrament. Uncertainty connected with the views respecting it.—III. The Matter of it.—IV. The Form of it.—V. Its Subjects.—VI. Effects of Extreme Unction.—VII. Objections against Extreme Unction as a Sacrament. 1. Its matter and form are unauthorized by Christ: 2. It is different from that mentioned by St. James, v. 14, 15: 3. The effects ascribed to it do not exist: 4. Not instituted by Christ. Seven arguments to prove this: 5. The Romish and scriptural anointings differ materially: 6. The testimony of antiquity is against it; (1.) The unction of the ancients different from extreme unction; (2.) The early Fathers do not mention it; (3.) Nor those of the fourth century; (4.) Nor the biographies of the first six centuries: 7. It affects injuriously those who receive it: 8. It tends to produce strange views and feelings in dying Christians: 9. It is chargeable with many inconsistencies. It is absurd in its institution. Is contrary to several doctrines of the Church of Rome: 10. It is the means of extortion by the Clergy: 11. Some grave Romanists allow it is not taught by St. James.

I. Statement of the doctrine.

1. The following is the Decree of the Council of Florence for the Instruction of the Armenians, on the sacrament of extreme unction:—"The fifth sacrament is extreme unction, whose matter is oil of olives, blessed by a Bishop. This sacrament ought not to be given to any except to a sick person, who is in danger of death; who is to be anointed in the following places: on the eyes, on account of sight; on the ears, on account of hearing; on the nose, on account of smelling; on the mouth, on account of tasting and speaking; on the hands, on account of touch; on the feet, on account of walking; on the reins, on account of their being the seat of pleasure. The form of this sacrament is this: 'By this unction, and his own great mercy, may God indulge thee whatever sins thou hast committed by sight,' &c.; and in like manner by the other members. The minister of this sacrament is a Priest; but the effect is the healing of the mind, and, as far as is fit, of the body also. Concerning this sacrament the Apostle St. James says, 'Is any infirm among you? let him send for the Presbyters of the Church; and let them pray for him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith will save the sick, and the Lord will relieve him; and if he be in sins, they will be forgiven him.' (James v. 14, 15.)"*

† reins

2. The following are the decrees and canons of the Council of Trent respecting extreme unction: the decree is divided into three chapters, the substance of which is as follows:—

["It hath seemed good to the holy Council to subjoin to the preceding exposition of the doctrine of penance, what now follows concerning the sacrament of extreme unction, which was regarded by the Fathers as the consummating act, not of penance only, but of the whole Christian life, which ought to be a perpetual penance. In the first place, therefore, with regard to its institution, the Council declares and teaches, that as our most merciful Redeemer, who intended that his servants should be provided at all times with salutary remedies against every dart of their enemies, has in the other sacraments prepared powerful helps, by which Christians may be safely preserved, during life, from all great spiritual evils,—so he has fortified the close of their existence with the sacrament of extreme unction, as with a most secure defence. For though our adversary seeks and takes occasion, during our whole life, to devour our souls in whatever manner he may, there is no period in which he so vigorously exerts all the strength of his subtlety to accomplish our utter ruin, and disturb, if possible, our confidence in the divine mercy, as when he sees that we are approaching the termination of our course.]

"CHAP. I. Of the institution of the sacrament of extreme unction.—This sacred unction of the sick was instituted as a true and proper sacrament of the New Testament, by Christ Jesus our Lord; being first intimated by Mark, (vi. 13,) and afterwards recommended and published to the faithful by James the Apostle, brother of our Lord. 'Is any man,' saith he, 'sick among you? let him bring in the Priests of the Church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick man; and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him.' (James v. 14, 15.) In which words, as the Church has learned by apostolical tradition, handed down from age to age, he teaches the matter, form, proper minister, and effect of this salutary sacrament. For the Church understands the matter of the sacrament to be the oil blessed by the Bishop; the unction most fitly representing the grace of the Holy Spirit, wherewith the soul of the sick man is invisibly anointed. The form is contained in the words of administration.

["CHAP. II. Of the effect of this sacrament.—The power and effect of this sacrament are explained in the words, 'And the prayer of faith shall save the sick man; and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him.' For this power is the grace of the Holy Spirit, whose unction cleanses away sins, if any remain to be expiated, even the last traces of sin; and relieves and confirms the soul of the sick man, exciting in him strong confidence of the divine mercy; by which strengthened, he bears far better the inconveniences and pains of his disorder; resists more easily the temptations of the devil, who does, as it were, lie in wait at his heels; and sometimes obtains the restoration of his bodily health, if the same shall further the salvation of his soul.

["CHAP. III. Of the Minister of this sacrament, and the time at which it is to be given.—And now as to the law relative to the persons who are to receive and administer this sacrament; this is laid down with sufficient clearness in the afore-cited words. For there it appears that the 'Elders of the Church' are the proper Ministers of this sacrament; which appellation is to be understood in that passage as meaning, either Bishops, or Priests regularly ordained by them, with laying on of the hands of the Presbytery; and not persons advanced in years, or of elevated rank. The Council also declares that this unction is to be applied to the sick, and especially to those who lie in so dangerous a state, as in all appearance to be appointed to death; whence it is called 'the sacrament of the dying.' But if the sick recover after receiving this unction, they may again enjoy the aid of this sacrament, when they are in similar danger of their lives. Wherefore, those persons are on no account to be listened to, who teach, in opposition to the most express and lucid statements of the Apostle James, that this unction is a human invention, or a rite received from the Fathers, but not a command of God, with promise of grace; nor those who affirm that its power has long ago ceased, as if the gift of healing belonged to the primitive church only; nor those who say that the rites and customs observed by the holy Roman Church, in the administration of this sacrament, are opposed to the language of the Apostle James, and therefore may be changed for any other; nor, finally, those who assert that this extreme unction may be despised by the faithful without sin. For all these assertions are contradictory to the plain words of the great Apostle. Nor, indeed, has the Church of Rome, the mother and mistress of all other Churches, adopted any other observance in administering this unction, as far as relates to the substance of the sacrament, than was enjoined by the blessed Apostle James. Neither can so important a sacrament be despised without great sin, and insult to the Holy Spirit himself."*]

[* "Quintum sacramentum est extrema unctio, cujus materia est oleum olivæ per Episcopum benedictum: hoc sacramentum, nisi infirmo de cujus morte timetur, dari non debet; qui in his locis unguendus est: in oculis propter visum; in auribus propter auditum; in naribus propter odoratum; in ore propter gustum vel locutionem; in manibus propter tactum; in pedibus propter gressum; in renibus propter delectationem ibidem vigentem. Forma hujus sacramenti est hæc: 'Per istam unctionem et suam piissimam misericordiam indulgeat tibi Dominus quidquid deliquisti per visum,' &c.; et similiter in aliis membris. Minister hujus sacramenti est Sacerdos: effectus vero est mentis sanatio, et, in quantum expedit, ipsius etiam corporis. De hoc sacramento inquit B. Jacobus Apostolus, cap. v., ver. 14 et 15: 'Infirmatur quis in vobis? inducat Presbyteros Ecclesiæ, et orent super eum, ungentes eum oleo in nomine Domini, et oratio fidei salvabit infirmum, et alleviabit eum Dominus; et, si in peccatis sit, dimittentur ei."—Decretum Concilii Florentini pro Instructione Armenorum. Conc. Labb., tom. xiii., p. 538. Paris, 1672.]

[* "Doctrina de sacramento extremæ unctionis.—Visum est autem sanctæ Synodo, præcedenti doctrinæ de pœnitentia adjungere ea quæ sequuntur de sacramento extremæ unctionis: quod non modo pœnitentiæ, sed et totius Christianæ vitæ, quæ perpetua pœnitentia esse debet, consummativum existimatum est a Patribus. Primum itaque, circa illius institutionem, declarat, et docet, quod clementissimus Redemptor noster, qui servis suis quovis tempore voluit de salutaribus remediis adversus omnia omnium hostium tela esse prospectum, quemadmodum auxilia maxima in sacramentis aliis præparavit, quibus Christiani conservare se integros, dum viverent, ab omni graviore spiritus incommodo possint; ita extremæ unctionis sacramento finem vitæ, tamquam firmissimo quodam præsidio, munivit: nam etsi adversarius noster occasiones per omnem vitam quærat, et captet, ut devorare animas nostras quoquo modo possit; nullum tamen tempus est, quo vehementius ille omnes suæ versutiæ nervos intendat ad perdendos nos penitus, et a fiducia etiam, si possit, divinæ misericordiæ deturbandos, quam cum impendere nobis exitum vitæ prospicit.

["CAPUT I. De institutione sacramenti extremæ unctionis.—Instituta est autem sacra hæc unctio infirmorum, tamquam vere et proprie sacramentum Novi Testamenti, a Christo Domino nostro, apud

"Canon 1. Whoever shall affirm that extreme unction is not truly and properly a sacrament, instituted by Christ our Lord, and published by the blessed Apostle James, but only a ceremony received from the Fathers, or a human invention; let him be accursed.

"2. Whoever shall affirm that the sacred unction of the sick does not confer grace, nor forgive sin, nor relieve the sick; but that its power has ceased, as if the gift of healing existed only in past ages; let him be accursed.

"3. Whoever shall affirm that the rite and practice of extreme unction observed by the holy Roman Church is repugnant to the doctrine of the blessed Apostle James, and therefore that it may be altered or despised by Christians without sin; let him be accursed.

"4. Whoever shall affirm that the 'Elders of the Church,' whom blessed James exhorts to be brought in to anoint the sick man, are not Priests, ordained by the Bishop, but persons advanced in years, in any community, and therefore that the Priest is not the only proper Minister of extreme unction; let him be accursed."*

In connexion with the foregoing account of extreme unction, we shall present it still more accurately by furnishing an extended view of this doctrine from the Divines who have formally written upon it: and as Dens has systematically discussed this as well as other doctrines of the Papacy, we shall principally follow him, occasionally collecting from Bailly, Ferraris, and others. The technical divisions which they observe we shall also follow, as being, on the whole, most convenient.

["This sacrament is called 'Extreme Unction,' because amongst the other unctions,* prescribed by our Lord to his church, this is the last to be administered. It was hence called by our predecessors in the faith, 'The Sacrament of the Anointing of the Sick,' and also, 'The Sacrament of dying Persons;' names which naturally lead the minds of the faithful to the remembrance of that last awful hour."†]

II. Institution of extreme unction.

Dens defines it to be "a sacrament, by which a sick person is anointed with sacred oil by a Priest, under a prescribed form of words, for the purpose of healing both the mind and body." Bailly defines it thus: "A sacrament of the new law for a sick man, conferring special aids for bearing pains, cleansing from sins and the remains of sin, and restoring health of body itself, when it conduces to the salvation of the soul."‡

The Romanists say that it was instituted by our Lord, intimated by Mark vi. 13, § and afterward recommended

Marcum quidem insinuatum, per Jacobum autem Apostolum, ac Domini fratrem, fidelibus commendatum, ac promulgatum. 'Infirmatur,' inquit, 'quis in vobis? inducat Presbyteros Ecclesiæ, et orent super eum, ungentes eum oleo in nomine Domini: et oratio fidei salvabit infirmum: et alleviabit eum Dominus: et si in peccatis sit, dimittentur ei.' Quibus verbis, ut ex apostolica traditione, per manus accepta, Ecclesia didicit, docet materiam, formam, proprium Ministrum, et effectum hujus salutaris sacramenti; intellexit enim Ecclesia, materiam esse oleum ab Episcopo benedictum; nam unctio aptissime Spiritus Sancti gratiam qua invisibiliter anima ægrotantis inungitur, repræsentat; formam deinde esse illa verba: 'Per istam unctionem,' &c.

["CAPUT II. De effectu hujus sacramenti.—Res porro et effectus hujus sacramenti illis verbis explicatur: 'Et oratio fidei salvabit infirmum: et alleviabit eum Dominus: et si in peccatis sit, dimittentur ei.' Res etenim hæc gratia est Spiritus Sancti: cujus unctio delicta, si qua sint adhuc expianda, ac peccati reliquias abstergit; et ægroti animam alleviat, et confirmat, magnam in eo divinæ misericordiæ fiduciam excitando: qua infirmus sublevatus, et morbi incommoda ac labores levius fert; et tentationibus dæmonis, calcaneo insidiantis, facilius resistit; et sanitatem corporis interdum, ubi saluti animæ expedierit, consequitur.

["CAPUT III. De Ministro hujus sacramenti, et tempore quo dari debeat.—Jam vero, quod attinet ad præscriptionem eorum qui et suscipere, et ministrare hoc sacramentum debent, haud obscure fuit illud etiam in verbis prædictis traditum. Nam et ostenditur illic, proprios hujus sacramenti Ministros esse Ecclesiæ Presbyteros. Quo nomine, eo loco, non ætate seniores, aut primores in populo intelligendi veniunt, sed aut Episcopi, aut Sacerdotes ab ipsis rite ordinati, per impositionem manuum Presbyterii.

["Declaratur etiam, esse hanc unctionem infirmis adhibendam, illis vero præsertim, qui tam periculose decumbunt, ut in exitu vitæ constituti videantur: unde et sacramentum exeuntium nuncupatur. Quod si infirmi post susceptam hanc unctionem convaluerint, iterum hujus sacramenti subsidio juvari poterunt, cum in aliud simile vitæ discrimen inciderint. Quare nulla ratione audiendi sunt, qui contra tam apertam et dilucidam Apostoli Jacobi sententiam docent, hanc unctionem vel figmentum esse humanum, vel ritum a Patribus acceptum, nec mandatum Dei, nec promissionem gratiæ habentem: et qui illam jam cessasse asserunt, quasi ad gratiam curationum dumtaxat in primitiva Ecclesia referenda esset: et qui dicunt, ritum et usum quem sancta Romana Ecclesia in hujus sacramenti administratione observat, Jacobi Apostoli sententiæ repugnare; atque ideo in alium commutandum esse: et denique, qui hanc extremam unctionem a fidelibus sine peccato contemni posse affirmant: hæc enim omnia manifestissime pugnant cum perspicuis tanti Apostoli verbis. Nec profecto Ecclesia Romana, aliarum omnium mater et magistra, aliud in hac administranda unctione, quantum ad ea quæ hujus sacramenti substantiam perficiunt, observat, quam quod beatus Jacobus præscripsit. Nec vero tanti sacramenti contemptus absque ingenti scelere et ipsius Spiritus Sancti injuria esse posset.

["Hæc sunt, quæ de pœnitentiæ et extremæ unctionis sacramentis sancta hæc œcumenica Synodus profitetur, et docet, atque omnibus Christi fidelibus credenda et tenenda proponit. Sequentes autem canones inviolabiliter servandos esse tradit, et asserentes contrarium perpetuo damnat, et anathematizat."—Can. et Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. xiv., De Ext. Unct.]

* "Canon 1. Si quis dixerit, extremam unctionem non esse vere et proprie sacramentum a Christo Domino nostro institutum, et a beato Jacobo Apostolo promulgatum; sed ritum tantum acceptum a Patribus, aut figmentum humanum; anathema sit.

"2. Si quis dixerit, sacram infirmorum unctionem non conferre gratiam; nec remittere peccata, nec alleviare infirmos; sed jam cessasse, quasi olim tantum fuerit gratia curationum; anathema sit.

"3. Si quis dixerit, extremæ unctionis ritum, et usum, quem observat sancta Romana Ecclesia, repugnare sententiæ beati Jacobi Apostoli, ideoque eum mutandum, posseque a Christianis absque peccato contemni; anathema sit.

"4. Si quis dixerit, Presbyteros Ecclesiæ, quos beatus Jacobus adducendos esse ad infirmum inungendum hortatur, non esse Sacerdotes ab Episcopo ordinatos, sed ætate seniores in quavis communitate; ob idque proprium extremæ unctionis Ministrum non esse solum Sacerdotem; anathema sit."—Decret. et Canon. Conc. Trid., sess. xiv.

[* "Variæ in ecclesia Dei habentur in praxi unctiones, prout diriguntur ad varias personas. Prima, Est catechumenorum, quos oleo benedicto Sacerdos ante baptismum ungit in pectore, et inter scapulas. Secunda, Baptizatorum, quos chrismate ungit Sacerdos in vertice. Tertia, Confirmatorum, qui per Episcopum unguntur in fronte. Quarta, Principum sæcularium, qua humeris et brachiis unguntur. Quinta, Est Sacerdotum et Episcoporum, quæ fit in illorum ordinatione. Sexta, Est infirmorum ad extrema reductorum, de qua solum in præsenti est sermo."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt. Ext. Unct.

[† Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 295.]

[‡ "Quid est extrema unctio?—R. Est sacramentum, in quo infirmus oleo sacro a Sacerdote inungitur sub præscripta verborum forma ad sanitatem mentis et corporis."—Dens Theol., tom. vii.; De Extrema Unctione, No. 1; De Institutione hujus Sacramenti.

["Extrema unctio definiri potest sacramentum novæ legis homini ægrotanti ad incommoda perferenda specialia auxilia conferens, peccata et peccatorum reliquias abstergens, ipsamque corporis, ubi animæ saluti expediens fuerit, sanitatem restituens. Patebit ex dicendis eam definitionem id omne complecti quod a Scriptoribus sacris et traditione infirmorum unctioni tribuitur."—Bailly, Theol., tom. v.; De Extrema Unctione, cap. i.; De Natura et Definitione Sacramenti Extremæ Unctionis.]

[§ "It is a doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, that the Apostles were not made Priests before the institution of the Lord's supper. Had it been affirmed that the passage in Mark recorded the institution of the sacrament in question, it would have followed that other persons besides Priests might administer it. To avoid this, the word 'intimated' (insinuatum) was employed: so that, though the Apostles did the very same thing which James afterwards enjoined, in the latter instance it is to be considered as the sacrament of extreme unction; but in the first as only something like it."—Cramp's Text-Book, p. 198.]

and published by James v. 14, 15; and that the proofs for its being a sacrament are, the above passage from James, the decisions of the Councils of Florence and of Trent, and tradition.*

[" That extreme unction is, strictly speaking, a sacrament, is first to be explained; and this, the words of St. James promulgating the law of this sacrament, clearly establish. (James v. 14.) When the Apostle says, 'If he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him,' he ascribes to extreme unction at once the nature and essence of a sacrament. That such has been at all times the doctrine of the (Roman) Catholic Church, many Councils testify; and the Council of Trent denounces anathema against all who presume to teach or think otherwise. The Pastor, therefore, will teach that extreme unction is a true sacrament, and that, although administered with many unctions, performed each with a peculiar prayer, and under a peculiar form, it constitutes but one sacrament,—one, not by the inseparable continuity of its parts, but, like every thing composed of parts, by the perfection of the whole. As an edifice, which consists of a great variety of parts, derives its perfection from one form, so is this sacrament, although composed of many and different things, but one sign, and its efficacy is that of one thing, of which it is the sign."†]

[* " Extrema unctio est verum ac proprie dictum novæ legis sacramentum.

[" Prob. 1. Jacobi v. 14, 15. Unde sic argumentor: sacramentum est signum externum et sensibile, gratiæ efficiendæ vim habens, a Deo permanenter institutum: atqui talis est extrema unctio. (1.) Est signum externum et sensibile, tum ratione materiæ seu olei unctione, tum ratione formæ seu Sacerdotis oratione. (2.) Vim habet efficiendæ gratiæ: 'Oratio fidei salvabit infirmum, alleviabit eum Dominus; et si in peccatis sit, remittentur ei.' (3.) A Deo institutum; nullus enim ritus peccata remittendi et gratiam conferendi vim habere potest, nisi ex Dei vel Christi institutione, fatentibus quos hic refellimus hæreticis. (4.) Non fuit transiens et ad tempus tantum ille ritus, ut volunt novatores, sed a Deo permanenter institutus, ut patet tum quia illæ voces, 'Inducat Presbyteros,' 'et oratio fidei salvabit eum, alleviabit eum,' nullis personarum et temporum limitibus coercentur, non secus ac sequentia: 'Confitemini alterutrum peccata vestra, et orate pro invicem;' tum quia extrema unctio ordinatur ad sublevamen ægrotantium sive spirituale sive temporale, quo non minus uno quam altero tempore indigent homines; tum demum quia ille ritus in usu semper fuit in Ecclesia, ut fatetur ipse Minister Chamier, lib. iv., de Sacram., c. 21, Dallæo in hac parte contrarius.

[" Prob. 2. Ex traditione. Origenis Homil. in Levit. Est adhuc septima per pœnitentiam remissio peccatorum....in quo impletur et illud quod Apostolus dixit: 'Si quis autem infirmatur, vocet Presbyteros, et imponant ei manus, ungentes eum oleo in nomine Domini.' Ibi docet Origen olei unctionem cum oratione junctam peccata dimittere, seu, quod idem est, verum ac proprie dictum esse sacramentum.

[" S. Chrysostomus, lib. iii., de Sacerdot., sic habet: 'Neque enim tantum Sacerdotes cum nos regenerant, sed postea etiam condonandorum nobis peccatorum facultatem obtinent: infirmatur inter vos aliquis? accersat Presbyteros.' Unde sic arguo: ille unctionem infirmorum inter sacramenta recenset qui docet eam peccata dimittere, et illam in eo cum baptismate comparat; atqui S. Doctor docet unctionem infirmorum peccata dimittere, et illam in eo cum baptismate comparat; ergo, &c.

[" Gregorius Magnus sexto seculo, data opera in sacramentario, describit extremæ unctionis ritum, sicut aliorum sacramentorum, et formam præscribit qua oleum ab Episcopis sit benedicendum.

[" Qui prolixiorem traditionis catenam desideraverit, adeat Sambovium, vel Jueninum, vel auctorem operis cui tit., De Re Sacramentaria.

[" Prob. 3. Ex consensu Græcorum cum Latinis, ut constat ex universis eorum eucologiis ac ritualibus. Utraque enim Ecclesia in eamdem hanc fidem non conspiraret, nisi ante separationem communis fuisset hæc apud Christianos omnes doctrina.

[" His adde mutationis in eo dogmate nec auctorem, nec locum, nec tempus assignari posse."—Bailly, Theolog., tom. v.; De Extrema Unctione, cap. ii.; De Existentia Sacramenti Extremæ Unctionis.

[† Catechism of the Council of Trent, translated by Donovan, p. 296. 8vo. Dublin. 1829.]

The following singular account of its institution, and of the time when it took place, is given by Dens :—

"Was this sacrament immediately instituted by Christ?—Answer. St. Thomas (Supp., q. 29, a. 3) answers in the affirmative. This is collected from the Council of Trent, (sess. xiv., cap. i., can. 1,) which teaches that it was promulgated by St. James; therefore he judges that it was not instituted by him, but immediately by Christ.

"When did Christ institute it?—Ans. The time is uncertain; yet it is very likely that he instituted it after his resurrection, during the forty days in which he conversed with his disciples concerning the kingdom of God and the affairs of the Church."*

Ferraris says, "This sacrament was probably instituted after the resurrection, when Christ instituted penitence, of which, the Council of Trent says, extreme unction is the consummation."†

III. The matter.

This is divided into the proximate and remote.

The remote matter is oil of olives, blessed by a Bishop; but a common Priest, in case of necessity, may consecrate the oil, but not without licence from the Pope. Although some assert that a Bishop may grant such licence, yet this has been doubted by many, and especially by Pius V.

When the consecrated oil is exhausted, and no other can be obtained, the following expedient is resorted to :—"According to the Roman Ritual, a Priest may mingle unconsecrated oil with that which is consecrated, but in less quantity than that which remains; otherwise the oil which has actually been blessed would cease to exist, and the greater part would be unconsecrated, so that it could not be said, that the same blessed oil remained."‡

As it has been questioned, whether this mixture could be made more than once, Pius VI. confirms the decree of the holy congregation of the 23d of September, 1682, in [* "An hoc sacramentum immediate a Christo est institutum?—R. S. Thom., Suppl., quæst. xxix., art. 3, affirmative; colligitur ex Trid., sess. xiv., cap. i. et can. i., docente, illud esse per S. Jacobum promulgatum; judicavit ergo, non ab eo, sed a Christo esse immediate institutum.

[" Quandonam Christus illud instituit?—R. Tempus illud incertum est; verisimilius tamen instituit post resurrectionem suam, tempore quadraginta dierum, quibus locutus est discipulis suis de regno Dei, sive de rebus Ecclesiæ, et quibus, ut ait S. Leo, magna confirmata sunt sacramenta: verisimilius etiam illud instituit post institutum sacramentum pœnitentiæ, cujus est perfectio et consummatio."—Dens Theol., tom. vii.; De Extrema Unctione, No. 1; De Institutione hujus Sacramenti.]

[† "Hoc sacramentum extremæ unctionis probabilius fuit institutum post resurrectionem, quando Christus (Johan. xx.) instituit pœnitentiam, cujus consummationem esse extremam unctionem dicit Trident., sess. xiv., De Extrema Unctione, in procemio."—Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt., Ext. Unct., sect. iv.]

[‡ "Quid faciendum, dum deficit oleum ab Episcopo feria quinta benedictum, nec aliud benedictum haberi potest?—R. Secundum Rituale Romanum, Sacerdotem posse oleum non benedictum miscere cum benedicto, in minore tamen quantitate quam sit oleum benedictum remanens; alias enim oleum desineret esse benedictum; cum notabilior pars benedicta non foret, neque dici posset manere moraliter idem oleum benedictum.

[" An illud oleum non benedictum, quod admiscetur, efficiatur benedictum, non liquet; partem affirmativam insinuant Neesen, Billuart, et Collet, hoc fundamento, quod ex illa unione oleum non consecratum quamdam consecrationem contrahat, non quidem ratione contractus physici, sed ex indulgentia Ecclesiæ, quæ voluit, ut preces Episcopi, qui consecravit oleum, extendantur quoque ad illud, quod admiscetur jam consecrato.

[" Non minus tamen probabiliter, inquit Wiggers, sustinetur, oleum non benedictum admixtum non effici benedictum, sicut vinum non consecratum admixtum consecrato non efficitur consecratum; mixtionem vero solummodo fieri, ut oleum benedictum ad plures extendi possit."—Dens Theol., tom. vii., De Extrema Unctione, No. 2, De Materia ejus Remota.]

which it was determined "that the unblessed oil could be added to the blessed many times, so that the oil added, considered separately, and in each mixture, should be in less quantity than the blessed oil, although, all the additions considered, the quantity of the unblessed was greater."

The proximate matter of the sacrament is anointing, or the use and application of oil. There are seven anointings, one for each of the five senses, namely, the eyes, ears, nose, mouth, and hands, and the other two for the breast and feet. Some include the application of the oil to the reins or kidneys. When the organ is double, as of the eyes, &c., then each is anointed under the same pronunciation of the form; but care must always be taken, that the repetition of the words of administration be not finished before each organ be anointed, otherwise the latter unction is rendered vain. When any organ is wanting, as eyes to the blind, the places deficient are to be anointed. The anointing in all cases must be made in the form of a cross, although this is not deemed essential.

"The anointing may be made by the thumb, or by a rod, at the option of the administrator. But if the infection of the oil is feared, suppose in case of madness, a separate rod may be used for each anointing, which rod is afterwards to be burned; or, at least, the rod at each unction, before it is re-dipped in the oil, should be cleansed by the tow with which each organ is wiped. Moreover, respecting the cleansing of the anointed organs, the Pastoral Manual prescribes, 'If the Minister in sacred things, or the Priest himself, after each unction, should wipe the anointed parts with a new globule of silk or tow, let him leave it in a clean vessel, and afterwards burn it;' but if the fire is not at hand, it may be committed to the domestics for that purpose." *

It has been disputed much "whether the anointing of the breast, feet, and reins, is necessary for this sacrament," and the practice is accordingly different. Dens, and especially Pope Benedict XIV., treat this subject with great precision.

Whether the anointings of the organs of the five senses are essential, is disputed. Bellarmine, Wiggers, Neesen, and others, believe the five unctions on the five organs of sense to be essential; because by these unctions the medicine applied to the roots of sin ought to be signified; but the senses are said to be the roots of all sins. Dens calls this opinion probable. But Sylvius, Daelman, Tournelly, Collet, and others, believe the sacrament to be valid, although only one part of the body is anointed, and one general form is used, embracing all the senses. Dens calls this opinion more probable than the former; but adds that the former, because probable, and safer in practice, is to be observed. In case of instant or approaching death, the five unctions are to be performed in as expeditious a manner as possible; and should the person die while these rites are in process of being performed, the administrator is to stop. But if he be in doubt whether the person is dead, he is then to proceed with the customary unctions, introducing, however, the condition, si vivis, "if you are alive." *

["The Pastor will also teach what are the component parts of this sacrament, its matter and form: these St. James does not omit, and each is replete with its own peculiar mysteries. Its element, then, or matter, as defined by many Councils, particularly by the Council of Trent, consists of oil of olives, consecrated by episcopal hands. No other sort of oil can be the matter of this sacrament; and this its matter is most significant of its efficacy. Oil is very efficacious in soothing bodily pain; and this sacrament soothes and alleviates the pain and anguish of the soul. Oil also contributes to restore health and spirits, serves to give light, and refreshes fatigue; and these effects correspond with, and are expressive of, those produced, through the divine power, on the sick, by the administration of this sacrament." †]

IV. The form.

This, according to the Roman Ritual, is in the following words:—"By this holy unction, and through his great mercy, may God indulge thee whatever sins thou hast committed by sight, &c. Amen." ‡ This is the [* "Quænam est materia proxima sacramenti extremæ unctionis?—R. Est unctio, seu usus et applicatio olei. Quot unctiones in hoc sacramento adhiberi debent?—R. Pastorale Mechliniense præscribit septem, nimirum ad organa quinque sensuum, scilicet ad oculos, aures, nares, os, et manus, deinde ad pectus et ad pedes. Dum organum alicujus sensus est duplex, v. g., duplex oculus, utrumque inungitur (non tamen de essentia) sub una formæ prolatione, et cavendum, inquit Pastorale, ne prius forma absolvatur, quam utrumque organum inunctum sit; quia posterior unctio alias redderetur inanis, cum non posset esse materia sacramenti; neque forma inchoari debet, nisi dum inchoatur unctio. Unctio oculorum non fit in pupilla, sed clausis oculis fit in palpebris seu valvis oculorum; similiter unctio ad sensum gustus, non fit in lingua, sed in labiis adhibetur. Dum infirmus non habet manus aut pedes, monet Pastorale, ut pars magis propinqua ungatur. An oculorum loca cæci nati ungenda sunt, cum nunquam peccaverit per visum, atque adeo forma non videatur verificari?—R. Cum S. Thom., quæst. xxxii., art. vii., in Corp., affirmative; licet enim non peccaverit per sensum exteriorem, cum habeat tamen potentias animæ in ordine ad visum, interius peccare potuit per ea, quæ ad visum pertinent, v. g., desiderando curiosa visus. Requirit Pastorale, ut unctiones fiant per modum crucis, sed hoc non est essentiale, sicuti nec ordo inter unctiones. Permittit Pastorale ut unctio fiat vel pollice vel virgula ad libitum ministrantis: si autem infectio olei timeatur, puta ex rabie, diversæ virgulæ lignæ ad singulas unctiones assumantur, quæ comburentur; vel saltem virgula ad singulas unctiones, antequam reponatur in oleum sacrum, purgetur per stuppam, qua organum inunctum abstergitur. Porro circa abstersionem organorum inunctorum ita præscribit Pastorale Mechliniense: 'Minister si est in sacris, vel ipsemet Sacerdos, post quamlibet unctionem tergat loca inuncta novo globulo bombycini aut stuppæ, eaque in vase mundo reponat et comburat;' si autem ignis ibi paratus non sit, id committetur domesticis."—Dens Theol., tom. vii., De Extr. Unct., No. 3, De Materia Proxima.]

[* "An quinque unctiones ad organa quinque sensuum sunt essentiales?

["R. (1.) Bellarminus, Wiggers, Neesen, et alii sustinent, quinque unctiones ad organa quinque sensuum esse essentiales; quia per unctiones debet significari medicina applicata ad radices peccatorum; jam autem sensus dicuntur radices omnium peccatorum; in quantum omnia peccata positive vel privative procedunt per cognitionem, et omnis cognitio per phantasmata ex sensibus ortum habere supponitur. (2.) Sylvius, Tournelly, Collet, Daelman, et plures alii censent validum esse sacramentum, etsi una tantum ungatur corporis pars, et unica proferatur forma universalis omnes sensus complectens.

["Licet hæc sententia sit verisimilior, tamen prior, utpote probabilis et tutior, est in praxi servanda, ita ut semper adhiberi debeant unctiones ad quinque organa sensuum, dummodo possibile sit; et ideo nequidem in casu quo infirmus videretur moriturus, antequam unctiones modo ordinario absolverentur, licet unicam adhibere, nisi forte tempus plures non permitteret; quia non licet uti materia dubia, ubi certior haberi potest; idipsum præscribunt Rituale Romanum et Pastorale Mechliniense, ut scilicet in illa extremitate fiant quinque unctiones. Deinde instans mortis a nobis ita exacte cognosci non potest: unde secunda sententia adfert plura incommoda in praxi, cum equidem postea procedere oporteret ad unctiones quinque sensuum propter dubium. Possunt autem in necessitate unctiones quinque brevissimo tempore fieri tangendo unum oculum, aurem, nares, os, et pro tactu maxillam, cum sensus tactus sit diffusus per totum corpus, idque sub unica forma omnes sensus exprimente: et si infirmus inter unctiones decedat, Presbyter ultra non procedat, et si dubitet, an adhuc vivat, unctiones prosequatur sub conditione, si vivis."—Dens Theol., tom. vii., De Ext. Unct., No. 4, De Unctionibus Essentialibus.] form of the expression when the eyes are anointed. When the unction is made on the ears, the words, per auditum, "by the hearing," are employed instead of those, "by the sight;" and a similar change is made to correspond with the other unctions. It is, however, a controverted point, whether all the senses may not be embraced in one formula of expression. On this, as on many others, there is room for great variety both in opinion and in practice. But whether a deprecatory or indicative form of words is to be used, is a topic not decided. St. Thomas and the Thomists contend for the deprecatory form; while Marinus, Tournelly, Collet, and others, say the indicative is sufficient. The case, however, in which a Priest, conferring this sacrament, is voluntarily distracted, presents more difficulty than either of the former cases, as the validity of the sacrament is peculiarly in danger. We must refer to Dens and other Divines on the form of this sacrament, by whom many curious distinctions are made and discussed.*

[† Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 296, 297.]

‡ "Per istam sanctam unctionem et suam piissimam misericordiam indulgeat tibi Dominus quidquid per visum deliquisti. Amen.

["That this is the true form of the sacrament,' says the Romish Catechism, "we learn from these words of St. James: 'Let them pray over him, and the prayer of faith shall save the sick man;' words which intimate that the form is to be applied by way of prayer, although the Apostle does not say of what particular words that prayer is to consist. But this form has been handed down to us by apostolic tradition, and is universally retained, as observed by the Church of Rome, the mother and mistress of all churches. Some, it is true, alter a few words, as when for 'God indulge thee,' they say, 'God remit' or 'spare,' and sometimes, 'heal, whatever thou hast committed;' but the sense is evidently the same, and, of course, the form observed by all is strictly the same. Nor should it excite our surprise, that, whilst the form of each of the other sacraments either absolutely signifies what it expresses, such as, 'I baptize thee,' or, 'I sign thee with the sign of the cross,' or is pronounced, as it were, by way of a command, as in administering holy orders, 'Receive power,' the form of extreme unction alone is expressed by way of prayer. The propriety of this difference will at once appear, if we reflect, that this sacrament is administered not only for the health of the soul, but also for that of the body; and as it does not please Divine Providence at all times to restore health to the sick, the form consists of a prayer, by which we beg of the Divine bounty, that which is not a constant and uniform effect of the sacrament." *]

V. The subjects of extreme unction.

They must be baptized, and dangerously sick. Yet all persons in peril of death are not proper subjects of this sacrament; such as persons condemned, by the laws of the country in which they reside, to death; yet to the aged, who are not sick, but are approaching death, it may be administered.

To some this sacrament must not be administered; as children who have not arrived at the use of reason, though dangerously ill. If, however, a doubt be entertained respecting their maturity, it may be administered conditionally, as follows, "if you are capable." To persons in a state of perpetual mental derangement it is to be denied.

The following we quote from Dens on this subject:—"The Roman Ritual prescribes that this sacrament is to be denied to impenitent persons, and to those who die in manifest mortal sin, and to excommunicated persons; those not baptized, with whom are to be enumerated, with the Cameracensian Pastoral, those who have lost their reason under wicked circumstances; for instance, in a state of voluntary and complete intoxication.

"But what concerning those who are suddenly deprived of the use of reason when in the very act or intention of committing mortal sin, and when it was uncertain whether they were inwardly deprived of their senses? For instance, such as are mortally wounded in a duel, or those who were known to have lived in concubinage, and had manifested no signs of penitence?—Answer. Pauels teacheth that as such can be absolved, because they may probably use reason inwardly, and have contrition, so in like manner extreme unction may be administered to them. Braunman and Steyaert teach that, even in consistency with the sentiment that such may be absolved, extreme unction ought not to be administered. Steyaert says that such was the practice in his time. It is said, 'in the very act of mortal sin;' because, if they had space for penitence before they became destitute of reason, sacred unction is not to be denied; inasmuch as it is proper to suppose that they have been penitent, although they have given no sign of penitence." † ["Pronomen 'tibi' est essentiale, eo quod hic sicut in aliis sacramentis requiratur, ut significetur subjectum. Hæc verba, 'quidquid deliquisti,' vel æquivalentia, videntur etiam essentialia: quia alias effectus non satis significaretur, nam verbum 'indulgeat' multas habet significationes, adeoque se solo, omissis illis, 'quidquid deliquisti,' non satis significaret effectum seu remissionem peccatorum attento etiam, quod hic non conjungatur confessio peccatorum, et ideo prædicta verba, aut eis æquivalentia videntur essentialia.

[* "Quænam est forma sacramenti extremæ unctionis?—R. A Rituali Romano, et Pastorali Mechliniensi assignatur hæc: 'Per istam sanctam unctionem et suam piissimam misericordiam indulgeat tibi Dominus, quidquid per visum deliquisti: Amen:' ubi inunguntur oculi. Dum unctio fit in auribus dicitur, 'Per auditum;' et sic in cæteris unctionibus, ut habet Pastorale Mechl.

["Quænam verba in prædicta forma sunt essentialia?—R. Imprimis hæc, 'Per istam unctionem,' aut æquivalentia, sunt essentialia; quia aliter non exprimeretur actus Ministri sive confectio sacramenti. Vox 'sanctam' non est essentialis; omittit enim eam Concilium Trid., sess. xiv., cap. i.: neque essentialia sunt hæc, 'et suam piissimam misericordiam;' quia eorum significatio satis continetur in verbis, 'indulgeat Dominus,' quæ essentialia sunt, utpote necessaria, ut significetur causalitas sacramenti, scilicet actus misericordiæ, quem Deus exercet in infirmem, qui a Ministro inungitur.

["An distincta expressio visus et aliorum sensuum est essentialis?—R. Videtur affirmandum, ut forma significare possit effectum determinate et explicite; hinc si quis diceret, 'Quidquid per sensus deliquisti,' dubium esset sacramentum: nec obstat, quod in voce sensus intelligatur visus, auditus, &c., quia forte non sufficit singulorum sensuum expressio implicita, sed requiritur explicita, quomodo non valet baptismus collatus sub forma hac, 'Baptizo te in nomine sanctissimæ Trinitatis.'"—Dens Theolog., tom. vii., De Ext. Unct., No. 5, De Forma hujus Sacramenti. Vide etiam, No 6, De Forma Deprecativa.]

[† "Sacramentum hoc negandum præscribit Rituale Romanum impœnitentibus, et qui in manifesto peccato mortali moriuntur, et excommunicatis, et nondum baptizatis, quibus cum Pastorali Cameracensi annumerandi sunt ii, qui rationem amiserunt in statu evidenter malo; sicque omnino practicandum foret, si de hoc certo constaret, v. g., in plene voluntaria et perfecta ebrietate.

["Sed quid de illis, qui in ipso peccati mortalis actu vel voluntate subito privantur usu sensuum, dum interim ignoratur, an interius ratione sint privati, v. g., qui in duello lethaliter sunt vulnerati, vel qui usque nunc sciuntur vixisse in concubinatu, et nullum dederunt aut jam dant pœnitentiæ signum?

["R. Docet Pauels, quod, sicut, tales possunt absolvi, eo quod forte interius ratione utantur et habeant contritionem, sic etiam possit eis conferri extrema unctio.

["Docent Braunman et Steyaert, quod etiam in sententia, quod tales possint absolvi, non possit tamen eis extrema unctio administrari, sicque praxim fuisse suo tempore, asserit Steyaert.

["Dictum est, 'In ipso peccati mortalis actu,' quia videtur dicendum, quod, si spatium pœnitendi habuerint, priusquam fierent rationis impotes, sacra unctio non sit eis deneganda; quia conjecturare licet, eos pœnituisse, etiamsi nullum suæ pœnitentiæ signum dederint."—Dens Theolog., tom. vii., De Extrem. Unct., No. 8, Quibus infirmis neganda sit Extrema Unctio.]

According to this statement, we have the following gloomy picture of Roman Catholic morality and doctrine:—(1.) Christians, as such, may be guilty of mortal sin, such as duelling, concubinage, voluntary and complete drunkenness, &c. (2.) And are suddenly deprived of their senses, even in the very act of sin, without the least degree of repentance. (3.) Yet may be absolved from their sins, and receive this sacrament of unction. Consequently all such are said to go to heaven when they die, or after they shall have been in purgatory for some time. Surely this is a licence to commit sin with greediness. It is allowed, indeed, that they teach persons to repent in due time; but then if they are not disposed to repent, and are determined to continue in sin, they are accommodated in these evil intentions by the system of Popery; so that they are enabled to obtain heaven, and yet live in sin all the days of their life!

Nor is this the opinion of a solitary individual, it is that of the Clergy in general. So Bailly states respecting such transgressors as are mentioned above, who suppose they may be absolved and anointed, provided they only show signs of repentance or of piety when they have the use of reason. He then gives the following impious and licentious instructions:—"Less severe, however, and not improbable, is the judgment of Habertus, Peter Collet, and others, who are of opinion that extreme unction ought to be administered to all the faithful who are deprived of their senses, whether they have lived piously or wickedly, provided they had space for penitence before they were deprived of reason. The arguments in favour of this are: (1.) Because the faithful possess this privilege as a matter of right: and that they cannot be deprived of the sacraments, unless it is certain they have forfeited them by manifest impenitence. (2.) Because, as they are Christians, and are imbued with the principles of faith, it is to be presumed that, in the last moment in which they were in possession of their reason, they were smitten with penitence.....The Pastors of the Church generally follow this opinion practically."* It is in vain that this author, in the next sentence, says that extreme unction is not to be administered to those who are deprived of their reason, in the very act of sin, when it is notorious that they were impenitent. The distinction which he makes, also, between impenitence and penitence is so small, that they cannot possibly be distinguished from each other. Those of whom he speaks as Christians, or the faithful, may have lived piously, or male, wickedly, and yet be considered entitled to such epithets.

[This sacrament, "although instituted for the use of all," says the Romish Catechism, "is not to be administered indiscriminately to all. In the first place, it is not to be administered to persons in sound health, according to these words of St. James: 'Is any one sick amongst you?' And, as reason also proves, it was instituted as a remedy, not only for the diseases of the soul, but also for those of the body; this can apply to the sick only; and, therefore, this sacrament is to be administered to those only whose malady is such as to excite apprehensions of approaching dissolution. It is, however, a very grievous sin to defer the holy unction until, all hope of recovery now lost, life begins to ebb, and the sick person is fast verging into a state of insensibility. It is obvious that if administered whilst the mental faculties are yet unimpaired, whilst reason still exercises her dominion, and the mind is capable of eliciting acts of faith, and of directing the will to sentiments of piety, the sacrament must contribute to a more abundant participation of the graces which it imparts. This heavenly medicine, therefore, in itself at all times salutary, the Pastor will be careful to apply, when its efficacy can be aided by the piety and devotion of the sick person. Extreme unction, then, can be administered only to the sick, and not to persons in health, although engaged in any thing, however dangerous, such as a perilous voyage, or the fatal dangers of battle. It cannot be administered even to persons condemned to death, and already ordered for execution. Its participation is also denied to insane persons, and to children incapable of committing sin, who therefore do not require to be purified from its stains; and also to those who labour under the awful visitation of madness, unless they give indications, in their lucid intervals, of a disposition to piety, and express a desire to be anointed. To persons insane from their birth, this sacrament is not to be administered; but if a sick person, whilst in the possession of his faculties, expressed a wish to receive extreme unction, and afterwards becomes delirious, he is to be anointed."*

[Dr. Mac Hale, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, observes, that "extreme unction is another channel for conveying the grace of penance; and that it is productive of the effect of remitting sins, is obviously deduced from the language of the Apostle, who first promulgated its institution: 'Is any man sick among you? let him bring in the Priests of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick man: and the Lord shall raise him up: and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him.' It will doubtless appear strange, that those who pretend to derive their faith from the Scripture should close their eyes to this attestation in favour of extreme unction. That one who, with Luther, would discard the whole Epistle because it is so strongly recommendatory of good works, should also reject every idea of the power of extreme unction to remit sins, is indeed natural. That those who blaspheme the inspired writings should point their ridicule against the practice of anointing at the hour of death, cannot excite our surprise; but that those who affect a veneration for the inspired word of God, and admit the Epistle of St. James to form a portion of it, should yet treat with profane derision the sacrament of the holy unction, betrays to the world that hereditary prejudice, and not the Bible, is the real source of their belief; else surely they would not indulge in any indecent mockery of a rite to which the Apostle, in language too clear for controversy, annexes the 'forgiveness of sins;' and which has been held in veneration in every age of the Church.

["In the ages immediately after that of the Apostles we do not find such frequent mention of this as of the other sacraments. The reason of the omission may be traced as well to the peculiar nature of the sacrament, as to the circumstances of the times. It is now the general discipline of the Church, that only one Priest administer this sacrament. Not so in the primitive ages, when, according to the suggestion of St. James, this rite was administered by the assistance of several Presbyters. The Lives of the Saints furnish many examples of this practice. In the life of Queen Clotilda we are told that she was anointed by Priests with the holy oil on the thirtieth day of her last sickness; and St. Cunigund, too, is said to have turned to the Priests who attended in her dying hour, from whom she sought the communion and the oil of unction.

* "Minus tamen severa est, nec improbabilis sententia Haberti, Petri Colleti, et aliorum, qui volunt extremam unctionem administrari debere omnibus fidelibus cognitione destitutis, sive pie, sive male vixerint, modo spatium habuerint pœnitendi priusquam rationis impotes fierent. Ratio eorum est: (1.) Quia fideles jure quod habent ad sacramenta privandi non sunt, nisi constet eos de jure suo cecidisse per manifestam impœnitentiam. (2.) Quia cum sint Christiani ac fidei principiis imbuti, præsumendum est ipsos ultimo que fuerunt sui ipsius compotes momento fuisse pœnitentia tactos..... Illam sententiam in praxi vulgo sequuntur Ecclesiæ Pastores."—Bailly, Theolog., tom. v., De Ext. Unct., cap. vii., Quær. iii.

[* Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 299, 300.

["In the Greek Church, up to the present day, seven Priests have generally assisted at the performance of this rite; nor is it ever known, says the learned and laborious Renaudot, that the sacrament is conferred only by one individual. All the other sacraments were generally administered in the church; and the instructions of St. Cyril still attest how cautiously those mysteries, as they are called by the Greek Fathers, were guarded from the knowledge and irreverence of the profane. If we are to judge from the modern rituals of the oriental churches, which are transcribed by the author of the History of the Sacraments, few ceremonies are more long and solemn than those which accompany the administration of extreme unction. Whilst, however, the other sacraments were securely celebrated in the churches, the nature of extreme unction required that it should be administered in the private houses of the dying. The same feeling which prompted the Fathers to treat the other sacraments with reserve, must have extended in some degree to this, and made them jealous of protecting, from the derision of the Pagans, who were then blended with Christian families, a sacramental rite which is not among those that are absolutely necessary for salvation.

["Besides, the spirit of persecution which uniformly raged against the first Christians, frequently prevented the administration of the holy unction. A number of Priests, habited in their sacerdotal robes, and bearing lighted tapers in their hands, would not only have provoked persecution against themselves, but would have directed the pursuit of their enemies to the bed of the sick and infirm, who would have been unable to escape the vengeance of the pursuers. The infirmities of sickness, during which alone the sacrament of the holy unction is to be applied, were often anticipated by the axe of the executioner, and its benefits superseded by the crown of martyrdom.

["In the earlier ages, the sacrament of extreme unction was generally sought and received before the patient advanced to the last stage of sickness. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, through an abuse that generally prevailed, it was deferred to the last agony,—an abuse of which some relics are still lingering in the Church.

["In the life of Oswald, Bishop of York, we are informed that, having gone into his oratory, he called his brethren, and exhorted them to administer to him the sacrament of extreme unction. The salutary practice of receiving this sacrament, whilst yet in the enjoyment of sufficient strength of mind and body, fell into disuse in subsequent times. A pernicious opinion spread abroad, that those who recovered were not permitted to walk barefooted, and that they were also forbidden the use of flesh-meat, &c. Lest they should be subjected to such privations, the faithful generally deferred the unction to the last agony, and were unhappily confirmed in the same practice by the avarice of some of the Clergy, who, by their exorbitant charges, rendered this sacrament almost inaccessible to the poor.

["It required all the zeal of the Bishops to reform such an abuse; and accordingly we find, that in their synods they adopted some salutary regulations to repress the exactions of the Clergy, as well as to eradicate the erroneous prejudices of the people. The causes which first influenced the delay of this holy rite have been removed; yet, such is the dominion of custom, that the dangerous practice of deferring this salutary remedy until its effect is almost lost on him to whom it is administered, has not been as yet entirely corrected.

["Most of the ancient Rituals prescribe that, while the extreme unction is administered, the dying penitent be laid in sackcloth and ashes. The ashes were sprinkled on the sackcloth in the form of a cross, and then the patient was stretched on it to receive the holy unction. Chardon cites a number of those Rituals, and refers to the example of many illustrious saints who devoutly conformed to this penitential practice. The historian, who has illustrated the important subject of the sacraments, tells us, that this practice generally prevailed over the Church; and laments, with a becoming indignation at their degeneracy, that it first fell into disuse among the Cistercians, one of the austerest of the religious orders.

["An opinion prevailed among some of the Scholastics of the twelfth century, that the sacrament of extreme unction could not be repeated. Like other opinions which they fancied, this was not authorized by the doctrine or practice of the Church. On the contrary, according to ancient Rituals, this sacrament was repeated during seven successive days. St. Rembert, Archbishop of Hamburg, as is mentioned in his Life, was anointed on the seventh day before his death; and received the same remedy, together with the body and blood of Christ, on each day till he expired. But, according to the modern practice of the Church, sanctioned by the Council of Trent, it is to be only once administered during the same sickness. It may, however, be as often repeated as the individual relapses into danger of death after recovery.

["To confer but once during life this salutary sacrament, would be to deprive many an individual of the advantages intended by its institution. At every period of his existence the 'life of man is a warfare;' and perhaps at no stage of his career does the contest prove more perilous than when approaching its termination. Then the enemy of man's salvation collects all his might, and gathers together all those engines of attack which were hitherto scattered through the different avenues of life. Under any circumstances the courage of the most intrepid would be put to severe trial by such vigorous assaults: they become doubly formidable, when man's strength is shattered by disease. If not sustained by some powerful armour, the heart of the Christian might sink under the pressure of despair. And hence the Almighty has, through his Apostle, ordained that the Priest should be called in, at the awful moment, to offer up 'the prayer of faith for his salvation,' and to anoint the patient with oil, imparting to it supernatural power to strengthen and to soothe, effects of which the element used on the occasion is naturally an emblem. The redemption is the rich and exhaustless source from which the grace of extreme unction, as well as that of every other sacrament, is derived. But if, on our entrance into the world, the Almighty has opened the living fountain of baptism, from which the grace of redemption might as if palpably flow, it is in accordance with the same scheme of love, that he should scatter similar wells of living water through the desert of our pilgrimage, and reserve a fresh spring of hope and mercy to gush forth at the hour of our departure." *]

VI. The effects of extreme unction.

These, as collected from the Council of Trent,† are the following:—1. Sanctifying grace. 2. Sacramental or actual graces. 3. Cleansing from the remains of sin, and comfort of mind. 4. Remission of sins. 5. Bodily healing.

The dispositions necessary for validly receiving this sacrament are, baptism, intention, dangerous sickness, and personal sin formerly committed for which absolution is required. In order to receive it fruitfully, a state of sanctifying grace is necessary. Hence, if any one is conscious of mortal sin, he is required to confess and receive forgiveness before he partakes of this sacrament.‡

1. Sanctifying grace. Extreme unction is said, per se, to confer secondary habitual grace, and, per accidens, primary grace. The following question and answer will present the views of the Paparchy on this topic:—

"When is this habitual grace infused?—Ans. There are three opinions concerning this. The first teaches that this grace is wholly infused at the first unction.

"The second contends, that it is only infused at the last, yet by the power of the preceding unctions; so that in the last the sacrament seems to be at length essentially perfected.

"The third declares, that by each unction grace is conferred, and effects corresponding to that sense which is anointed; for instance, remission of sins, committed through the sight, is obtained while the eyes are being anointed; so that in every unction the effects are in part obtained; and thus in the last unction, the total and complete effect is accomplished. This opinion is proved, because each unction, in its own form, is applied in the mode of a sacramental sign, which is conformable or adapted to its proper end; therefore the corresponding effect is given in the last instant, so as to be complete in itself, when there is no obstacle; for that form or preceding unction does not express the order for the other unctions, just as the effect of the consecration of the bread is not suspended on the following consecration of the wine.

"Observe, when it is said that remission of sins is conferred by each unction, (for instance, those committed by the sight, when the eyes are anointed,) this ought to be understood of venial sins, not of mortal sins: for, according to this opinion, all mortal sins are remitted in the first unction, as incompatible with sanctifying grace."§

From the foregoing, the studious reader will perceive, that the effects of extreme unction are placed in the same light as a charm or incantation, and without any warrant from Scripture. They are mere artificial figments, as is manifest from the jarring sentiments of Romish theologians respecting them.

2. Sacramental grace. This is said to be conferred ex opere operato, by the power of the sacrament on those who are properly disposed.

3. It cleanses from the remains of sin, and alleviates the mind, by exciting it to confidence in the divine mercy. Romanists explain the remains of sin, to mean a torpor of mind with regard to heavenly things, horror of death, fear on account of the uncertainty of salvation, proneness to evil, pusillanimity, &c.* Grace is said to be given to counteract all these. The Tridentine Catechism declares that "extreme unction removes the languor and infirmity entailed by sin, with all its other inconveniencies. .....It quiets our fears, illumines the gloom in which the soul is enveloped, fills it with pious and holy joy, and enables us to wait with cheerfulness the coming of the Lord."†

4. The remission of sins. This is an article of faith. The sacrament under consideration is allowed to remit venial sins directly and per se; but it is disputed whether it remits mortal sins per se and directly, or whether only per accidens. It is, notwithstanding, allowed, that this sacrament does remit mortal sins, as the Council of Trent teaches,‡ and which is attempted to be proved from the expressions in St. James, "if he be in sin," and, "they shall be forgiven." There are four opinions entertained among the Romanists respecting the meaning of the word "sins" by the Apostle. Some understand thereby "venial sins;" others, "mortal sins;" some, "the remains of sin;" and others, "every kind of sins." Accordingly, the Council of Trent, as if with the intention of accommodating all classes of sinners, and of countenancing all opinions, employs the words quidquid deliquisti, "whatever sins thou hast committed;" so that casuists and sinners appear to be at liberty to interpret this, so as to suit their various sentiments and desires.

["Popish Doctors," says Mr. Edgar, "notwithstanding their pretended unity, vary, as Faber, Bellarmine, Estius, and Dens have shown, on the effect of this unction. Dens has enumerated no less than ten different opinions, entertained on this point in the Romish communion. The chief differences, however, may be reduced to four, which have given rise to four factions in Papal Christendom.

["One faction, patronized by Bonaventure, Fleury,

[* Mac Hale, On The Evidences and Doctrines of the (Roman) Catholic Church, pp. 475—480. 8vo. London, 1842.]

[† Can. et Dec. Conc. Trid., sess. xiv., cap. 2.

[‡ "Qualis requiritur dispositio ad susceptionem hujus sacramenti?—R. 1. Ut valide suscipiatur, requiritur baptismus, intentio, periculosa infirmitas, et peccatum personale aliquando commissum. 2. Ut fructuose suscipiatur, insuper, per se loquendo, requiritur status gratiæ sanctificantis, cum sit sacramentum vivorum. Proinde is, qui conscientiam habet peccati mortalis, confessionem sacramentalem præmittere debet; qui autem confiteri non potest, prius equidem est absolvendus."—Dens Theolog., tom. vii., De Extrem. Unct., No. 9, De Effectibus hujus Sacramenti.

[§ "Quandonam infunditur gratia illa habitualis?—R. Tres circa hoc sunt opiniones. Prima dicit gratiam illam totaliter infundi in prima unctione. Secunda eam solum infundi in ultima, vi tamen præcedentium unctionum; eo quod in ultima sacramentum videatur demum essentialiter perfici: huic sententiæ favet S. Thom. (Supp. quæst. xxx., art. i., ad. 3.) Tertia docet, per singulam unctionem conferri gratiam, et effectus spectantes ad sensum illum, qui inungitur, v. g., remissio peccatorum per visum commissorum dum oculi inunguntur; ita ut singulis unctionibus partiales effectus percipiantur, atque ita in ultima totalis et completus effectus percipiatur. Probatur hæc sententia; quia quælibet unctio cum sua forma applicatur per modum signi sacramentalis et consistentis in usu: ergo effectus correspondens datur in ultimo instanti completi sui esse, dum nullus est obex; illa enim forma aut unctio præmissa ordinem non dicit ad alias unctiones, quomodo effectus consecrationis panis non suspenditur a consecratione vini secutura.

["Nota, dum dictum est, per singulam unctionem conferri, v. g., remissionem peccatorum per visum commissorum, dum oculi inunguntur, &c., hoc debere intelligi de venialibus, non de mortalibus; in hac enim sententia mortalia omnia remittuntur in prima unctione, utpote incompossibilia cum gratia sanctificante."—Idem, No. 10, De Effectu Gratiæ.]

[* "Quænam sunt illæ peccatorum reliquiæ, contra quas hoc sacramentum est institutum?—R. Torpor animi ad cœlestia, horror mortis, timor ob incertitudinem salutis, pronitas ad malum, pusillanimitas, &c."—Idem, No. 11, De Abstersione Reliquiarum Peccatorum.]

† Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 302.

‡ Can. et Dec. Conc. Trid., sess. xiv., cap. ii., can. 2.

Challenor, and the Trent Catechism, reckon the effect of this ceremony, the remission of venial sins. But this opinion has been rejected by others, such as Aquinas, Soto, Valentia, Scotus, Faber, and many moderns. A second party, supported by Estius, Dens, and the Council of Mentz, as well as by other Divines, extend its effects to the dismission of mortal transgressions. This theory, however, has been deprecated by Aquinas, Soto, Valentia, Scotus, Bellarmine, Faber, and many other theologians, because mortal offences are pardoned in baptism, and afterward in penance. A third class include both venial and mortal sins in the effect of this unction. This, according to the interpretation of Estius and Calmet, was the doctrine of the Council of Trent, which conferred on this ceremony the power of cancelling unexpiated and remaining transgressions. This explanation, therefore, embracing both trifling and heinous sins, sins both of frailty and enormity, is clothed by the Trentine dictators with all the glory of infallibility.

[" A fourth description ascribe the effect of this institution neither to venial nor mortal iniquity, but to weakness, infirmity, and the remains of sin. This, which some reckon the common opinion, has been sanctioned by Aquinas, Soto, Valentia, Durandus, and many moderns. But these Doctors, differing from others, differ also among themselves on the meaning attached to the remains of sin. Valentia, in the remains of sin, comprehends aversion to good and inclination to evil; while Bellarmine and others, at the expense of a little inconsistency, extend it to venial and mortal offences, as well as to sorrow and anxiety." *]

5. Health of body, or restoration from sickness, is another effect of extreme unction. The Catechism says: " The recovery of health, if advantageous to the sick person, is another effect of this sacrament." † The Council of Trent says: " The sick person sometimes obtains health of body, when this contributes to salvation." The Catechism proceeds: " However, should this effect not follow, it arises not from any defect in the sacrament, but from weakness of faith on the part of him by whom it is received, or of him by whom it is administered; for the Evangelist informs us, that our Lord wrought not many miracles among his countrymen, because of their incredulity. It may, however, be proper to observe, that Christianity, now that it has taken deep root in the minds of men, stands less in need of the aid of such miracles in our days than in the early ages of the Church." ‡ Had this observation been better regarded, fewer lying wonders would have disgraced the pages of Roman Catholic history.

Whether any precept has directly been given, enforcing the reception of this sacrament, has been a topic of dispute among Popish Divines. The decisions of the Council of Trent, and the exposition of the Catechism, are in favour of its divine institution, and its consequent necessity and obligation. Those who are devoted Romanists follow them. Others who have sufficient independence of mind, and are acquainted with antiquity and Scripture, consider it to be only of mere ecclesiastical authority, and not enjoined by inspired precept.

6. Theologians of the Church of Rome usually connect with extreme unction, instructions concerning the sepulture of the dead.

The following, on ecclesiastical sepulture, we translate from Dens:—" In ecclesiastical or sacred sepulture the Church especially embraces these four things: the solace of the living, a debt of piety, the honour of the dead, and their relief; for not only does the celebration of the divine office profit them, but also because the discharge of these dues is a pious work, serving to the support of the ministry and of the fabric of the Church.

" Besides, when they are buried in a sacred or blessed place, they partake of the prayers poured out there, and their bodies are delivered from the power of demons; they are committed to the patronage of the saints of that place, and are often peculiarly aided by the prayers of the faithful, who especially pray there for them.

" The Rituals teach, therefore, that mass should be celebrated in the presence of the dead body: wherefore evening sepultures ought not easily to be admitted." *

The following regulations we also collect from Dens, respecting the denial of burial to certain persons:—(1.) According to the Roman Ritual, ecclesiastical sepulture is to be denied to Pagans, Jews, and all infidels, heretics, and their favourers, apostates from the Christian faith, and schismatics. Of course, all Protestants are embraced under those called heretics, which is the common name given to them in their standard works, as well as in their private conversation; though in public, where the favour of Protestants is sought, they call them " their Protestant brethren," " their dissenting brethren." But this is only the language of deceit. (2.) Burial is denied to persons publicly excommunicated by the greater excommunication. (3.) To those who are interdicted by name, and those who live in an interdicted place. (4.) To notorious and public sinners. (5.) To those who do not receive the sacrament of confession annually, and who die without any sign of repentance. (6.) Self-murderers. (7.) Duellists. (8.) And to infants who die unbaptized. †

The superstitious observances and opinions which Roman Catholics connect with being buried in consecrated ground, are well known.

[We shall now proceed to give the doctrine of the Church of Rome respecting this sacrament, in the very words of her approved authors, commencing with Bishop Hay, to whose productions we have often referred.

[" Does the devil attack souls with more violence than ordinary in their last moments?—A. He certainly does, as the General Council of Trent declares, and as experience itself assures us. For though, at all times, he goeth about as a 'roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour,' (1 Peter v. 8,) yet he redoubles all his force, and all his art, when we come to our last moments, knowing, that, if he can gain us then, we shall be his for ever; but, if he lose us then, he loses us for ever; according to that of the Revelation, when St. John heard a loud voice, saying, 'Woe to the earth, and to the sea, because the devil is come down to you, having great wrath, knowing that he hath but a short time.' (Rev. xii. 12.) When the soul is in her last agony, hovering betwixt time and

[* Edgar's Variations of Popery, pp. 404, 405.]
† Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 303.
‡ Idem.

[* " In ecclesiastica seu sacra sepultura, Ecclesia intendit potissimum hæc quatuor: vivorum solatium, pietatis debitum, defunctorum honorem et refrigerium; non tantum quatenus celebratio divini officii ipsis prodest, sed etiam quia solutio expensarum opus est pium, serviens sustentationi Ministrorum et fabricæ Ecclesiæ.

[" Ulterius, cum sepeliantur in loco sacro seu benedicto, participant de precibus ibidem fusis, eorumque corpora potestati dæmonum subtrahuntur, patrocinio Sanctorum ejusdem loci committuntur, ac sæpe a fidelibus ibidem specialiter pro ipsis orantibus juvantur.

[" Ritualia deinde volunt, ut missa præsente corpore celebretur; quare sepulturæ vespertinæ non facile admittendæ."—Dens Theolog., tom. vii., De Extrema Unctione, No. 19, De Sepultura Ecclesiastica.]
† Idem, No. 20, De neganda Sepultura Ecclesiastica.

eternity, and upon the point of leaving the body, the devil then knows there is but a short time to stay, and therefore he redoubles all his assaults against her; for, as another text says, 'there are spirits that are created for vengeance, and in the time of destruction they shall pour out their force.' (Ecclus. xxxix. 28.) Like a King, who being at war with his enemies, when he comes to a decisive battle, on the event of which his crown depends, calls out all his army on that day, and exerts the utmost of his power in order to insure the victory. Now, when the poor soul comes to this last and dreadful battle, what can she do? If left to herself, she will surely perish. This our blessed Saviour well knowing, was pleased out of his infinite goodness to institute the holy sacrament of extreme unction, by which he both purifies the soul still more and more from all the remains of sin that may be in her, and which would give the devil more power and advantage over her; and he also raises her up above her own strength, endowing her with power from on high to enable her to fight manfully against all the assaults of Satan, and come off with victory.

["Q. Is extreme unction a true and real sacrament of the new law?—A. It is, and has all the three things necessary for that purpose.

["Q. What is the outward sensible sign used in extreme unction?—A. It is the anointing the different organs of our senses with holy oil, blessed in a particular manner by the Bishop for this purpose, accompanied by prayer.

["Q. What is the inward grace this brings to the soul?—A. Both the sanctifying grace of God, by which any stain of sin that may be in the soul is washed away and forgiven; and also the actual grace of God, by which the soul is fortified and strengthened to resist the assaults of Satan, in her last moments. It also sometimes brings health to the body, when Almighty God sees that to be expedient for the good of the soul.

["Q. How is this outward action a sign of the inward grace?—A. The oil with which the sick person is anointed represents the grace of God, which is poured down into the soul, and the prayer used at the time of anointing expresses the remission of sins thereby granted to the sick person; for the prayer is this: 'By this holy unction, and his own most pious mercy, may the Almighty God forgive you whatever sins thou hast committed by the sight,' when the eyes are anointed; 'by the hearing,' when the ears are anointed; and so of the other senses.

["Q. Where is this sacrament laid down in the holy Scriptures?—A. It is explained at large, in all its parts, by the holy Apostle St. James, in these clear and express terms: 'Is any one sick among you? let him bring in the Priests of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.' See here the outward action of the sacrament, 'anointing with oil, accompanied with prayer;' the inward grace immediately follows: 'And the prayer of faith shall save the sick man, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him.' (James v. 14.) Our Lord shall raise him up above his own strength, fortifying his soul with his assisting grace; and, 'if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him,' by the sanctifying grace of God, which will wash and purify his soul from all the stains of sin that may remain in it, so that he may appear with joy before his Lord.

["Q. What are the effects of this sacrament of extreme unction?—A. These will easily appear from what has been said. (1.) It cleanses the soul from all the remains of sin; that is, from that anxiety and disturbance of mind, that fear and disquiet, that tepidity and sloth of soul, which, in some degree or other, sin always leaves in the soul, and which, when a person is in the danger of death, have often very bad consequences. Hence, (2.) It calms the mind, and renders the sick person composed and resigned to the will of God, giving him great courage and confidence in the divine mercy. (3.) It washes away the guilt of venial sins which may lurk in the soul, as the proper and direct effect which is designed by it. (4.) It also cleanses the soul even from the guilt of mortal sin, in certain circumstances, where the sick person cannot have recourse to the sacrament of penance; for, where this sacrament of penance can be had, it must always be applied to for the remission of mortal sin; but in dying persons, it may sometimes happen that this cannot be done. As, for example, if their mortal sins were not forgiven in confession, for want of proper dispositions, though unknown to the person himself; or, were committed after being at the sacrament of penance, but had quite escaped his memory; or, if being suddenly deprived of his senses, he could not confess them, but had a sincere sorrow for them. In these, or such like cases, even the guilt of mortal sins will be cleansed from the soul by the grace of extreme unction. (5.) It strengthens him to bear with more Christian patience, all the pains and sufferings of his sickness. (6.) It fortifies the soul against all the assaults of Satan in her last moments. And, (7.) It contributes to restore health to the body, if expedient to the soul.

["Q. Are all these effects certainly produced by the grace of this sacrament?—A. All those which regard the soul never fail to be produced by the grace of this sacrament, unless the sick person put a hinderance to them by his indisposition; for the Scripture expressly affirms, that, when it is administered, 'our Lord shall raise him up, and his sins shall be forgiven him.' So that God who is faithful to his word, will never fail on his part to bestow these graces on the sick person, if he be properly disposed to receive them; and the more perfectly he is disposed, the more abundant portion he will receive of them. But what regards the health of the body is not always granted, being only an accidental effect, and not essential to the sacrament, and is only given when the good of the soul requires it.

["Q. What are the dispositions required for receiving extreme unction?—A. To receive this sacrament with the full and proper fruit of it to the soul, it is required, (1.) That the person be free from the known guilt of mortal sin, by a previous use of the sacrament of penance, where that can be done. (2.) If he be conscious of being in the state of sin, but cannot confess, being deprived of his speech, for example, although otherwise in his senses, he must have a sincere, internal sorrow and repentance for these sins. (3.) As repentance is absolutely required for the remission of every sin, great or small, he ought also to have a sincere repentance for all his sins in general, whether great or small, known or unknown. (4.) He ought also to have a great and firm confidence in the mercy of God, and in the merits of Christ, that by means of this sacrament he will be enabled to die the death of the just, and find favour with his God. (5.) To join his earnest prayers with those of the Church, while the sacrament is administering to him; for this is a sacrament of prayer, and 'the prayer of faith shall save the sick man.'

["Q. To whom does it belong to give extreme unction?

—A. The Scripture has determined it in express terms: 'Let him call for the Priests of the Church,' this being a branch of the priestly office.

["Q. To whom can this sacrament be given?—A. Only to the members of the Church who are in danger of death by sickness. 'Is any one sick among you?' says the Scripture; and among those only to such as are capable of sinning, because the design of this sacrament is chiefly to purify the soul from the remains of past sins, and strengthen her against falling into sin again. Hence it cannot be given, (1.) To such as are in danger of death, but not from sickness; as to people going to battle, or to sea, in a dangerous voyage, or to be put to death by the order of justice, or the like. (2.) To such as are incapable of having ever sinned; such as infants, and those who have been deprived of their judgment from their infancy. (3.) To those who die impenitent, or in the actual commission of mortal sin; as a drunken man wounded to death, and dying before he becomes sober again."*

[In the "Short Christian Doctrine," composed by the order of Pope Clement VIII., by the Rev. Father Robert Bellarmine, we find the following view of the sacrament under consideration:—

["Master. What effect is produced by extreme unction?—Disciple. It blots out the remains of sin; it gives joy and strength to the soul to contend with the devil in that last hour; and it also assists in the recovery of bodily health, if that should be useful to the health of the soul." †

[In the "Abridgment of Christian Doctrine," an elementary work, published with the sanction of the Romish authorities of Ireland, we meet with the following exhibition of the doctrine in question:—

["Q. What is the fifth sacrament?—A. Extreme unction. Q. When did Christ institute it?—A. The time is uncertain: some think it was instituted at his last supper; others, that it was done betwixt his resurrection and ascension.

["Q. By whom was this sacrament promulgated?—A. By St. James: 'Is any sick among you? let him bring in the Priests of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of our Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick man, and our Lord will lift him up; and if he be in sin, his sins shall be forgiven him.' (James v. 14, 15.)

["Q. Who is capable of this sacrament?—A. Every true and faithful Christian who is in mortal danger of death by sickness; excepting infants, fools, and such as are always mad. Q. What is the matter of it?—A. Oil, blessed by a Bishop. Q. What is the form of it?—A. 'By his own anointing, and his own most pious mercy, our Lord pardon thee whatsoever thou hast sinned by thy seeing,' &c. And so of all the other senses, repeating the same words.

["Q. What are the effects of extreme unction?—A. It comforts the soul, in her last agony, against despair; it remits venial sins, and removes the relics of sin, and restores corporal health, if it be expedient. Q. How prove you that?—A. Out of St. Mark, where we read, that the Apostles 'anointed with oil many sick, and healed them;' (Mark vi. 13;) which anointing is insinuated by many to have been a previous sign of extreme unction; and, consequently, of its effects. Q. Why then do so few recover after it?—A. Either because the recovery of the body is not expedient for the soul, or because the sick deferred the sacrament too long, as too many do, or for other indispositions in the receiver of it." *

[In the Catechism of Dr. Butler, revised, enlarged, approved, and recommended by the four Roman Catholic Archbishops of Ireland, as a general Catechism for the kingdom, we meet with the following:—

["Q. What is extreme unction?—A. A sacrament which gives grace to die well, and is instituted chiefly for the spiritual strength and comfort of dying persons. Q. Is extreme unction given to all persons in danger of death?—A. No; only to such as are in danger of death by sickness. Q. How should we prepare ourselves for extreme unction?—A. By a good confession; and we should be truly sorry for our sins, and resigned to the will of God when we are receiving that last sacrament. Q. Who are appointed to administer the sacrament of extreme unction?—A. The Priests of his church, as St. James teaches, and as the Church has constantly practised." †

["The very name of this sacrament," says the Jesuit Mumford, "is grown even unheard of to us here in England, who boast so much of the word of God. And yet, according to the word of God, there is not any sacrament at all which can be more manifestly proved a true sacrament than this, both in regard of the outward or visible sign, or in regard of the invisible grace. This visible sign is proved evidently by our Saviour, because nobody but he could annex the gift of invisible grace to the visible sign; to which sign most clear Scripture doth testify this grace to be annexed. For so we read, James v. 14. Behold the visible outward sign of this sacrament! And in the next words, behold the invisible grace annexed thereunto, 'And if he be in sins, they shall be remitted him.' Now, good Protestant, give me leave to ask thee this one question: Is there any time in which it more imports a man to have so good a warrant, as God's word is, for the remission of his sins, than in the time of his departure out of this world? Behold then here a means to obtain this remission, even at this very time; and this means warranted by the very word of God. And yet without any ground at all in God's word, you have rejected a thing so importing all Christians, though you found the practice of all Christianity to be conformable to the words as they sound. How doth this stand with your pretence of reforming our errors by the rule of Scripture? You go so flatly contrary to real Scripture, even in a point of abolishing a sacrament which was used by all the (Roman) Catholic Church before your Reformation, and having so clear a text for it, and no single text against it.

["(2.) To take away the force of this text; first, in place of 'Priests,' you are pleased, against all antiquity, to read 'Elders,' because the Greek word that signifieth 'Priests,' in vulgar use signifieth 'Elders.' Now this is as ridiculous, as if one would say, 'The Bigger of the city,' in place of saying, 'The Major of the city,' because [* Sincere Christian instructed in the Faith of Christ, vol. ii., pp. 124—129. Dublin, 1822.

[† "M. Che effetto fa l' olio santo?—D. Scancella le reliquie de peccati; dà allegrezza e fortezza all' anima per combattere col Demonio in quell' ultimo tempo; ed ancora ajuta a ricevere la sanità del corpo, se quella sia utile alla salute dell' anima."—Dottrina Cristiana Breve, composta per ordine di Papa Clemente VIII., dal R. P. Roberto Bellarmino, della Compagnia di Gesu', poi Cardinale di Santa Chiesa. Reveduta, ed approvata della Congregazione della Riforma. In Roma, 1836, Presso Pietro Aurelj. Stampatore, e Librajo in Via de' Sediari, N. 24. Con Licenza de' Superiori, e Privelegio.

[* Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine, pp. 88, 89. Belfast, 1833.

[† Dr. Butler's Catechism, p. 55. Cork, 1839.

the word 'Major' (Mayor) signifieth the 'Bigger;' or as if, for the like cause, you would call a 'Doctor of Physic,' a 'Teacher of Physic,' whereas a 'Doctor' is well known to signify such a degree. As also a 'Major' is notoriously known to signify a secular office, or dignity in a city: so the name put in Greek for a 'Priest,' Presbyteros, is as notoriously known to signify a 'Priest' endued with a priestly order, office, and function in the church of God. Whence this name is improperly translated 'Elder,' when speech is manifestly of Church affairs, as here speech is of some ministry or other, at which sins are forgiven.

["I know that those who grant, that here is a command (for Councils you will have none) to use anointing of the sick with true oil, pretend that this was commanded to be done only for obtaining a miraculous cure; 'a doctrine full of absurdities.' The first of which is novelty. The second is flat contradiction to the text, expressing the chief effect to be sought for, not to be the health of the body, but of the soul: 'And if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him.' The third absurdity is to say, there was in the Church (for a time) a command to any one sick among us, to seek for a miraculous cure. The fourth is to say, that any Priest or Elder whatsoever might be called in to work this miraculous cure. Upon what authority of Scripture or history is this said? Give me leave, in the last place, to ask, if ever you did read or hear, that at the use of any element, which was not sacramental, sins were promised to be forgiven by any one, even of Christ's Apostles?

["Other of your Doctors will have this anointing with oil, to be only the oil of devout prayers, or charity. But, first, where have you that, at your Elder's or Priest's prayer? It will follow, that 'if the sick man be in sins, they shall be forgiven him.' Do not you scoff at Priests' forgiving sins; and will you now allow a sure warrant attested by God's own word, that at the Priest's prayer, yea, at the Elder's, the sick man's sins shall be forgiven? Again, this free licence of interpreting 'oil' to be prayer or charity, opens a gap to interpret all that is said of applying water in baptism, to be understood only of applying the clear and cleansing streams of heavenly doctrine, teaching them to believe in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, without ever casting water on them. Again, did ever any holy Father thus interpret this place of St. James? Shall I, upon your never-heard-of interpretation, go and forsake a remedy taught me by the practice of all the Church, and by so clear a text, upon which remedy the forgiveness of my sins, at the hour of my death, and consequently my eternal salvation, may depend? God give me my wits, and I will never do it." *]

VII. Having stated the doctrine of extreme unction as held by the Church of Rome, we now proceed to show, that its matter and form as a sacrament are unauthorized; that the part assumed by the Minister of this rite is unscriptural; that the effects ascribed to the institution do not exist; that it was not instituted by Christ; that there exists a great discrepancy between the scriptural and Romish accounts of this practice of anointing; that the testimony of antiquity is against it; that it is not a mere innocent or harmless rite, but that its effects are hurtful both to the Clergy and laity; that it is deceptive in its character; that it tends to produce strange ideas respecting the views and feelings of dying Christians; and that it is directly superstitious in its tendency. All these assertions we can establish to the satisfaction of all the intelligent and unprejudiced.

[* The Catholic Scripturist, by Joseph Mumford, Priest of the Society of Jesus, pp. 177—182. London, 1686.]

1. The matter and form of extreme unction as a sacrament are unauthorized by Scripture.

As to the form, let it be remarked: (1.) It is not warranted nor found in Scripture, as the words of consecration in the sacraments of the Lord's supper and baptism are; and therefore such a form cannot be enjoined on Christians as of divine authority. (2.) The form is blasphemous in itself, inasmuch as it connects the anointing and God's mercy together in such a manner, as that the creature and the Creator are associated in one and the same commission.

In reference to the matter, we note, (1.) The element of a sacrament, according to the scriptural view of such an institution, is not consecrated except in the administration. The bread is blessed in breaking; (1 Cor. x 16;) or rather, God is blessed, which is the true idea of the word ευχαριζω, which means, "to bless God," and is so used in the words of institution. (2.) In the sacrament of baptism, we have no authority to bless the water that is employed. Therefore, consecrated oil has no authority from Scripture; and if we judge by analogy, from the acknowledged sacraments of the old and new law, the authoritative institution of these sacraments is directly against the Romish practice of consecrating or blessing oil in anointing the sick.

Furthermore, to put the most favourable construction on the Roman Catholic institution, it possesses many additions to the simple anointing mentioned in Scripture, which have no warrant from the word of God, nor example in the primitive Church. To anoint with oil in the name of the Lord, and to pray in faith, are mentioned in Scripture. To this, however, the Papists have added so as to make the number of anointings eight, or at least five, using distinct unctions in immediate succession, as well as the same number of accompanying petitions, together with many preliminary and concluding prayers and ceremonies, and this to such an extent as entirely to lose sight of the scriptural usage.

2. This anointing, of which St. James speaks, was performed by the whole company of Elders in every congregation, all of whom were not recognised as Pastors of the Church. Though these are the fittest persons to visit the sick, to pray with, and to comfort them, both with respect to their duty and qualifications; yet this does not preclude the prayers of pious persons, as the Scripture abundantly testifies, and that in this very case of anointing. So the Apostle, in the connexion where he treats of this anointing, commendeth the prayer, not only of the faithful Pastors, but of any righteous man. "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." (James v. 16.) Again: our Lord does not confine his miraculous, any more than his ordinary, gifts, to the ministry; for the faithful who were not Ministers occasionally possessed the gift of healing, as appears from the following passage: "These signs shall follow them that believe, &c.: They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." (Mark xvi. 17, 18.)

["Extreme unction," observes Mr. Edgar, "is a variation from scriptural unction. The scriptural and Romish institution differ in the administration, sign, form, subject, and end. The Popish unction requires but one administrator. This has been defined by Pope Alexander and Benedict, as well as by the Tridentine Council. A solitary Priest, unaided and alone, can, with facility and dispatch, perform the whole ceremony in all its diversified evolutions, and in all its modern additions and improvements. The scriptural unction, recommended by the pen of inspiration, requires, on the contrary, a plurality of administrators. The sick person was to 'call for the Elders of the Church.' The words which signify the anointing and the prayer are in the plural number, indicating, beyond all question, the necessity of more than one dispensator.

["Extreme and scriptural unction differ also in their sign. The sign of both, indeed, is oil. But the oil of the Popish ceremony must be consecrated by a Bishop, and the consecration is attended with a world of superstition and chicanery. The Romish institution, celebrated with any other kind of oil, is invalid. Should the administrator, through mistake, use chrism, he is instructed by the Council of Milan to repeat the ceremony, and apply the proper sign. The holy oil only is, in this ordinance, possessed of any efficacy. The primeval Christians knew nothing of these superstitions. The use of the ceremony stated by the sacred historian Mark, was, according to the Council of Trent, prior to the existence of the priestly or episcopal order: and the unguent, therefore, employed at that time, was guiltless of episcopal benediction.

["The modern and primitive unctions differ in their form, as well as in their administrator and sign. The form of the Popish rite, consisting in anointing and prayer, is one continued scene of superstition, balderdash, and indecency. The Priest makes the sign of the cross three times on the sick person, in the name of the Trinity. The imposition of the sacerdotal hands, and the invocation of angels, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs, Confessors, and virgins, are used for the extinction of the power of the devil, and every unclean spirit in the patient's members, marrow, and every joint of his limbs. The Priest then dips his thumb in the holy ointment, and anoints the sick person in the form of a cross on the eyes, ears, nose, mouth, hands, and feet. These organs are then wiped with cotton, which is burned, and the ashes, for fear of profanation, are thrown into the sacrarium. Even the water with which the Priest washes his hands is, for the same reason, poured into a clean and retired place.

["The administration of this observance adds indecency to superstition. This part of the ceremony is of the most revolting description, and is expressed in the language of grossness and indelicacy. The whole scene, as represented in the Roman Ritual, must, to every mind possessing the least sensibility or refinement, present a spectacle of loathing and disgust."*]

Pope Innocent I. taught, that it was lawful for laymen and even all Christians to use this anointing. His words are, "The holy oil of chrism, made by the Bishop, it is lawful not only for the Priests, but for all Christians, to use by anointing, in their own or their friends' necessity."†

3. With regard to the effects of this supposed sacrament, they are said to be at least five, as we have already seen. It can, however, be shown, that these are chiefly superstitious virtues which have been foolishly ascribed to this unction, or effects which have been produced by other means, and in a different manner.

That this Popish anointing cannot heal the body, we see by daily experience, for more die than live after it; and those who recover, with more reason, attribute their restoration to other means. Therefore, this unction is utterly dissimilar to that used by the Apostles, which was followed by the restoration of health. Here, however, the Romanists are divided among themselves. Some imagine that the health of the body is the proper end of this sacrament; others believe that the welfare of the soul is particularly intended, and the health of the body conditionally, and only so far as the well-being of the soul is concerned. The confusion arising from these jarring sentiments naturally tends to infidelity among the more thinking part of the community; and, by the superstitious and ignorant, this unction is only viewed as a charm, spell, or incantation, to relieve the soul or body, or both, as their necessities may require.

To ascribe remission of sins to this ceremony is truly unscriptural. St. James says, that "the prayer of faith," not the oil, will "save the sick." The Scripture, also, in other places ascribes remission of sins to faith, and not to any external rite. Here also Popish Divines are placed in a somewhat awkward dilemma. Some say venial sins, others mortal sins, others the remains of sins, are pardoned, while a fourth class affirm that the sacrament remits sins of every description. Thus nothing but perplexity seems to attend us in almost every step that we take in Popish divinity. According to Scripture, when the sin is pardoned, there is no condemnation, and peace of conscience follows. "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God." (Rom. v. 1.) "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus." (Rom. viii. 1.)

4. The Romish sacrament of extreme unction was not instituted by Christ. In proof of this we present the following exposition and arguments:—

(1.) It must be allowed that there is something in the sound of the words used by St. James that seems to give countenance to the Popish practice; and hence it is, that some ill-taught Protestants have been imposed upon, and persuaded to submit, in their dying hours, to an unction, under a kind of half-persuasion that the thing can do no harm, and may probably accomplish some good. Nevertheless, we ought to remember, that it is not the sound of certain words, taken out of their connexion, by which we are to judge of the sense of Scripture. It is the meaning of the sentence, taken in connexion with the whole of what may be said upon the subject in question, by which our faith and practice are to be regulated. The words of the supposed institution of this sacrament are, in our translation, as follows:—"Is any sick among you? let him call for the Elders of the Church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." (James v. 14, 15.) Here we certainly have "sickness," and "sending for the Elders," or "Priests," as the Douay version has it. We have also, "praying over the sick person," and "anointing him with oil," and "saving him," and "raising him up," and "having his sins forgiven." Taking these expressions in this detached manner, the Church of Rome would seem to have a better foundation for this sacrament than for others of her errors; and yet the arguments deduced from them have no more weight than that used by an intemperate person, who would plead for drunkenness and its concomitants, by quoting the following passage: "Drink ye, and be drunken, and spue, and fall, and rise no more." (Jer. xxv. 27.)

(2.) Anointing with oil was a ceremony in frequent use among the Jews. It was divinely appointed to be applied to persons who were set apart for certain offices, and the application of it was often attended with a change of relation or character. Such examples are furnished in the cases of Saul and Jehu. The sign was a common one among the Jews. This appeared by what the Apostles did, when Christ first sent them out to preach the Gospel. Hence, though our Lord only commissioned his disciples "to heal the sick," (Matt. x. 8; Luke ix. 2,) yet St. Mark informs us, that they added their usual ceremonies in doing this; for "they anointed many that were sick with oil, and healed them." (Mark vi. 13.) Accordingly St. James, speaking to the Elders of the Jews, recommends them to use this form in the name of the Lord.

[* Edgar's Variations of Popery, pp. 407, 408.]

† "Sancto oleo chrismatis ab Episcopo confecto, non solum Sacerdotibus, sed et omnibus uti Christianis licet, in sua aut suorum necessitate, inunguendo."—Epist. i., cap. 8.

["The external application of oil to the human body is of remote antiquity, and was directed to a variety of purposes. Of these the most ancient of which we have any account was the consecration of Kings and of Priests, and even of inanimate things set apart for holy uses. (1 Sam. x. 1; Exod. xxviii. 41; xxix. 7; xxx. 23—25; xxxvii. 29; Lev. viii. 12; Psalm cxxxiii. 2; Gen. xxviii. 18; xxxv. 14.) The same word (שמן) translated 'ointment' in Psalm cxxxiii. 2, is rendered 'oil' in Exod. xxix. 7. And, in fact, the holy ointment (Exod. xxx. 23—25) was nothing more than a perfumed oil. The spices were pounded separately, then mixed and infused in water: the water thus impregnated was mixed with oil, which was boiled till the water exhaled.* The use of oil in consecration appears to have been peculiar to the Hebrews; and from them the practice was communicated to Christian Princes; and was probably intended to signify, by its soothing qualities, the benign influences of divine grace. It was almost of equal antiquity among the Jews, as an article of luxury; (Deut. xxviii. 40;) for this, among other indulgences, was forbidden to the Jews on the day of expiation."†]

(3.) The power of casting out devils, and healing the sick, and raising the dead, was continued to the Apostles after Christ had ascended to heaven; and others were admitted to a participation, at least, of some of these powers. Persons thus endowed would become, of course, by the choice of their brethren, Elders of Churches.

(4.) Among the extraordinary gifts bestowed on the Preachers of the Gospel, or the rulers or Elders of the Churches, was the gift of faith, as in these words: "To another (the gift of) faith by the same Spirit;" (1 Cor. xii. 9;) that is, a strong impulse of the Spirit, persuading them that God would enable them to do this or that. Hence faith sometimes signifies the spiritual gifts in general; (Rom. xii. 3;) at others the gift of working miracles; (1 Cor. xii. 9; xiii. 2;) and occasionally the gift of healing diseases miraculously. This seems to be that faith which is styled "the faith of God," to which is ascribed the power of removing mountains. The gift of working miracles was called "faith," because they were wrought in consequence of an impression on the mind persuading, or producing faith in the mind of the individual, that God would, by him, accomplish such a miracle. Wherefore, "the prayer of faith," spoken of by St. James, is a prayer which the Elder, moved by the Spirit of God, was to make for the recovery of the sick, in the full persuasion that the Lord would raise him up; for σωσει, "will save," is the same with εγερει, he "will raise him up;" and, therefore, in the Church of Rome, unless the Priest, as often as he administers extreme unction, acts and prays by immediate inspiration, his prayers are not the kind to which St. James refers; neither are they directed to the same end.

(5.) As to the sins committed, and the forgiveness of them, we remark, that they appear to be such as God was pleased to visit with some bodily affliction; as in the case of the Corinthians, some of whom, for disorderly celebrating the Lord's supper, were "weak and sickly," and were therefore "chastened:" (1 Cor. xi. 30, 32:) and where the sickness was by way of chastisement, the healing was a testimony that God forgave it. Hence, "Thy sins be forgiven," was our Lord's usual expression when he healed the sick. (Matt. ix. 2, 6, 7.) So the Prophet says, "The inhabitant shall not say, I am sick: the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity." (Isai. xxxiii 24.) Hence it is evident there is no foundation for the dogma of extreme unction, which is administered for the purgation of sins, when the persons concerned, humanly speaking, are past recovery. For how can they gather a sacrament of extreme unction from an unction which is not extreme; or a perpetual ordinance from one that was extraordinary and miraculous, and that has long since ceased? How can they prove that which was proper to dying persons from a rite administered only to persons who were not to die, but were to be raised up from sickness? or promise to him forgiveness of sins, to whom they cannot promise that recovery which was the token of it?

(6.) That the anointing recommended by St. James cannot be such as the Romish Church prescribes, is evident from the following considerations:—(i.) St. James directs that the sick person should be anointed in reference to his cure; but they anoint him while in the agonies of death, when there is no prospect of recovery, and never administer this unction while there is any hope of life. (ii.) The Apostle orders this anointing for the cure of the body; but they apply it principally for the cure of the soul, concerning which St. James gives no directions: and what is said of the forgiveness of sins is to be referred to faith and prayer, and not to the anointing; for these are often the means of restoring lost health, and of preventing premature death, when all natural means have failed. (iii.) The anointing which St. James recommends was only applied in some cases, perhaps very few; but the Church of Rome uses it in all cases; therefore St. James's unction and the extreme unction of Popery, are two very different things.

(7.) From the foregoing it is evident, that the anointing of the sick with oil, and the praying for their recovery, were not appointed as a permanent office in the Church, which every Priest may perform, and every professing Christian who is sick may demand. These rites were peculiar to the first ages, being appointed not for the procuring pardon of sin to the sick, but for a miraculous recovery from some mortal disease which had been inflicted on them as the temporal punishment of their sins; and no person could minister these rites with efficacy, but those who had the gift of healing diseases miraculously. The directions, therefore, which the Apostles have given concerning these rites, were not intended for the instruction of the Ministers of religion in every age, but merely to teach those who in the first ages were endowed with miraculous powers.

5. There exists an extraordinary discrepancy between the Romish and the scriptural accounts of anointing the ["* Witsii Miscel. Sacr., lib. ii., disc. ii., sect. 56.

[† See an article entitled, "On the Ancient Use of Oil," Wesleyan-Methodist Magazine, vol. lxvi., pp. 461—467.]

sick. Not inferring, however, that they are similar institutions,—for nothing can be more dissimilar,—we may properly contrast the two, since the Church of Rome identifies them as one and the same. "The Council" of Trent "declares that this unction is to be applied to the sick, and especially to those who lie in a dangerous state, as in all appearance to be appointed to death; whence it is called 'The sacrament of the dying.'" The Catechism says, "Extreme unction is to be administered to those only whose malady is such as to excite apprehensions of approaching dissolution." But what saith the Scripture? St. Mark's account, in the passage brought forward by the Council, and according to the Rhemish translation, is, "And they cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them." (Mark vi. 13.) Then what says St. James in the passage on which the tenet is founded? "Is any man sick among you?" &c.; "and the Lord shall raise him up." But the Church of Rome will only administer to the dying, in their extreme or last state; and it is even accounted an untoward event if the sick man recover after having gone through the ceremony. It is as difficult to discover the identity, as it is wonderful to contemplate the consummate credulity with which this glaring inconsistency is received.

["It doth not appear that our Saviour enjoined the use of this ceremony; but it is rather probable that he did not, since the Apostles healed many persons without it. And, therefore, if one should say, that possibly they took it up of themselves, as a rite very pertinent for them to use upon this occasion, and which would easily be understood by all, I do not see how he could be confuted. Perhaps it may not be unreasonably supposed, that they received some general direction from our Saviour, that in exerting the gift which he had bestowed upon them, they might freely use this honourable ceremony, or some other of like signification, that was fit to raise the expectation of a miraculous healing.

["Now this (Mark vi. 13) being the only place in the New Testament where anointing with oil is mentioned, besides that of St. James, and it being also plain that the unction in St. Mark referred to the gift of healing, surely the unction spoken of by St. James must have the same signification; or else it is a place of such obscurity, that it will be very hard to find a sacrament in it, or to make any conclusion whatsoever from it; for in all appearance the very same case is spoken of in both places. The action is the same, namely, anointing with oil; the persons anointed are in the same circumstances, for in both they are 'the sick;' and the event the same, for in St. Mark they were healed, and in St. James it is expressly said, 'The Lord shall raise him up.' What, therefore, should hinder, but that if anointing were the ceremony of miraculous healing in the one, it should have the same signification in the other? If there were any difficulty in the words of St. James, and it were doubtful to what purpose the unction by him mentioned was applied, one would think the obscurity should wholly disappear before the light with which St. Mark offers to clear that text. But that, in all appearance, the same case should be expressed in both, and yet there should be so vast a difference as the Romish doctrine supposes, is for them to believe who make the Scriptures good for nothing, till the Church comes to find out a meaning for them.

["For this reason some of our adversaries have thought fit to prove their pretended sacrament out of St. Mark, well perceiving that, without drawing him in for a witness to their doctrine, as well as they could, they must be forced to quit St. James too. Thus Maldonatus, without mincing the matter, asks, 'If the sacrament of extreme unction be not here, (in St. Mark,) where is it?' A question put not without reason, I confess; from whence I infer, that here it is not, and therefore it is nowhere to be found in Scripture. As for his other question which he presently adds, 'Why is it not here, if it be any where else?' I answer, that if he could have made good proof that he found it any where else, he would never have stretched his confidence so far as to pretend that he found it here.

["'In this place,' says the Jesuit, 'we are to deal not only with heretics who obstinately contend that the sacrament of extreme unction is not here spoken of, but also with certain Catholics, who seem to say almost the same thing, who are nevertheless excusable in great part, since these new heretics had not yet sprung up in their time.'* And he was so well satisfied that their sacrament was gone, if St. Mark's text could not save it, that he plainly said, that to deny this place to be understood of the sacrament of extreme unction, was 'to make a step' towards the taking of it away, either 'maliciously,' if he were an heretic that did so, or 'imprudently,' if he were a (Roman) Catholic.

["He well knew that the Divines of his Church had generally denied the unction which the Apostles used in St. Mark to be their sacramental unction, and that they had laid the stress of their cause upon St. James; but he saw the inconvenience of it too, that the same unction being indeed spoken of in both places, by giving up one, they, in effect, yielded both, and so left their sacrament without any testimony of Scripture at all. Thus far, therefore, his judgment is to be commended, that he chose rather to challenge both places, which might be done with the same confidence, and the same pains that would serve to challenge one of them, than to be at the charge of wresting St. James, and afterwards to be at a new expense of pains in making St. Mark and St. James to speak of two different unctions; that is, to show a difference where in truth there was none to be shown.

["But how does this bold undertaker bring St. Mark's text to his purpose? Why, he proves that the Apostles did not use oil as a medicine, as if any, either Protestant or Papist, was so weak as to say they did; and then he concludes, that they anointed the sick, not 'to cure their bodies,' so much as 'their minds' by a sacrament; as if that unction must needs be a sacrament, or a medicine. He pretends that it could not be used as a sign of a miraculous cure, because it would have obscured the miracle, and led the spectators into a belief that the cure was wrought by the natural force of the oil. And some other such things he says, which are so intolerably trifling, that I am very well pleased to be excused from giving them any answer, by the confession of the most and best Divines of the Roman Church, that the unction in St. Mark was not sacramental, or for the healing of the mind, but the body. For this was not taught by Cajetan only, but by Gregory de Valentia, and by Bellarmine, who recites other great authors of the same opinion."†]

["* 'Hoc loco agendum non solum contra hæreticos, qui pertinaciter contendunt hic non esse sermonem de sacramento extremæ unctionis, sed etiam contra quosdam Catholicos, qui pene idem videntur docere, quos tamen magna ex parte ætas nondum novas experta hæreses excusat.'—Maldonati in Quat. Evang. Comment., tom. i., Marc. vi. 13. Fol. Mogunt., 1624."

[† Gibson's Preservative against Popery, vol. ii., tit. vii., chap. ii., sect. iv., pp. 63, 64.]

6. The testimony of antiquity on this doctrine.

Though Roman Catholics on this, as well as on others of their new doctrines, claim the suffrage of antiquity, nothing is worse founded than such an assertion. We have proof to show that this pretended sacrament is a mere novelty of the dark ages, and that it was entirely unknown to Christians of earlier days.

(1.) We have seen that the words of the Apostle James related to the healing of the sick, or to their restoration to health, and that they furnish no authority for anointing the dying, solely with a view to their departure. We read of several instances of persons being anointed, while in sickness, during the first four or five centuries; but all these appear to be connected with the hope of restoration to health; and there is reason to think that the practice was superstitiously continued after the miraculous powers of healing had ceased; but of its being considered a sacrament to be administered to the dying for their spiritual benefit, we read nothing for many centuries after Christ.

(2.) There is no mention of it in Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, or Cyprian, or in any of the writers of the first three centuries, who wrote frequently and plainly of the discipline and sacraments of the Church: it was, therefore, not known to them.

(3.) It was unknown in the fourth century, which produced so many Christian writers, but not one of them mentions it, not even when writing of the sacraments and ecclesiastical rites. Epiphanius treats largely of the doctrines, discipline, and ceremonies of the Church, in his work against heresies; but not a word does he mention of extreme unction. The counterfeit Dionysius lays down, with wonderful minuteness, all the mysteries of the Church, from the baptism to the burial of the faithful; yet of extreme unction he is as silent as the grave. And so is the author of the Apostolical Institutions, in his eighth book, in which he undertakes to describe all ecclesiastical forms.

(4.) The biographies extant of the first six centuries, which contain narratives of the life and death of many extraordinary persons, give no intimation of any of them undergoing the process of extreme unction. This amounts to positive proof that no such sacrament then existed in the Church. In later ages, the writers of the lives of the saints seldom omit this circumstance, and usually give to it a prominent part in their history, that they have been anointed with holy oil. No other reason can be given why so material a circumstance as this should be omitted in recording the death of ancient Christians; which is scarcely ever omitted by Roman writers of more modern times: as the rite itself is now practised in the Church of Rome, it was utterly unknown in ancient days.

[" The ceremony is destitute of written and unwritten authority, and was unknown both to the Apostles and fathers of antiquity. Fleury, Ward, Sclater, Mumford, and Chaloner, in consequence, forbear, on this topic, to make any quotations from the record of early Christianity. The omission, indeed, was dictated by prudence. Antiquity could afford no authority for such an innovation, but which, by its impertinence, would have disgraced, if possible, even the Popish system of superstition and absurdity. Bellarmine endeavours to excuse the ancients for omitting the history of this sacrament in their works, by alleging their want of occasion. The Cardinal, for once, was right. The early Christian authors had no opportunity of discussing a non-entity.

[" The Rhemists admit that the Fathers of the first four centuries make no mention of this institution. These annotators, indeed, refer to Origen, who flourished in the third century; but at the same time insist not on his testimony clearly from a consciousness of its utter inadequacy. The concession, in reality, is an abandonment of the cause, so far as concerns this source of evidence. Four hundred revolving years ran their ample round, and left no trace of this sacrament. The apostolic men, Clemens, Hermas, Barnabas, Ignatius, and Polycarp, lived, and wrote, and departed, without once mentioning the sacrament of the dying. The successors of the apostolic men, such as Justin, Irenæus, Clemens, Tertullian, Cyprian, Athenagoras, Tatian, Epiphanius, and the Apostolic Constitutions, are, on this theme, equally silent and disobliging. The pretended Dionysius, who has left circumstantial details on similar topics, has, says Aquinas, made no mention of extreme unction. These authors have emblazoned the other sacraments in their works, and drawn minute delineations of baptism and the communion. These topics meet the reader's eye in nearly every page of their literary productions. But extreme unction, wonderful to tell, is never mentioned. This ceremony which, in modern days, remits sin, and strengthens the soul of the dying, forms no part of either the light or shade of the picture sketched by the pen of antiquity. This was a woful and vexatious omission in the good Fathers, and has put many moderns to a sad puzzle.

[" The Christian men and women of old, such as Constantine, Helen, Anthony, Basil, Chrysostom, Monica, and Augustine, whose death-bed biography has been transmitted to the present day, seem never to have been anointed. Their biographers never so much as mention the sacrament of the dying. All these, it is to be feared, departed without the application of the blessed oil. The holy men and women, in all probability, contrived getting to heaven without being greased for the journey. But the modern saints and sinners of Romanism are prepared for heaven or purgatory by consecrated oil. The death of many, in latter days, has been recorded by Surius and Butler; and these, on their death-bed, were always complimented with a plaster of blessed ointment. The modern saints make their exit from time, and their entrance into eternity, ornamented, in seven different places, with the cross-streaks of the oily figures, formed by the graceful motion of the sacerdotal thumb.

[" The friends of this ceremony have endeavoured to prop the baseless fabric by historical testimony, extracted from the annals of the fifth and following centuries. All this evidence, worthy of any attention, is taken from Innocent I., Bede, and the Councils of Chalons and Worms.

[" Pope Innocent, who flourished so late as the fifth century, is their first witness. Decentius, Bishop of Eugubium in Italy, had occasion, on this subject, to consult the Pontiff, who returned the following answer:—' The diseased faithful to whom James refers, may be anointed with the consecrated oil of chrism. This ointment may be used, not only by Priests, but also by all Christians, who may anoint not only themselves, but also their friends. But the chrism may not be poured on penitents; for it is a kind of sacrament.'

[" The utter ignorance of Decentius and Innocent, on this subject, irrefragably shows the non-existence of extreme unction in the fifth century. Decentius, a dignified Clergyman of Italy, knew so little of the ceremony, that he could not, without instruction, administer the pretended sacrament of the dying. He applied in his difficulty to the Pope, the Father and teacher of all Christians; and the Pontiff, who has been eulogized for genius and learning, by Jerome, Augustine, Chrysostom, and Bellarmine, knew no more of it, except in his own conceit, than the Bishop. He called the rite 'a kind of sacrament.' This appellation would have called down on His Holiness the anathemas of the Trentine Council, that pronounced this observance 'a true and proper sacrament.' His Infallibility, besides, mistook the administrator and the sign of this 'kind of sacrament.' Its Minister, in His Infallibility's hands, was not only a Priest, but every Christian, both for himself and his friends. The layman, however, who, in modern times, should make the attempt, would, says Faber, 'not only sin, but effect nothing.' The sign, according to His Holiness, was chrism, which, in modern days, is utterly unfit for this use. This unction performed now with chrism is invalid; and the whole process in this case must, says the Council of Milan, be repeated with the proper element. His Infallibility's 'kind of sacrament,' administered according to his Pontifical directions, would in modern times be perfectly useless. Innocent and Decentius, the Pontiff and the Bishop, were, in reality, strangers to one of the seven sacraments, and would have needed a fugleman to show the motion of his spiritual exercise. Both would have required a modern Priest to drill these two raw recruits, and teach them the manœuvres of sacerdotal duty, and the use of ecclesiastical arms.

["Bede's testimony, more than three hundred years later, is similar to Innocent's. 'The sick,' says the English Monk, 'is, according to ecclesiastical use, to be anointed with consecrated oil, and healed. This is lawful, not only for the Pastors, but also, as Innocent hath declared, for all Christians, both for themselves and their friends.' This only shows that the unction of the sick remained in the same state in the eighth century as in the fifth, and that the unction of Romanism was as little known in the days of Bede as of Innocent, and in England as in Italy. Bede and Innocent would have needed some modern adept in superstition to teach them the proper movements and evolutions in applying the sacramental plaster. Bede, besides, represents the recovery of health as the end or effect of this ceremony: and this shows that the unction of the sick, in the English Monk's time, was still used for the original design, and referred not to the soul, but to the body.

["The provincial synod of Chalons's testimony has been added to that of Innocent and Bede. This Assembly met in 813, and in its forty-eighth canon enjoined the unction of the sick with oil blessed by the Bishop. This kind of medicine, said the Council, 'is not to be despised, which heals the infirmity of soul and body.' This canon only shows that the unction of the sick was in the ninth century still confined to its primeval intention. The sign is called 'medicine,' and the effect is spiritual and corporeal health. The body, by its application, recovered its strength, and the soul obtained pardon of the sin which occasioned the malady. The convenient modern condition of this rite being beneficial to the body, when pleasing to God, and good for the patient, was unknown in the ninth century. Recovery of health, according to this Synod, attended the unction as uniformly as the remission of crime. The only addition which the ceremony, in the long lapse of eight hundred years, seems to have received from the spirit of superstition, consisted in the episcopal consecration of the ointment, and its indiscriminate application to the infirm. The Council also erred in continuing an extraordinary and temporary observance, when the age of miracles had passed, and when its administration had ceased to convey its original and proper effect.

["The Provincial Council of Worms has been added to that of Chalons, as evidence of this superstition. But this Assembly affords no additional testimony; its seventy-second canon merely embodied Pope Innocent's reply to Bishop Decentius. The Fathers of Worms only adopted and repeated His Infallibility's decision, without preface or explanation. The subject was no better known, and the future sacrament had made no farther progress, than four hundred and fifty years before, in the fifth century. The unction still remained 'a kind of sacrament.' Hundreds of years had elapsed from the commencement of Christianity, and still the sacrament was misunderstood. Decentius, Innocent, and Bede, as well as the Councils of Chalons and Worms, were ignorant of the administrator, the sign and the end of the ceremony, which the Trentine Fathers, of infallible memory, pronounced a true and proper sacrament, insinuated by Mark, published by James, and instituted by Immanuel.

["The history of this innovation is easily traced. Extreme unction, in its present form, was the child of the twelfth century. The monuments of Christian theology, for eleven hundred years, mention no ceremony which, in its varied and unmeaning mummery, corresponds with the unction of Romanism. The patrons of this superstition have rifled the annals of ecclesiastical history for eleven ages, and have failed in the discovery of either precept or example for a rite which, they affirm, was practised as a sacrament in every nation of Christendom since the era of redemption.

["The twelfth century, of which this filthy ceremony is the offspring, was the reign of ignorance and superstition. Science and literature seemed, in disgust, to fly from a tasteless and degenerated world. Philosophy refused to shed a single ray on a grovelling race, who hated or despised its light. Immorality, as usual, kept pace with barbarism. Moral and intellectual darkness commingled their clouds around man, for the purpose of forming a night of concentrated horror and atrocity. The King and the subject, the Clergy and the laity, conspired against all information; while the Sun of Righteousness seemed to withdraw his beams from a wicked and a wandering world.

["Amid this intellectual and moral darkness, the apostolic ceremony, noticed by Mark and James, degenerated, by accumulated innovations, into the Romish sacrament. Superstition, from her overflowing fountain, poured her copious streams, which, mingling, but not uniting, with the scriptural spring, formed the heterogeneous and unsightly mass. The simple rite was transformed into the clumsy sacrament. The original unction, intended for the recovery of health to particular individuals, continued while the gift of healing and the power of working miracles remained. But these, in process of time, ceased; and the weakness of man prompted many to use the external rite after the miraculous power was suspended. The patient's health, not, indeed, by the miraculous application of the oil, but by the ordinary operations of Providence, was sometimes restored; and the recovery in these cases was ascribed to the ointment. But many, though anointed, died; and the observance, in these instances, though the body suffered, was supposed to be beneficial to the soul. The recovery of health, therefore, was accounted conditional, and the good of the soul was reckoned certain. Superstition, from day to day, and from age to age, appended new additions to the growing ceremony. The episcopal consecration of the oil, its indiscriminate application, and other innovations, dictated by the demon of superstition, were superinduced on the pristine institution. The filthy progeny of ignorance and superstition came, at last, to maturity. Bernard, Victor, and Lombard, in the twelfth century, speak of the unction of the sick in modern language, enlarged with the multiplied accessions of eleven hundred years. Albert, Aquinas, and other Schoolmen, touched the picture with characteristic subtlety. These theological projectors brought the system to perfection, and exhibited it to the world in a finished form. The novelty, in 1439, was adopted by Pope Eugenius and the Florentine Council, and stamped with the seal of their unqualified approbation and synodal infallibility.

[" The subject came afterwards before the Council of Trent. But the Doctors who attended that assembly differed, and quibbled, and argued, and squabbled on this, as on every other subject, without harmony, and often without meaning. Each maintained his own opinion with warmth and obstinacy. The Legates, therefore, in forming the canons, omitted many of the jarring opinions of the angry theologians, and inserted only those in which they agreed. These the sacred Synod, in the fourteenth session, ratified with dreadful anathemas, discharged from their spiritual artillery against all who should gainsay. These canons, therefore, though hardly intelligible, became, on this topic of theology, the professed standard of faith, and form of external conformity among the patrons of Romanism. The veering vane of Popery, which had shifted, in ceaseless variation, round all the points of the theological compass, rusted, in motionless inflexibility, during the long sessions of the Trentine Congress; and on this, as on every other topic of divinity, fixed, in a great measure, the modern system of superstition." *]

It is therefore evident that all real antiquity is against extreme unction; and because the Council of Florence, under Pope Eugenius, and the Council of Trent, under Julius III. and Pius IV., about two hundred and fifty or three hundred years ago, determined to establish such a sacrament, are we to receive it as an ordinance of God? By no means. For "though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other doctrine than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." (Gal. i. 8.)

7. This doctrine is calculated to produce injurious effects on the minds of those who receive it. It has a direct tendency to induce a neglect of Christ, and of the salvation of the Gospel. It leads the dying man to rest his hopes on an unmeaning ceremony, when his intellect is wandering, and his senses are disordered, instead of resting solely on the great atonement. It induces relatives and friends to neglect present repentance, and to defer applying to God through Christ for pardon and peace; and prevents them from renouncing sin, and surrendering themselves to God. Because, come what will, should a Priest arrive at the last extremity, if there be only breath in the body, the tongue unable to articulate, the eyes to see, or the ears to hear, he nevertheless pretends to give remission and spiritual consolation.

The unction and prayers of the officiating individual, by the dying Romanist, are resorted to as a kind of spiritual enchantment, possessing virtue, not as a means of grace so much as an amulet, by which the soul is prepared for heaven, or at least saved from hell.

[* Edgar's Variations of Popery, pp. 414—419.]

The most fatal delusion is connected with this false sacrament. Perilous as is deception or delusion at any time in things spiritual, it is immeasurably so at the approach of death. It is then that the Church of Rome "lays the flattering unction to the soul." The dying man sends for the Priest, and makes confession to him; absolution is promptly bestowed; the eucharist is administered; and then the sacred chrism is applied. These are the credentials of pardon, these are passports to heaven. No attempt is made to investigate the state of the heart, to detect false hopes, or to bring the character of the sick man to the infallible standard of God's word. Nothing is said of the atonement of Christ, or of the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit. Without repentance, faith, or holiness, the departing soul feels secure, and is not undeceived till eternity discloses its dreadful realities. It is not affirmed that this description is universally applicable; yet in the majority of cases it is, alas! too true.

It cannot be said, as some ill-informed Protestants have supposed, that the reception of this sacrament is at least innocent or harmless. For, considering its tendency to lead the mind from Christ, and to fix it on the supposed virtues of some magical charm, it cannot be called harmless or innocent; but, on the other hand, fatally injurious and deadly. This sacrament supplants the atonement of the Redeemer, the influences of the Spirit, the exercise of faith and prayer, and usurps the place of holiness of heart and life. Both in the decree of the Council of Trent, and in the Catechism, there seems to be no reference whatever to the sacrificial death of the Son of God, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost; but in their place a process of incantation has been instituted. Were the evil to terminate here, the consequence would not be so serious, inasmuch as an unbeliever or wicked man might as well be deceived by this dogma as by partaking of the eucharist, which is the viaticum of many Protestants, who hold the truth in unrighteousness. But the system is, that when an ignorant Protestant on his death-bed is visited by his Popish friends, (and they are ever on the watch for such,) the Priest is generally sent for: if he find the person under any alarm, and his conscience weak, he will refuse to absolve him, or to administer the holy oil, unless not only the dying person himself be baptized into the Church, but also every branch of his family: this scheme too often succeeds, and will be found the principal cause of the partial relapse into Popery which in some places occurs. Indeed, this and similar practices are the most successful modes of bringing ignorant or vicious Protestants within the pale of the Church of Rome.

8. From the preceding exposition it will not fail to strike every observer, that Romanists have a strange idea of the state of a dying Christian. They represent the soul to be peculiarly assailed by the devil at the approach of death, and that the remedy for this is, not Christ and the salvation of the Gospel, but the Priest and absolution, viaticum and unction. Now, according to the Scripture, Christ does not leave his people in their last moments to contend with Satan in their own strength, or in the strength of consecrated oil, applied to different parts of their bodies, by a poor, inefficient mortal like themselves. Believers in Christ are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. Their whole life is a state of warfare against sin and the present evil world; and though the contest does not terminate till death, there is no scriptural reason to conclude that it is necessarily, or even usually, most severe at that moment. When a

Christian comes to die, he is not entering upon a scene entirely new to him. From the hour of his first believing he became dead to the world. It was then his constant exercise to contemplate his transition from this world to the next; and his daily reflections were suitable to the last hour of his life. Such are enabled to say, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

But the Popish doctrine represents the dying believer in a state as destitute as though death had been altogether unexpected. The Council of Trent speaks of the powerful protection of the sacrament of extreme unction, as necessary to fortify the latter end of life; and that it is to be used only when that period is supposed to have arrived. The Church of Rome intends it for the dying only, and applies it for the salvation of individuals, many of whom never thought of salvation before! They lived in sin, and trusted to be saved from its punishment by virtue of this sacrament, which, like the rest of Popish privileges, is sold for money.

According to the doctrine, as laid down by Bishop Hay, in his Sincere Christian, when a believer comes to die, his case is still one of doubtful perplexity. Whether he shall go to heaven or hell depends upon his ability to fight manfully against the devil, and that when he is in the agonies of death; and the success of this conflict is made to rest upon his being previously anointed. This, again, is suspended upon the intention of the Bishop who consecrated the oil, and of the Priest who applies it. Having gone round this circle, we arrive at the point to which every Popish ceremony tends, namely, that the salvation of a Roman Catholic hangs entirely or principally upon his Priest. All that Christ did and suffered for sinners goes for nothing, unless the Priest be allowed the honour of rendering it available. Extreme unction is not a vain ceremony, or mere absurdity, which, when it has excited a sufficient degree of ridicule, may be left to the peaceable enjoyment of those who are in love with it. It is in itself antichrist. It is a substitute for the Saviour and his holy religion. It occupies the place of the Redeemer in the ministrations of Priests, and in the thoughts of dying Romanists. It leaves the Lord Jesus quite out of the view of a dying sinner, and the Priest and this anointing are put in his place. Accordingly, when a Roman Catholic is about to die, his great, his only, concern is, to have the Priest with his holy oil; and to have this applied to all the members of his body, by means of which he may have committed sin; and to the organs of sight and hearing, by which sin may have found its way into the heart. Here Christ is rejected. The Priest and the oil constitute the saviour in which the poor wretch confides; and while he perishes in his sins, the guilt of this spiritual murder lies at the door of that apostate Church which has deceived and ruined him.

If it were true that the devil really and systematically made an assault upon dying persons; that he reminded them of their sins, and filled their minds with alarming apprehensions of the coming judgment; some might be led to think of the Gospel which they have heard or read, and flee for refuge to the hope set before them, and be saved from the wrath to come. But the worst possible state of a dying sinner is to be without alarm; to think that he is at peace with God, when he is at enmity with him. There is delusion enough in the heart of every unregenerate man to think this of himself; but, as if it were not so, the Church of Rome steps forward with a pretended sacrament, called "extreme unction," by which she professes to give peace to the conscience of the dying reprobate. It was the sin of the false prophets of old, that they healed the hurt of the Lord's people slightly. The Romish Priests are in the same condemnation; but, alas! under circumstances of far more heinous wickedness!

9. The doctrine of extreme unction is chargeable with numerous follies and inconsistencies.

Its institution by the Council of Trent is manifestly absurd, as it is built on mere conjecture. It is certain that this synod was greatly perplexed, being fully aware that they were going aside from truth and Scripture, when they instituted this sacrament. In the chapter concerning it, they betray much caution, ingenuity, and timidity; but in the canons they throw away all restraint, and speak authoritatively, and without fear or shame of uttering manifest falsehood. In the chapter (sess. xiv., cap. 1) concerning the institution of extreme unction, they say, "This holy anointing of the sick is instituted, as it were, a true and proper sacrament of the New Testament; hinted at, indeed, by Christ our Lord, in St. Mark, but recommended and preached to the faithful by the Apostle St. James." Here they say it was instituted, but by whom they cannot tell; for they say that Christ only insinuated it, not instituted it. Nor do they say that they have any express Scripture-proof for it, but that the Church learned it from apostolic tradition; or, as we would say, from mere hearsay. Notwithstanding all this, they have on record a canon confronting and contradicting themselves; a canon insisting that Christ himself did positively institute extreme unction as a true and proper sacrament. The canon is, "If any shall say extreme unction is not truly and properly a sacrament instituted by Christ our Lord, and preached by the Apostle St. James, but that it is a human invention, let him be accursed." Here they add an anathema for calling it a human invention, or forgery, which shows it was even then so called. As farther proof of their confusion, when they were concocting extreme unction, they expunged the word "instituted," which they first put into the decree, and inserted the word "insinuated," because they saw plainly it was not instituted in the place referred to. But, to make amends for the change, they added their own canons, and inserted anathemas with such confidence, that those who will not believe the institution is found there, and that it confers grace, are condemned without mercy. All their writers are puzzled and confused when they endeavour to find this doctrine in Scripture; and this is no wonder, when it is not to be found there. So we see that confusion and perplexity attend this new doctrine of the Council of Trent.

This sacrament of extreme unction is opposed to several doctrines of the Church of Rome. It is contrary to the doctrine of purgatory. If by this unction all those great things are accomplished which they ascribe to it; that every fault or sin which remained on the soul is entirely removed for ever; why then go to purgatory to atone for them again? Why so many masses to hasten persons out of it? This does not look well. Moreover, if by absolution of the Priest all sins are pardoned, why is extreme unction brought in to have that done which has been done already? It is, therefore, inconsistent with other doctrines of the Church of Rome.

10. The sacrament of extreme unction is not only a superstitious rite, but it is also the means of extortion by the Clergy. It is regarded by every Roman Catholic as one of extreme importance. He feels, in a dying hour, that if the Priest refuse to anoint him, his soul must be lost. The Priest stands at his bed-side, and the dying sufferer raises his eyes to him, imploring the performance of the last ceremony of religion. Who could think that at such an hour any man had the heart to make a bargain? But so it is. The following is the statement of Priest Croly, of Ireland, who gives the exact account of the practice of his country, in a pamphlet which he published, in order to show that the Church of Rome, in Ireland, should be supported by the government instead of money filched from the miserable and poor, and extorted by the Priests for baptisms, confessions, marriages, extreme unction, &c. His words are :—

"Extreme unction is considered in this country to be of the last importance; so much so, that no misfortune is accounted greater than for a poor mortal to depart this life without its reception. This rite is often administered under most distressing circumstances, amid sickness, lamentation, destitution, and want; yet money is demanded in most cases, particularly in the country; and instances occur of payment being demanded beforehand, and even of money being pocketed by the Priest which had been given as alms for the relief of the dying." "The Church revenue," says Mr. Croly, "is become a mere scramble: every man is striving to seize upon a larger share, and deciding for himself in the appropriation. This is a bad state of things; it is a shameful exhibition of clerical demoralization. Common honesty is out of the question. Nothing but lies, schemes, duplicity, false returns; so that the simple and the honest become the prey of the cunning and the crafty."

Such is the character of the Catholic Priests of Ireland, according to the testimony of one of their own number.

11. We have fully shown, that this rite of the Church of Rome has no authority from Scripture; and, indeed, some very grave and learned Roman Catholics are of opinion, that its scriptural authority is more than doubtful. Cardinal Cajetan, on St. James v. 14, 15, says, "It neither appears by the words, nor by the effect, that St. James speaks of the sacrament of extreme unction, but rather of that unction which our Lord appointed in the Gospel to be used on sick persons by his disciples. For the text does not say, 'Is a man sick unto death?' but absolutely, 'Is any sick?' And it makes the effect to be, the recovery of the sick, and speaks but conditionally of the forgiveness of sins; whereas, extreme unction is not given but when a man is almost at the point of death; and, as the form of words then used sufficiently shows, it tends directly to the forgiveness of sins."*

[* "'Infirmatur quis in vobis? inducat Presbyteros Ecclesiæ, et orent super eum, ungentes eum oleo in nomine Domini. Et oratio fidei salvabit infirmum, et alleviabit eum Dominus: et si in peccatis sit, remittentur ei.' Nec ex verbis, nec ex effectu verba hæc loquuntur de sacramentali unctione extremæ unctionis: sed magis de unctione quam instituit Dominus Jesus in Evangelio, a discipulis exercendam in ægrotis. Textus enim non dicit, 'Infirmatur quis ad mortem?' sed absolute, 'Infirmatur quis?' et effectum dicit infirmi alleviationem, et de remissione peccatorum non nisi conditionaliter loquitur, quum extrema unctio non nisi prope articulum mortis detur, et directe (ut ejus forma sonat) tendit ad remissionem peccatorum. Præter hoc Jacobus ad unum ægrum multos Presbyteros, tum orantes tum ungentes, mandat vocari, quod ab extremæ unctionis ritu alienum est." —Evangelia, cum Commentariis R. D. D. Thom. de Vio Cajetani, Cardinalis. In Quatuor Evangelia, Acta Apostolorum, et Epist. Pauli et aliorum Apostolorum. Fol. Paris, 1532.]

CHAPTER XV.

ORDERS.

I. Nature and Institution of Orders. 1. Previous remarks: 2. Definition of, by the Roman Catechism. Dens: 3. The Council of Trent calls it a sacrament. Of the imposition of hands. Of grace bestowed: 4. The time of its institution: 5. The power bestowed on the priesthood. Catechism.—II. The Number of Orders. 1. Papists make many Orders. Council of Trent: 2. Whether the Episcopate is a distinct Order, disputed. The first opinion, that it is not a distinct Order from the Presbyterate, but an extension of it. The second opinion, that it is a distinct Order from the Presbyterate. The third opinion, compounded of both, making the priesthood the genus, and the Presbyterate and Episcopate only species existing in it: 3. The most common of the several Orders stated.—III. Whether all the Orders are Sacraments. 1. The priesthood is generally called the foundation of all the Orders: 2. Different sentiments concerning the Episcopate: 3. Whether the Deaconship is a sacrament: 4. Of the minor Orders: 5. Uncertainty in the number of Orders. —IV. The Minor Orders. 1. Enumeration of them, and of the tonsure in particular. Catechism. Obligations of the tonsure. Their various interpretations of it: 2. The Ostiarius, or Porter: 3. The Reader: 4. The Exorcist: 5. The Acolyte.—V. The Greater or Holy Orders. 1. The Sub-Deacon: 2. The Deacon: 3. The Priest.—VI. The Episcopate. 1. Definition of this Order by Bailly: 2. The power of Order: 3. The power of jurisdiction, or government. Evasion of the Council of Trent. Benedict XIV. cited. Diversity of sentiment at the Council of Trent. Common opinion since that time: 4. Their prerogatives: 5. Their functions, or offices: 6. Seven grades of Bishops: 7. Election of Bishops: 8. Consecration: 9. Arguments for the princely character of Bishops examined: (1.) Their arguments from Scripture, 1 Tim. v. 19, considered; (2.) Bishops not the only Pastors. Popish Bishops not Preachers. Debates at Trent on this topic; (3.) Romanists say the power of ordaining others properly belongs to Bishops. Answered; (4.) The argument from the High Priest considered; (5.) And also from the Apostles and Seventy; (6.) Authority of the Fathers; (7.) Authority of the Council of Trent; (8.) Argument from prescription: 10. Arguments against such claims; (1.) Three distinct opinions on this point; (2.) According to the New Testament, Presbyters and Bishops were the same; (3.) Such also is the opinion of the ancient Fathers; (4.) Arguments of Willet on this point; (5.) A priority among the Apostles gives no ground for their system; (6.) Especially their princely dominion; (7.) Only two Orders in the New Testament; (8.) Testimony of the Fathers is against them. The apostolical Fathers. Cyprian. Epiphanius. Ambrosiasta. Jerome.—VII. Not seven Orders of Clergy.—VIII. Orders no Sacrament. 1. Do not confer grace: 2. Cannot be reiterated: 3. Orders alone would comprise seven sacraments at least: 4. Not instituted by Christ: 5. They have neither outward element nor words of institution: 6. Our Saviour did not use imposition of hands in appointing Apostles: 7. Many Roman Catholics do not admit the inferior Orders.—IX. The Matter and Form. 1. In three Orders there are seven distinct opinions concerning matter and form: 2. Of imposition of hands: 3. Qualifications of the person the chief point, according to Scripture.—X. The Minister of Ordination. 1. Their Bishops not better qualified than Protestant Bishops: 2. Every Church hath power to ordain Ministers; (1.) Prophets and teachers laid hands on Paul and Barnabas; (2.) The contrary is absurd; (3.) The form and manner of ordaining were not uniform in the Apostles' times; (4.) Every Church is at liberty in this; (5.) Timothy was ordained by the priesthood; (6.) Origen was thus ordained; (7.) Decree of the African Church; (8.) Presbyters and Bishops conjointly ordained in the primitive church; (9.) Presbyters ordain the minor Orders.—XI. The Effects of Orders. 1. Enumeration of them: 2. Of sacramental grace, and gift of the Holy Ghost: 3. The indelible character. Council of Trent cited. Dens. Bailly. Objections against character.—XII. The Ceremonies of Orders.

I. The nature and institution of orders, as it exists in the Church of Rome.

1. The Clergy, in the Romish hierarchy, are divided into two classes; namely, the secular, or those who exercise any public function in the Church; and regular, or those who live according to some specific rule, and are called "Monks." We shall treat first of the secular Clergy.

Romanists enumerate among the Clergy several orders, for the most part seven; some extend them to nine, while others restrict them to three or four. The most general division is into seven. In this they and Protestants disagree. They teach also that orders is a sacrament; and in this they differ from the Reformed Churches. They furthermore attach certain powers and privileges to the Clergy, which Protestants consider unscriptural, and by no means calculated to promote the welfare of Christianity.

Protestants and Roman Catholics, however, are agreed, that a certain class of men appointed in the Church to teach, to administer the sacraments, and to bear rule, is of divine appointment, and necessary for the interests of piety. We shall consider the nature and institution of orders, as it exists in the Church of Rome.

2. The solemn consecration of Ministers to their respective functions, according to the Roman Catechism, is called "ordination," or "the sacrament of orders." "To exercise the power," with which the Christian priesthood is clothed, "Ministers are appointed and solemnly consecrated; and this solemn consecration is denominated 'ordination,' or 'the sacrament of orders.' To designate this sacrament, the word 'orders' has been made use of by the holy Fathers, because its signification is very comprehensive, and, therefore, well adapted to convey an idea of the dignity and excellence of the Ministers of God. Understood in its strict and proper acceptation, order is the disposition of superior and subordinate parts, which, when united, present a combination so harmonious as to stand in mutual and accordant relations. Comprising, then, as the ministry does, many gradations and various functions, with the greatest regularity, this sacrament is very appropriately called 'the sacrament of orders.'"*

Dens, speaking of orders, says: "It is a sacrament of the new law, in which spiritual power and grace are conferred, for the purpose of rightly and decently discharging ecclesiastical functions."† Bailly furnishes the following definition: "A sacrament instituted by Christ, in which grace and spiritual power are conferred, for the purpose of performing ecclesiastical duties, especially to consecrate the eucharist and administer other sacraments."‡

[The following are the decisions of the Council of Trent, concerning the Romish sacrament of orders:—

["CHAP. I. Of the institution of the priesthood of the new law. Sacrifice and priesthood are so joined by the ordinance of God, that both are found together in every dispensation. Since, therefore, under the New Testament, the Catholic Church has received, by divine institution, the holy and visible sacrifice of the eucharist, it must be acknowledged that she has a new, and visible, and external priesthood, in the place of the old. Now the sacred Scriptures show, and the tradition of the Catholic Church has always taught, that this priesthood was instituted by the Lord our Saviour; and that to his Apostles, and their successors in the priesthood, the power was given to consecrate, offer, and minister his body and blood, and also to remit and retain sins.

["CHAP. II. Of the seven orders. As the ministry of so exalted a priesthood is a divine thing, it was meet, in order to surround it with the greater dignity and veneration, that, in the admirable economy of the Church, there should be several distinct orders of Ministers, intended by their office to serve the priesthood, and so disposed as that, beginning with the clerical tonsure, they may ascend gradually through the lesser to the greater orders. For the sacred Scriptures make express mention of Deacons as well as of Priests, and instruct us in very serious language respecting those things which are to be specially regarded in their ordination; and from the beginning of the Church, the names and appropriate duties of the following orders are known to have been in use; namely, Sub-Deacons, Acolytes, Exorcists, Readers, and Porters. Although they are not all of equal rank; for Sub-Deacons are placed among the greater orders by the Fathers and holy Councils, in which also we very frequently read of other inferior orders.

["CHAP. III. That orders are truly and properly a sacrament. Since it is evident, from the testimony of Scripture, apostolic tradition, and the unanimous consent of the Fathers, that by holy ordination, bestowed by words and external signs, grace is conferred; no one ought to doubt that orders constitute one of the seven sacraments of holy Church. For the Apostle saith, 'I admonish thee that thou stir up the grace of God, which is in thee by the imposition of my hands. For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of sobriety.' (2 Tim. i. 6, 7.)

["CHAP. IV. Of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and of ordination. Forasmuch, then, as in the sacrament of orders, as in baptism and confirmation, a character is impressed which can neither be destroyed nor taken away, the holy Council deservedly condemns the notion of those who assert that the Priests of the New Testament have only a temporary power, and that those who have been rightly ordained may become laymen again, if they should cease to exercise the ministry of the word of God. Moreover, if any one affirm, that all Christians promiscuously are Priests of the New Testament, or that all are endued with equal spiritual power, he does nothing less than confound the ecclesiastical hierarchy, which resembles a well-appointed army; as if, in opposition to the doctrine of blessed Paul, all were Apostles, all were Prophets, all were Evangelists, all were Pastors, all were Teachers. Further, the holy Council declares, that in addition to other ecclesiastical degrees, Bishops, who have succeeded to the place of the Apostles, hold a distinguished rank in this hierarchical order; that they are placed there by the Holy Spirit, as the same Apostle saith, to rule the church of God; that they are superior to Presbyters; and that they administer the sacrament of confirmation, ordain the Ministers of the Church, and perform many other offices, to which those who are in inferior orders have no right. The holy Council further declares, that in the ordination of Bishops, Priests, and the other orders, the consent, call, or authority of the people, or of any secular power or magistracy, is not so necessary, as that without the same the ordination would be invalid; on the contrary, it is hereby declared, that all those who presumptuously undertake and assume the offices of the ministry, with no other call and appointment than that of the people, or of the secular power and magistracy, are not to be accounted Ministers of the Church, but thieves and robbers, who have not entered in by the door.

[* Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 308, 309.]

† "Quid est sacramentum ordinis?—R. Est sacramentum novæ legis, quo spiritualis potestas confertur et gratia, ad ecclesiastica munia rite decenterque obeunda."—Dens Theol., tom. vii.; Tract. de Ordine, No. 1; De Definitione et Existentia Sacramenti Ordinis.

[‡ "Ordinatio definiri solet sacramentum a Christo institutum, quo gratia spiritualisque potestas confertur ad obeunda munia ecclesiastica, præsertim ad consecrandam eucharistiam cæteraque conficienda sacramenta."—Bailly, Theol., tom. v.; Tract. de Sac. Ordinis, pars i., cap. i.; De Nomine, Definitione, et Existentia Sacramenti Ordinis.]

[" Thus much it hath seemed good to the holy Council to teach the faithful respecting the sacrament of orders. Opposite sentiments are condemned in the manner following, by express and appropriate canons; that amidst the prevailing darkness of error, all men may, by the help of Christ, adopting this rule of faith, easily discern and retain the Catholic truth.

[" Canon 1. Whoever shall affirm, that under the New Testament there is not a visible and external priesthood; or that there is no power to consecrate and offer the true body and blood of the Lord, and remit and retain sins, but only the bare office and ministry of preaching the Gospel; or that those who do not preach are by no means to be considered Priests; let him be accursed.

[" 2. Whoever shall affirm, that there are not in the Catholic Church, besides the priesthood, other orders, both greater and lesser, by which, as by degrees, the priesthood may be ascended; let him be accursed.

[" 3. Whoever shall affirm, that orders, or holy ordination, is not truly and properly a sacrament, instituted by Christ the Lord; or that it is a human invention, devised by men unskilful in things ecclesiastical; or that it is only the ceremony of choosing the Ministers of the word of God and of the sacraments; let him be accursed.

[" 4. Whoever shall affirm, that the Holy Spirit is not given by ordination; and, therefore, that Bishops say in vain, 'Receive the Holy Ghost;' or that thereby a character is not impressed; or that he who was once a Priest, may become a layman again; let him be accursed.

[" 5. Whoever shall affirm, that the sacred unction used by the Church in holy ordination, as well as the other ceremonies observed in bestowing orders, are not only unnecessary, but ridiculous and hurtful; let him be accursed.

[" 6. Whoever shall affirm, that there is not in the Catholic Church a hierarchy instituted by divine appointment, and consisting of Bishops, Presbyters, and Ministers; let him be accursed.

[" 7. Whoever shall affirm, that Bishops are not superior to Presbyters; or that they have not the power of confirming and ordaining; or that the power which they have, is common to them and Presbyters; or that orders conferred by them without the consent or calling of the people, or the secular power, are invalid; or that those who are not properly ordained or instituted according to ecclesiastical or canonical power, but derive their ordination from some other source, are lawful Ministers of the word and the sacraments; let him be accursed.

[" 8. Whoever shall affirm, that those Bishops who are peculiarly appointed by the authority of the Roman Pontiff, are not lawful and true Bishops, but a human invention; let him be accursed."*]

[* " Caput I. De institutione sacerdotii novæ legis. Sacrificium et sacerdotium ita Dei ordinatione conjuncta sunt, ut utrumque in omni lege exstiterit. Cum igitur in Novo Testamento sanctum eucharistiæ sacrificium visibile ex Domini institutione Catholica Ecclesia acceperit; fateri etiam oportet, in ea novum esse visibile et externum sacerdotium, in quod vetus translatum est. Hoc autem ab eodem Domino Salvatore nostro institutum esse, atque Apostolis, eorumque successoribus in sacerdotio, potestatem traditam consecrandi, offerendi, et ministrandi corpus et sanguinem ejus, necnon et peccata dimittendi et retinendi, sacræ litteræ ostendunt, et Catholicæ Ecclesiæ traditio semper docuit.

[" Cap. II. De septem ordinibus. Cum autem divina res sit tam sancti sacerdotii ministerium; consentaneum fuit, quo dignius et majori cum veneratione exerceri posset, ut in Ecclesiæ ordinatissima dispositione plures et diversi essent Ministrorum ordines, qui sacerdotio ex officio deservirent; et ita distributi, ut, qui jam clericali tonsura insigniti essent, per minores ad majores ascenderent. Nam non solum de Sacerdotibus, sed et de Diaconis sacræ litteræ apertam mentionem faciunt; et quæ maxime in illorum ordinatione attendenda sunt, gravissimis verbis docent; et ab ipso Ecclesiæ initio sequentium ordinum nomina, atque uniuscujusque eorum propria ministeria, Sub-Diaconi, scilicet, Acolythi, Exorcistæ, Lectoris, et Ostiarii, in usu fuisse cognoscuntur, quamvis non pari gradu: nam Sub-Diaconatus ad majores ordines a Patribus et sacris Conciliis refertur, in quibus et de aliis inferioribus frequentissime legimus.

[" Cap. III. Ordinem vere et proprie esse sacramentum. Cum Scripturæ testimonio, apostolica traditione, et Patrum unanimi consensu perspicuum sit, per sacram ordinationem, quæ verbis et signis exterioribus perficitur, gratiam conferri; dubitare nemo debet, ordinem esse vere et proprie unum ex septem sanctæ Ecclesiæ sacramentis. Inquit enim Apostolus: 'Admoneo te, ut resuscites gratiam Dei, quæ est in te, per impositionem manuum mearum; non enim dedit nobis Deus spiritum timoris, sed virtutis, et dilectionis, et sobrietatis.'

[" Cap. IV. De ecclesiastica hierarchia et ordinatione. Quoniam vero in sacramento ordinis, sicut et in baptismo, et confirmatione, character imprimitur, qui nec deleri, nec auferri potest; merito sancta Synodus damnat eorum sententiam, qui asserunt, Novi Testamenti Sacerdotes temporariam tantummodo potestatem habere; ac semel rite ordinatos iterum laicos effici posse, si verbi Dei ministerium non exerceant. Quod si quis omnes Christianos promiscue Novi Testamenti Sacerdotes esse, aut omnes pari inter se potestate spirituali præditos, affirmet; nihil aliud facere videtur, quam ecclesiasticam hierarchiam, quæ est ut castrorum acies ordinata, confundere; perinde ac si contra beati Pauli doctrinam omnes Apostoli, omnes Prophetæ, omnes Evangelistæ, omnes Pastores, omnes sint Doctores. Proinde, sacro-sancta Synodus declarat, præter ceteros ecclesiasticos gradus, Episcopos, qui in Apostolorum locum successerunt, ad hunc hierarchicum ordinem præcipue pertinere; et positos, sicut idem Apostolus ait, a Spiritu Sancto, regere ecclesiam Dei; eosque Presbyteris superiores esse; ac sacramentum confirmationis conferre; Ministros Ecclesiæ ordinare; atque alia pleraque peragere ipsos posse: quarum functionum potestatem reliqui inferioris ordinis nullam habent. Docet insuper sacro-sancta Synodus, in ordinatione Episcoporum, Sacerdotum, et ceterorum ordinum, nec populi, nec cujusvis secularis potestatis, et magistratus consensum, sive vocationem, sive auctoritatem, ita requiri, ut sine ea irrita sit ordinatio; quin potius decernit eos qui, tantummodo a populo aut seculari potestate ac magistratu vocati et instituti, ad hæc ministeria exercenda ascendunt, et qui ea propria temeritate sibi sumunt, omnes non Ecclesiæ Ministros, sed fures et latrones, per ostium non ingressos, habendos esse. Hæc sunt quæ generatim sacræ Synodo visum est Christi fideles de sacramento ordinis docere. His autem contraria certis et propriis canonibus in hunc, qui sequitur, modum damnare constituit; ut omnes, adjuvante Christo, fidei regula utentes, in tot errorum tenebris Catholicam veritatem facilius agnoscere et tenere possint.

[" De sacramento ordinis. Canon 1. Si quis dixerit, non esse in Novo Testamento sacerdotium visibile et externum; vel non esse potestatem aliquam consecrandi et offerendi verum corpus et sanguinem Domini, et peccata remittendi et retinendi; sed officium tantum et nudum ministerium prædicandi Evangelium; vel eos qui non prædicant, prorsus non esse Sacerdotes; anathema sit.

[" 2. Si quis dixerit, præter sacerdotium non esse in Ecclesia Catholica alios ordines, et majores et minores, per quos, velut per gradus quosdam, in sacerdotium tendatur; anathema sit.

[" 3. Si quis dixerit, ordinem, sive sacram ordinationem, non esse vere et proprie sacramentum, a Christo Domino institutum, vel esse figmentum quoddam humanum excogitatum a viris rerum ecclesiasticarum imperitis; aut esse tantum ritum quemdam eligendi Ministros verbi Dei, et sacramentorum; anathema sit.

[" 4. Si quis dixerit, per sacram ordinationem non dari Spiritum Sanctum, ac proinde frustra Episcopos dicere, 'Accipe Spiritum Sanctum;' aut per eam non imprimi characterem; vel eum, qui Sacerdos semel fuit, laicum rursus fieri posse; anathema sit.

[" 5. Si quis dixerit, sacram unctionem, qua Ecclesia in sancta ordinatione utitur, non tantum non requiri, sed contemnendam et perniciosam esse, similiter et alias ordinis cæremonias; anathema sit.

[" 6. Si quis dixerit, in Ecclesia Catholica non esse hierarchiam divina ordinatione institutam, quæ constat ex Episcopis, Presbyteris, et Ministris; anathema sit.

[" 7. Si quis dixerit, Episcopos non esse Presbyteris superiores, vel non habere potestatem confirmandi et ordinandi; vel eam, quam habent, illis esse cum Presbyteris communem; vel ordines ab ipsis

The Catechism also says: "A sacrament is a sensible sign of an invisible grace, and with these characters holy orders are invested; their external forms are a sensible sign of the grace and power which they confer on the receiver; holy orders, therefore, are really and truly a sacrament." The customary characters of a sacrament, they say, belong to orders; namely, (1.) An outward sign; (2.) Conferring of grace; (3.) And the institution of Christ.*

Romanists say that the imposition of hands, in ordination, is the outward sign. But Christ did not use this ceremony in appointing the Apostles; at the last supper, which was the time, they say, that the sacrament of orders was instituted. Nor is there any special command whatever to use this rite of imposition of hands in the sacred Scripture; though it is, both as a sign of prayer and a rite of dedication, the most appropriate that can be used.

As to the grace which they affirm is given by ordination, it is altogether inconsistent to confine the gift of the Holy Spirit to the mere rite of imposition of hands; and more especially, when deficiency in moral character forms no obstacle in the valid administration of the sacrament in the Church of Rome. It is true, they sometimes assert, that the grace is not in this case given, or that it is imparted only in degree. But the Council of Trent declares, that "whoever shall affirm, that the Holy Spirit is not given by ordination, let him be accursed." The sentiment of the Synod seems to us to be similar to that of Simon Magus, who thought that the gift of the Holy Ghost was so confined to the imposition of hands, that it could be bestowed on any upon whom the hands might be laid.

That an appointment to the Christian ministry was commanded or instituted by Jesus Christ, is acknowledged on both sides. But that ordination is to be considered as a sacrament, cannot be admitted; because in orders there is not that formal institution of the outward rite, as in baptism and the eucharist, in the paschal supper or circumcision.

It is also much disputed among Roman Catholic theologians, whether the imposition of hands alone is the outward sign, or whether prayer and other ceremonies ought not to be added.

4. The institution of this sacrament is said to have been by our Lord Jesus Christ, and the time of its appointment, the last supper, when he said to his Apostles, "Do this in remembrance of me." The Council of Trent says, that "whoever shall affirm, that, by these words, 'Do this for a commemoration of me,' Christ did not appoint his Apostles Priests, let him be accursed." It is also maintained, by Romish Divines, that at the same time the Apostles were created Bishops, and received power to ordain others. It would indeed be strange, if our Lord, by these words, instituted two sacraments; for it is allowed on all hands, that the sacrament of the eucharist was instituted at that period. To suppose that another sacrament was instituted at the same time, and by similar words, would be confounding things of the most distinct character. Besides, the Apostles had been already appointed to their office; and to celebrate the eucharist became one of the duties of that ministry to which they had previously been set apart.

collatos sine populi vel potestatis secularis consensu, aut vocatione, irritos esse; aut eos, qui nec ab ecclesiastica et canonica potestate rite ordinati, nec missi sunt, sed aliunde veniunt, legitimos esse verbi et sacramentorum Ministros; anathema sit.

["8. Si quis dixerit, Episcopos, qui auctoritate Romani Pontificis assumuntur, non esse legitimos et veros Episcopos, sed figmentum humanum; anathema sit."]

[* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 309.]

5. On the power bestowed on the priesthood, the Roman Catechism teaches as follows:—"The faithful are to be made acquainted with the exalted dignity and excellence of this sacrament in its highest degree, which is the priesthood. Priests and Bishops are, as it were, the interpreters and heralds of God, commissioned in his name to teach mankind the law of God, and the precepts of a Christian life: they are the representatives of God upon earth. It is impossible, therefore, to conceive a more exalted dignity, or functions more sacred. Justly are they called not only 'angels,' but 'gods,' holding as they do the place, and power, and authority of God on earth. But the priesthood, at all times an elevated office, transcends in the new law all others in dignity. The power of consecrating and offering the body and blood of our Lord, and of remitting sins, with which the priesthood of the new law is invested, is such as cannot be comprehended by the human mind, still less is it equalled by, or assimilated to, any thing on earth."

Speaking on the extent of the power conferred on the Ministers, the Catechism says, "This power is twofold, of jurisdiction, and of orders: the power of orders has reference to the body of our Lord Jesus Christ in the holy eucharist; that of jurisdiction to his mystical body, the Church; for to this latter belong the government of his spiritual kingdom on earth, and the direction of the faithful in the way of salvation. In the power of orders is included not only that of consecrating the holy eucharist, but also of preparing the soul for its worthy reception, and whatever else has reference to the sacred mysteries." †

We are further informed, that "the power with which the Christian priesthood is clothed, is a heavenly power, raised above that of angels: it has its source, not in the Levitical priesthood, but in Christ the Lord: he it is who, endowed with supreme authority to grant pardon and grace, has bequeathed this power to his church, a power limited, however, in its extent, and attached to the sacraments." ‡

From the foregoing, it will be perceived that the powers with which the Roman Clergy are supposed to be invested are extensive. They are said to be commissioned by God, representatives of the Most High, above angels, to have the power of transforming bread and wine into the very body and blood of Christ, to have the government of the Church solely in their hands, with power to grant pardon and grace, though confined to the administration of the sacraments. But this limit is almost or altogether no limit whatever; inasmuch as the administration of the sacraments is completely in the power of the Clergy. By this means the priesthood possesses all spiritual power by an assumed delegation from God, so that pardon of sins, increase of grace, and preparation for heaven, can be obtained only through their immediate instrumentality! Hence they are said to "administer the sacraments, the sources of grace." §

II. The number of orders.

1. The Church of Rome has instituted numerous orders of her Clergy. The Council of Trent on this subject, in the twenty-third session, chapter ii., has given a somewhat full exposition of her views, but cautiously avoids saying how many orders there actually are; probably lest such a declaration might come in collision with the Canonists, who maintain the existence of

[* Idem, pp. 304, 305.]
[† Idem, p. 307.]
[‡ Idem, p. 308.]
[§ Idem, p. 307.]

eight or nine; or with the Greeks, who reduce the number to four. Though that assembly decided the number of sacraments to be seven, it leaves the number of orders undetermined. By this means, those who entertained different sentiments were left in peaceable possession of their respective opinions.

Many distinguished authors, as Pope Cornelius, Gregory the Great, Isidorus Hispalensis, Alcuin, with others, add the episcopate to the number, and thus establish the existence of eight orders. Ignatius the Martyr, Jerome, and many others, add the Psalmists or Singers to the number of ecclesiastical degrees. The Canonists, or the interpreters of the Canon-Law, add the tonsure and episcopate, and contend for nine orders; whilst the Greeks allowed only four; namely, presbyterate, deaconship, sub-deaconship, and reader.*

2. Whether the episcopate is a distinct order, and to be annexed to the number seven, or to the number of orders acknowledged by the Council of Trent and the compilers of the Roman Catechism, is a point much disputed among theologians. Romanists mention three separate opinions on this topic, each having its supporters among their Divines and Clergy.

The first is the opinion of those who judge that the episcopate is not a distinct order from the presbyterate, but a mere extension of the priesthood; so that one grade differs only from the other in power and jurisdiction, each pertaining to the same order. This is the opinion of those who believe there are only seven orders. To this class belong the Master of the Sentences, Bonaventura, Thomas Aquinas, Pope Cornelius, Gregory the Great, Alcuin, &c. The Council of Trent ranks with this class of Divines, as may be gathered from the second canon of the twenty-third session, which constitutes the priesthood the principal order, and the episcopate a branch of it. The Catechism also declares, respecting orders, that its highest degree is the priesthood.†

The second is the opinion of those who would make the episcopate a distinct order from the presbyterate. These are chiefly the Doctors of the Canon-Law, who attempt to establish eight orders of Clergy, by adding the episcopate to the number. Liebermann, who is one of them, says, "Considering the orders separately, we properly date their beginning in the episcopate; for this order embraces all the others, and as it is first in its origin, so it is the fountain and head of all.' ‡ The greater part of the Bishops of the Council of Trent are said to have been of this sentiment; but they were overawed by the intrigues of the Pope and his Legates, and prevented from establishing this opinion, as it was supposed to be injurious to, or inconsistent with, the supremacy.

The third opinion is that of those who distinguish the order of the episcopate from that of the priesthood, in common with the patrons of the second opinion, but nevertheless make one order of both generically, although they consider them to be two specifically. For example: they say the priesthood is a certain genus, to which the presbyterate and episcopate, as distinct species, belong; and hence the priesthood, generically considered, constitutes the seventh order, which is divided into the presbyterate as its beginning, and into the episcopate, which is its perfection. Those who hold this opinion say, that the greatest power belonging to the priesthood consists in making the body and blood of Christ;—so the first order is that of those who consecrate the eucharist. Nevertheless, they partake of this power diversely, the Priests who consecrate the body of Christ, and the Bishops who both consecrate and confer the power of consecrating on others; hence there are two species of Priests, who constitute one order, because the chief and notable power is common to both.

3. The following is the division of the several orders in the Church of Rome, according to the most authentic standards:—

The Council of Trent (sess. xxiii., cap. 2) divides them into majores, "greater," and minores, "less." Aquinas gives the division of sacros, "sacred," or non sacros, "not sacred." The greater or sacred orders are the priesthood, deaconship, and sub-deaconship. The other four orders are called "minor," or "not sacred."*

The episcopate, with them, embraces the following dignitaries; namely, Pope, Patriarch, Primate, Archbishop, and Cardinal.

III. Whether all the orders are sacraments.

1. The priesthood, for the most part, is considered the beginning and fountain of all the orders. Some say, "The whole plenitude of this sacrament is in the priesthood; but in the others there is a participation of order, and thus all the orders are but one sacrament." Others affirm that the presbyterate alone is the sacrament. Thus there is great diversity of opinion on this, as well as on many other doctrines, among their theologians, whenever there is opportunity for dissent, and when they are not hampered by those dogmas which limit them in their investigations. The presbyterate, however, is acknowledged by most to be a sacrament, by whom it is considered an article of faith; yet the Tridentine Divines seem to place the sacrament in the priesthood, which is made to comprise, for the most part, the episcopate and the presbyterate.

2. Concerning the episcopate there is much diversity of opinion, whether it be a sacrament or not. Some, as Hugo a S. Victoire, Alens, and Bonaventura, contend that episcopal ordination is no sacrament, but something sacramental, impressing no character distinct from the sacerdotal. They assert that, if the episcopate be a sa-

[* "Plures ex supra laudatis auctoribus, Cornelius Pontifex, Gregorius Magnus, Isidorus Hispalensis, Alcuinus, et alii, septem prædictis ordinibus episcopatum addunt; ergo non sunt tantum septem ordines ecclesiastici. S. Ignatius Martyr, Hieronymus, et alii permulti Psalmistas seu Cantores inter ordines ecclesiasticos recensent; ergo plures sunt quam septem ordines."—Bailly, Theolog., tom. v., Tract. de Ordine, pars i., cap. ii., De Numero Ordinum.

["Quot sunt ordines?—R. De fide est, in Ecclesia plures ordines dari; ita enim definivit Conc. Trident., sess. xxiii., can. 2. Quot vero sint, Concilium non definit. Enumerat tamen septem eadem sessione, cap. ii.; sacerdotium, scilicet, seu presbyteratum, diaconatum, sub-diaconatum, acolythatum, exorcistatum, lectoratum, et ostiariatum. Totidem etiam numerat Cornelius Papa electus anno 251, in Epistola ad Fabium Antiochenum, S. Thom. quæst. cit. Catech. Rom., de Sacr. Ordinis, No. 24, et theologi communiter. Canonistæ passim novem ordines ponunt, addunt scilicet tonsuram et episcopatum. Græci vero tantum quatuor admittere videntur, presbyteratum, scilicet, diaconatum, sub-diaconatum, et lectoratum."—Dens Theol., tom. vii., Tract. de Ordine, No. 2, De Institutione, Numero, et Divisione Ordinum.]

[† Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 304.]

‡ "Ordines singulos separatim decurrentes, ab episcopatu merito initium ducimus; hic enim ordo alios omnes complectitur, atque ut origine primus est, sic omnium fons est et caput."—Liebermann. Inst. Theol., tom. v., De Sac. Ordinis, cap. i., art. ii., sect. 1.

[* "Quæres, 2. Quomodo ordines nunc in Ecclesia Latina dividantur?—R. Illos dividi in majores seu sacros, et minores seu non sacros. Inter ordines majores seu sacros collocantur presbyteratus, diaconatus, et sub-diaconatus; inter minores vero seu non sacros quatuor alii recensentur."—Bailly, Theol., tom. v., Tract. De Ordine, pars i., cap. 2.]

crament, there are more than seven; and that it would also be superior to the presbyterial character, which cannot be admitted; if the episcopate be a sacrament, the archi-episcopate must of necessity be one also, and then the number would be indefinitely increased. The advocates of the opinion that the episcopate is a sacrament, quote the Council of Trent, as well as numerous authoritative testimonies from the ancient Fathers, Popes, Doctors, and even from the Apostle Paul. (2 Tim. i.)

3. The deaconship is also said by some to be a sacrament; but it is denied this rank by many, as Durandus, Cajetan, Maldonat, &c. It is not, however, considered by many grave authors an article of faith; such as Estius, Bellarmine, &c. Similar disputes are in existence with regard to the Sub-Deacons.

4. It is a topic of still greater contention, whether the minor orders are to be considered sacraments. We believe, however, that the majority of the Romish Divines repudiate them as such.

5. To the objection, that if all these orders are sacraments, there would be more than seven, no satisfactory answer is given. Those, however, who desire to see the most subtle solutions to this objection that human ingenuity can devise, may consult Peter Dens. *

IV. The minor orders.

1. These are, the Porter, Reader, Exorcist, and Acolyte. But before we describe them, it will be necessary to advert to the clerical tonsure.

Tonsure is considered by the greater number of Divines, not an order of the Clergy, but rather, a preparation for orders: this, however, has been disputed. The Council of Trent and the Catechism consider it as such; and in this light it must be viewed by Roman Catholics, whatever the sentiments entertained in former times respecting it may have been.

The Roman Catechism says, "The tonsure is a sort of preparation for receiving orders; as persons are prepared for baptism by exorcisms, and for marriage by espousals, so those who are consecrated to God by tonsure are prepared for admission to the sacrament of orders. Tonsure declares what manner of person he should be, who desires to receive orders: the name of 'Clerk,' (Clericus,) which he receives then for the first time, implies, that thenceforward he has taken the Lord for his inheritance, like those who, in the old law, were consecrated to the service of God, and to whom the Lord forbade that any portion of the ground should be distributed in the land of promise, saying, 'I am thy portion and thy inheritance.' This, although true of all Christians, applies in a special manner to those who have been consecrated to the ministry. In tonsure the hair of the head is cut in form of a crown, and should be worn in that form, enlarging the crown according as the Ecclesiastic advances in orders. This form of the tonsure, the Church teaches to be of apostolic origin: it is mentioned by the most ancient and venerable Fathers, by St. Denis the Areopagite, by St. Augustine, and by St. Jerome. According to these venerable personages, the tonsure was first introduced by the Prince of the Apostles, in honour of the crown of thorns which was pressed upon the head of the Redeemer; that the instrument devised by the impiety of the Jews for the ignominy and torture of Christ may be worn by his Apostles as their ornament and glory." †

Those who receive the tonsure profess to give up all worldly concerns, and are numbered among the Clergy. Accordingly, they possess those privileges which are awarded to that class of individuals in Roman Catholic countries. They become, by virtue of tonsure, capable of receiving ecclesiastical benefices and pensions.

Many and various are the interpretations given to this ceremony, and the uses to which it is employed. The Catechism states that "it was intended to signify that the Ministers of religion are, in all things, so to comport themselves, as to carry about them the figure and likeness of Christ." * The compilers of the Catechism advance other explanations. They say, that, according to the ancient Fathers, "tonsure is an emblem of the royal dignity, which belongs peculiarly to those who are specially called to the inheritance of God." And others are of opinion, that "tonsure, which is cut in form of a circle, the most perfect of all figures, is emblematic of the superior perfection of the ecclesiastical state; or that, as it consists in cutting off hair, which is a sort of superfluity, it implies a contempt of worldly things, and a detachment from all worldly cares and concerns." †

We quote the following from St. Anthony, Archbishop of Florence:—"The shaving on the upper part of the head, signifies that they ought to have a mind free for the contemplation of divine things. The tonsure over the ears denotes, that they ought not to have dull senses, or be involved in worldly matters, which are designated by the hair. But the cut of the hair, in form of a circle, designates the royal dignity which they have, and because they ought to regulate themselves and others according to the virtues." ‡

2. The Porter or Ostiarius. He is the lowest of the four minor orders, possessing the power of opening and shutting the doors of the church.

The matter of this order is the delivery of the keys of the church; and the form of words employed by the Bishop who ordains is, "Conduct yourself as having to render an account to God for those things which are kept under these keys."

The duties of this order are, to open the doors of the church to the faithful, and to shut them against infidels, heretics, and excommunicated persons; toll the bell; to assist at mass, so that no one should approach too near the celebrant; to attend to the cleansing of the house, preserving its ornaments and furniture in good order, &c. Or, according to the Catechism, the duty of this office consists in "taking care of the keys and door of the church, and in suffering none to enter to whom entrance is prohibited. The Porter also assisted at the holy sacrifice, and took care that no one should approach too near the altar, or interrupt the celebrant. To the order of Porter belonged also other functions, as is clear from the forms used at his consecration. That in the ancient Church this office was one of considerable dignity, may be inferred from still existing ecclesiastical observances; for to the Porter belonged the office of Treasurer of the church, to which was also attached that of Guardian of the sacristy;

* Dens Theol., tom. vii., De Ordine, No. 3, An omnes Ordines sint Sacramenta?

[† Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 310, 311.]

[* Idem, p. 311.]

[† Idem, pp. 311, 312.]

‡ "Rasura autem, quæ fit ex parte superiore, significat, quia debent hujusmodi habere mentem liberam ad contemplationem divinarum. Tonsura super aures designat, quia non debent habere sensus abvolutos et implicatos terrenis, quæ per capillos designantur. Corona vero capillorum designat dignitatem regiam, quam habent, et quia se et alios debent virtutibus regulare."—S. Anton. Sum. Theol., pars iii., cap. xvi., sec. vi., p. 743.

stations, the duties of which are still numbered amongst the most honourable functions of the Ecclesiastic." *

3. The Reader. The duty of this functionary is to read to the people, in a clear and distinct voice, the sacred Scriptures, particularly the Nocturnal Psalmody, as well as to instruct them in the rudiments of the faith. The Bishop at his ordination hands him a book which belongs to the exercise of his function, and says, "Receive this book, and be thou a rehearser of the word of God, destined, if thou approve thyself faithful and useful in the discharge of thy office, to have a part with those who from the beginning have acquitted themselves well in the ministry of the divine word."

4. The Exorcist; to whom is given power to invoke the name of the Lord over persons possessed by unclean spirits. The matter of this order is, the delivery of a book of exorcisms, either a Pontifical or Missal. The form is in the words following:—"Take this, and commit it to memory, and have power to impose hands on persons possessed, be they baptized or catechumens." They had ability to expel devils, or to restrain them, by the imposition of their hands, and various prayers, together with holy water, &c. This order seems now suppressed, and its powers are transferred to the Priests; but Priests cannot exercise it without a special licence from the Bishop. "Great abuses, such as the avarice of the Exorcists," says Dens, "and the credulity of the people, called for the extinction of the order." †

Now, as these Exorcists pretended to cast out devils in the name of the Lord Jesus, how does it happen, that the Church has discontinued the office, or has forbidden them to exercise its duties, thereby acting in direct opposition to that passage of Scripture, "Forbid them not?" Besides, according to the Church of Rome, the power of casting out devils was intrusted to wicked men. Thus Satan casts out Satan. And "he that casteth out devils in the name of Christ, cannot easily speak evil of the Son of man;" or, in other words, he cannot be wicked. Do they believe that wickedness is not an insuperable hinderance? At any rate, neither the credulity of the ignorant, nor the avarice of the Exorcists, seems to be so great an abuse as that of the Bishop in depriving the Exorcist of his office, or in restraining it to certain Priests. Was ever such power exercised by an Apostle, as that of personally interfering with the gift of casting out devils, so as to say precisely by written licence who should, and who should not, employ it?

5. The Acolyte, a follower, or assistant.‡ "The duty of the Acolyte is to attend and serve those in holy orders, Deacons, and Sub-Deacons, in the ministry of the altar. The Acolyte also attends to the lights used at the celebration of the holy sacrifice, particularly whilst the Gospel is read. At his ordination, therefore, the Bishop, having carefully admonished him of the nature of the office which he is about to assume, places in his hand a light, with these words: 'Receive this waxlight, and know, that henceforward you are devoted to light the church, in the name of the Lord.' He then hands him empty cruets, saying, 'Receive these cruets, which are to supply wine and water for the eucharist of the blood of Christ, in the name of the Lord.'" §

[Dr. Rock informs us, that "Acolytes constitute the highest of the four minor orders in the Latin Church, in which they have been employed, from the remotest antiquity, to perform the inferior ministry at the altar. St. Cornelius, who suffered martyrdom in 254, and his African contemporary, St. Cyprian, in their epistles, severally mention these subordinate Clerks. The Roman Pontiff, in that part of his letter to Fabius, where he enumerates the Clergy of Rome, says that there were 'forty-six Priests, seven Deacons, seven Sub-Deacons, forty-two Acolytes, Exorcists, and Lectors, together with fifty-two Door-keepers.' The Fourth Council of Carthage, celebrated in the year 398, takes especial notice of the form of their ordination; and directs, that 'when an Acolyte is ordained, let him be instructed by the Bishop how he is to perform his office. But let him receive from the Archdeacon the candlestick, with a wax taper, that he may know that to him has been consigned the duty of lighting the candles of the church. And let him receive an empty cruet, to supply wine for the eucharist of the blood of Christ.' † The same formula is recited in the Sacramentary of St. Gregory. The term is Greek, and derived from the word Ακολουθος, which signifies 'a young servant or attendant.' One amongst their most conspicuous offices within the sanctuary is, as St. Isidore ‡ informs us, to bear a wax taper. It has been the custom for several centuries to allow lay persons, even youths, to discharge the ministry, at the holy sacrifice, and other functions, without having the ordination of Acolytes. It was anciently a custom for the sovereign Pontiff at Rome, and for the Bishops of the other cities in Italy, to send by Acolytes § deputed for that purpose, a small portion of the

[* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 312.]

[† "Officium Exorcistæ est legere exorcismos, et manus imponere super energumenos, ad dæmones pellendos vel cohibendos. Nota; quod Exorcista suam, quam vi ordinis accepit, exorcizandi potestatem jam amplius licite exercere nequeat, sed illam Sacerdotibus reservatam esse, ita quidem ut nec his sine speciali Episcopi commissione hac uti licitum sit propter varios abusus, ut sunt sordida Exorcistarum avaritia et laicorum nimia credulitas; et quidem ut hæc commissio scriptis habeatur, vult Synodus II. Provincialis Mechliniensis, titulo xv., cap. iv., item Pastorale, in quo varias circa exorcismos faciendos instructiones reperies."—Dens Theolog., tom. vii., Tract. de Ordine, No. 8, De Minoribus Ordinibus.]

[‡ "Acolouthi, or Acolytes, servants of the Church, who appeared in the Latin Church as early as the third century; but in the Greek, not till the fifth. Their office was to light the candles, thence they were called accensores; to carry the tapers in the festal processions, thence ceroferarii; to present the wine and water at the supper, and in general to assist the Bishops and Priests in the performance of the ceremonies. They belonged to the Clergy, and had a rank immediately below the Sub-Deacons. In the Roman Church the consecration of an Acolouthos is the highest of the lower kinds of ordination. The person ordained receives a candlestick and chalice, in token of his ancient employment. The duties, however, formerly belonging to this office, have been performed since the seventh century by menials and boys taken from the laity, who are improperly called Acolouthi in the books of Roman Liturgy. The modern Greek Church no longer retains even the name."—Buck's Theological Dictionary, by Henderson, in loco.]

[* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 313.]

["† 'Acolythus cum ordinatur, ab Episcopo quidem doceatur qualiter in officio suo agere debeat. Sed ab Archidiacono accipiat ceroferarium cum cereo, ut sciat se ad accendenda ecclesiæ luminaria mancipari. Accipiat et urceolum vacuum, ad suggerendum vinum in eucharistiam sanguinis Christi.'—Concil. Labb., tom. ii., p. 1200. Paris, 1622.

["‡ St. Jerome, who flourished about the year 376, refers to this ceremony in his answer to Vigilantius, whom he thus addresses:—'Throughout all the churches of the East, whenever the Gospel is recited, they bring forth lights, though it be at noon-day; not certainly to drive away the darkness, but to manifest some sign of joy.' (Hieron. Epist. Advers. Vigilantium.) Those attendants who answer, and wait upon the Priest, and at high mass carry the lights, are thus noticed by St. Isidore, in his book called 'Origines,' which he composed towards the year 595:—'Those who in the Greek tongue are denominated Acolytes, are in Latin called Taper-bearers, from their carrying wax-candles at the reading of the Gospel, or when sacrifice is to be offered. These tapers are lighted, and borne by them.'—Isid. Orig., lib. vii., cap. xii.

["§ 'St. Tharsicius (is said to have been) one of those Acolytes, who, rather than betray to the Pagans, who had seized him, what he holy eucharist which they had consecrated, to the various titular churches of the city. The Priest who was celebrating the holy sacrifice, used to put this particle into the chalice, at the same time that he recited the prayer, 'The peace of our Lord,' &c." *]

V. The greater or holy orders.

This embraces three; namely, the sub-deaconate, the deaconate, and the presbyterate, or priesthood. The episcopate, as we have already seen, comprises the priesthood, and is a part thereof, or a distinct order. Each of these orders of Clergy requires a separate consideration.

1. The Sub-Deacon. Some rank this among the minor orders; but the Council of Trent and the Roman Catechism place it in the list of holy, or greater, orders; and here it must remain, as that infallible Synod and its faithful copyists have determined. No good Papist can reasonably doubt the certainty of such decision, although theologians have come very near calling into question its propriety.

The sub-deaconship is an order to which power is given of ministering to the Deacon, and of solemnly singing the epistle. "His office, as the name implies, is to serve the Deacon in the ministry of the altar: to him it belongs to prepare the altar-linen, the sacred vessels, the bread and wine necessary for the holy sacrifice, to minister water to the Priest or Bishop at the washing of the hands at mass, to read the epistle, a function which was formerly discharged by the Deacon, to assist at mass in the capacity of a witness, and see that the Priest be not disturbed by any one during its celebration. The functions which appertain to the ministry of the Sub-Deacon may be learned from the solemn ceremonies used at his consecration. In the first place the Bishop admonishes him, that by his ordination he assumes the solemn obligation of perpetual continence, and proclaims aloud that he alone is eligible to this office who is prepared freely to embrace this law. In the next place, when the solemn prayer of the Litanies has been recited, the Bishop enumerates and explains the duties and functions of the Sub-Deacon. This done, each of the candidates for ordination receives from the Bishop a chalice and consecrated patena, and from the Archdeacon cruets filled with wine and water, and a basin and towel for washing and drying the hands, to remind him that he is to serve the Deacon. These ceremonies the Bishop accompanies with this solemn admonition: 'See what sort of ministry is confided to you: I admonish you, therefore, so to comport yourselves as to be pleasing in the sight of God.' Additional prayers are then recited; and when, finally, the Bishop has clothed the Sub-Deacon with the sacred vestments, on putting on each of which he makes use of appropriate words and ceremonies, he then hands him the book of the Epistles, saying, 'Receive the book of the Epistles, and have power to read them in the church of God, both for the living and the dead.'" †

There is great variety of opinion respecting the matter of the sub-deaconship. Some assign it to the delivery of the empty cup and paten; several add the tunic, delivered by the Bishop; others assert that all the rites prescribed in the Pontifical belong thereto; while there are found those who contend that it consists principally in the delivering of the book of the Epistles.*

2. The Deacon. The deaconship is defined to be a sacred order on which power is conferred of immediately assisting the Priest, and of singing the Gospel. †

["The ministry of a Deacon is more comprehensive, and has always been deemed more holy. To him it belongs constantly to accompany the Bishop, to attend him when preaching, to assist him and the Priest also during the celebration of the holy mysteries, and at the administration of the sacraments, and to read the Gospel at the sacrifice of the mass. In the primitive ages of the Church, he not unfrequently exhorted the faithful to attend divine worship, and administered the chalice in those churches, in which the faithful received the holy eucharist in both kinds. In order to administer to the wants of the necessitous, to him was also committed the distribution of the goods of the Church. That the greatest care should be taken, that no unworthy person be advanced to the office of Deacon, is evinced by the emphasis with which the Apostle, writing to Timothy, dwells on the morals, the virtue, the integrity, which should mark the lives of those who are invested with this sacred character. The rites and ceremonies used at his ordination also sufficiently convey the same lesson of instruction. The prayers used at the ordination of a Deacon are more numerous and solemn than at that of a Sub-Deacon; his person is also invested with the sacred stole; ‡ of his ordination as of that of the first Deacons who were ordained by the Apostles, the imposition of hands also forms a part; and, finally, the book of the Gospels is handed to him by the Bishop, with these words: "Receive power to read the Gospel in the church of God, as well for the living as for the dead, in the name of the Lord.'" §]

There are not less than five opinions among Divines respecting the matter of this sacrament. The first, which is that of Bonaventura, Durandus, Scotus, Marinus, Martenius, Jueninus, and many others, places it in the imposition of hands only. The second, in the delivery of the Gospel alone. The third, which is the opinion of Aquinas, unites both the former. The fourth adds the stole. And the fifth, the dalmatic. ‖ The Greeks observe the imposition of hands and prayer only in ordaining Deacons. It will be seen that the various ceremonies of the Latin Church, which are added to imposition of hands was carrying, suffered himself to be beaten to death with clubs.'—Martyrologium Romanum."

[* Hierurgia, or the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, with Notes and Dissertations, elucidating its Doctrines and Ceremonies, by Daniel Rock, D.D., vol. i., pp. 75, 99, 152. London, 1833.]

† Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 313, 314.

[* "Quænam sunt officia Sub-Diaconi?—R. (1.) Calicem et patenam ad altare deferre. (2.) Panem et vinum suppeditare Diacono, eique subservire. (3.) Solemniter epistolam cantare. (4.) Juxta Pontif. Rom. pallas altaris et corporalis abluere.

["Quid est sub-diaconatus?—R. Est ordo sacer, in quo potestas traditur ministrandi Diacono, et epistolam solemniter cantandi."—Dens Theolog., tom. vii., De Ordine, No. 7, De Sub-Diaconatu.]

[† "Diaconatus definiri potest: ordo sacer, quo potestas traditur ad proxime assistendum Sacerdoti celebranti, et Evangelium cantandum."—Dens Theolog., tom. vii., De Ordine, No. 6, De Diaconatu.]

[‡ Vide supra, p. 176.

[§ Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 315, 316.]

[‖ "The dalmatic is a vestment worn by the Deacon whilst ministering at high-mass. It is a long robe, open on each side, and differs from the chasuble by having a species of wide sleeve, and, instead of being marked on the back with the cross, which superseded the senatorial latus-clavus, is ornamented with two stripes that were originally the angustus-clavus, worn upon their garments by the less dignified amongst the ancient Roman people. It derives its name from Dalmatia, the nation that invented it; and was originally a vest peculiar to the regal power; and, as such, became adopted, and was used in public, by several among the Roman Emperors. Anciently, the dalmatic was white, and its angusti-clavi, or narrow stripes, were scarlet."—Rock's Hierurgia, vol. ii. p. 647.]

and prayer, receive no countenance from the word of God, or from the institution of Deacons, as recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. (Chap. vi.)

The diaconal duties, according to the Roman Pontifical, are three-fold; namely, to minister at the altar, to baptize, and to preach.

He ministers at the altar. He assists the Priest at saying mass, prepares the bread and wine, and when the laity received the cup, he was the Minister who gave it to them. He is also the extraordinary administrator of the eucharist, in case of necessity, but in the absence of a Bishop, or Priest, and by special commission from them. "To the Deacon also, as the eye of the Bishop, it belongs to inquire and ascertain who within his diocess lead lives of piety and edification, and who do not; who attend the holy sacrifice of the mass, and the instruction of their Pastors, and who do not; that thus the Bishop, made acquainted by him with these matters, may be enabled to admonish each offender privately; or, should he deem it more conducive to their reformation, to rebuke and correct them publicly. He also calls over the names of catechumens, and presents to the Bishop those who are to be promoted to orders." *

He can baptize in case of necessity, by commission from the Bishop or Priest.

He can also preach in the absence of a Bishop or Presbyter; not, however, from an elevated place, in order that it may be understood that preaching is not one of his ordinary functions. For this purpose he must also have a special licence from his Diocesan.†

It will be seen, by any who may examine the duties of the primitive Deacons, as described in the Acts of the Apostles, and defined in the instructions given to these church officers by St. Paul, that the Deacons of the Romish Church differ much from those of the New Testament, both as to the manner of their appointment and the duties which they have to perform.

3. The Priest. The term "priesthood" is considered by many, if not by most, Roman Catholics, as generic, embracing all grades of Priests, whether Presbyters, Bishops, Archbishops, Abbots, &c. The Catechism says, "The order of priesthood, although essentially one, has different degrees of dignity and power. The first is confined to those who are simply called Priests. The second is that of Bishops, who are placed over their respective sees to govern, not only the other Ministers of the Church, but also the faithful."‡ Leibermann calls the priesthood, "the beginning and fountain of all orders."§ He says, "The plenitude of the sacrament is in one order, the priesthood."* Again he affirms: "The Council of Trent places the priesthood as the genus, under which are contained Priests of the first and second orders; namely, Bishops and Presbyters."† Though numerous Divines took a different view of this subject, especially before the Council of Trent, which decided this question,‡ the great body of them ultimately adopted the decision of that Synod.

Dens defines the priesthood: "A sacred order and sacrament, in which power is conferred of consecrating the body of Christ, of remitting sins, and of administering certain other sacraments."§

["The office of the Priest is, then, as the rites used at his consecration declared, to offer sacrifice to God, and to administer the sacraments of the Church: the Bishop, and after him the Priests, who may be present impose hands on the candidate for priesthood; then placing a stole on his shoulders, he adjusts it in form of a cross, to signify that the Priest receives strength from above to enable him to carry the cross of Jesus Christ, to bear the sweet yoke of his divine law, and to enforce this law, not by word only, but also by the eloquent example of a holy life.] He next anoints his hands with sacred oil, reaches him a chalice containing wine, and a patena with bread; saying, 'Receive power to offer sacrifice to God, and to celebrate mass, as well for the living as for the dead.' By these words and ceremonies he is constituted an interpreter and mediator between God and man, the principal function of the priesthood. Finally, placing his hands on the head of the person to be ordained, the Bishop says, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whose sins ye shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins ye shall retain, they are retained;' thus investing him with that divine power of forgiving and retaining sins, which was conferred by our Lord on his disciples. These are the principal and peculiar functions of the priesthood."‖ According to this, a Priest is an "interpreter and mediator between God and man;" he has power to "forgive and retain sins," and to "change bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ;" and thus he is invested with divine power, or he has this power by divine right, or committed to him by the Almighty!

The "functions" of the Priest may be summed up as follows:—(1.) To administer the sacrament of the eucharist, and to celebrate mass. (2.) To bless both persons and things which are employed in their use: to pray for others. (3.) To preside over and govern, under the control of the Bishop, the inferior Clergy and people. (4.) To preach. (5.) To baptize, and to administer the other sacraments, except confirmation and ordination. (6.) To remit and retain sins, in the sacrament of penance; for without priestly absolution no man can obtain ordinarily from God remission of sins, however penitent he may be.

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 315.

[† "Quænam sunt officia Diaconi?—R. Præcipua sunt hæc: 1. Solemniter et proxime assistere Sacerdoti celebranti. 2. Solemniter cantare Evangelium. 3. Eucharistiam ministrare, sed tantum in necessitate ex commissione Episcopi vel Parochi saltem præsumpta. Olim tamen, dum dabatur communio sub utraque specie, dispensatio calicis erat Diaconis ordinaria. 4. Baptizare etiam solemniter; sed iterum non nisi in necessitate ex Episcopi vel Parochi commissione. 5. Prædicare verbum Dei, sed ex solo Episcopi commissione. Olim adhuc alia Diaconis committebantur, ut cura afflictorum, dispensatio thesauri Ecclesiæ ex oblationibus fidelium collecti, et in necessitate pœnitentium reconciliatio, non quidem sacramentalem absolutionem impertiendo, sed vel communionem dando, quæ erat reconciliationis signum, vel cæremonialem absolutionem nomine Episcoporum deferendo."—Dens Theol., tom. vii.; De Ordine, No. 6; De Diac natu.]

‡ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 318.

[§ "Vides plures esse in sacro ministerio ordines, gradusque diversos, quorum omnium sacerdotium et principium est et fons."—Liebermann, Instit. Theol., tom. v.; Sacrament. Ordinis, cap. i., art. 2, observanda i.]

[* "Tota enim plenitudo hujus sacramenti est in uno ordine, scilicet sacerdotio."—Idem, observanda ii.]

[† "Tridentinum, cum ordines numerat in Ecclesia constitutos, a sacerdotio initium ducit; sacerdotium autem ponit tanquam genus, sub quo continentur primi et secundi ordinis Sacerdotes, id est, Episcopi et Presbyteri."—Idem, sect. i.; De Sacerdotio, observanda i.]

‡ Decret. et Can. Conc. Trid., sess. xxiii., can. vi.

[§ "Ex jam dictis sacerdotium definiri potest: ordo sacer et sacramentum, quo potestas confertur consecrandi corpus Christi, et peccata remittendi.

["Quænam sunt officia Sacerdotis?—Pontificale Rom. enumerat quinque sequentia; offerre, scilicet, benedicere, præesse, prædicare, et baptizare. Sub termino baptizare, inquit Steyaert, administratio omnium sacramentorum, confirmatione et ordinatione excepta, intelligitur."—Dens Theol., tom. vii.; De Ordine, No. 4; De Presbyteratu.]

‖ Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 318.

Among Presbyters, some are superior in grade and dignity to others: such are, Abbots, Deans, Canons, Theologians, Penitentiaries, Archdeacons, Archpresbyters, Officials, Vicars-General of Bishops, whose powers and functions are described by the Canonists. The distinction, however, is of ecclesiastical right.

There are four distinct opinions concerning the matter and form in the presbyterate. The first places the matter in the delivery of the instrument in the correspondent form. The second places the matter and form in the sole imposition of hands, with the accompanying prayer. The third teaches that the anointing of the hands is the form in part. The fourth makes a double matter and form. This opinion is said to be the most common.* The double matter and form do not well coincide with the doctrine they teach, when explaining what they mean by the matter and form of a sacrament!

VI. The episcopate.

1. The following definition of this order of Roman Catholic Clergy is given by Bailly:—"The episcopate is defined the supreme order by which power is conferred on a Presbyter of administering the sacraments of confirmation and orders, and of governing the church committed to him, that is, the Clergy and laity. By these words is expressed the double power of the Bishops; namely, of order, by which they confirm neophytes, and ordain Ministers of the Church; and of jurisdiction, by which they govern the people committed to them."†

Here a twofold power is said to be conferred on Bishops, namely, that of order, by which they confirm neophytes, and ordain Ministers; and that of jurisdiction, or a power of governing the Church; for example, they alone can take cognizance of causes, decide what is right, and deliver their judgment respecting matters of faith.

2. The power of order. Roman Catholics believe that Bishops, by divine right, are superior to Presbyters, as it regards the power of order, which principally consists in confirming neophytes, and in ordaining all degrees of Ministers. With these powers is associated the prerogative of making chrism, of consecrating temples and altars, of admitting and excommunicating members of the Church, and of receiving Ministers, without the consent or control of the Presbyters or the people. Thus Bishops alone admit members into the Church, and Ministers among the Clergy; and perform, in respect of them, all that the laity and ecclesiastical bodies have power to accomplish among the greater number of Protestant Churches.

The superiority of Bishops above Presbyters is thus expressed by the Council of Trent: "If any one shall say that Bishops are not superior to Presbyters, or that they have not the power of confirming and ordaining, or that what they have is common to them with Presbyters; let him be accursed."*

3. The power of jurisdiction or government. The Council of Trent expresses itself evasively on this topic, as the Pope's party were determined to have nothing decided by that assembly which would interfere with the supremacy of the Pontiff; and being aware that this could not be carried without manifest danger to such authority, they, by their intrigues, prevented any decision being announced respecting the power of Bishops at all. The sixth canon of the twenty-third session, however, recognises Bishops as a part of the great hierarchy; and in the fourth chapter of the same session it is said, that Bishops "govern the church of God:" regere ecclesiam Dei.

Benedict XIV. asserts the superiority of Bishops above Presbyters in matters of jurisdiction, and considers this doctrine as an article of faith. His words are, "It is a most firm dogma of the Catholic Church, that Bishops are superior to Presbyters, not only in the power of order, but also of jurisdiction."†

Though the Pope affirms that it is a well-established dogma, or article of faith, that, in matters of jurisdiction, Bishops are superior to Presbyters, there are several theologians who entertain a different opinion.‡

The discussion on the divine right of Bishops was conducted with great violence and asperity at the Council of Trent. Those who held the institution of Bishops to be of divine right, treated their opponents as slaves, who had ignobly sold themselves to do the will of the Pope, and they themselves were regarded as rebels for opposing the just rights of Christ's Vicar on earth. While the French and Spanish Prelates laboured to establish the divine right of Episcopacy, meaning thereby that Bishops derived both their office and their power immediately from Jesus Christ, the Pope strove to establish a distinction between their order and their jurisdiction, affirming that the former was derived from Jesus Christ, and the latter from the Roman Pontiff. Various formulæ were prepared, in the hope of uniting the two parties without any compromise of principle on either side; but the attempt was utterly unsuccessful, and the Council terminated without any authoritative declaration on the subject. The following canon, sent by the Pope to the Legates, but which the Synod refused to pass, was expressed thus:—"Whoever shall affirm, that blessed Peter was not appointed by Christ the chief of the Apostles, and his Vicar on earth; or that it is not necessary that there should be in the Church one Pontiff, the successor of Peter, and equal to him in the power of government; or that his lawful successors in the Roman See, from that time to the present, have not possessed the primacy of the Church, [* "Quænam est materia et forma presbyteratus?—R. Quatuor hac super re sunt sententiæ: Prima materiam constituit in sola instrumentorum traditione sub forma correspondente: estque Goneti, Dominici Soto, et aliorum. Secunda materiam et formam constituit in sola manuum impositione cum oratione adjuncta; traditionem autem instrumentorum dicit tantum ritum esse integrantem ab Ecclesia adjunctum ad majorem dumtaxat significationem et expressionem potestatis collatæ. Hanc tuentur Morinus, Juenin van Espen, Tournelly, &c.

["Tertia ipsam unctionem manuum materiam saltem partialem esse dicit, estque Cardinalis Hosii.

["Quarta tandem duplicem materiam et formam hujus sacramenti partialem distinguit: hanc amplectuntur Estius, Bellarminus, Sylvius, Daelman, &c. In hac sententia una materia partialis est traditio patenæ cum pane, et calicis cum vino: forma vero ei correspondens sunt verba Episcopi: 'Accipe potestatem offerre sacrificium Deo, missasque celebrare tam pro vivis, quam pro defunctis, in nomine Domini.' Alia partialis materia est impositio manuum Episcopi sub hac forma: 'Accipe Spiritum Sanctum: quorum remiseris peccata, remittuntur eis; et quorum retimueris, retenta sunt.'"—Dens Theol., tom. vii.; De Ordine, No 4; De Presbyteratu.]

† "Episcopatus definitur ordo supremus quo datur Presbytero potestas conferendi sacramenta confirmationis et ordinis, regendique Ecclesiam sibi commissam, id est, Clerum et plebem. His verbis exprimitur duplex Episcoporum potestas, videlicet, ordinis, qua neophytos confirmant et Ecclesiæ Ministros ordinant, et jurisdictionis, qua populum sibi commissum regunt."—Bailly, Theol., tom. v.; De Ordine, pars ii., cap. v., art. 2, sect. 2.

* Can. et Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. xxiii., can. 7.

† "Ecclesiæ Catholicæ firmissimum dogma est, Episcopos esse superiores Presbyteris, non solum potestate ordinis, sed etiam jurisdictionis."—De Synodo, tom. iii., lib. xii., cap. 1., n. 2, p. 265.

‡ See Bailly, Theol., tom. v.; De Ordine, pars ii., cap. v., art. 2, sect. iv., prop. 2. "Episcopi jure divino simplicibus Presbyteris jurisdictione ac dignitate sunt superiores."

and were not the Fathers, Pastors, and Teachers of all Christians, and that full power to feed, rule, and govern the universal church was not committed to them by our Lord Jesus Christ; let him be accursed."*

Since the days of that Council, the common opinion among Romanists, with the exception of the French, is, that the Bishops receive their power immediately from the Pope. They maintain, however, in connexion with this sentiment, that Bishops are, by divine right, superior to Presbyters as to jurisdiction: because, though they receive this authority from the Pope, nevertheless he is obliged to confer it upon them, as being the appointment of Christ. These two sentiments are held to be distinct, namely, to have jurisdiction by divine right, and to receive it immediately from God.†

To the power of governing belongs the right to approve or appoint Confessors, to excommunicate, and to grant indulgences.

4. Their prerogatives. These shall be stated in the words of Bailly: "What is the power and jurisdiction of Bishops in ecclesiastical matters?—Answer 1. They, and they alone, by divine right, are judges of controversies. 2. They, or the greater part of them, in those things which belong to faith, cannot teach error. 3. They do not obtain their authority and jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters from secular Princes, from the consent of the Presbyters, nor from the Pope, but immediately from Christ himself. 4. They have immediate jurisdiction, as well over the people subjected to them as over the Clergy."‡

5. The functions or offices of Bishops. The Pontifical asserts, that these are seven; namely, to judge, to interpret, to consecrate altars, chalices, temples, virgins, &c., to ordain, to offer, to baptize, to confirm.

6. The grades of Bishops are also seven: the Pope, who, by divine right, has the primacy of honour and jurisdiction over the whole Church; the Patriarch, who presides over the Primates and Metropolitans in his dominions; the Primate, or Exarch, who presides over several provinces; the Metropolitan, or Archbishop, who manages the concerns of one province; and the simple Bishop, who governs a diocess, and the parishes which are included in it.

7. The election of Bishops. Papists acknowledge, that in the primitive church this was done by the people and Clergy. In after-times they were chiefly elected by the Magistrates and Princes. In 1215 the Lateran Council deprived the people, Bishops, and Clergy of the right of election, and conferred it on the Canons. The "Pragmatic sanction"* placed the election of Bishops with the Canons, and the election of Abbots with the monasteries. Almost endless changes have been made in this matter. The Council of Trent decreed that, "whosoever shall say, that orders conferred by Bishops, without the consent or calling of the people or the secular power, are invalid; let him be accursed."†

8. Consecration. There is much controversy concerning the number of Bishops necessary to ordain another of that order. Some say three are necessary, and others more; while some maintain that one is sufficient.‡

* Cramp's Text-Book of Popery, p. 286.

[† "A quo habent Episcopi suam jurisdictionem?—R. Galli prætendunt, quod Episcopi illam habeant immediate a Christo, obtenta tamen a Pontifice confirmatione: sed communis extra Galliam sententia est, Episcopos suam jurisdictionem immediate accipere a Pontifice; hæcque sententia, ait Steyaert, expressiore et majore nititur auctoritate; conformis etiam est menti Ecclesiæ Romanæ, cæterarum matris ac magistræ; atque pro ea stat expressissima S. Leonis Papæ doctrina, dicentis: 'Nunquam nisi per ipsum (Petrum nempe vel ejus successorem) dedit, quidquid aliis non negavit; item ut ab ipso quasi quodam capite dona sua velut in corpus omne diffunderet.'

["Nec ex hac sententia consequens est, quod Episcopi non sint jure divino superiores Presbyteris quoad jurisdictionem; quia quamvis jurisdictionem a Pontifice accipiant, illam tamen Pontifex ex Christi ordinatione ipsis conferre tenetur: disparata ergo sunt hæc duo: habere suam jurisdictionem jure divino, et illam habere immediate a Deo."—Dens Theol., tom. vii.; De Ordine, No. 5; De Episcopatu.]

[‡ "Quæres, 1. Quænam sit Episcoporum in rebus ecclesiasticis auctoritas et jurisdictio?—R. 1. Illos, et quidem solos, jure divino esse controversiarum fidei judices. 2. Fieri non posse ut pars eorum maxima in iis quæ ad fidem attinent errorem doceat. 3. Eos suam in rebus ecclesiasticis auctoritatem ac jurisdictionem nec a principibus secularibus, nec a consensu Presbyterorum, nec a summo Pontifice mutuari, sed ab ipso Christo immediate accepisse. 4. Illos immediatam tum in plebem sibi subditam, tum in Clerum, jurisdictionem habere."—Bailly, Theol., tom. v.; De Ordine, pars ii., cap. v., art. ii., sect. v.]

[* The Pragmatic sanction was composed of the Canons of the Council of Basil. See Du Pin's Eccles. Hist., vol. iii., p. 132, et seq.]

† Can. et Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. xxiii., can. 7.

["Cujus sit Episcopos eligere?—R. 1. Olim populum in eligendis Episcopis simul cum Clero partem habuisse, ut videre est cap. vi. Act. Apostol. apud Cyprianum, Epist. lxvii., alias lxxxiv., ad Anastasium. 2. Nec tamen ubique, nec semper viguit disciplina illa, ut videre est apud Hallerium: Concilium Laodicenum, can. xiii., laicis electiones ademit. 3. Sequentibus ætatibus Magistratus et Principes, tanquam populi capita, sibi multam in sacris electionibus partem vindicaverunt. 4. Concilium Lateranense, anno 1215, plebem et comprovinciales Episcopos spoliavit jure electionum, quas totas Capitulis concessit. 5. Pragmatica sanctio, quam ex variis Concilii Basileensis decretis adornatam in Bituricensibus comitiis promulgavit Carolus VII., Galliarum Rex, permisit iisdem Capitulis ut Episcopum, monasteriis ut Abbatem, eligerent. 6. Pragmaticam hanc abrogaverant Leo X., Papa, et Franciscus I., inter quos in percelebri concordato Bononiæ, anno 1516, edito, conventum est ut electiones tollerentur et ad regem in Galliis devolverentur. At etiamnum in Germania vigent ex antiquis concordatis. 7. Ex his facile colligitur contra Protestantes suffragium populi nec ad validam nec ad legitimam ministrorum institutionem esse necessariam; (1.) Quia si fuisset necessarium, tanta non fuisset ea de re varietas, nec Concilium Generale Lateranense, anno 1215, plebem electionum jure spoliavisset; (2.) Quia Apostoli sine ullo plebis suffragio Episcopos instituebant, eosque mittebant ad varios populos; (3.) Quia valide instituitur qui vocatur a Deo tanquam Aaron, Heb. v., atqui Aaron a Moyse sine ullo multitudinis suffragio electus est; (4.) S. Cyprianus, Epist. xxxiii. in ordinandis Clericis, inquit: Solemus vos consulere, fratres charissimi; sed exspectanda non sunt testimonia humana, cum præcedunt divina suffragia; (5.) Nedum popularis electio sit necessaria, imo maxima ex ea consequuntur incommoda, gravesque ac turbulentæ non infrequenter ex ea natæ sunt contentiones, uti constat ex historiis ecclesiasticis."—Bailly, Theol., tom. v.; De Ordine, pars ii., cap. v., art. 2, sect. 5. Vide etiam Ferraris, Biblioth. Promp. Episcopus, art. 2.]

[‡ "Valet Episcopi consecratio ab uno Episcopo facta.—Prob. Si unus Episcopus ad alium valide consecrandum non sufficeret, rata haberi non posset ordinatio nisi a pluribus esset facta: atqui multorum Episcoporum ordinationes pro ratis habitæ fuerunt, quæ a pluribus Episcopis non fuerunt factæ. (1.) Enim difficile fuit ut Apostoli, qui ubique verbum disseminantes Episcopos ordinare consueverant, semper alios Episcopos ad sacram cæremoniam sibi adjungerent. (2.) In historia ecclesiastica Clemens a Petro, Anianus a Marco, consecrati fuisse perhibentur, nec a pluribus Episcopis ordinati dicuntur. (3.) Theodoretus, lib. v., Hist., cap. 25, refert Evagrium fuisse a solo Paulino Episcopum Antiochiæ consecratum. (4.) In Pontificali Romano et in antiquis ritualibus permultis unus tantum Episcopus dicitur consecrator, alii vero vocantur assistentes vel testes. Unde vero denominatio tam diversa, si tres vel duo Episcopi in consecrationem necessario et æqualiter influunt? (5.) Nullibi in Scripturis legitur, nec a SS. Patribus unquam dictum est, plurium Episcoporum ministerium in ordinatione Episcopi necessitate sacramenti esse requisitum: atqui tamen si ministerium illud necessitate sacramenti requireretur, id in Scripturis vel in scriptis SS. Patrum perpetuo non sileretur. (6.) Ipsimet adversarii sibi non consentiunt, alii asserentes ordinationem Episcopi non posse nisi a tribus valide fieri, alii existimantes duos Episcopos ad hancce ordinationem sufficere. (7.) Demum iidem theologi, ut sese extricent a variis quæ ipsis opponuntur argumentis, sine ratione ulla asserunt ex dispensatione S. Pontificis fieri posse ut valeat Episcopi consecratio ab uno Episcopo facta. Hæc dispensatio gratis ab ipsis con-

9. From the foregoing it appears that Roman Catholics differ from Protestants in several points respecting the superiority and powers of the Episcopacy. They maintain that Bishops are not only in a higher degree superior to other Ministers, but that they are as Princes among the Clergy, who in all things are subject to them. They maintain that Bishops are properly the Pastors, and that to them only it appertains to preach. They assert that not principally or chiefly, but entirely and alone, does it belong to them to confer ordination. Their powers, embraced under the two divisions of orders and jurisdiction, or government, invest them with such a pre-eminence as to deprive both the people and the regular Pastors or Presbyters of almost all those ecclesiastical privileges and prerogatives by which the discipline of the Gospel can be successfully exercised. Properly speaking, the principal powers of the Pastor, such as receiving and expelling members, and preaching the word, are assumed or restrained by the Bishop of the diocess so as to lead to a dereliction of the Scripture rules on these points. The privileges of the people, in judging of the proper character of their church-members, and of having at least some deference paid to their wishes and interests in the choice of Ministers, are almost exclusively engrossed by the princely Prelates of the Church of Rome. We propose first to examine those Scripture proofs and arguments by which they attempt to maintain their position; and then adduce the testimony of Scripture and of early antiquity in opposition to such high claims and pretensions.

First, we shall examine the Scripture proofs and arguments by which the Romanists attempt the maintenance of their position.

(1.) For the princely authority of their Prelates, whom they would have obeyed in all things, they adduce several passages of Scripture: "Against an Elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses." (1 Tim. v. 19.) Timothy, they say, as Bishop of Ephesus, is made judge of the Elders; therefore he possessed such power as the Romish Bishops possess. To this we reply: (i.) Timothy had no such prince-like authority as that for which they contend, because he was restrained and limited by a rule which was set down by the Apostle, and which he was bound to observe. (ii.) The power of judging others does not necessarily argue pre-eminence. Indeed, trial by jury, or by one's peers, is acknowledged by all enlightened nations to be the most equitable. Many ecclesiastical cases from the present and former ages might be adduced, where the person acting as judge was of precisely the same, and sometimes of an inferior, grade as that of the person judged; and although the Apostle teaches that those most esteemed ought to be appointed the judge, yet he evidently means those who were of equal ecclesiastical degree, as is plain from the context. Can there be no pre-eminence or superiority in the Church but that which is regal? Is every Judge a Prince over those upon whom he exercises authority? (iii.) Timothy was not a Bishop at Ephesus, such as the Roman Catholic Bishop is in his diocess. If he were, the Apostle would not have called him so often from his charge, and have employed him so extensively in the service of other churches; for he sends him to Corinth, and to the Thessalonians, to confirm them in the faith, and elsewhere. (iv.) Timothy occupied the place of an Evangelist, whose office it was to aid the Apostles in their ministry, and to water that which they had planted. That the calling of Evangelists and Bishops, or Pastors, was different in the Apostles' times, from that practised by the Papacy, is evident from St. Paul's words: "He hath given some Apostles, some Prophets, some Evangelists, some Pastors," &c. (Eph. iv. 11.) And that Timothy was such as we have stated, we learn from the passage where the Apostle exhorts him to "do the work of an Evangelist." (2 Tim. iv. 5.) (v.) Besides, as Timothy was ordained by the eldership, (1 Tim. iv. 14,)* which they themselves translate priesthood, and as the Rhemists expound it of the ancient practice of the Church, when the Presbyters,† together with the Bishop, laid their hands upon him who was ordained, how could Timothy be such a Bishop as they contend for, when he was ordained by Presbyters? (vi.) Admitting that Timothy was a Bishop, or, which is the same thing, an Evangelist, or one greater than a Bishop; yet the princely power over Presbyters as their subjects, and an absolute or plenary influence over them, even to their exclusion from pastoral authority, can never be proved from the passage under consideration. St. Paul instructs Timothy not to rebuke, but to exhort, the Elders as fathers. Therefore he giveth no princely dominion to Timothy, such as the Roman Prelates are accustomed to exercise. Again: where he says, "Receive no accusation," though he speaks by name to Timothy, as chief, he does not exclude the rest, any more than the Holy Spirit excludes other individuals when addressing the angels of the seven churches. Nor can it be gathered from those words of the Apostle, "Lay hands suddenly on no man," that Timothy wielded this power; for the Apostle would not give that to him which he did not assume, when he associated with himself the rest of the presbytery in ordaining Timothy. From the whole, we must conclude that such princely Monarchs or mitred Prelates as those of the Church of Rome are not authorized by the text in question.

(2.) Romanists affirm that Bishops only are properly the Pastors, and that the preaching of the word, as a right of jurisdiction, pertains to them. In support of this they affirm that the Apostles had the preaching of the word committed to them, as others, for example, were chosen to attend on tables. (Acts vi.) To this we reply: (i.) Bellarmine denies that Bishops do succeed the Apos-ficta est, nullisque Scripturæ testimoniis aut veteribus monumentis fundatur. Quæ solent objici SS. Patrum testimonia facile explicantur, hocque unum significant, ordinationes Episcoporum a paucioribus quam a tribus vel saltem duobus Episcopis factas esse illicitas, nec esse ratas quoad honorem et usum ac jurisdictionem, non vero eas quoad substantiam et potestatem ordinis esse invalidas."—Bailly, Theolog., tom. v., De Ordine, pars ii., cap. v., art. ii., sect. 3, Prop. Vide etiam Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt. Episcopus, art. ii., sect. 1—13.]

[* "St. Paul in 2 Tim. i. 6, says, 'Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands;' but in 1 Tim. iv. 14, he says, 'Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the Presbytery;' which two passages referring, as they plainly do, to the same event, the setting apart of Timothy for the ministry, show that the Presbytery were associated with St. Paul in the office of ordination, and further prove that the exclusive assumption of this power, as by divine right, by Bishops, is an aggression upon the rights of Presbyters, for which not only can no scriptural authority be pleaded, but which is in direct opposition to it."—Watson's Works, vol. xii., pp. 172, 173.]

[† "Neglect not the grace. St. Augustine declareth this grace to be the gift of the Holy Ghost given unto him by receiving this holy order, whereby he was made fit to execute the office to his own salvation and other men's. And, note withal, that grace is not only given in or with the sacraments, by the receivers' faith or devotion, but by the sacrament, per impositionem, 'by imposition of hands, for so he speaketh, (2 Tim. i.,) which is here said, cum impositione, 'with imposition.'"—Rhem. Test. sub loco.]

tles,* because he would magnify the Pope above Bishops. Yet in another place he saith, Episcopi proprie succedunt Apostolis: "Bishops properly succeed the Apostles." Roman Catholics, therefore, do not agree as to the true successors of the Apostles, of which we could give many examples. (2.) Every pious, qualified, and faithful Pastor is a successor of the Apostles. For in respect of their extraordinary calling, and miraculous gifts, those sainted men have, strictly speaking, no successors. The work to which they were specially appointed, is that wherein they were regularly succeeded; namely, the preaching of the Gospel. The commission which they received from our Lord was "to preach the Gospel, and teach all nations." (Matt. xxviii. 18, 19; Mark xvi. 15; Luke xxiv. 47.) St. Paul said he "was sent to preach, not to baptize." (1 Cor. i. 17.) This is evident also from Isaiah, where, speaking in the name of the Lord, he said, "My words which I have put in thy mouth shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed." (Isai. lix. 21.) The promise of succession, we see, applies chiefly to the preaching of the Gospel, which belongs to other Ministers as well as to Bishops. Add to this, that Bishops and Presbyters were neither in name nor office distinguished in the Apostles' time: it follows, therefore, that either the Apostles assigned no succession, or that indifferently, during their lifetime, all faithful Pastors and Preachers of the apostolic faith are their true successors. (iii.) When Deacons were elected, the Christians were resident chiefly in Jerusalem; and the Apostles attended to preaching the word. But afterward, when Pastors had been ordained in other churches, to them also was the word of reconciliation committed. "And he gave some, Apostles; and some, Prophets; and some, Evangelists; and some, Pastors and Teachers." (Eph. iv. 11.) So that Pastors and Teachers, though first ordained by the Apostles, had authority to preach without any farther licence or restraint. (iv.) The Popish doctrine on this point is both absurd and contradictory. They say it is not proper for the priesthood to preach; that they only have power to sacrifice the body of Christ; that such duty belongs to the Bishop. We rejoin: First, the Bishop is properly the Pastor of every flock and congregation in his diocess; for he that feedeth is the Pastor. Therefore the Minister, having the pastoral charge of the congregation or parish, is only the substitute or Vicar of the Bishop. But what Bishop is able to bear so great a burden as to have the special charge of all the souls in his see? Although he may hold a certain jurisdiction over them, yet to suppose that he is their Pastor, and hath the power and principal charge of souls in teaching and feeding, is absurd in the extreme. Secondly, the Rhemists inform us, that many who are not able to preach are qualified to be Bishops;† consequently, it is not proper for Bishops to preach. Then whose duty is it to preach, if it be neither that of the Bishops nor inferior Pastors? Thirdly, Papists make seven orders of ecclesiastical Ministers, and the priesthood is the chief; for a Bishop and a Priest, according to several of them, constitute but one order. But none of these are allowed to preach; for seeing it does not legitimately belong to the Priest, none of the inferior orders can challenge it. So little importance do they attach to the principal part of the Minister's work, namely, the preaching of the Gospel! Indeed, preaching the Gospel, according to them, is not so requisite a duty, but it can easily be dispensed with. Finally, one part of the Priest's duty is to preach; yet under many restrictions, it being principally the duty of the Bishop to license and to control preaching. The result is, that this part of the Pastors' work has been, in a considerable degree, neglected in the Church of Rome. In its place heaps of ceremonies, and the mass, in an unknown tongue, have been introduced; so that the word of God has been neglected, and the preaching of it, which is the power of God unto salvation, has received a substitute in priestly absolution, and other kindred mummeries of Popery.*

The want of preaching qualifications in Popish Prelates was strikingly manifested at the Council of Trent. The Bishops claimed the sole prerogative to provide for the wants of the Church in respect to preaching, and complained bitterly of the usurpations of the Regulars, especially the Mendicant Orders, whose great power was much feared by them. The Pope favoured the pretensions of the religious orders, whose devotedness to the Roman See was of essential importance to his interests; though he was convinced that the Prelates, according to the order of the Church, had justice on their side. He accordingly charged his Legates to exert themselves to the utmost, that the Bishops might be gratified at as little expense as possible to their rivals. The debates on this subject were violent and disorderly. The Prelates stated their grievances in strong and intemperate language. The Bishop of Fiesoli exhorted his brethren to be mindful of the duties of their office; he complained of the intrusion of the Regulars into the diocesses, and of the liberty they had to preach in the monasteries, and even ventured to describe them as wolves who had entered into [* "Magnum esse discrimen inter successionem Petri, et aliorum Apostolorum. Nam Romanus Pontifex proprie succedit Petro, non ut Apostolo, sed ut Pastori ordinario totius Ecclesiæ, et ideo ab illo habet Romanus Pontifex jurisdictionem, a quo habuit Petrus; at Episcopi non succedunt proprie Apostolis, quoniam Apostoli non fuerunt ordinarii, sed extraordinarii et quasi delegati Pastores, qualibus non succeditur."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Roman. Pontif., lib. iv., cap. xxv., col. 884, B. Colon., 1620.]

[† "Such Priests specially and Prelates are worthy of double, that is, of the more ample, honour, that are able to teach and preach, and do take pains therein. Where we may note, that all good Bishops or Priests in those days were not so well able to teach as some others; and yet for the ministry of the sacraments, and for wisdom and government, were not unmeet to be Bishops and Pastors; for though it be one high commendation in a Prelate to be able to teach, as the Apostle before noted, yet all cannot have the like grace therein, and it is often recompensed by other singular gifts no less necessary. St. Augustine laboured in word and doctrine; Alipius and Valerius were good Bishops, and yet had not that gift. And some times and countries require Preachers more than other. All which we note to discover the pride of heretics, that contemn some of the Catholic Priests or Bishops, pretending that they cannot preach as they do, with meretricious and painted eloquence."—Rhemish Test. sub loco, 1 Tim. v. 17.]

[* In the Stuttgart edition of Luther's Sinnreiche Tischreden, 1836, vol. ii., chap. iv., sect. lix., p. 156, the following remarks are found:—"Under the Papacy the Priests were consecrated, not for the office of preaching, to teach the word of God, but only to perform mass, to consecrate, and to offer for the living and the dead; but we ordain Priests according to the commandment of Christ and St. Paul; namely, to preach the true, pure Gospel, and word of God. But they (the Papists) have no regard in their ordination to the office of preaching in order to teach the word of God; therefore their consecration is false and worthless; for all divine service that is not appointed by God, nor directed out of, and according to, the word and commandment of God, is good for nothing; yea, is mere idolatry." This may account for the language of Strype, when, in speaking of the excellent Bishop Pilkington, whose writings have recently appeared, he mentions him as being set down, in the British Antiquities, as Minister Secular, and adds, "The using of that term was to distinguish him from the Popish massing Priests, and probably to imply his receiving his holy orders from some Protestant Bishop or Bishops in King Edward's days; which word Minister became usual in these times for distinction from the idolatrous Priests of the Romish Church."—Strype's Life of Parker, pp. 127, 128. Edit., 1821.]

the sheepfold, but not by the door. He besought the Fathers, by all that was sacred, not to suffer these abuses any longer; if they neglected this opportunity, he would appeal to the tribunal of God himself, before which he would stand innocent in this matter; but that on their heads would be the blood of the people. It was observed on the other side, that the Prelates had no reason to find fault with that which was the consequence of their neglect; that if the duties of public instruction had been properly discharged, the Regulars would have confined themselves to the more private exercises of religion; that to their own ignorance and idleness the present state of things was mainly attributable; and that they could not justly complain, since, while the Monks bore the burden of their ministry, they themselves retained all its gains and honours.

The Bishop of Fiesoli subsequently renewed the discussion. He said that there was great want of liberty in the Council, and that attempts were daily made to diminish the power and authority of the Prelates, whom he besought, in the name of Jesus Christ, not to suffer themselves to be so shamefully treated, but to resolve on the restoration of their pristine dignity. The Legates heard this address with great impatience. Fiesoli was charged with heresy, and of exciting discord and sedition. "A man cannot hold his tongue," said the Bishop, "when he sees that he is robbed." But he soon found it necessary to alter his tone. De Monte sent a copy of his speech to Rome, and at the next meeting inveighed most angrily against it; denounced it as calumnious, insulting, seditious, and schismatical; and excited so much feeling among the Fathers, that the Bishop was compelled, by the odium raised against him, to ask forgiveness.

In the course of the debates, Seripand, General of the Augustines, spoke largely on the alleged encroachments of the Regulars. He remarked, that the liberty of preaching had been enjoyed by them for three hundred years; and that if the Bishops designed to restore the primitive state of the Church, and undertake personally the work of public instruction, their resolve was to be commended: but it would not be of so easy execution as they imagined. He contended that modern Prelates required very different qualifications from those which were necessary in the early ages of Christianity; that now they must understand the civil and canon law, and be versed in politics, and the business of courts and the arts of government; that these studies and engagements equally unfitted them for the patient investigation of theological truth, and for the duties of the Christian ministry; that, on the other hand, the Regulars were unencumbered with worldly matters, and wholly devoted to divinity.

Amid these jarring sentiments a decree was framed; but it was so difficult to give general satisfaction, that it was many times altered and amended. Thus they had recourse to expediency in the place of Scripture and reason. Accordingly, the Legates succeeded in forming a plan in which the contending parties acquiesced. The Regulars were to be prohibited from preaching in churches not belonging to their order, without a Bishop's licence; in their own churches the licence of their Superiors would suffice, which, however, was to be presented to the Bishop, whose blessing they were directed to ask, and who was empowered to proceed against them if they preached heresy, or acted in a disorderly manner. But this privilege was clogged with a clause, enacting that the Bishops exercised their power as delegates of the Holy See. Thus the Pope took away with one hand what he gave with the other, and fastened the chains of bondage while he seemed to bestow freedom.*

The truth of the matter is, that preaching the Gospel forms a very small portion of the duties performed by the Clergy of the Church of Rome. The greater part of their sermons are discourses on unscriptural doctrines and observances; and proofs in support of them are not derived from Scripture, but from tradition, ecclesiastical laws, apocryphal writings, and the productions of degenerate Fathers. Those sermons, which are on professedly scriptural topics, abound with foolish paraphrases and puerile distinctions. Add to this, that many of the Clergy, and especially the Prelates, do not preach at all. And wherever preaching makes any considerable part of their religious exercises, they have been urged to adopt this practice by the industry and example of their Protestant neighbours. There are, however, examples of some eloquent Preachers among them, such as Massillon and Bourdaloue; but they are comparatively few, and fall infinitely short of what may be found among Protestants, both in number and character.

(3.) The Papacy further contends that the power of order, or of ordaining Ministers, belongs entirely to Bishops, quoting, among other passages of Scripture, Acts xiv. 23, where it is stated, that Barnabas and Paul ordained Elders in every church. To this we adduce the following reply, in order to show that the power of ordaining or appointing to the ministry, was not altogether vested in the Apostles; that they did not exercise this power independently of the Presbyters; and that the practice of the Church of Rome is not supported by this or other passages of Scripture. (1.) In the choice of Matthias to the apostleship, (Acts i.,) the disciples selected two, one of whom was chosen by lot; and we have no account of hands having been laid upon him to make him an Apostle. (2.) In selecting the first Deacons, (Acts vi.,) they were chosen or elected by the believers, and were then appointed or consecrated by the Apostles, by prayer and imposition of hands. (3.) Persons called Prophets and Teachers, or Pastors, in the Church at Antioch, laid hands on Barnabas and Paul, when they were appointed to a particular work. (Acts xiii. 1—4.) As St. Paul speaks of the laying on of his hands, (2 Tim. i. 6,) so he makes mention of the imposition of hands by the Presbytery or Eldership. The Rhemish annotators also allow, that the Elders joined with the Apostle in the imposition of hands.† The conclusion, therefore, is, that the Presbyters of a place took part in ordination, or, as indeed sometimes occurred, ordained Ministers themselves. (4.) Hence Romanists allow of the Priests or Presbyters who are present joining the Bishop or Bishops in the ordination of Elders. What else is this, than the remains of the primitive custom of the apostolic and immediately succeeding age, during which Presbyters were either the ordaining party, or they and Bishops jointly set apart persons to the sacred ministry?

It should also be remembered, that consecration, or the mere imposition of hands, is the smallest part of scriptural ordination, which consists of election, examination, process of trial or probation, and the recognition in the candidate of proper ministerial qualifications. The official cognizance of these is generally, and necessarily, placed in the hands of the people and Presbyters. The ceremony of laying on of hands, is nothing more than the formal recognition of a person, who has furnished proofs that he is called to the Minister's work, and therefore eligible, and consequently a proper person to be formally recognised in that office. But even in performing this ceremony, in behalf of the Church in primitive times, Presbyters took as active and as full a share as any of those who are called Bishops.

* See Cramp's Text-Book of Popery, pp. 61—64.

† "Imposition of the hands of the priesthood. The practice of the Church giveth us the sense of this place, which the ancient Council of Carthage doth thus set down: 'When a Priest taketh orders, the Bishop blessing him, and holding his hand upon his head, let all the Priests present lay also their hands on his head, by the Bishop's hands,'" &c.—Rhem. Test., 1 Tim. iv. 14.]

["If we consult the New Testament," says the Rev. R. Watson, "this office was never conveyed by the people. The Apostles were ordained by our Lord; the Evangelists, by the Apostles; the Elders in every church, both by Apostles and Evangelists. The passage which has been chiefly urged by those who would originate the ministry from the people is Acts xiv. 23, where the historian, speaking of St. Paul and Barnabas, says, 'And when they had ordained (χειροτονησαντες) Elders in every church, and had prayed with fasting, they commended them to the Lord.' Here, because χειροτονειν originally signified 'to choose by way of suffrage,' some have urged that these Elders were appointed by the suffrages of the people. Long, however, before the time of St. Luke, this word was used for simple designation, without any reference to election by suffrages; and so it is employed by St. Luke himself in the same book, (Acts x. 41,)—'witnesses chosen before of God,' where, of course, the suffrages of men are out of the question. It is also fatal to the argument drawn from the text, that the act implied in the word, whatever it might be, was not the act of the people, but that of Paul and Barnabas. Even the Deacons, whose appointment is mentioned Acts vi., although 'looked out' by the disciples as men of honest report, did not enter upon their office till solemnly appointed thereto by the Apostles. Nothing is clearer in the New Testament, than that all the candidates for the ministry were judged of by those who had been placed in that office themselves, and received their appointment from them. Such, too, was the practice of the primitive churches after the death of both Apostles and Evangelists. Presbyters, who, during the life of the Apostles, had the power of ordination, (for they laid their hands upon Timothy,) continued to perform that office in discharge of one solemn part of their duty, to perpetuate the ministry, and to provide for the wants of the churches. In the times of the Apostles, who were endued with special gifts, the concurrence of the people was not, perhaps, always formally taken; but the directions to Timothy and Titus imply a reference to the judgment of the members of the church, because from them only it could be learned whether the party fixed upon for ordination possessed those qualifications without which ordination was prohibited. When the churches assumed a more regular form, 'the people were always present at ordinations, and ratified the action with their approbation and consent. To this end the Bishop was wont, before every ordination, to publish the names of those who were to have holy orders conferred upon them, that so the people, who best knew their lives and conversation, might interpose if they had any thing material to object against them.' * Sometimes, also, they nominated them by suffrages, and thus proposed them for ordination. The mode in which the people shall be made a concurrent party, is matter of prudential regulation; but they had an early, and certainly a reasonable, right to a voice in the appointment of their Ministers, although the power of ordination was vested in Ministers alone, to be exercised on their responsibility to Christ." *]

(4.) The Paparchy further maintain, "that in the Old Testament there was the High Priest as chief, upon whose sentence every matter depended, and the other Priests were inferior to him: therefore, in the New Testament, Bishops are in the place of the High Priests, and Presbyters as the inferior Priests." To this we respond: (i.) The High Priest in the law was a figure of Christ, who fills that office in the New Testament, and is the chief Shepherd; (Heb. iii. 1; iv. 14; 1 Peter v. 4;) and therefore this type being fulfilled in Christ, cannot properly be applied to the external hierarchy of the Church. (ii.) If every Bishop be this High Priest, then they have lost one of the strongest arguments in favour of the Pope, whom they place as High Priest in the Church. (iii.) There may be appropriate degrees of priority or office among Ministers of the Gospel, without any such princely dominion as that of the Church of Rome. (iv.) It is not true, that all things were governed at the will of the High Priest; for other Priests and Elders were his assistants, and discussed subjects in council with him. We allude to the Sanhedrim and Council, of which mention is made in Scripture. (Acts iv. 8, 23.) The synagogue, and afterward the Church, had this Council or Presbytery, without whose advice and consent nothing was accomplished. (v.) Jerome reasons thus: "That if Moses chose seventy Elders, together with whom he judged the people; so should Bishops and Presbyters govern the Church in common."

(5.) It is asserted that "Christ ordained twelve Apostles and seventy disciples; therefore, the Bishops succeed the Apostles, and the Priests follow in the place of the disciples." We answer: (i.) Though there was a difference between the Apostles and the seventy, this can be no argument in favour of the princely pre-eminence which is assumed in the Church of Rome. (ii.) Ignatius, in his Epistle to the Trallians, says, "Be ye subject to your Presbyters, as to the Apostles of Jesus Christ, our hope." † Although in the same Epistle he compares the Bishops to Christ, and the Elders to the Apostles; it is, nevertheless, sufficient for our purpose, that Presbyters are recognised as the Apostles. (iii.) We read only of two grades among the disciples of our Lord; namely, that of the Apostles, and the seventy. In like manner the primitive Church had but two sacred orders; one of Priests, and the other of Deacons. (iv.) Ignatius, though the third Bishop of Antioch, does not pretend to derive his ecclesiastical pedigree from the Apostles; for, when writing to the Romans, he says, "I do not, as Peter and Paul, command you. They were Apostles, I, a condemned man; they were free, but I am, even to this day, a servant." ‡

(6.) The authority of the ancient Fathers is quoted to support the princely jurisdiction of the Prelates of Rome. On this we remark, that although those venerable men constantly make mention of Bishops, by that term they mean either the Pastor of a congregation, or of a certain district, who had a number of fellow-labourers of whom he was chief, or superior in point of order and jurisdiction:

["* Cave's Primitive Christianity."]

[* Watson's Works, vol. xii., pp. 191, 192.]

[† "Αλλ' ὑποτασσεσθε και τῳ Πρεσβυτεριῳ, ὡς τοις Αποστολοις Ιησου Χριστου της ελπιδος ἡμων."—S. Ignat. Epist. ad Trall., sect. ii.]

[‡ "Ουχ ὡς Πετρος και Παυλος διατασσομαι ὑμιν. Εκεινοι Αποστολοι, εγω κατακριτος· εκεινοι ελευθεροι, εγω δε μεχρι νυν δουλος."—Ignat. Epist. ad Rom., sect. iv.]

or they imply persons, who, in process of time, had several Presbyters and Deacons under them in charge of distinct congregations; but even these Bishops, so called, were chosen and ordained by the Presbyters, and could do nothing without the consent or approbation of the Presbytery or body of Elders. Bishops, such as these, were very different from the princely monarchs in the Church of Rome, who bear that title, but who possess few traits in common with those of primitive times.

(7.) The authority of the Council of Trent is alleged. But that synod was divided on this point, and its decrees leave the subject in a very undefined state. Indeed, the decisions of that body are entitled to but little credit from those who believe that ignorant, impious, and factious men, of violent party feelings and of uncontrolled and gratified passions, are incompetent judges of the doctrines and morals of the Gospel. But if Roman Catholic authors are to be credited, such men were the Fathers of the Trentine assembly.

(8.) The argument from "prescription" is sometimes referred to, as authoritative on this subject. It is stated, that as it was received from the Apostles, so it is retained in the Church of Rome incorrupted. The misfortune attending this argument is, that history and facts are against it. For although the name of "Bishop" is retained, the office has lost so many of its primary elements of constitution, and so many additions have been made to its functions and powers, that when we compare the humble, self-denying Bishops of the apostolic and succeeding ages, with the princely lords of the Church of Rome, we can find but few characteristics common to them and the Bishops of primitive Christianity. Such prescription is as ill-founded in the mouth of Roman Catholics, as the plea of the Jews, who claimed Abraham for their father, though they were destitute of his faith.

10. Secondly, We shall adduce the testimony of Scripture and of early antiquity against these high claims of Popish Prelates.

(1.) On the difference between Presbyters and Bishops, there are three opinions, which may be stated here. The first is, that all Ministers should be equal; and that a Bishop neither was, nor ought to be, superior to a Priest.

The second, in the opposite extreme, is that of the Roman Catholics, who would not only have a difference, but a princely pre-eminence of the Bishops over their Clergy, and that to be authorized by the word of God; urging, that they consider those to be no churches which do not receive this hierarchy. How far some Protestants have adopted this notion, it is not necessary for us to inquire.

The third opinion, which lies between both, is, that though a distinction of Bishops and Presbyters cannot be directly proved from Scripture, yet it is useful for the government of the church, in order to avoid schism, and to preserve unity. Of this sentiment Bishop Jewel against Harding showeth Chrysostom, Ambrose, and Jerome to have been. So also were Bishop Jewel himself, and Bishop Whitgift, as well as Cranmer, with the early writers of the English Church.

Without attempting to decide respecting the comparative weight of the first and third opinions, we present the following arguments against the second, or that which is embraced by the Church of Rome.

(2.) According to the New Testament, Presbyters and Bishops in the Apostles' time were all one. (Acts xx. 17, 28.) Those whom the Apostle calls Elders or Presbyters, he also designates Overseers or Bishops. (Titus i. 5, 7.) The same persons called Elders are also named Bishops. Also St. Peter (1 Epist. v. 1,) exhorts the Elders to do the duties of a Bishop or Overseer. Hence we conclude, with Jerome, that a Bishop and a Priest are one order.

These testimonies from Scripture are corroborated by the greater number of the ancient Fathers. It is the opinion of St. Chrysostom, who teaches that the name of Bishop in the time of the Apostles was attributed both to Bishops and Presbyters.* So also Theophylact, Œcumenius, Jerome, Bede, Anselm, and the Angelic Doctor. Into this opinion almost all the Latin and Greek Fathers have gone; and if they are the interpreters of Scripture, certainly they ought to decide this matter against the Church of Rome; for such distinctions as they now make between Presbyters and Bishops are utterly inconsistent with a common name, office, and rank. There have been found, however, among the ancients, as among themselves, persons of very different sentiments.

Theodoret, in his Comment on 1 Tim. iii., asserts, that, in the time of the Apostles, the Bishops were called by that name, and those who were properly Presbyters were denominated Bishops.† On this opinion we remark: (1.) It is more probable that Bishops should be called Apostles, subsequently to their death, than during their lifetime; but after the departure of the Apostles, the ancient Bishops refused to accept that title, as is plain from Ignatius and Cyprian. (2.) The case of Epaphroditus, who is called Apostle or messenger, is not an instance in point; (Phil. iv. 18;) for he was simply the messenger of that church, to bear their bounty of benevolence to St. Paul. (3.) The Ministers or Pastors of the church were sometimes called Apostles, in reference to their pastoral office; (2 Cor. viii. 23;) but not in that more extensive sense which the term was intended to designate. So the word Deacon or deaconship is sometimes taken for any office or ministry, even as the apostleship is sometimes so called. (Acts i. 25.) Timothy, an Evangelist, is called a Deacon; that is, a Minister. (1 Thess. iii. 2.) The Apostles, in a peculiar acceptation of that word, were called Deacons; as Bishops and Pastors might also be called Apostles. (4.) In the Apostles' time none were usually and with propriety called by that name, but the twelve, to whom were afterward joined Paul and Barnabas, as is evident from the Scriptures: "Christ chose twelve, whom also he named Apostles." (Luke vi. 13.) The name therefore of Apostle must be conferred by Christ; and St. Paul saith, (1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. iv. 11,) that "God gave some to be Apostles, some Pastors and Teachers;" therefore all could not be Apostles. If then some were Apostles and some Pastors, the Pastors could not pertain to the former office.

[* "Coepiscopis et Diaconis. Quid hoc? an unius civitatis multi erant Episcopi? Nequaquam, sed Presbyteros isto nomine appellavit. Tunc enim nomina adhuc erant communia, atque ipse etiam Episcopus vocabatur Diaconus."—Chrysost. Opera, tom. xi., in Epist. ad Philip., cap. i., hom. i. Edit. Bened., Paris, 1838.]

[† "Hic autem Episcopum appellat Presbyterum, sicut Epistolam ad Philippenses interpretando ostendimus. Hoc autem ex hoc etiam loco intelligi facile potest. Post leges enim Episcopales, eas scribit quæ Diaconis conveniunt prætermissis Presbyteris. Sed, ut dixi, eosdem olim vocabant Presbyteros et Episcopos; eos autem qui nunc vocantur Episcopi, Apostolos nominabant. Procedente autem tempore, Apostolatus nomen reliquerunt iis qui vere erant Apostoli: Episcopatus autem appellationem imposuerunt iis qui olim appellabantur Apostoli. Ita Philippensium Apostolus erat Epaphroditus: Vestrum enim, inquit, Apostolum et adjutorem necessitatis meæ. Ita Cretensium Titus, et Asianorum Timotheus, Apostoli. Ita ab Hierosolymis iis qui erant Antiochiæ scripserunt Apostoli et Presbyteri. Sed tamen, etiamsi Presbyteris ista constituit divinus Apostolus, clarum est quod has leges oportet primos servare Episcopos, qui majorem dignitatem sortiti sunt."—Theodoreti Opera, tom. iii., Interp. epist. i. ad Tim., cap. iii., pp. 473, 474. Fol. Paris, 1642.]

[" The appellation of Apostles was also given to the ordinary travelling Ministers of the Church. Thus St. Paul, in the Epistle to the Romans, (xvi. 7,) says, 'Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen and fellow-prisoners, who are of note among the Apostles.' In this inferior sense the appellation is applied, by Clement of Alexandria, to Barnabas; who was not an Apostle in the highest sense of the word, so as the twelve and Paul were Apostles. Tertullian calls all the seventy disciples Apostles; and Clement calls Barnabas apostolical merely in another place, and says that he was one of the seventy, and fellow-labourer of Paul. These, says Dr. Lardner, are the highest characters which he really intends to give to Barnabas, and what he means when he styles him Apostle; therefore he need not be supposed to ascribe to Barnabas that large measure of inspiration and high authority, which was peculiar to the Apostles, strictly and properly so called. In a similar subordinate form, St. Clement of Rome is called an Apostle. Timothy, also, is called by Salvian, Apostle, meaning merely apostolical, or a companion and disciple of the Apostles.

[" Apostle was likewise a title given to those sent by the churches to carry their alms to the poor of other churches. This usage they borrowed from the synagogues, who called those whom they sent on this message by the same name; and the function or office itself, αποστολη, that is, 'mission.' Thus St. Paul, writing to the Philippians, tells them, that Epaphroditus, their Apostle, had ministered to his wants. (Phil. ii. 25.) It is applied, in like manner, to those persons who first planted the Christian faith in any place.

[" Apostle is also used among the Jews for a kind of officer anciently sent into the several parts and provinces in their jurisdiction, by way of Visiter or Commissary; to see that the laws were duly observed, and to receive the moneys collected for the reparation of the temple, and the tribute payable to the Romans. These Apostles were a degree below the officers of the synagogues, called 'Patriarchs,' and received their commissions from them. Some authors observe that St. Paul had borne this office; and that it is this he alludes to in the beginning of the Epistle to the Galatians; as if he had said, 'Paul, no longer an Apostle of the synagogue, nor sent by men to maintain the law of Moses, but now an Apostle and envoy of Jesus Christ,' &c. St. Jerome, though he does not believe that St. Paul had been an Apostle of this kind, yet imagines that he alludes to it in the passage just cited."*]

Epiphanius gave it as his opinion, that those were properly called Bishops who are the same that were afterward called by that name; but that the name "Bishop" was never applied to Presbyters. Bishop Pearson and Petavius follow Epiphanius. It is, however, sufficient to state, that St. Paul, in writing to the Philippians, (Phil. i. 1,) addresses the Bishops and Deacons. From this, therefore, we may infer that the Philippian Bishops must have been the same with Elders, otherwise they could not have been diocesan Bishops.

The arguments which Andrew Willet, a Minister of the Church of England, employed in 1634, in answer to Bellarmine, who maintained, that in the Apostles' time the names of Bishops and Presbyters were confounded, being common to all Ministers, but that the offices and functions of all were distinct, are valuable:—

"Answer. First, St. Hierome showeth out of St. Paul, (1 Tim. iii.,) where he describeth the office of a Bishop, that not only the name of a Bishop and a Priest were taken for the same, but the office also; because the Apostle requireth the same properties and qualities in them both: 'There is,' said he, 'no mention made of a Priest, because he is contained under a Bishop.'* In the same Epistle, also, he urgeth that passage, Titus i. 5, 7, where the Apostle not only gives the name of Bishops to Priests, but requires the same gifts and qualities in both. Secondly, St. Chrysostom useth the same reason. 'Discoursing of Bishops, and having described their character, and the qualities which they ought to possess, and having passed over the order of Presbyters, he proceeds to that of Deacons. The reason of this omission was, that between Presbyters and Bishops there was no great difference. Both had undertaken the office of Teachers and Presidents in the Church; and what he has said concerning Bishops is applicable to Presbyters. For they only are superior in having the power of ordination, and seem to have no other advantage over Presbyters.'† Thirdly, St. Ambrose, also, upon the same ground, thus writes: 'He places the ordination of a Deacon after a Bishop: why? because there is but one ordination of a Bishop and a Priest: for both of them is a Minister, (Sacerdos,) yet the Bishop is the first among the Priests.'‡ Fourthly, Likewise,§ in these words from Isidore, which conclude thus: Unde ad Timotheum de ordinatione, &c. 'Hereupon the Apostle, writing to Timothy, of the ordination of a Bishop and a Deacon, speaketh nothing of Priests, because he comprehendeth them under the name of Bishops.' Secundus etenim gradus pene conjunctus est primo: 'For the second degree is almost all one with the first.' Thus, by the judgment of these learned Fathers, there was small difference between the names, so between the offices, of Priests and Bishops in the Apostles' time. And thus much concerning the testimony of Scripture.

"Argument 2. Archbishops and Primates have the same right of jurisdiction over other Bishops which Bishops have over simple Priests; but their authority and jurisdiction are rather grounded upon the ancient custom of the Church, than any apostolical injunction or institution in Scripture. Ergo,

[* Watson's Biblical and Theological Dictionary, art. "Apostle."]

[* "De Presbyteris omnino reticetur; quia in Episcopo et Presbyter continetur."—Hieron. Opera, tom. iv., pars ii., Epist. ci., ad Evangel. Fol. Paris, 1706.]

[† "Διαλεγομενος περι Επισκοπων, και χαρακτηρισας αυτους, και ειπων τινα μεν εχειν, τινων δε απεχεσθαι χρη, και το των Πρεσβυτερων ταγμα αφεις, εις τους Διακονους μετεπηδησε. Τι δηποτε; Ὅτι ου πολυ το μεσον αυτων και των Επισκοπων. Και γαρ και αυτοι διδασκαλιαν εισιν αναδεδεγμενοι, και προστασιαν της Εκκλησιας· και ἁ περι Επισκοπων ειπε, ταυτα και πρεσβυτεροις ἁρμοττει.

["Postquam de Episcopis dixit, illorumque formam descripsit, indicavitque quid habere, a quibus abstinere debeant; relicto Presbyterorum ordine, ad Diaconos transiit. Quare? Quia non multum spatii est inter Presbyteros et Episcopos; nam etiam Presbyteri docendi munus acceperunt, et Ecclesiæ præsunt; ac quæ ille de Episcopis dixit, etiam Presbyteris competunt. Sola namque ordinatione superiores sunt, et hinc tantum videntur presbyteris præstare."—Chrysost. Opera, tom. xi. In Epist. i. ad Tim., cap. iii., Hom. xi. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1833.

[‡ "Post Episcopum tamen Diaconi ordinationem subjecit. Quare, nisi quia Episcopi et Presbyteri una ordinatio est? Uterque enim Sacerdos est; sed Episcopus primus est; ut omnis Episcopus Presbyter sit, non omnis Presbyter Episcopus: hic enim Episcopus est qui inter Presbyteros primus est."—Ambrosii Opera, tom. ii., Comment. in Epist. 1 ad Timoth., cap. iii., col. 577. Fol. Paris, 1661.]

§ Concil. Aquisgran., cap. viii.; Conc. Labb., tom. vii., col. 1317. Paris, 1671.

"The second part of the reason is proved by the authority of St. Hierome, or whoever else was the author of the book De Septem Ordinibus. Propter hoc est nuper episcopalis electio, &c. For this cause also, that is, the preserving of unity, the election of the Bishop is referred to the Metropolitan, &c.; and now the chief Priests begin to endure another Priest above them, non ex jure, sed necessitate, rather of necessity than equity. Also the decree of Nicholas, the Pope, canon 3, de Patriarch., Primates vel Patriarchas nihil habere privilegii, &c.: 'We do determine that Primates and Patriarchs have no privilege before other Bishops, nisi quantum, but as far as the sacred canons do grant, and ancient custom of old time hath given unto them.' This is also affirmed by that reverend and learned Prelate, Bishop Jewel, out of Hierome, that Bishops are subject to Primates by continuance of custom, more than by precept of Scripture."* Our author proceeds to show that the distinction between Bishops and other Ministers had no existence, or was very small, in the days of the Apostles. Indeed, if such a distinction as exists between Bishops and Priests in the Church of Rome were by commandment and institution of Christ and his Apostles, it would have been clearly enjoined on all churches; but this is not the case. Here, then, is the difference between the Church of Rome and us: they say it is necessary to salvation to be subject to the Pope, and to Bishops and Archbishops under him; which is a notable difference between the Bishops of their Church and those of Protestant Churches.

The following is the concluding observation of Andrew Willet on the topic concerning which we have quoted. "Wherefore," says he, "as we condemn not those Reformed Churches which have retained another form of ecclesiastical government, so neither are they to censure our Church for holding still the ancient regiment of Bishops, purged from the ambitious and superstitious inventions of the Popish prelacy. Let every Church use that form which best fitteth her state: in external matters every Church is free, not one bound to the prescription of another, so they measure themselves by the rule of the word; for if any Church shall seem to prescribe unto another in those things wherein they are left free, that saying of the Apostle may be fitly applied against them, 'Did the word of God spring from you, or came it unto you only?' (1 Cor. xiv. 36.) God may give unto one Church wisdom out of the word, to know what is best for their state, as well as to another. And so I conclude this point, with that saying of St. Augustine to the Donatist Bishops: 'Hold that which you hold: you have your sheep, I have my sheep: be not troublesome to my sheep, I am not troublesome to yours.'† So may we say to our sisters, the Reformed Churches; and they likewise to us: let them hold that government they have; we do not molest them in their course, neither let them molest us in ours." ‡

(5.) It is readily admitted that there was a priority among the Apostles themselves, although they were, in point of jurisdiction and order, equal. And in like manner there may be a priority of office, duty, and oversight, granted to some of the Ministers of Christ in every age, and that in accordance with Scripture. So Peter first openly confessed Christ; therefore he was the first to open the door of faith to the Jews and Gentiles. So James, Cephas, and John were pillars. Paul was the Apostle of the uncircumcision, as Peter was of the circumcision. The same may occur among Christian Ministers. (1 Cor. xii. 28.)

(6.) Though it may be admitted, that to avoid schism, and to promote union, a difference of rank may be allowed in the ministry, yet the princely dominion of the Prelates of the Church of Rome cannot, on the principles of Scripture, be tolerated.

It is contrary to the express declaration of Christ: "And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest. And he said unto them, The Kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve." (Luke xxii. 24—26.) Here our Saviour forbade that there should be any such pre-eminence among ecclesiastical persons, as existed among civil rulers.

St. Peter is expressly against it: "Feed the flock of God which is among you; neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock." (1 Peter v. 2, 3.) And are they not Lords over the flock who challenge to be Princes?

The identity and equality existing between Bishops and Elders in the days of the Apostles, (Acts xx. 17, 28; Titus i. 5, 7; Acts xv. 6,) are at variance with the usage of the Roman Catholic hierarchy.

(7.) If, in the former ages of the Church, the Bishops were in office and dignity superior to Presbyters, there must have been three distinct orders of Clergy; namely, Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons. Whereas only two distinct orders of Clergy were recognised in those times, namely, Presbyters or Bishops, and Deacons. (Phil. i. 1.) St. Paul, in his Epistle to Timothy, mentions only Bishops and Deacons. (1 Tim. iii. 2, 8.) Polycarp, in his Epistle to the Philippians, exhorts, "Be subject to the Presbyters and Deacons, as unto God and Christ;"* and Justin Martyr, in his Apology, says, "After the Bishop gives thanks—those who are called Deacons among us." Thus both Scripture, and the earliest antiquity, make mention only of two grades of church officers; namely, the Pastors, who were called Bishops or Presbyters, and Deacons.

(8.) Patristical testimony is also against the lordly pre-eminence of the Romish Prelates.

The apostolic Fathers, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Clement, represent the churches of their day as being governed by a single Bishop, or Pastor, and a presbytery of Elders and Deacons. It was not lawful for the presbytery to do any thing in the church without the authority of the Bishop, or ruling Presbyter; and the Bishop, or Pastor, could do nothing without the consent and counsel of his presbytery. Many quotations might be given to prove this, without leaving the least room for doubt. Such lofty pretensions and power of jurisdiction as are claimed and exercised by the Bishops of Rome, were utterly unknown to the churches over whom those Fathers presided.

According to Cyprian, the Bishop and Presbyters formerly governed the Church; † while Epiphanius does * Willet's Synopsis Papismi, p. 239. Third edit., fol. London, 1600.

[† "Vos tenete quod tenetis: oves tuas habes, oves meas habeo; noli molestus esse ovibus meis, quia et ego non sum molestus ovibus tuis."—August. Opera, tom. iv. In Psal. xxi. Enarrat. ii., col. 102. Edit. Bened. Fol. Paris, 1681.]

[‡ Willet's Synopsis Papismi, p. 240.]

[* "Ὑποτασσομενους τοις Πρεσβυτεροις και Διακονοις ὡς Θεῳ και Χριστῳ."—S. Polycarp, Epist. ad Phil., sect. iv.]

[† Cypriani Opera, Epist. v., Ad Presbyteros et Diaconos.

not hesitate to assert, that Presbyters are successors of the Apostles.*

The following from Ambrosiaster † is worthy of notice: —"In the beginning it was conceded to all to preach, to baptize, to explain the Scripture: afterward, offices were appointed, so that none of the Clergy would dare to fill an office which he knew was not intrusted or conceded to him." ‡ From this we learn, that much of the distinction of offices in the Church is new, and therefore not of divine right. He says, on 1 Tim. iii., Episcopi et Presbyteri una est ordinatio: "The ordination of a Bishop and Presbyter is the same."

He also says, "In Egypt, Presbyters ordain when a Bishop is not present."§

Speaking of the distinction between Bishops and Presbyters, he observes, that "each is a Priest, but the Bishop is chief; it is necessary that every Bishop should be a Presbyter, not every Presbyter a Bishop." ‖ He then adds, "He is a Bishop who is first among the Presbyters. Timothy, because no one was placed over him, was Bishop." ¶

On Eph. iv., we meet with the following observation: —"At first Presbyters were called Bishops, so that when one died another succeeded him. Because the succeeding Presbyters began to be found unworthy to occupy the primacy, the custom was changed, so that not rank, but merit, obtained the place of a Bishop, who was chosen by the judgment of many Presbyters." **

Jerome, in his comment on Titus i., writes as follows:—"The same, therefore, is a Presbyter and Bishop. Before that, by the instinct of the devil, contentions arose in religion, and it was said by the people, 'I am of Paul, I of Apollos, and I of Cephas;' churches were governed by the common counsel of Presbyters. But after each supposed those whom he baptized to be his own, and not Christ's, it was decreed throughout the whole world that one elected from the Presbyters should preside over the others, to whom all the care of the church belonged; and the seed of schism was by this means taken away. Whoever supposes that it is not the decision of Scripture, but merely my own opinion, that a Bishop and Presbyter is one, and that the one is a name of age, and the other of office, let him read the words of the Apostle, saying to the Philippians, 'Paul and Timotheus, to all the saints in Christ who are at Philippi, with the Bishops and Deacons.' Philippi is one city of Macedonia; and certainly in one city there cannot be many Bishops, such as are now so called. But because, at that time, they termed those Bishops who were also Presbyters, the Apostle speaks indifferently of Bishops, as though they were Presbyters. Besides, we have said these things, that we might show that among the ancients the same persons were Presbyters and Bishops. But, by degrees, that the plants of dissension might be rooted up, the principal charge was conferred on one. As, therefore, Presbyters know that, by the custom of the Church, they are subject to him who was placed over them; so Bishops should know that they, more by the custom of the Church than by the verity of our Lord's appointment, should govern the Church, imitating Moses, who, when he was chosen to preside over the people of Israel, chose seventy persons with whom he might judge the people." *

Jerome, writing to Evagrius or Evangelus, and reproving the rashness of a certain Deacon, who conducted himself insolently against the Presbyters, repeats the arguments for the equality of a Presbyter and Bishop; adding, "But afterward one was elected, who was placed over the others, which was a remedy for schism..... ... For also at Alexandria, from the time of Mark the Evangelist, to the Bishops Heracleas and Dionysius, the Presbyters always nominated one of themselves, and elected him Bishop to be placed in a higher grade; in such manner as if an army should make a General, or the Deacons choose some active individual from among themselves, whom they knew, and should call [* Epiphan. Opera, tom. i., Adversus Hæres, lib. i., Hær. xlii. Fol. Paris, 1622.

[† Ambrosiaster, the nominal author of the Commentary upon St. Paul's thirteen Epistles which are usually joined with St. Ambrose's works, but which have, of late, been ascribed to Hilary, Deacon of Rome. Cave (Hist. Literaria) supposes that the Commentary was written about the year 384. Richard Simon (Hist. Crit. des Commentateurs du Neuf Test., chap. ix., p. 133) is of the same opinion concerning the author of these Commentaries; but the Benedictine editors of St. Ambrose are not so clear upon this point. Hilary was born in Sardinia, and was made Deacon of Rome about the year 354. He is mentioned by Jerome in his Book of Ecclesiastical Writers Pagi contends that he was the author of the Commentaries. Du Pin carefully examines the point; and Tillemont asserts that it is now thought by many that Hilary is the author of the Commentary; although, he says, the opinion is not destitute of difficulties. Dr. A. Clarke observes, there are many powerful reasons for supposing these Commentaries to be the production of some other pen than that of Ambrose; and that many attribute them to Hilary the Deacon. Some have imagined that they were a compilation from various authors, as Chrysostom, Jerome, and others, whose names were unknown; but almost all agree, that neither style of writing, nor manner of interpretation, is such as Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, would use, to whom more spurious productions have been attributed than would be sufficient to blast the fame of a dozen writers. Most probably Hilary, the Deacon, was the compiler and partial author. —See Lardner's Works, vol. iii., p. 26; iv., p. 382. 8vo. edit. London, 1831; and Clarke's Chronological Succession of Ecclesiastical Literature, vol. i., p. 456. 8vo. edit. London, 1830.]

‡ "Inter initia omnibus concessum est et evangelizare, et baptizare, et Scripturas in Ecclesia explanare.—Postea officia sunt ordinata, ut nullus de Clero auderet præsumere officium, quod sciret non sibi creditum vel concessum."—Ambros. Opera, tom. ii.; Comment. in Epist. ad Ephes., cap. iv., col. 504. Fol. Paris, 1661.

§ "Presbyteri in Ægypto consignant, si præsens non sit Episcopus."—Idem.

‖ "Uterque enim Sacerdos est; sed Episcopus primus est; (necessum est,) ut omnis Episcopus Presbyter sit, non omnis Presbyter Episcopus."—Idem, in 1 Tim. iii., col. 577.

¶ "Hic Episcopus est, qui inter Presbyteros primus est. Timothæus, quia ante se alterum non habebat, Episcopus erat."—Idem, ut supra.

 "Primum Presbyteri Episcopi vocabantur, uti, recedente uno, sequens ei succederet. Quia cæperunt sequentes Presbyteri indigni inveniri ad primatus tenendos, immutata est ratio, ita ut non ordo, sed meritum crearet Episcopum, multorum Sacerdotum judicio constitutum."—Idem, in Eph. iv. If the reader will consult Bailly, tom. v., p. 506, he will find several quotations from Ambrosiaster to the same import.

* "Idem est ergo Presbyter qui Episcopus; et antequam diaboli instinctu studia in religione fierent, et diceretur in populis, 'Ego sum Pauli, ego Apollo, ego autem Cephæ,' communi concilio Presbyterorum Ecclesiæ gubernabantur. Postquam vero unusquisque eos quos baptizaverat, suos putabat esse, non Christi, in toto orbe decretum est, ut unus de Presbyteris electus superponeretur cæteris, ad quem omnis Ecclesiæ cura pertineret, et schismatum semina tollerentur. Putat aliquis non Scripturarum, sed nostram esse sententiam, Episcopum et Presbyterum unum esse, et aliud ætatis, aliud esse nomen officii? Relegat Apostoli ad Philippenses verba dicentis, 'Paulus et Timotheus, omnibus sanctis in Christo qui sunt Philippis cum Episcopis et Diaconis.' Philippi una est urbs Macedoniæ; et certe in una civitate plures, ut nuncupantur, Episcopi esse non poterant; sed quia eosdem Episcopos illo tempore quos et Presbyteros appellabant, propterea indifferenter de Episcopis quasi de Presbyteris est loquutus. Hæc propterea diximus, ut ostenderemus apud veteres eosdem fuisse Presbyteros quos et Episcopos: paulatim vero, ut dissensionum plantaria evellerentur, ad unum omnem solicitudinem esse delatam. Sicut ergo Presbyteri sciunt se ex Ecclesiæ consuetudine ei, qui sibi præpositus fuerit, esse subjectos; ita Episcopi noverint se magis consuetudine, quam dispositionis dominicæ veritate debere Ecclesiam regere, imitantes Moisen, qui quum haberet in potestate solus præesse populo Israel, septuaginta elegit cum quibus populum judicaret."—Hieron. Opera, tom. iv., pars i., Comment. in Epist. ad Titum, cap. i. Edit. Bened., fol. Paris, 1706.

him an Archdeacon. For what doth a Bishop which a Presbyter may not do, except ordination?"*

From this we may infer, that a Presbyter and a Bishop are of the same order of Clergy; consequently, Bishops are not elevated above Presbyters to that lordly eminence to which Popish Prelates aspire.

This passage of Jerome is no small stumbling-block in the way of the Roman prelacy. They are completely puzzled to answer, or even to evade its force. Many and various have been their opinions and expositions of this passage. The first is that of Medina, who supposes that not only Jerome, but also Ambrose, Augustine, Sedulius, Primasius, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, and Œcumenius, were heretics for holding such opinions. The second is that of Durandus, Dominicus Soto, Vasquesius, Becan, Maldonat, &c., who maintained that Jerome did not, in this matter, manifest his usual acumen. The third is that of Cellotius, that these parts of Jerome's works were corrupted by the frauds of the heretics, and perhaps of the Arians. The fourth is that of many theologians, who maintain that Jerome wrote in accordance with the doctrines of the Church of Rome. Those of this class make up the want of evidence by lengthy interpretations and confident assertions, as it is too serious a matter to have Jerome, together with the ablest of the ancient Fathers, against them. †

["A full enunciation of the primitive offices is found in Ephesians iv. 11, 12: 'And he gave some, Apostles; and some, Prophets; and some, Evangelists; and some, Pastors and Teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ.' Of these, the office of Apostle is allowed by all to have been confined to those immediately commissioned by Christ to witness the fact of his miracles, and of his resurrection from the dead, and to reveal the complete system of Christian doctrine and duty; confirming their extraordinary mission by miracles wrought by themselves. If by 'Prophets' we are to understand persons who foretold future events, then the office was from its very nature extraordinary, and the gift of prophecy has passed away with the other miraculous endowments of the first age of Christianity. If, with others, we understand that these Prophets were extraordinary Teachers raised up until the churches were settled under permanent qualified instructers; still the office was temporary. The 'Evangelists' are generally understood to be assistants of the Apostles, who acted under their especial authority and direction. Of this number were Timothy and Titus; and as the Apostle Paul directed them to ordain Bishops or Presbyters in the several churches, but gave them no authority to ordain successors to themselves in their particular office as Evangelists, it is clear that the Evangelists must also be reckoned among the number of extraordinary and temporary Ministers suited to the first age of Christianity. Whether by 'Pastors and Teachers' two offices be meant, or one, has been disputed. The change in the mode of expression seems to favour the latter view, and so the text is interpreted by St. Jerome, and St. Augustine; but the point is of little consequence. A Pastor was a Teacher; although every Teacher might not be a Pastor; but in many cases be confined to the office of subordinate instruction, whether as an Expounder of doctrine, a Catechist, or even a more private instructer of those who as yet were unacquainted with the first principles of the Gospel of Christ. The term 'Pastor' implies the duties both of instruction and of government, of feeding and of ruling the flock of Christ; and, as the Presbyters or Bishops were ordained in the several churches, both by the Apostles and Evangelists, and rules are left by St. Paul as to their appointment, there can be no doubt but that these are the 'Pastors' spoken of in the Epistle to the Ephesians, and that they were designed to be the permanent Ministers of the church; and that with them both the government of the church and the performance of its leading religious services were deposited. Deacons had the charge of the gifts and offerings for charitable purposes: although, as appears from Justin Martyr, not in every instance; for he speaks of the weekly oblations as being deposited with the chief Minister, and distributed by him.

["Whether Bishops and Presbyters be designations of the same office, or these appellatives express two distinct sacred orders, is a subject which has been controverted by Episcopalians and Presbyterians with much warmth; and whoever would fully enter into their arguments from Scripture and antiquity, must be referred to this controversy, which is too large to be here more than glanced at. The argument drawn by the Presbyterians from the promiscuous use of these terms in the New Testament, to prove that the same order of Ministers is expressed by them, appears incontrovertible. When St. Paul, for instance, sends for the 'Elders,' or Presbyters, of the Church of Ephesus to meet him at Miletus, he thus charges them: 'Take heed to yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you Overseers,' or Bishops. That here the Elders or Presbyters are called 'Bishops,' cannot be denied, and the very office assigned to them, to 'feed the church of God,' and the injunction, to 'take heed to the flock,' show that the office of Elder or Presbyter is the same as that of 'Pastor' in the passage just quoted from the Epistle to the Ephesians. St. Paul directs Titus to ordain 'Elders (Presbyters) in every city;' and then adds, as a directory of ordination, 'A Bishop must be blameless,' &c., plainly marking the same office by these two convertible appellations. 'Bishops and Deacons' are the only classes of Ministers addressed in the Epistle to the Philippians; and if the Presbyters were not understood to be included under the term 'Bishops,' the omission of any notice of this order of Ministers is not to be accounted for. As the Apostles, when not engaged in their own extraordinary vocation, appear to have filled the office of stated Ministers in those churches in which they occasionally resided for considerable periods of time, they sometimes called themselves Presbyters. 'The Elder (Presbyter) unto the elect lady.' (2 John i. 1.) 'The Elders (Presbyters) which are among you, I exhort, who am also an Elder' (Presbyter); and from what follows, the highest offices of teaching and government of the Church are represented as vested in the Presbyters. 'Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof.' There seems, therefore, to be the most conclusive evidence, from the New Testament, that, after the extraordinary ministry vested in Apostles, Prophets, and Evangelists, as mentioned by St. Paul, had ceased, the feeding and oversight, that is, the teaching and government of the churches devolved upon an order of men indiscriminately called 'Pastors,' 'Presbyters,' and 'Bishops,' the two latter names growing into most frequent use; and with this the testimony of the apostolical Fathers, so far as their writings are acknowledged to be free from later interpolations, agrees.

* "Quod autem postea unus electus est qui cæteris præponeretur, in schismatis remedium factum est.... Nam et Alexandriæ, a Marco Evangelista usque ad Heracleam et Dionysium Episcopos, Presbyteri semper unum ex se electum in excelsiori gradu collocatum Episcopum nominabant, quomodo si exercitus Imperatorem faciat, aut Diaconi eligant de se quem industrium noverint, et Archidiaconum vocent. Quid enim facit, excepta ordinatione, Episcopus quod Presbyter non faciat?"—Idem, tom. iv., pars ii., Epist. ci., alias lxxxv. Fol. Paris, 1706.

[† Vide Bailly, Theol., tom. v.; De Ordine, pars ii., cap. v., sect. iv., pp. 400—417.]

["It is not indeed to be doubted, that, at a very early period, in some instances probably from the time of the Apostles themselves, a distinction arose between Bishops and Presbyters; and the whole strength of the cause of the Episcopalians lies in this fact. Still this gives not the least sanction to the notion of Bishops being a superior order of Ministers to Presbyters, invested, in virtue of that order, and by divine right, with powers of government both over Presbyters and people, and possessing exclusively the authority of ordaining to the sacred offices of the Church. As little, too, will that ancient distinction be found to prove any thing in favour of diocesan Episcopacy, which is of still later introduction.

["Could it be made clear that the power of ordaining to the ministry was given to Bishops to the exclusion of Presbyters, that would indeed go far to prove the former a distinct and superior order of Ministers in their original appointment. But there is no passage in the New Testament which gives this power at all to Bishops, as thus distinguished from Presbyters; whilst all the examples of ordination which it exhibits are confined to Apostles, to Evangelists, or to Presbyters, in conjunction with them.

["The early distinction made between Bishops and Presbyters may be easily accounted for, without allowing this assumed distinction of order. In some of the churches mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, the Apostles ordained several Elders or Presbyters, partly to supply the present need, and to provide for the future increase of believers, as it is observed by Clemens in his Epistle. Another reason would also urge this:—Before the building of spacious edifices for the assemblies of the Christians living in one city, and in its neighbourhood, in common, their meetings for public worship must necessarily have been held in different houses or rooms obtained for the purpose; and to each assembly an Elder would be requisite for the performance of worship. That these Elders or Presbyters had the power of government in the churches cannot be denied, because it is expressly assigned to them in Scripture. It was inherent in their pastoral office; and 'the Elders that rule well' were to be 'counted worthy of double honour.' A number of Elders, therefore, being ordained by the Apostles to one church, gave rise to the cœtus Presbyterorum, in which assembly the affairs of the church were attended to, and measures taken for the spread of the Gospel, by the aid of the common counsel and efforts of the whole. This meeting of Presbyters would naturally lead to the appointment, whether by seniority or by election, of one to preside over the proceedings of this assembly for the sake of order; and to him was given the title of 'Angel of the church,' and 'Bishop' by way of eminence. The latter title came in time to be exclusively used of the presiding Elder, because of that special oversight imposed upon him by his office, and which, as churches were raised up in the neighbourhood of the larger cities, would also naturally be extended over them. Independently of his fellow-Presbyters, however, he did nothing.

["The whole of this arrangement shows that in those particulars in which they were left free by the Scriptures, the primitive Christians adopted that arrangement for the government of the Church which promised to render it most efficient for the maintenance of truth and piety; but they did not at this early period set up that unscriptural distinction of order between Bishops and Presbyters, which obtained afterwards. Hence Jerome, even in the fourth century, contends against this doctrine, and says, that before there were parties in religion, churches were governed communi consilio Presbyterorum; but that afterwards it became a universal practice, founded upon experience of its expediency, that one of the Presbyters should be 'chosen by the rest' to be the head, and that the care of the church should be committed to him. He therefore exhorts Presbyters to remember that they are subject by the custom of the Church to him that presides over them; and reminds Bishops that they are greater than Presbyters, rather by custom than by the 'appointment of the Lord;' and that the Church ought still to be governed in common. The testimony of antiquity also shows, that, after Episcopacy had very greatly advanced its claims, the Presbyters continued to be associated with the Bishop in the management of the affairs of the Church.

["Much light is thrown upon the constitution of the primitive churches, by recollecting that they were formed very much upon the model of the Jewish synagogues. We have already seen that the mode of public worship in the primitive church was taken from the synagogue service, and so also was its arrangement of offices. Each synagogue had its Rulers, Elders, or Presbyters, of whom one was the Angel of the church, or Minister of the synagogue, who superintended the public service, directed those that read the Scriptures, and offered up the prayers, and blessed the people. The President of the Council of Elders or Rulers was called, by way of eminence, the 'Ruler of the synagogue;' and in some places, as Acts xiii. 15, we read of these 'Rulers' in the plural number; a sufficient proof that one was not elevated in order above the rest. The Angel of the church, and the Minister of the synagogue, might be the same as he who was invested with the office of President; or these offices might be held by others of the Elders. Lightfoot, indeed, states that the Rulers in each synagogue were three, whilst the Presbyters or Elders were ten. To this council of grave and wise men, the affairs of the synagogue, both as to worship and discipline, were committed. In the synagogue they sat by themselves in a semicircle, and the people before them, face to face. This was the precise form in which the Bishop and Presbyters used to sit in the primitive churches. The description of the worship of the synagogue by a Jewish Rabbi, and that of the primitive church by early Christian writers, presents an obvious correspondence. 'The Elders,' says Maimonides, 'sit with their faces towards the people, and their backs to the place where the law is deposited; and all the people sit rank before rank; so the faces of all the people are towards the sanctuary, and towards the Elders; and when the Minister of the sanctuary standeth up to prayer, he standeth with his face towards the sanctuary, as do the rest of the people.' In the same order the first Christians sat with their faces towards the Bishops and Presbyters, first to hear the Scriptures read by the proper Reader: 'then,' says Justin Martyr, 'the Reader sitting down, the President of the assembly stands up and makes a sermon of instruction and exhortation; after this is ended, we all stand up to prayers; prayers being concluded, the bread, wine, and water are all brought forth; then the President again praying and praising to his utmost ability, the people testify their consent by saying, Amen.'* 'Here we have the Scriptures read by one appointed for that purpose, as in the synagogue; after which follows the word of exhortation by the President of the assembly, who answers to the Minister of the Synagogue; after this, public prayers are performed by the same person; then the solemn acclamation of Amen by the people, which was the undoubted practice of the synagogue.'† Ordination of Presbyters or Elders is also from the Jews. Their Priests were not ordained, but succeeded to their office by birth; but the Rulers and Elders of the synagogue received ordination by imposition of hands and prayer.

["Such was the model which the Apostles followed in providing for the future regulation of the churches they had raised up. They took it, not from the temple and its priesthood; for that was typical, and was then passing away. But they found in the institution of synagogues a plan admirably adapted to the simplicity and purity of Christianity, one to which some of the first converts in most places were accustomed, and which was capable of being applied to the new dispensation without danger of Judaizing. It secured the assembling of the people on the Sabbath, the reading of the Scriptures, the preaching of sermons, and the offering of public prayer and thanksgiving. It provided, too, for the government of the church by a Council of Presbyters, ordained solemnly to their office by imposition of hands and prayer; and it allowed of that presidency of one Presbyter chosen by the others, which was useful for order and for unity, and by which age, piety, and gifts might preserve their proper influence in the church. The advance from this state of scriptural Episcopacy to Episcopacy under another form, was the work of a later age.

["When the Gospel made its way into towns and villages, the concerns of the Christians in these places naturally fell under the cognizance and direction of the Bishops of the neighbouring cities. Thus diocesses were gradually formed, comprehending districts of country, of different extent. These diocesses were originally called παροικιαι, 'parishes,' and the word διοικησις, 'diocess,' was not used in its modern sense till at least the fourth century; and when we find Ignatius describing it as the duty of a Bishop 'to speak to each member of the church separately, to seek out all by name, even the slaves of both sexes, and to advise every one of the flock in the affair of marriage,' diocesses, as one observes, must have been very limited, or the labour inconceivably great.

["'As Christianity increased and overspread all parts, and especially the cities of the empire, it was found necessary yet farther to enlarge the episcopal office; and as there was commonly a Bishop in every great city, so in the metropolis, (as the Romans called it,) the mother-city of every province, (wherein they had courts of civil judicature,) there was an Archbishop or a Metropolitan, who had ecclesiastical jurisdiction over all the churches within that province. He was superior to all the Bishops within those limits; to him it belonged to ordain or to ratify the elections and ordinations of all the Bishops within his province, insomuch that without his confirmation they were looked upon as null and void. Once at least every year he was to summon the Bishops under him to a Synod, to inquire into and direct the ecclesiastical affairs within that province; to inspect the lives and manners, the opinions and principles, of his Bishops; to admonish, reprove, and suspend them that were disorderly and irregular; if any controversies or contentions happened between any of them, he was to have the hearing and determination of them; and indeed no matter of moment was done within the whole province, without first consulting him in the case. When this office of Metropolitan first began, I find not; only this we are sure of, that the Council of Nice, settling the just rights and privileges of metropolitan Bishops, speaks of them as a thing of ancient date, ushering in the canon with an Αρχαια εθη κρατειτω, Let ancient customs still take place. The original of the institution seems to have been partly to comply with the people's occasions, who oft resorted to the metropolis for dispatch of their affairs, and so might fitly discharge their civil and ecclesiastical both at once; and partly because of the great confluence of people to that city: that the Bishop of it might have pre-eminence above the rest, and the honour of the Church bear some proportion to that of the State.

["'After this sprung up another branch of the episcopal office, as much superior to that of Metropolitans, as theirs was to ordinary Bishops: these were called Primates and Patriarchs, and had jurisdiction over many provinces. For the understanding of this, it is necessary to know, that, when Christianity came to be fully settled in the world, they contrived to model the external government of the Church, as near as might be, to the civil government of the Roman empire: the parallel is most exactly drawn by an ingenious person of our own nation; the sum of it is this:—The whole empire of Rome was divided into thirteen diocesses, (so they called those divisions,) these contained about one hundred and twenty provinces, and every province several cities. Now, as in every city there was a temporal Magistrate for the executing of justice, and keeping the peace, both for that city, and the towns round about it; so was there also a Bishop for spiritual order and government, whose jurisdiction was of like extent and latitude. In every province there was a Proconsul or President, whose seat was usually at the metropolis, or chief city of the province; and hither all inferior cities came for judgment in matters of importance. And in proportion to this there was in the same city an Archbishop or Metropolitan, for matters of ecclesiastical concernment. Lastly, in every diocess the Emperors had their Vicarii or Lieutenants, who dwelt in the principal city of the diocess, where all imperial edicts were published, and from whence they were sent abroad into the several provinces, and where was the chief tribunal where all causes, not determinable elsewhere, were decided. And, to answer this, there was in the same city a Primate, to whom the last determination of all appeals from all the provinces in differences of the Clergy, and the sovereign care of all the diocess for sundry points of spiritual government, did belong. This, in short, is the sum of the account which that learned man gives of this matter. So that the Patriarch, as superior to the Metropolitans, was to have under his jurisdiction not any one single province, but a whole diocess, (in the old Roman notion of that word,) consisting of many provinces. To him belonged the ordination of all the Metropolitans that were under him, as also the summoning them to Councils, the correcting and reforming the misdemeanours they were guilty of; and from his judgment and sentence, in things properly within his cognizance, there lay no appeal. To this I shall only add what Salmasius has noted, that as the diocess that was governed by the Vicarius had many provinces under it, so the Præfectus Prætorio had several diocesses under him: and in proportion to this, probable it was, that Patriarchs were first brought in, who, if not superior to Primates in jurisdiction and power, were yet in honour, by reason of the dignity of those cities where their sees were fixed, as at Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem.' *

["* Apol. 2. ["† Stillingfleet's Irenicum.

[" Thus diocesan Bishops, Metropolitans, Primates, Patriarchs, and, finally, the Pope, came in, which offices are considered as corruptions or improvements; as dictated by the necessities of the Church, or as instances of worldly ambition; as of divine right, or from Satan; according to the different views of those who have written on such subjects. As to them all it may, however, be said, that, so far as they are pleaded for as of divine right, they have no support from the New Testament; and if they are placed upon the only ground on which they can be reasonably discussed, that of necessity and good polity, they must be tried by circumstances, and their claims of authority be so defined that it may be known how far they are compatible with those principles with which the New Testament abounds, although it contains no formal plan of Church government. The only scriptural objection to Episcopacy, as it is understood in modern times, is its assumption of superiority of order, of an exclusive right to govern the Pastors as well as the flock, and to ordain to the Christian ministry. These exclusive powers are by the New Testament nowhere granted to Bishops in distinction from Presbyters. The government of Pastors as well as people was at first in the assembly of Presbyters, who were individually accountable to that ruling body, and that whether they had a President or not. So also as to ordination: it was a right in each, although used by several together, for better security; and even when the presence of a Bishop came to be thought necessary to the validity of ordination, the Presbytery were not excluded.

[" As for the argument from the succession of Bishops from the times of the Apostles, could the fact be made out, it would only trace diocesan Bishops to the Bishops of parishes; those, to the Bishops of single churches; and Bishops of a supposed superior order, to Bishops who never thought themselves more than presiding Presbyters, primi inter pares. This, therefore, would only show that an unscriptural assumption of distinct orders has been made, which that succession, if established, would refute. But the succession itself is imaginary. Even Epiphanius, a Bishop of the fourth century, gives this account of things, 'that the Apostles were not able to settle all things at once. But according to the number of believers, and the qualifications for the different offices which those whom they found appeared to possess, they appointed in some places only a Bishop and Deacons; in others Presbyters and Deacons; in others a Bishop, Presbyters, and Deacons:'—a statement fatal to the argument from succession. As for the pretended catalogues of Bishops of the different churches from the days of the Apostles, exhibited by some ecclesiastical writers, they are filled up by forgeries and inventions of later times. Eusebius, more honest, begins his catalogue with declaring, that it is not easy to say who were the disciples of the Apostles that were appointed to feed the churches which they planted, excepting only those whom we read of in the writings of St. Paul.

[" Whether Episcopacy may not be a matter of prudential regulation, is another question. We think it often may; and that churches are quite at liberty to adopt this mode, provided they maintain St. Jerome's distinction, that 'Bishops are greater than Presbyters rather by custom than by appointment of the Lord, and that still the church ought to be governed in common,' that is, by Bishops and Presbyters united. It was on this ground that Luther placed Episcopacy,—as useful, though not of divine right; it was by admitting this liberty in churches, that Calvin, and other Divines of the Reformed hierarchy, allowed Episcopacy and diocesan churches to be lawful, there being nothing to forbid such an arrangement in Scripture, when placed on the principle of expediency. Some Divines of the English Church have chosen to defend its Episcopacy wholly upon this ground, as alone tenable; and, admitting that it is safest to approach as near as possible to primitive practice, have proposed the restoration of Presbyters as a senate to the Bishop, the contraction of diocesses, the placing of Bishops in all great towns, and the holding of provincial Synods;—thus raising the Presbyters to their original rank, as the Bishop's 'compresbyters,' as Cyprian himself calls them, both in government and in ordinations.

[" As to that kind of Episcopacy which trenches upon no scriptural principle, much depends upon circumstances, and the forms in which Christian churches exist. When a church composes but one congregation, the Minister is unquestionably a scriptural Bishop; but he is, and can be, only Bishop of the flock, Episcopus gregis. Of this kind, it appears from the extract given above from Epiphanius, were some of the primitive churches, existing, probably, in the smaller and more remote places. Where a number of Presbyters were ordained to one church, these would, in their common assembly, have the oversight and government of each other as well as of the people; and, in this their collective capacity, they would be Episcopi gregis et Pastorum. In this manner, Episcopacy, as implying the oversight and government both of Ministers and their flocks, exists in Presbyterian Churches, and in all others, by whatever name they are called, where Ministers are subject to the discipline of assemblies of Ministers who admit to the ministry by joint consent, and censure or remove those who are so appointed. When the ancient presbyteries elected a Bishop, he might remain, as he appears to have done for some time, the mere President of the assembly of Presbyters, and their organ of administration; or be constituted, as afterwards, a distinct governing power, although assisted by the advice of his Presbyters. He was then in person an Episcopus gregis et Pastorum, and his official powers gave rise at length to the unfounded distinction of superior order. But abating this false principle, even diocesan Episcopacy may be considered as in many possible associations of churches throughout a province, or a whole country, as an arrangement in some circumstances of a wise and salutary nature. Nor do the evils which arose in the church of Christ appear so attributable to this form of government as to that too intimate connexion of the Church with the State, which gave to the former a political character, and took it from under the salutary control of public opinion,—an evil greatly increased by the subsequent destruction of religious liberty, and the coercive interferences of the civil Magistrate.

[" At the same time, it may be very well questioned, [" * Cave's Primitive Christianity.

whether any Presbyters could lawfully surrender into the hands of a Bishop their own rights of government and ordination, without that security for their due administration which arises from the accountability of the administrator. That these are rights which it is not imperative upon the individual possessing them to exercise individually, appears to have been the judgment of the earliest antiquity, because the assembly of Presbyters, which was probably co-existent with the ordination of several Presbyters to one church by the Apostles, necessarily placed the exercise of the office of each under the direction and control of all. When therefore a Bishop was chosen by the Presbyters, and invested with the government, and the power of granting orders, so long as the Presbyters remained his Council, and nothing was done but by their concurrence, they were still parties to the mode in which their own powers were exercised, and were justifiable in placing the administration in the hands of one, who was still dependent upon themselves. In this way they probably thought that their own powers might be most efficiently and usefully exercised. Provincial and national Synods or Councils, exercising a proper superintendence over Bishops, when made even more independent of their Presbyters than was the case in the best periods of the primitive church, might also, if meeting frequently and regularly, and as a part of an ecclesiastical system, afford the same security for good administration, and might justify the surrender of the exercise of their powers by the Presbyters. But when that surrender was formerly made, or is at any time made now in the constitution of churches, to Bishops, or to those bearing a similar office, however designated, without security and control, either by making that office temporary and elective, or by the constitution of Synods or assemblies of the Ministers of a large and united body of Christians for the purpose of supreme government, an office is created which has not only no countenance in Scripture, that of a Bishop independent of Presbyters, but one which implies an unlawful surrender of those powers, on the part of the latter, with which they were invested, not for their own sakes, but for the benefit of the Church; and which they could have no authority to divest themselves of and to transfer, without retaining the power of counselling and controlling the party charged with the administration of them. In other words, Presbyters have a right, under proper regulations, to appoint another to administer for them, or to consent to such an arrangement when they find it already existing; but they have no power to divest themselves of these rights and duties absolutely. If these principles be sound, modern Episcopacy in many Churches is objectionable in other respects than as it assumes an unscriptural distinction of order."*]

VII. The question between us and the Church of Rome in this place, is not concerning the titles and dignities annexed to the ministry, such as Bishops, Archdeacons, Deacons, and Provosts, but of the several orders of the ministry; for Bishops and other Ministers do not differ in order, but in office. They hold that there are seven orders, which have their several rites of consecration, and peculiar offices assigned to them. The following arguments are offered against the doctrine of the Church of Rome on this point:—

As for the names and offices of Sub-Deacon, Reader, Exorcist, Acolyte, and Porter, we have no warrant out of Scripture to make them orders of the Church; and therefore, as such, we condemn them. Whatever difference of grade or office is profitable for the Church, is embraced in such distinctions as are expressed by the following passage:—"And he gave some, Apostles; and some, Prophets; and some, Evangelists; and some, Pastors and Teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, and for the edifying of the body of Christ." (Eph. iv. 11, 12.)

These offices are idolatrous, as they are now used in the Romish Church. The Deacons, Sub-Deacons, and Acolytes were to attend on the Priest at mass. Some of them are ridiculous, such as to sweep the church, to drive out dogs, or to hold a fan of peacocks' feathers to prevent the flies falling into the communion cup: and they are distinguished also by ridiculous ornaments, which were proper to each. [The importance which is attached to them by the Papacy appears in the ceremony of deprivation. Andrew Willet informs us, that "when a Priest is degraded, the chalice, paten, and host are taken away, intimating that he has no longer any power to offer sacrifice; his nails are scraped with a piece of glass, to signify his inability to anoint; and, lastly, his priestly ornaments are removed; the chasuble, which signifies charity, and the stole that represented the sign of our Lord. From the Deacons, when degraded, they take, first, the book of the Gospels, with which act the Deacons are deprived of the power of reading the word of God; and afterwards the Dalmatic is taken away, a sign of his Levitical office, and the white stole, from his back, the symbol of innocency. From the Sub-Deacon they take the book of the Epistles, that he should no longer have power to read them, and afterward the empty chalice and his vesture, his office being to serve and to minister to the Deacons at the altar. The Acolytes, who lighted the candles, and brought wine and water to the altar in pitchers and bottles, had taken from them, in the ceremony of degradation, an empty flagon, a candlestick with an extinguished taper. The Exorcist was degraded by depriving him of the power to read in the book of Exorcisms. From the Reader the book of Church Lessons was taken; and from the Ostiarius or Door-keeper were removed the church keys, which deprived him of power to open the doors and to ring the bells."*]

These offices are much degenerated from their use in the ancient Church. The individuals are merely waiters at the celebration of mass, a ceremony which was unknown in primitive Christianity. At that time the Exorcists had the peculiar grace of God to cast out devils: now they read only certain exorcisms in books. Then the Lectors only read the Scripture: now they read legends of saints. Then, in time of persecution, when Christians assembled in the night, the waiters had the charge of lighting candles; but now they light them at noon-day.

These offices have not been in use for many years among them; generally the Sexton or his assistant executes all the duties of the minor orders. Nor are these offices retained among them for any special service, but as preparatory steps to the priesthood.

As it regards the voice of antiquity and of Scripture, it is decidedly opposed to such orders, as they now exist in the Romish Church. ["Damasus, some time Bishop of Rome, says, 'We know but two orders to have been among the disciples of our Lord; namely, twelve Apostles, and seventy disciples.' And it follows, 'Unde iste tertius processerit ignoramus: From whence this third order proceeded, we know not. That which is brought in without reason must be rooted out.' If Damasus disliked a third, much more would he have objected to six or seven new orders; these, however, having been invented without just cause, must, according to the Bishop's rule, be extirpated. What is to be thought of these Popish degrees, the Council of Colen advises:—'It is now come to pass that the four lesser orders of Door-keepers, Exorcists, Psalmists, Readers, beside their name, have no other office in the Church; and in their stead some silly, poor fellows of the lay sort are appointed by the Prelates by a more compendious way.' How, then, call you those 'orders' which have a name, and whereof the laity are capable, as it is now practised in Popery?

[* Watson's Works, vol. xii., pp. 173—183.]

[* Willet's Synopsis Papismi, p. 230.]

["Let us further inquire how these seven Popish orders stand by their law. 'In the Church,' says Honorius, 'there must not be a greater number of orders than the goods or revenues thereof will suffice to maintain.' Few churches are enabled to provide for so many orders; nay, some churches are utterly unable to maintain one poor Vicar; how, then, can so many unnecessary offices be adequately supported? In the canons of the Romish hierarchy, besides the decree of Damasus, to which reference is made above, there is one of Pope Innocent III. 'Sacred orders,' said he, 'we call Deacons and Presbyters, for these two the primitive church is found only to have had;' and, in the same place, Innocent denied that Sub-Deacons were numbered among the sacred orders. Similar words are found in Peter Lombard,* intimating that the primitive church had but two orders, and that the Apostle gave charge concerning no others.

["Respecting these orders in particular: The office of Door-keeper is not at present necessary: it had formerly some use, when the Jews and Gentiles dwelt among the Christians. Claude D'Espence proves, from Chrysostom, that it belonged to the office of Deacon to admit into the church, and to shut out of it. The Master of the Sentences says, that 'Christ took this office upon himself, when he whipped the buyers and sellers out of the temple; and that Christ, when he said, I am the door, showed that he was the door-keeper;'† but if Christ be door-keeper, what reason have they to make it an office in the Church?

["The second degree in orders is that of Reader, which is not a distinct office in the Church; for, in some places, it was the duty of the Deacon, in others of the Minister, whilst, in a few, it belonged to the Bishop to read the Scriptures, and especially on festival days. Peter Lombard says, that Christ fulfilled the office of Reader in his own person, and after he had read in the book, he did interpret and expound it; so that to read the Scripture and to expound it belongs to the same office;‡ and although we deny not but that it is lawful, and many times convenient, for one to read and another to preach, as St. Paul, (Acts xiii. 15,) yet for this cause Papists need not to have brought into the Church a new office composed of Readers only.

["The third degree is that of Exorcists. This miraculous gift has now ceased in the Church, and the bare name and title thereof only remain. The office of exorcising, Chrysostom says, belonged to the Deacons, so that a special office was not required for that service. Origen observes, Judaicum est adjurare dæmonia, 'It was a custom among the Jews to adjure spirits:' it cannot, therefore, be a peculiar office of the Gospel dispensation. Isidore, also, asserts, that it pertained to the Exorcists to examine the fabric and ruins of the church.* So that the Papists themselves are not decided what the office of the Exorcist really was.

["The fourth is the Acolyte. The Master of the Sentences says, that they, in the Old Testament, did show a form of this office, who dressed the lamps in the temple: then it cannot be a calling in the New Testament, inasmuch as it was instituted in the Old. He says, also, that Christ bore this office when he uttered the words, 'I am the light of the world;' and on the same reason, the Apostles were Acolyti, to whom Christ said, 'Ye are the light of the world.'† Who does not see what simple grounds the Romanists have for these superstitious and superfluous offices? These Acolyti, or ministers, or attendants, waited upon the Bishop in his domestic offices, both for greater honour, and to avoid suspicion, they being always witnesses of the actions of the Prelate: which function of the Acolyte Bellarmine said Calvin found out of his own brain; nevertheless the same is alleged by Claude D'Espence out of the Canons.

["Concerning the office of the Sub-Deacon, it is certain that he was employed as letter-carrier to the Bishop, by whom he forwarded his epistles and messages, as Claude D'Espence proves from Cyprian. This was no ecclesiastical function; consequently he was no ecclesiastical officer. The decree of Pope Innocent amply shows that the office of Sub-Deacon in time past was not counted among the sacred orders."‡

[The opinion entertained of these superfluous orders and ridiculous apparel by the holy martyrs, is worthy of notice:—

[We are informed that "when Dr. Rowland Taylor had lain in the Compter, in the Poultry, a seven-night, or thereabouts, prisoner, the 4th of February, A.D. 1555, Edmund Bonner, Bishop of London, with others, came to the said Compter to degrade him, bringing with them such ornaments as do appertain to their massing-mummery. Now, being come, he called for the said Dr. Taylor to be brought unto him; the Bishop being then in the chamber where the keeper of the Compter and his wife lay. So Dr. Taylor was brought down from the chamber above that to the said Bonner. And at his coming, the Bishop said, 'Master Doctor, I would, you would remember yourself, and turn to your Mother, [* "Diaconatus scilicet et presbyteratus: quia hos solos primitiva ecclesia legitur habuisse, et de his solis præceptum Apostoli habemus."—Petri Lombardi, Episc. Paris., Sententiarum lib. iv., Dist. xxiv., sect. i. Colon., 1566.

[† "Hoc officium Dominus in sua persona suscepit quando flagello de funiculis facto vendentes et ementes ejecit de templo. Ipse enim se ostiarium significans dicit, 'Ego sum ostium; per me si quis introierit, salvabitur, et ingredietur et egredietur, et pascua inveniet.'"—Idem, ibid.

[‡ "Hoc officium implevit Christus, cum in medio seniorum librum Esaiæ aperiens, distincte ad intelligendum legit: 'Spiritus Domini super me,' &c. Ex quo lectoribus datur intelligi, quia gratia spirituali clarere debent, qui aliis verbum Dei annunciant. Hic ordo formam et initium a Prophetis accepisse videtur: quibus dicitur, 'Clama, ne cesses: quasi tuba exalta vocem tuam.'"—Idem, ibid.

[* "Nullam aliam curam habebant actores templi, nisi ad sarta tecta reficienda; ut quæcumque fuissent vexata in ædificio templi aut delapsa, per eosdem actores de thesauris dominicis reficerentur, atque excolerentur."—Isidor. Oper., De Offic. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. xiii. De Exorcistis, p. 602, fol. Paris, 1601.

[† "Hoc officium Dominus se habere testatur dicens, Ego sum lux mundi; qui sequitur me, non ambulat in tenebris. Hujus officii formam illi gerebant in Veteri Testamento, qui lucernas candelabri componebant, et accendebant igne cœlesti, ad illuminandas tenebras aquilonares."—Petri Lombard., Sent., lib. iv., Dist. 24.

[‡ See Willet's Synopsis Papismi, pp. 231, 232.

holy Church; so may you do well enough, and I will sue for your pardon.' Whereunto Master Taylor answered, 'I would you and your fellows would turn to Christ. As for me, I will not turn to antichrist.' 'Well,' quoth the Bishop, 'I am come to degrade you; wherefore put on these vestures.' 'No,' quoth Dr. Taylor; 'I will not.' 'Wilt thou not?' said the Bishop: 'I shall make thee, ere I go.' Quoth Dr. Taylor, 'You shall not, by the grace of God.' Then he charged him upon his obedience to do it; but he would not do it for him; so he willed another to put them upon his back. And when he was thoroughly furnished therewith, he set his hands to his side, walking up and down, and said, 'How say you, my Lord? am not I a goodly fool? How say you, my masters? If I were in Cheap, should I not have boys enough to laugh at these apish toys, and toying trumpery?' So the Bishop scraped his fingers, thumbs, and the crown of his head, and did the rest of such like devilish observances." *

[Dr. Ridley, Bishop of London, it is said, "would have reasoned with Dr. Brooks, Bishop of Gloucester, of the Bishop of Rome's authority, but could not be suffered; and yet he spake so earnestly against the Pope therein, that the Bishop told him, if he would not hold his peace, he should be compelled against his will. 'And seeing,' saith he, 'that you will not receive the Queen's mercy, now offered unto you, but stubbornly refuse the same, we must, against our wills, proceed, according to our commission, to degrading, taking from you the dignity of priesthood. For we take you for no Bishop, and therefore we will the sooner have done with you. So, committing you to the secular power, you know what doth follow.'

["RIDLEY.—'Do with me as it shall please God to suffer you; I am well content to abide the same, with all my heart.'

["GLOUCESTER.—'Put off your cap, Master Ridley, and put upon you this surplice.'

["RIDLEY.—'Not I, truly.'

["GLOUCESTER.—'But you must.'

["RIDLEY.—'I will not.'

["GLOUCESTER.—'You must therefore make no more ado, but put this surplice upon you.'

["RIDLEY.—'Truly, if it come upon me, it shall be against my will.'

["GLOUCESTER.—'Will you not do it upon you?'

["RIDLEY.—'No; that I will not.'

["GLOUCESTER.—'It shall be put upon you by one or other.'

["RIDLEY.—'Do therein as it shall please you; I am well contented with that, and more than that; the servant is not above his Master. If they dealt so cruelly with our Saviour Christ, as the Scripture maketh mention, and he suffered the same patiently, how much more doth it become us his servants!'

["And in saying of these words, they put upon the said Dr. Ridley the surplice, with all the trinkets appertaining to the mass. And as they were putting on the same, Dr. Ridley did vehemently inveigh against the Romish Bishop, and all that foolish apparel, calling him antichrist, and the apparel foolish and abominable; yea, too fond for a vice in a play; insomuch that Bishop Brooks was exceeding angry with him, and bade him hold his peace, for he did but rail. Dr. Ridley answered him again, and said, so long as his tongue and breath would suffer him, he would speak against their abominable doings, whatsoever happened unto him for so doing.

["GLOUCESTER.—'Well, you were best to hold your peace, lest your mouth be stopped.' At which words one Edridge, the Reader then of the Greek lecture, standing by, said to Dr. Brooks, 'Sir, the law is, he should be gagged; therefore let him be gagged.' At which words Dr. Ridley, looking earnestly upon him that so said, wagged his head at him, and made no answer again; but, with a sigh, said, 'O, well, well, well!' So they proceeded in their doings; yet nevertheless Dr. Ridley was ever talking things not pleasant to their ears, although one or other bade him hold his peace, lest he should be caused against his will. When they came to that place where Dr. Ridley should hold the chalice and the wafer-cake, called the 'singing-bread,' they bade him hold the same in his hands. And Dr. Ridley said, 'They shall not come in my hands; for, if they do, they shall fall to the ground for all me.' Then there was one appointed to hold them in his hand, while Bishop Brooks read a certain thing in Latin, touching the degradation of spiritual persons according to the Pope's law. Afterward they put a book in his hand, and withal read (as is before said) a certain thing in Latin, the effect whereof was, 'We do take from you the office of preaching the Gospel,' &c. At which words Dr. Ridley gave a great sigh, looking up towards heaven, saying, 'O Lord God, forgive them this their wickedness!' And as they put upon him the mass-gear, so they began with the uppermost garment, in taking it away again, reading a thing in Latin, according to the order contained in the said book of the Pope's law. Now when all was taken from him, saving only the surplice left on his back, as they were reading and taking it away, Dr. Ridley said unto them, 'Lord God, what power be you of that you can take from a man that which he never had! I was never singer in all my life, and yet you will take from me that which I never had." *

[When the Popish authorities came to take away the pall from Dr. Thomas Cranmer, which is the solemn vesture of an Archbishop, he said, "'Which of you hath a pall, to take off my pall?' which imputed as much as they, being his inferiors, could not degrade him. Whereunto one of them said, in that they were but Bishops they were his inferiors, and not competent judges; but, being the Pope's delegates, they might take his pall. And so they did; and, so proceeding, took every thing in order from him, as it was put on. Then a barber clipped his hair round about, and the Bishop scraped the tops of his fingers where he had been anointed, wherein Bishop Bonner behaved himself as roughly and unmannerly as the other Bishop was to him soft and gentle. Whilst they were thus doing, 'All this,' quoth the Archbishop, 'needed not; I had myself done with this gear long ago.' Last of all, they stripped him out of his gown into his jacket, and put upon him a poor yeoman beadle's gown, full bare, and nearly worn, and as evil favouredly made, as one might lightly see, and a townsman's cap on his head, and so delivered him to the secular power." †]

VIII. A few remarks may be proper here, to show that orders is not a sacrament.

1. They assert that orders confer grace; in support of which the following passage of Scripture has been quoted:—"Neglect not the gift which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery." (1 Tim. iv. 14.) Answer. It cannot be proved from this place that imposition of hands giveth grace: this was an extraordinary gift of which St. Paul here speaks, and which does not always follow the imposition of hands: for all on whom hands were laid received not the Holy Ghost. Besides, imposition of hands in ministerial appointment is very different from a similar ceremony in conferring extraordinary spiritual qualifications. In the appointment to the ministry, hands were laid on persons because they had the grace of the Holy Spirit already, as was the case with the seven Deacons, who were required to be "men full of faith and of the Holy Ghost," that they might lawfully be set apart to their deaconship by the laying on of hands. The grace which Timothy had seems to have been of this description. But if it were an extraordinary gift, received by the imposition of hands, then it was not a ministerial endowment, properly so called.

[* Foxe's Ecclesiasticall Historie, vol. iii., p. 174. Fol. London, 1631.

[* Idem, p. 500. [† Idem, p. 665.]

2. They say, "The deaconship is a sacrament, because it is given by imposition of hands." At least, this is one of the arguments which Papists employ to prove its sacramental character. If so, then it must follow that children, on whom hands were laid, received a sacrament; which is absurd. Ananias, a disciple or private Christian, laid hands on Paul, and he received his sight. The giving of sight must have been a sacrament, because it was administered by laying on of hands; which is another absurdity.

3. Another reason given for the sacramental character of orders is, that they cannot be reiterated. If this argument be of any weight, it may with equal propriety be said that the creation or the deluge are sacraments, because they cannot be repeated.

4. According to the Roman Catholic mode of reasoning, there must be as many as seven sacraments in the various grades of their Clergy, to which might be added as many more as they have rites and ceremonies in their Church; which would be truly ridiculous.

5. Sacraments, as Romanists allow, must have their institution from Christ. But this is not true of many of their orders. In the old law there were Priests and Levites only. Our Lord instituted only Apostles and disciples. Presbyters or Bishops, and Deacons, were introduced by the Apostles, who had no power to constitute new sacraments. The Apostles acknowledged only two ministerial offices, one of the word, and another of tables: therefore there can only be two orders of Ministers; namely, the Pastors and Deacons. There is no sacrament of the New Testament which has not for its authority some precept or example of Christ.

6. This sacrament of orders hath neither outward element nor words of institution. Imposition of hands is not an outward sign; because the outward sign in a sacrament must not only be an external action, but a material element; as water, for example, in baptism, and bread and wine in the supper of our Lord.

7. Our Saviour, when he ordained his Apostles, used no imposition of hands: therefore orders given by this act cannot be a sacrament, because it has not been instituted by Christ. The ministry of the word is his ordinance, but no sacrament.

8. Many Roman Catholics deny altogether that the inferior degrees are orders of Clergy.

IX. The matter and form.

1. We have already observed, when treating on the presbyterate, that there were four opinions concerning its matter and form. But respecting these when applied to the seven orders, contradictory opinions multiply. The following seven are enumerated by a celebrated Roman Catholic theologian. In a preliminary remark he says, "The question here is not concerning the matter and form of each separate order, but of the sacrament of order, or as far as it respects the three hierarchical orders instituted by Christ; namely, the episcopate, presbyterate, and deaconship. But the dispute is especially concerning the imposition of hands, the reaching of the instruments, and concerning the words which correspond to the rites.

"The first is the opinion of certain Doctors of the Canon Law, who, considering ordination as confined to no fixed rite, or formula, believe that a Bishop or Presbyter can be made by the following words of the Pope alone: 'Be thou a Bishop,' 'Be thou a Presbyter.'

"The second is that of those who contend that Christ did not institute the matter and form of orders, or of the other sacraments, especially, but that he granted to the Church the power of determining, according to her judgment, those rites that were proper for sacramental effect." * According to this opinion, it is obvious, that the matter of orders may vary in order to suit different times and places; and that the imposition of hands, which alone is of use in the oriental Churches, would be sufficient to consecrate Presbyters among them, but that the reaching or handing of the instruments is necessarily joined to imposition of hands among the Latins. And when the Church, according to this sentiment, hath the power of determining the matter of the sacraments, the oriental Church, without the consent of the Latin, and the Latin without the consent of the Greek Church, might choose the matter for itself.

"The third opinion is, that no matter or form is sufficient for ordination, unless the consent of the Church is obtained. Hence it results, that ordination, though complete in all other parts, for want of the approbation of the Church becomes null and void." Such were the sentiments of Father Courayer, in his Dissertation on the Ordination of the Church of England. Habertus held similar views.

"The fourth teaches, that the matter of ordination was instituted by Christ; but that one form was for the west, and committed to Peter, consisting of anointing and reaching of the instruments; but the other was for the use of the east, and was committed to Paul, and consisted in imposition of hands." This was the sentiment of Harduin, and contained in his Succession of English Bishops, against the doctrines of Father Courayer.

[* "Quæstio non eo loco de materia et forma singulorum ordinum, de quibus in secunda parte hujus tractatus opportunior erit dicendi locus; sed de materia et forma sacramenti ordinis, seu quatenus tribus solummodo competit ordinibus hierarchicis a Christo institutis, nimirum episcopatui, presbyteratui, et diaconatui. Præsertim vero disputatur de manuum impositione et instrumentorum porrectione, necnon de verbis quæ ritibus illis correspondent.

["Prima sententia quorumdam est maleferiatorum in jure canonico Doctorum, qui ordinationem nulli fixo ritui nullique verborum formulæ illigatam existimantes, crediderunt episcopatum vel presbyteratum solis istis posse fieri Papæ verbis: 'Esto Episcopus,' 'Esto Presbyter.' Error iste abunde confutatus manet in tractatu de sacramentis in genere, ubi ostendimus sacramenta omnia perfici rebus tanquam materia, et verbis tanquam forma.

["Secunda sententia eorum est qui contendunt Christum ordinationis, non secus ac quorumdam aliorum sacramentorum, materiam et formam generatim duntaxat instituisse, Ecclesiæ vero potestatem fecisse ritus ad effectum sacramentalem idoneos pro judicio suo determinandi."—Bailly, Theolog., tom. v., De Ordine, pars i., cap. iv., De Materia et Forma Sacramenti Ordinis.]

"The fifth is that of those who consider both the imposition of hands and the reaching of the instruments to constitute the matter; but the form consists of the prayers corresponding to the actions. But these do not explain the thing in the same way: for some distinguish imposition of hands from that action by which the instruments are reached, but others confound them. Some suppose the reaching of the instruments to be instituted by Christ; but others are of the opinion, that this was introduced, not by Christ, but by the Church, according to the power conceded to her.

"The sixth opinion, for the essential matter of ordination, acknowledges only the reaching of the instruments, and for the form, the words corresponding to them.

"The seventh places the matter in the imposition of hands only, and that the prayer alone is its form. But the reaching out of the instruments, with the corresponding words, is an accidental rite." *

Thus in three orders there are seven distinct opinions concerning the matter and form. According to this proportion, were the four other orders as fruitful in producing diversity of sentiment, the number of distinct opinions respecting the form and manner of the seven orders would not be less than sixteen; and this on a point which they esteem by no means unimportant. Indeed, the form and matter of ordination are among the leading topics on which they unchurch Protestants, and claim for themselves a direct succession from Christ and his Apostles.

2. Some Roman Catholics hold imposition of hands to be non-essential or accidental: among these is to be found Dominicus a Soto. Others affirm it to be essential; as Petrus a Soto, Hosius, Bellarmine, &c. To those of the latter class, we reply,—

That it is a comely and decent ceremony, but it is not of the essence of ordination, so that if the rite were dispensed with, there could be no ordination. For when Matthias was selected to be an Apostle, he was not chosen by imposition of hands, but by lot. Our Lord did not use this ceremony in ordaining or appointing the Apostles. In the decree of Eugenius, or of the Florentine Council, there is no mention made of the imposition of hands, but the matter is the delivering of the instruments, such as of the chalice with wine, and of the paten with bread, in ordaining a Presbyter. And how can imposition of hands be a necessary part of ordination, when this ceremony is not used in conferring the minor orders?

3. According to Scripture, the proper qualification of the person to be ordained is the chief point. The Deacons, whose original office was to serve tables, were required to be "men of good report, full of faith and the Holy Ghost." St. Paul, also, declares, respecting Elders or Bishops, that they must be "blameless, apt to teach," &c., &c. Indeed, no one is eligible for ordination without ministerial qualifications; nor ought any one to be ordained who is destitute of them.

X. The Minister of ordination.

The Romanists maintain that their Bishops are the only persons who ought to ordain Ministers; and that those who are ordained by Presbyters, or by Protestant Bishops, receive an invalid ordination.

1. Should we be disposed to admit, that ordination by Bishops alone is valid, there would be some difficulty for the Papists to show, that their Bishops are the true Bishops of Christ. Cannot Protestant Bishops claim more than equal ministerial qualifications, and are they not, therefore, in possession of claims superior to Popish Prelates, whose doctrines are unsound, and whose attainments are comparatively insignificant?

2. But it cannot be admitted that there are no Ministers but those who have received Episcopal ordination. Every Church has power in itself to ordain Ministers in such order and after such manner as are consistent with the word of God. It is the common judgment of the Reformed Churches,* that each community is not bound to follow

[* "Tertia sententia est Haberti, in opere cui titulus, Origines Ecclesiasticæ, cap. xx., qui contendit nullam materiam nec formam ad ordinationem sufficere nisi accesserit Ecclesiæ consensus; unde vult ordinationem numeris omnibus absolutam defectu approbationis Ecclesiæ nullam ac irritam fieri posse: huic systemati suffragatur P. le Courayer, pars ii., Dissert. de Validitate Ordinat. Anglic., cap. xv.

["Quarta sententia fuit Harduini, viri omni sensu singularis, qui in Dissertatione de Successione Episcoporum Anglic., contra P. le Courayer, docet ordinationis materiam a Christo institutam fuisse, aliam quidem ad usum occidentis, quæ Petro tradita sit, videlicet chrismationem et instrumentorum porrectionem; aliam vero ad usum orientis, quæ data sit Paulo post manuum impositionem. Idem censet scriptor ille de forma materiæ illius sacramenti correspondente.

["Quinta sententia eorum est qui manuum impositionem simul et porrectionem instrumentorum ordinationis materiam esse volunt; formam vero orationes utrique illi actioni correspondentes: isti vero non eodem modo rem explicant. Quidam enim manuum impositionem distinguunt ab ipsa actione qua porriguntur instrumenta; alii vero confundunt: alii porrectionem instrumentorum a Christo institutam esse existimant; alii autem non a Christo sed ab Ecclesia, juxta potestatem ei concessam, invectam esse opinantur.

["Sexta sententia pro essentiali ordinationis materia solam agnoscit instrumentorum porrectionem, ac pro forma voces iis correspondentes.

["Septima tandem sententia statuit solam manuum impositionem ordinationis esse materiam, solamque orationem esse illius formam; instrumentorum vero porrectio cum verbis correspondentibus, in ea opinione, ritus est accidentalis, vel ad summum integrans, quo significantius exprimitur illius sacramenti effectus."—Bailly, Theolog., tom. v., De Ordine, pars i., cap. iv., De Materia et Forma Sacramenti Ordinis.]

[* "It is not true as Bellarmine says, that there are no Ministers but by the ordination of Bishops; for this were to condemn all those Reformed Churches of Helvetia, Belgia, Geneva, with others, that have not received this form of ecclesiastical government. Undoubtedly where godly Bishops are, there no ordination is to be had without them, as in the Church of England: but every church having not the same office, but others equivalent or correspondent thereunto, hath full authority in itself, to ordain Ministers in such order and manner, as the church hath received, agreeably to the word of God; so that we doubt not, but that all the Reformed Churches professing the Gospel, have true and lawful Ministers, though they observe not all the same manner in the election and ordaining of them. And this is the general consent of the Churches themselves.

["Harm., sect. ii., Helvetic Confess. latter. 'Let the Ministers of the Church be called and chosen, by a lawful and ecclesiastical vocation or election; that is to say, let them be religiously chosen of the Church, or of those which thereunto are appointed of the Church, and that in due order.'

["Helvetic Confess. prior, art. xvi. 'They must be chosen either by the divine sentence of God, or by the certain and advised suffrage of the Church, or by their sentence to whom the Church hath assigned this charge.'

["Confess. Bohem., cap. ix. 'They must be proved and tried by examination, and so afterward, prayer and fasting being made, they may be confirmed or approved by the Elders, by laying on of hands.'

["Confess. Gallic., art. xxxi. 'Every one ought to be admitted thereunto by a lawful election, so near as may be; and as long as the Lord giveth leave, &c. Nevertheless, howsoever it be, we believe that this rule is always to be followed, that all Pastors and Elders should have a testimony of their calling.'

["Confess. Anglican. 'We say, that the Minister ought lawfully, duly, and orderly to be preferred to that office of the church of God.'

["Confess. Belgic. 'We believe, that the Ministers, Seniors, Deacons, ought to be called to those their functions, by the lawful election of the Church; to be advanced to those offices, earnest prayer being made unto God, and after the order and manner which is set down unto us in the word of God.'

["Confess. Scotic., p. 22. 'We affirm lawful Ministers to be only the same manner of ordination of Ministers, provided only that the form used be agreeable to the word of God. According to this rule, every Church may employ that plan which is most suited to their state and condition. Our arguments for this are the following:—

(1.) Certain Prophets and Teachers laid hands on Paul and Barnabas at Antioch, when sent on a peculiar embassy to preach the Gospel; there being no other officers in the Church at Antioch of higher grade than Prophets and Teachers, though these were inferior to that of an Apostle. So, in other Churches, those who are lawfully appointed to ordain, are the proper persons to discharge that duty in behalf of the Church, whether they are called Presbyters or Bishops, or by any other designation.

(2.) If it were not so, the following inconsistencies would inevitably accrue; namely, (i.) That all the Reformed Churches had no true Ministers, being without episcopal ordination. (ii.) That either they must be denied to be true Churches, or else a true Church without the right power of ordination; which is absurd.

(3.) The form or manner of ordination was not uniform in the days of the Apostles. They were appointed by Christ, without imposition of hands. Matthias was chosen by lot. Timothy was ordained by the presbytery. There were also other varieties; but these examples are sufficient to prove the point.

(4.) That every Church is left at liberty in this, their own canons bear testimony. Augustine declares, that there is no better discipline than for a man to do as he seeth the Church with which he is associated do.

(5.) Timothy was ordained by the presbytery, or priesthood, as the Rhemist translators render the passage. (1 Tim. iv. 14.)

(6.) The same was the practice of the Greek Church on the ordination of Origen, on which occasion many Bishops and Priests were gathered together.

(7.) The African Church, assembled at the fourth Council of Carthage, (cap. xxii.,) decreed as follows:—"A Bishop must not ordain a Clerk, without an assembly and Council of the Clergy."

(8.) The Presbyters who are present with the Bishop lay their hands on the person to be ordained. This proves that Presbyters take part in ordination.

(9.) In conferring minor orders, Presbyters, by the permission of the Church, ordain. If they can lawfully do so in one case, there is no reason why they might not exercise the same power in conferring other orders.

XI. The effects of orders.

1. Some say the effects of orders are three, as Dens;* namely, sanctifying grace, sacramental grace, and character. Others make the effects to be only two; that is, grace and character.

The following is the explanation which the Catechism gives:—"The sacrament of orders imparts grace to him who receives it with proper dispositions, which qualifies and enables him to discharge with fidelity the duties which it imposes; and among which is to be numbered the administration of the sacraments. As baptism qualifies for their reception, so orders qualify for their administration. Orders also confer another grace, which is a special power in reference to the holy eucharist; a power full and perfect in the Priest, who alone can consecrate the body and blood of our Lord, but in the subordinate Ministers, greater or less in proportion to their approximation to the sacred mysteries of the altar. This power is also denominated a spiritual character, which, by a certain interior mark impressed on the soul, distinguishes the ecclesiastic from the rest of the faithful, and devotes them especially to the divine service."*

There are two points especially in reference to orders, in which there is great difference between the Papists and us: the one respects the grace bestowed, or rather the manner or means by which it is given; the other has reference to the character impressed.

2. Respecting the sacramental grace, Romanists teach, that the Holy Ghost is given to all on whom hands are laid. The Council of Trent declares, that by orders the Holy Ghost is actually bestowed, when the words are pronounced, "Receive the Holy Ghost." "If any one shall say, that by sacred ordination the Holy Ghost is not given, and that the Bishop says in vain, 'Receive the Holy Ghost;' let him be anathema."† While we readily admit, that since God gives to each according to his necessities, so he also vouchsafes his grace and his Holy Spirit to Ministers in such a manner and to such a degree as both their personal salvation and their important functions may demand. But, that the Holy Spirit is confined to the mere act of ordination, so that it accompanies the rite of imposition of hands, we cannot allow, because:—

(1.) What need is there of examination and trial, of which St. Paul speaks, if the laying on of hands can make men true Ministers? (1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6.)

(2.) In the case of the seven first Deacons, they had received the Holy Spirit before hands were imposed on them. For they were "men of good report, and full of faith and the Holy Ghost." (Acts vi.)

(3.) Contradictory doctrines are taught on this point. For instance, the Council of Trent declares, as quoted above, that the Holy Spirit is given to all who are duly ordained; whereas the Catechism teaches, that this sacrament confers grace only on those who are properly disposed.

(4.) Such a doctrine as connects the gift of the Spirit with the exercise of an external rite, is to be viewed rather as a charm or spell, than a means of grace.

(5.) It is the error which was committed by Simon Magus, and condemned by the Apostle. He desired to have the gift of laying his hands on whomsoever he chose, that they might receive the Holy Ghost. (Acts viii. 19.)

3. The indelible character. The Council of Trent‡

they that are appointed to the preaching of the word, &c.; they being men lawfully chosen thereto by some Church.'

["This, then, is the judgment of the Reformed Churches, that every church is not tied to the same manner of ordination of Ministers, so that it be agreeable to the word of God; but, according to this rule, every church may make choice of that form and order, which is most agreeable to their state; so that where the calling of Bishops is received, by them Ministers must enter."—Willet, Synopsis Papismi, pp. 724, 725.]

[* "Quinam sunt effectus sacramenti ordinis?—R. 1. Gratia sanctificans per se secunda, seu gratiæ sanctificantis augmentum, cum sit sacramentum vivorum; per accidens etiam prima, ut ostenditur in Tractatu de Sacram. in genere. 2. Gratiæ sacramentales seu actuales fini sacramenti subservientes, suo tempore dandæ, ad ordinis munia rite decenterque obeunda. 3. Character, quem S. Thom., Supplem., quæst. xxxiv., art. ii., ad. 2, vocat effectum ordinis principalem. Ratione hujus characteris sacramentum ordinis initerabile est, et potestas ordinis inamissibilis, adeo ut Sacerdos excommunicatus vel degradatus valide consecret."—Dens Theolog., tom. vii., De Ordine, No. 10, De Effectu Sacramenti Ordinis.]

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, p. 323.

† "Si quis dixerit, per sacram ordinationem non dari Spiritum Sanctum, ac proinde frustra Episcopos dicere, 'Accipe Spiritum Sanctum;' anathema sit."—Decret. et Can. Con. Triden., sess. xxiii., can. 4.

‡ Idem.

asserts, that by orders a character is impressed; so that he who was once a Priest can never become a laic. Dens says that "character is the principal effect of ordination; because order principally supposes power; not so with baptism. According to the nature of character the sacrament of orders is initerable, and the power of conferring orders is inamissible; so that an excommunicated or degraded Priest can validly consecrate others..... * Order always impresses a character whenever such order is validly received; but it does not confer grace unless to those who are rightly disposed." †

We present the following extracts from Bailly:—"The sacrament of order impresses a character, in consequence of which it cannot be reiterated." ‡ "It is certain, that the character impressed in ordination remains in the wicked, Simoniacs, degraded persons, also in those who, after ordination, fall into heresy or schism, because character is indelible." § Our author then proceeds to support the following proposition:—"Ordinations conferred according to the rite instituted by Christ, are valid, though performed by Bishops who are heretics, schismatics, degraded, deposed, excommunicated, intruded, invaders, Simoniacs, in one word, by any wicked person." ‖ Those who would peruse an elaborate defence of the ministrations of such as are enumerated in the foregoing proposition, ought to consult this author. Suffice it to say, that Bailly occupies not less than twenty-five octavo pages to prove the validity of those ordinations which have been conferred by the most abandoned of the human race.

On the dogma of the indelible character, very little need be said to convince the reader that it is heretical in doctrine, immoral in practice, unscriptural, and contrary to the usage of the purest and best ages of Christianity.

(1.) It is contrary to Scripture. Judas, by transgression, fell from or forfeited his bishopric. St. Paul says a Bishop or Pastor must be blameless. The wicked are forbidden to minister in holy things.

(2.) The immoral tendency of this doctrine on the lives of the Clergy needs no comment.

(3.) Like Priest like people. Those who are taught by such apostates from truth and righteousness, will soon learn all manner of wickedness, instead of receiving instruction in righteousness.

(4.) Innumerable proofs could be drawn from antiquity, to show that immoral and heterodox Ministers have ever been rejected, and expelled from the church of God.

(5.) Numerous testimonies might be brought from the writings of pious Roman Catholics, to show that, though they may virtually hold the doctrine in question, principles are taught which entirely overturn the doctrine itself. It were an easy task to array the Church of Rome against her own tenets.

* Dens Theol., tom. vii.; De Ordine, No. 10. Vide supra.

[† "Sed an omnis ordo, qui sacramenti rationem habet, prædictos effectus causat in omni subjecto, quod ordinem valide suscipit?—R. Characterem semper imprimit, quandocumque talis ordo valide suscipitur; gratiam vero non confert nisi rite dispositis."—Dens Theol., tom. vii., De Ordine, No. 10, De Effectu Sacramenti Ordinis.]

[‡ "Sacramentum ordinis characterem imprimit quo fit ut sacramentum illud non possit iterari."—Bailly, Theol., tom. v., De Ordine, pars i., cap. viii., De Effectibus Ordinationis.]

[§ "Certum est characterem in ordinatione impressum remanere in improbis, Simoniacis, degradatis, necnon iis qui post ordinationem in hæresim vel schisma prolapsi sunt, quia nimirum ille est indelebilis."—Idem.]

[‖ "Validæ sunt ordinationes secundum ritum a Christo institutum factæ ab Episcopis hæreticis, schismaticis, degradatis, depositis, excommunicatis, intrusis, invasoribus, Simoniacis, uno verbo, improbis omnibus."—Idem.]

XII. The ceremonies of orders.

They anoint the hands of such as are ordained with oil. They also shave the top of the head, and thus form the tonsure; and the higher the degree of priesthood, the larger the tonsure that is required.

As it regards the superstitious custom of anointing, it is a Jewish rite, and unsuitable to the ministry of Christ. It is enough to say, that this practice is without authority from Scripture, and has no example in primitive Christianity.

Shaving the crown is worse than a Jewish ceremony: it seems to have been taken from the Heathen. The Jews were forbidden to shave or make themselves bald. It was even a sign of greater holiness not to suffer a razor to come upon their heads, as may be seen in the law of the Nazarites.

Optatus reproveth the Donatists, who were addicted to this custom. "Show where it is commanded you to shave the heads of Priests; whereas, on the contrary, there are so many examples furnished to show that it ought not to be." *

[We shall conclude this section with a full description of the various rites and ceremonies pertaining to the degradation of all orders and degrees in the Romish Church, Archbishops, Priests, Deacons, Sub-Deacons, &c., taken from the Pontificale Romanum.†

[" THE FORM OF DEGRADING AN ARCHBISHOP.

[" Imprimis, In publico extra ecclesiam paretur aliquis eminens locus congruentis spatii, pro degradatione fienda.

[" Item, Supra eundem ordinetur una credentia simplici tobalea co-operta.

[" Item, Supra eandem credentiam ponantur ampulla vini et ampulla aquæ.

[" Item, Liber Evangeliorum, liber epistolarum, liber exorcismorum, liber lectionum, antiphonarium.

[" Item, Bacile cum baculo et mantili.

[" Item, Unum candelabrum cum candela extincta.

[" Item, Claves, forfices, cultellus seu petia vitri.‡

[" Item, Calix cum patina.

[" Paramenta pro Degradando.

[" Superpellicium, sandalia cum caligis, amictus, alba, cingulum, manipulus, tunicella, stola, Dalmatica, chirothecæ, alia stola, planeta, mitra, annulus Pontificalis, pallium, baculus Pastoralis, et aliqua vestis habitus secularis.

[" Item, Paretur faldistorium pro Pontifice degradatore.

[" Item, Sedilia pro officialibus.

[" Item, Adsint ministri Pontificis.

[" Item, Judex secularis, cui degradatus committatur

[" Item, Notarius qui processum degradationis legat, si opus erit, vel Episcopo degradatori placuerit.

[" Item, Barbitonsor.

[" Item, Hora convenienti degradandus, habitu suo

* "Docete ubi vobis mandatum est radere capita Sacerdotum, cum e contra sint tot exempla proposita fieri non deberi."—Optatus, Lib. contra Parmenion.

[† "All the process, though with some slight variation, will be found, accompanied by illustrative annotation, in the Pontificale Romanum; nunc primum commentariis illustratum, auct. Jos. Catalano, (Romæ, 1740,) vol. iii., pp. 146—164. Among other editions one was printed at Venice in 1520, and another at Rome in 1595; these two have afforded the means of correcting a few trifling errors in the Forms of Degradation following."

[‡ "'Cultellus, aut vitrum,' is the reading in the edition of 1595."

quotidiano indutus, super dictum locum adducatur, et a Clericis induatur omnibus paramentis sui ordinis.

[" Item, Eo sic induto, Pontifex degradator indutus amictu, alba, cingulo, stola, et pluviali rubeis, ac mitra simplici, baculum Pastoralem in sinistra manu tenens, ascendet ad locum prædictum, et ibidem sedebit in faldistorio, in convenienti loco sibi parato, versus ad populum, astante sibi judice seculari.

[" Tunc degradandus omnibus sui ordinis vestibus sacris indutus et singulis ornamentis ornatus, habens in manibus ornamentum ad ordinem suum spectans, ac si deberet in suo officio ministrare, adducitur ante Pontificem, coram quo genu flectit.

[" Tunc Pontifex degradator (sedens ut supra) populo in vulgari notificat degradationis hujusmodi causam.

[" Deinde contra degradandum sententiam fert in hæc verba, si hujusmodi sententia lata non sit:

[" ' In nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, Amen. Quia nos N. Dei et Apostolicæ sedis gratia Episcopus,' &c.

[" Degradatio ab Ordine Archiepiscopali.

[" Primo, Pallium degradator aufert a degradando, dicendo: ' Prærogativa pontificalis dignitatis, quæ in pallio designatur, te eximimus, quia male usus es ea.'

[" Secundo, Mitram aufert a degradando, dicendo: ' Mitra, pontificalis dignitatis, videlicet, ornatu, quia eam male præsidendo fœdasti, tuum caput denudamus.'

[" Tertio, Librum Evangeliorum a degradandi manibus aufert, dicendo: ' Redde Evangelium, quia prædicandi officio, quo, spreta Dei gratia, te indignum fecisti, te juste privamus.'

[" Quarto, Annulum aufert de digito degradandi, dicendo: ' Annulum, fidei scilicet signaculum, tibi digne subtrahimus, quia ipsam sponsam Dei ecclesiam temere violasti.'

[" Quinto, Baculo pastorali per unum de ministris in manus degradandi tradito, illum aufert degradator, dicendo: ' Auferimus a te baculum pastoralem, ut perinde correctionis officium, quod turbasti, non valeas exercere.'

[" Sexto, Chirothecis per ministros extractis degradator abradit degradandi pollices et manus leviter cum cultello aut vitro, dicendo: ' Sic spiritualis benedictionis, et delibutionis mysticæ gratia, quantum in nobis est, te privamus, ut sanctificandi et benedicendi perdas officium et effectum.'

[" Septimo, Caput degradandi cum eodem cultello aut vitro abradit degradator leniter, dicendo: ' Consecrationem et benedictionem ac unctionem tibi traditam radendo delemus, et te ab ordine Pontificali, cui inhabilis es redditus, abdicamus.'

[" Tum degradandi per ministros extrahuntur sandalia.

[" DEGRADATIO AB ORDINE PRESBYTERATUS.

[" Calice cum vino et aqua et patina et hostia per ministros in manus degradandi traditis, degradator aufert potestatem celebrandi, dicens: ' Amovemus a te, quin potius amotam esse ostendimus, potestatem offerendi Deo sacrificium, missamque celebrandi, tam pro vivis quam pro defunctis.'

[" Pollices et manus abraduntur sub hac forma: ' Potestatem sacrificandi et benedicendi, quam in unctione manuum et pollicum recepisti, tibi tollimus hac rasura.'

[" Casulam sive planetam per posteriorem partem captivi accipit degradator, et degradandum exuit, dicens: ' Veste sacerdotali charitatem signante te merito expoliamus, quia ipsum et omnem innocentiam exuisti.'

[" Quarto, Stolam aufert, dicens: ' Signum Domini per hanc stolam signatum turpiter abjecisti: ideoque ipsam a te amovemus, quem inhabilem reddimus ad omne sacerdotale officium exercendum.'

[" DEGRADATIO AB ORDINE DIACONATUS.

[" 1. Libro Evangeliorum degradandi in manus per Ministros tradito, degradator aufert librum, dicens: ' Amovemus a te potestatem legendi Evangelium in ecclesia Dei, quia id non competit, nisi dignis.

[" 2. Dalmaticam aufert, dicens: ' Levitico ordine te privamus, quia tuum in eo ministerium non implevisti.'

[" 3. Stolam auferens de humeris degradandi degradator projicit eam post tergum, dicens: ' Stolam candidam, quam acceperas immaculatam in conspectu Domini perferendam, quia non sic cognito mysterio exemplum conversationis tuæ fidelibus præbuisti, ut plebs dicata Christi nomini possit exinde imitationem acquirere, juste a te amovemus, omne Diaconatus officium tibi prohibentes.'

[" DEGRADATIO AB ORDINE SUB-DIACONATUS.

[" 1. Epistolarum libro degradandi in manum tradito, degradator eundem aufert, dicens: ' Auferimus tibi potestatem legendi Epistolam in ecclesia Dei, quia hoc ministerio indignus es redditus.'

[" 2. Tunicella aufertur, dicendo: ' Tunica Sub-Diaconali te exuimus, cujus cor et corpus timor Domini castus et sanctus in æternum permanens non constrinxit.'

[" 3. Manipulum aufert, dicendo: ' Depone manipulum, quia per fructus bonorum operum, quos designat, non expugnasti spiritualis insidias inimici.'

[" 4. Amictus aufertur sub hac forma: ' Quia vocem tuam non castigasti, ideo amictum a te auferimus.'

[" 5. Urceolis cum vino et aqua et bacili cum manutergio degradando traditis, ea aufert Archidiaconus. (Et nihil dicit.)

[" 6. Calicem vacuum cum patina traditum in manus degradandi aufert degradator, dicendo: ' Potestatem introeundi sacrarium, tangendi pallas, vasa, et alia indumenta sacra, omneque Sub-Diaconatus ministerium exercendi a te amovemus.' Deinde ministri exuunt degradando cingulum, albam, et amictam.

[" DEGRADATIO AB ORDINE ACOLYTATUS.

[" Urceolum vacuum in manus degradandi traditum aufert degradator, dicens: ' Immunde, vinum et aquam ad eucharistiam de cætero non ministres.'

[" Candelabrum cum cereo extincto degradator accipit de manibus degradandi, dicens: ' Dimitte præferendi visibile lumen officium, qui præbere spirituale moribus neglexisti, ac universum Acolytatus officium hic depone.'

[" DEGRADATIO AB ORDINE EXORCISTATUS.

[" Librum Exorcismorum aufert Pontifex degradator, dicens: ' Privamus te potestate imponendi manum super energumenos, et dæmones de obsessis corporibus expellendi, omni tibi Exorcistatus officio interdicto.'

[" DEGRADATIO AB ORDINE LECTORATUS.

[" Librum Lectionum aufert Pontifex degradator, dicens: ' In ecclesia Dei non legas ulterius, neque cantes, neque panes aut fructus novos ullatenus benedicas, quia tuum officium non implevisti fideliter et devote.'

[" DEGRADATIO AB ORDINE OSTIARIATUS.

[" Claves ecclesiæ aufert Pontifex degradator, dicens: ' Quia in clavibus errasti, claves dimitte, et quia ostia cordis tui male dæmonibus obserasti, amovemus a te offi-cium Ostiarii, ut non percutias cymbalum, non aperias ecclesiam, non sacrarium, non librum amplius prædicanti.'

["DEGRADATIO A PRIMA TONSURA.

["Superpellicium degradando extrahit Pontifex degrador, dicens: 'Auctoritate Dei omnipotentis, Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, ac qua fungimur in hac parte, tibi auferimus habitum Clericalem, et nudamus te religionis ornatu, atque deponimus, degradamus, spoliamus, et exuimus te omni ordine, beneficio, et privilegio Clericali, et velut Clericalis professionis indignum redigimus te in servitutem et ignominiam habitus secularis ac status.'*

["Tum (cum) forficibus tondere incipiat Pontifex degradator, et per barbitonsorem ibidem præsentem totaliter tonderi faciat caput degradandi, dicens: 'Te velut ingratum filium a sorte Domini, ad quam vocatus fueras, abjicimus, et coronam tui capitis (regale quidem signum Sacerdotii) de tuo capite amovemus, propter tui regiminis pravitatem.'

["Deinde, si velit Pontifex, dicat: 'Quod ore cantasti corde non credidisti, nec opere implevisti, ideo cantandi officium in ecclesia Dei a te amovemus.'

["Tum ministri Pontificis exuunt degradatum veste, et habitu Clericali, et ipsum induunt habitum secularem.

["Si degradatus tradi debeat curiæ seculari,

["Pontifex degradator degradatum amplius non tangit, sed in hunc modum (contra ipsum) pronunciat, dicens: 'Pronunciamus, ut hunc exutum omni ordine ac privilegio Clericali curia secularis in suum forum recipiat.'

["Rogat† judicem secularem ut citra mortis periculum, &c.: 'Domine judex, rogamus vos cum omni affectu quo possumus, ut amore Dei, pietatis, et misericordiæ intuitu, et nostrorum interventu precaminum, miserrimo huic nullum mortis vel mutilationis periculum inferatis.'"‡]

CHAPTER XVI.

MATRIMONY.

I. THE DOCTRINE STATED. 1. Council of Trent cited: 2. The doctrines embraced in it. Other authorities noticed.—II. ITS SACRAMENTAL CHARACTER CONSIDERED. 1. Not supported by Eph. v. 32: 2. Arguments proving it to be no sacrament: 3. Not instituted by Christ.—III. IMPEDIMENTS DISSOLVING MARRIAGE. 1. The Church of Rome annuls Scripture impediments, and adds new ones: 2. Their prohibition of marriage considered. —IV. OF THE VALIDITY AND INVALIDITY OF MARRIAGE. 1. Distinctions made by their Divines: 2. Marriage of heretics, or Protestants: 3. The matrimony of two Catholics by a Protestant held invalid: 4. Marriage of Catholics with Protestants considered lawful when the non-Catholic promises to become a Catholic, and when the children are educated Catholics: 5. Dispensations of the Pope. One granted to Henry VIII. Consequences to the Church of Rome, &c.

I. Statement of the doctrine.

1. The Council of Trent, at its twenty-fourth session, held November 11th, 1563, took up the subject of matrimony, and, having explained their views of this institution, present us with twelve canons, enforced by numerous anathemas. Certain enactments accompany this decree, purporting to provide for the "reformation of matrimony." In the observations of the Council, preceding the decree, occasion is taken to refer to the institution of marriage at the creation; its recognition by Christ, and its establishment as a sacrament.

["The first parent of the human race, inspired by the divine Spirit, pronounced the bond of marriage to be perpetual and indissoluble, when he said, 'This now is bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh; wherefore a man shall leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall be two in one flesh.' (Gen. ii. 23, 24.)

["Christ our Lord hath expressly taught that two persons only can be joined together, and united in this bond. Having quoted the last-mentioned words, as proceeding from God, he said, 'Therefore now they are not two, but one flesh:' and immediately afterwards he confirmed the durability of the connexion, as it had been so long before declared by Adam, by adding, 'What therefore God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.' (Matt. xix. 5, 6.)

["Christ also, who hath instituted and perfected the venerable sacraments, hath, by his passion, merited the grace which gives perfection to natural love, confirms the indissoluble union, and sanctifies those who are united: which the Apostle Paul intimated, when he said, 'Husbands, love your wives, as Christ also loved the church, and delivered himself for it;' presently adding, 'This is a great sacrament: but I speak in Christ and in the church.' (Eph. v. 25, 32.)

["Since, therefore, under the Gospel, matrimony excels the nuptials of the ancients, because of the grace received through Christ, our holy Fathers, the Councils, and the universal tradition of the Church have always taught that it is deservedly reckoned among the sacraments of the new law. Against which doctrine impious men have raved in these times, not only indulging wrongful thoughts respecting this venerable sacrament, but also, according to their manner, introducing liberty of the flesh under cover of the Gospel, and writing and speaking much that is contrary to the sentiments of the Catholic Church, and the approved customs that are derived from the apostolic era,—greatly to the peril of the faithful in Christ. Therefore this holy and universal Council, desiring to prevent such rashness, hath determined to destroy the infamous heresies and errors of the before-named schismatics, lest many more should be infected by their destructive contagion; for which cause the following anathemas are decreed against these heretics and their errors."]

These are the canons containing the anathemas, to which the Council refers:—

"Canon 1. Whoever shall affirm, that matrimony is not truly and properly one of the seven sacraments of the evangelical law, instituted by Christ our Lord, but that it is a human invention, introduced into the Church, and does not confer grace; let him be accursed.

"2. Whoever shall affirm, that Christians may have more wives than one, and that this is prohibited by no divine law; let him be accursed.

"3. Whoever shall affirm, that only those degrees of consanguinity or affinity which are mentioned in the Book of Leviticus can hinder or disannul the marriage contract; and that the Church has no power to dispense with some of them, or to constitute additional hinder-

[* "The secular state is ignominious, and disdained by the proud Clergy!"

[† "The introductory sentences throughout are abridged by Foxe; but the following is too characteristic to be so dismissed:—'Tum Pontifex degradator efficaciter, et ex corde, omni instantia, pro miserrimo illo derelicto intercedit apud judicem sæcularem, ut citra mortis periculum vel mutilationis contra degradatum sententiam moderetur, dicens: Domine judex,' &c. Pontificale Ven., 1520, p. 203."]

[‡ Foxe's Acts and Monuments, vol. viii., pp. 77—79. 8vo. edit. London, 1839.]

ances or reasons for disannulling the contract; let him be accursed.

"4. Whoever shall affirm, that the Church cannot constitute any impediments, with power to disannul matrimony, or that in constituting them she has erred; let him be accursed.

"5. Whoever shall affirm, that the marriage bond may be dissolved by heresy, or mutual dislike, or voluntary absence from the husband or wife; let him be accursed.

"6. Whoever shall affirm, that a marriage solemnized but not consummated is not disannulled, if one of the parties enters into a religious order; let him be accursed.

"7. Whoever shall affirm, that the Church has erred in teaching, according to the evangelical and apostolic doctrine, that the marriage bond cannot be dissolved by the adultery of one of the parties, and that neither of them, not even the innocent party, who has given no occasion for the adultery, can contract another marriage while the other party lives; and that the husband who puts away his adulterous wife, and marries another, commits adultery, and also the wife who puts away her adulterous husband, and marries another; (whoever shall affirm, that the Church has erred in maintaining these sentiments;) let him be accursed.

"8. Whoever shall affirm, that the Church has erred in decreeing, that for various reasons married persons may be separated, as far as regards actual cohabitation, either for a certain or an uncertain time; let him be accursed.

"9. Whoever shall affirm, that persons in holy orders, or regulars, who have made a solemn profession of chastity, may contract marriage, and that the contract is valid, notwithstanding any ecclesiastical law or vow; and that to maintain the contrary is nothing less than to condemn marriage; and that all persons may marry who feel, that though they should make a vow of chastity, they have not the gift thereof; let him be accursed; for God does not deny his gifts to those who ask aright, neither does he suffer us to be tempted above that we are able.

"10. Whoever shall affirm, that the conjugal state is to be preferred to a life of virginity, or celibacy, and that it is not better and more conducive to happiness to remain in virginity, or celibacy, than to be married; let him be accursed.

"11. Whoever shall affirm, that to prohibit the solemnization of marriage at certain seasons of the year is a tyrannical superstition, borrowed from the superstition of the Pagans; or shall condemn the benedictions, and other ceremonies, used by the Church at those times; let him be accursed.

"12. Whoever shall affirm, that matrimonial causes do not belong to the ecclesiastical judges; let him be accursed."*

2. From the foregoing canons we collect the following doctrines; namely,—

(1.) That matrimony is a sacrament, instituted by Christ, and confers grace.

(2.) That the Church can add to, or subtract from, the degrees of consanguinity mentioned in Leviticus; and constitute any impediments, with power to annul matrimony.

(3.) Marriage solemnized, but not consummated, is annulled, if either of the parties enter into religious orders.

(4.) The marriage bond cannot be dissolved by the adultery of one of the parties.

(5.) The Church can decree that married persons may be separated, as far as regards actual cohabitation, either for a certain or an uncertain time.

[* "Doctrina de sacramento matrimonii. Matrimonii perpetuum indissolubilemque nexum primus humani generis parens divini Spiritus instinctu pronuntiavit, cum dixit: 'Hoc nunc os ex ossibus meis, et caro de carne mea: quamobrem relinquet homo patrem suum et matrem, et adhærebit uxori suæ, et erunt duo in carne una.'

["Hoc autem vinculo duos tantummodo copulari et conjungi, Christus Dominus apertius docuit, cum postrema illa verba, tanquam a Deo prolata, referens dixit: 'Itaque jam non sunt duo, sed una caro:' statimque ejusdem nexus firmitatem, ab Adamo tanto ante pronunciatam, his verbis confirmavit: 'Quod ergo Deus conjunxit homo non separet.'

["Gratiam vero, quæ naturalem illum amorem perficeret, et indissolubilem unitatem confirmaret, conjugesque sanctificaret, ipse Christus, venerabilium sacramentorum institutor atque perfector, sua nobis passione promeruit, quod Paulus Apostolus innuit, dicens: 'Viri, diligite uxores vestras, sicut Christus dilexit ecclesiam et seipsum tradidit pro ea:' mox subjungens: 'Sacramentum hoc magnum est: ego autem dico in Christo, et in ecclesia.'

["Cum igitur matrimonium in lege Evangelica veteribus connubiis per Christi gratiam præstet; merito inter novæ legis sacramenta annumerandum, sancti Patres nostri, Concilia, et universalis Ecclesiæ traditio semper docuerunt: adversus quam impii homines hujus sæculi insanientes, non solum perperam de hoc venerabili sacramento senserunt; sed, de more suo, prætextu Evangelii, libertatem carnis introducentes, multa ab Ecclesiæ Catholicæ sensu, et ab Apostolorum temporibus probata consuetudine aliena, scripto et verbo asseruerunt, non sine magna Christi fidelium jactura: quorum temeritati sancta et universalis Synodus cupiens occurrere, insigniores prædictorum schismaticorum hæreses, et errores, ne plures ad se trahat perniciosa eorum contagio, exterminandos duxit, hos in ipsos hæreticos eorumque errores decernens anathematismos."]

"Canon 1. Si quis dixerit, matrimonium non esse vere et proprie unum ex septem legis evangelicæ sacramentis a Christo Domino institutum, sed ab hominibus in Ecclesia inventum; neque gratiam conferre; anathema sit.

"2. Si quis dixerit, licere Christianis plures simul habere uxores, et hoc nulla lege divina esse prohibitum; anathema sit.

"3. Si quis dixerit, eos tantum consanguinitatis et affinitatis gradus, qui Levitico exprimuntur, posse impedire matrimonium comprehendum, et dirimere contractum; nec posse Ecclesiam in nonnullis illorum dispensare, aut constituere ut plures impediant, et dirimant; anathema sit.

"4. Si quis dixerit, Ecclesiam non potuisse constituere impedimenta matrimonium dirimentia, vel in iis constituendis errasse; anathema sit.

"5. Si quis dixerit, propter hæresim, aut molestam cohabitationem, aut affectatam absentiam a conjuge, dissolvi posse matrimonii vinculum; anathema sit.

"6. Si quis dixerit, matrimonium ratum, non consummatum, per solennem religionis professionem alterius conjugum non dirimi; anathema sit.

"7. Si quis dixerit, Ecclesiam errare, cum docuit, et docet, juxta evangelicam et apostolicam doctrinam, propter adulterium alterius conjugum matrimonii vinculum non posse dissolvi; et utrumque, vel etiam innocentem, qui causam adulterio non dedit, non posse, altero conjuge vivente, aliud matrimonium contrahere; mœcharique eum, qui dimissa adultera aliam duxerit, et eam, quæ, dimisso adultero, alii nupserit; anathema sit.

"8. Si quis dixerit, Ecclesiam errare cum ob multas causas separationem inter conjuges, quoad torum seu quoad cohabitationem, ad certum incertumve tempus fieri posse decernit; anathema sit.

"9. Si quis dixerit, clericos in sacris ordinibus constitutos, vel regulares, castitatem solenniter professos, posse matrimonium contrahere, contractumque validum esse, non obstante lege ecclesiastica vel voto; et oppositum nil aliud esse, quam damnare matrimonium; posseque omnes contrahere matrimonium, qui non sentiunt se castitatis, etiam si eam voverint, habere donum; anathema sit: cum Deus id recte petentibus non deneget, nec patiatur nos supra id quod possumus tentari.

"10. Si quis dixerit, statum conjugalem anteponendum esse statui virginitatis, vel cœlibatus, et non esse melius ac beatius manere in virginitate aut cœlibatu, quam jungi matrimonio; anathema sit.

"11. Si quis dixerit, prohibitionem solennitatis nuptiarum certis anni temporibus superstitionem esse tyrannicam, ab ethnicorum superstitione profectam; aut benedictiones, et alias cæremonias, quibus Ecclesia in illis utitur, damnaverit; anathema sit.

"12. Si quis dixerit, causas matrimoniales non spectare ad judices ecclesiasticos; anathema sit."—Can. et Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. 24; De Sacram. Matrimonii. Fol. Romæ, 1564.

(6.) Persons in holy orders cannot contract marriage.

(7.) A life of virginity, or celibacy, is to be preferred to the married life.

(8.) Marriage is to be celebrated at certain periods of the year. Benedictions and other ceremonies are to be used.

(9.) Matrimonial causes belong to the ecclesiastical judges.

Certain enactments accompanied this decree, by which clandestine marriages were condemned, and ancient canons renewed, enjoining the public solemnization of the ceremony, after due notice, and in the presence of witnesses. The parties are exhorted to confess, and receive the eucharist, three days before the marriage. One sponsor only of each sex is allowed in baptism and confirmation, in order to lessen the inconvenience arising from spiritual affinity. Marriage, within the prohibited degrees, if wilfully contracted, is punished, without hope of dispensation. And it was enacted, that dispensations should be very rarely given, and in the second degree not at all, unless to great Princes, and for public and special reasons. Excommunication is threatened against those who keep concubines, unless, after having been thrice admonished by the Ordinary, they put them away.

In many most important points respecting marriage, Protestants and Roman Catholics agree. Yet when the Church of Rome advances matrimony to a sacrament, instituted by Christ, and endows it with sacramental qualities, there are several points of considerable importance to Christianity in which we and the Church of Rome disagree.

II. As to the sacramental character of matrimony, Romanists assert, that it is a sacrament, instituted by Christ, and confers grace.

["That marriage is a sacrament," says the Catechism of the Council of Trent, "has been at all times held by the Church as a certain and well-ascertained truth; and in this she is supported by the authority of the Apostle in his Epistle to the Ephesians: 'Husbands,' says he, 'should love their wives, as their own bodies: he who loveth his wife, loveth himself, for no one ever hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as Christ doth the church; for we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones. For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall be two in one flesh. This is a great sacrament; but I speak in Christ, and in the church.' When the Apostle says, 'This is a great sacrament,' he means, no doubt, to designate marriage; as if he had said: The conjugal union between man and wife, of which God is the author, is a sacrament, that is, a sacred sign of the holy union that subsists between Christ and his church. That this is the true meaning of his words is shown by the holy Fathers who have interpreted the passage; and the Council of Trent has given to it the same interpretation. The husband, therefore, is evidently compared by the Apostle to Christ, the wife, to the church; 'the man is head of the woman, as Christ is of the church;' and hence, the husband should love his wife, and again, the wife should love and respect her husband; for 'Christ loved his church, and gave himself for her;' and the church, as the same Apostle teaches, is subject to Christ.

["That this sacrament signifies and confers grace, and in this the nature of a sacrament principally consists, we learn from these words of the Council of Trent: 'The grace which perfects that natural love, and confirms that indissoluble union, Christ himself, the author and finisher of the sacraments, has merited for us by his passion.' The faithful are therefore to be taught, that, united in the bonds of mutual love, the husband and wife are enabled, by the grace of this sacrament, to repose in each other's affections; to reject every criminal attachment; to repel every inclination to unlawful intercourse; and in every thing to preserve 'marriage honourable, and the bed undefiled.'"*

[In the Abridgment of Christian Doctrine, an elementary theological work of great authority and repute among the Romanists, we meet with the following:—

["Q. What is the seventh sacrament?—A. Matrimony. Q. Where was matrimony first ordained?—A. In Paradise, by Almighty God, when he gave Eve as wife to Adam, who presently said, 'Therefore a man shall leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be two in one flesh.' (Gen. ii. 22—24.) Q. Where was it made a sacrament of the new law?—A. When and where Christ instituted this sacrament is uncertain. Some think it done, or at least insinuated, at the wedding in Cana in Galilee, where Christ was present, and wrought his first miracle, by turning water into wine. (St. John ii.) Others, more probably say, it was done when Christ declared the indissolubility of marriage, saying, 'Therefore now, they are not two but one flesh: that therefore which God hath joined together, let no man separate.' (Matt. xix. 6.)

["Q. Why was it necessary that marriage should be made a sacrament?—A. Because it is a contract whereon depends the chief happiness of a married life; as being ordained for the restraint of sinful concupiscence, the good of posterity, the well-ordering our domestic affairs, and the education of our children in the fear and service of God, and therefore ought to be ranked in the highest order of those actions which Christ has sanctified for the use of man. Q. How prove you marriage to be a sacrament?—A. Because, as you have heard, it is a conjunction made and sanctified by God himself, and not to be dissolved by any power of man. Q. What other proof have you?—A. Out of Eph. v. 31, 32: 'They shall be two in one flesh; this is a great sacrament. But I speak in Christ and in the church.' Q. What is the matter of this sacrament?—A. The mutual consent of the parties, and giving themselves to one another. Q. What are the effects of matrimony?—A. It gives special grace to the married couple, to love and bear one with another; as also to bring up their children in the fear of God."†

[In the Catechism of the Most Reverend Dr. James Butler we read: "Q. What is matrimony?—A. A sacrament which gives grace to the husband and wife to live happy together, and to bring up their children in the fear and love of God. (Matt. xix. 6.) Q. Do they receive the grace of the sacrament of matrimony who contract marriage in the state of mortal sin?—A. No. They are guilty of a very great sacrilege, by profaning so great a sacrament; and instead of a blessing they receive their condemnation. (Eph. v. 32.) Q. What should persons do to receive worthily the sacrament of marriage?—A. They must make a good confession, and earnestly beseech God to grant them a pure intention; and to direct them in the choice they are to make."‡

[* Catechism of the Council of Trent, pp. 331, 332.

[† Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine, with Proofs of Scripture for Points controverted; by way of Question and Answer. Permissu Superiorum. Belfast, 1833.

[‡ The Most Rev. Dr. James Butler's Catechism, revised, enlarged, approved, and recommended by the four Roman Catholic Archbishops of Ireland, as a general Catechism for the Kingdom. P. 56. Cork, 1839.

["Q. What is marriage or matrimony?—A. It is an indissoluble union, contracted by mutual consent, between one man and one woman, in a lawful manner, by which they are obliged to live together, all the days of their life. It may be considered in three different states: 1. As a 'natural contract,' conformable to the natural desire of mankind for propagating the human species, and gives the married party a mutual right to each other's bodies, according to that of the Scripture, 'The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband; and, in like manner, the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife.' (1 Cor. vii. 4.) God himself is the author of this contract, and at the beginning of the world he created both the sexes, male and female, on purpose to be united in it for the propagation of mankind; thus Christ himself says, 'He who made man in the beginning, made them male and female; wherefore, they are no more two, but one flesh.' (Matt. xix. 4, 5.)

["2. As 'a civil contract;' for, upon the multiplication on the earth, they formed themselves into larger societies, of many families joined in one body, for their mutual protection and defence, and for securing to individuals the undisturbed possession of their property. For this purpose it was necessary to make proper laws and regulations, by which this security might be obtained. And as nothing contributes more to the good of the state, and the public tranquillity, than to have the natural contract of marriage properly regulated, with regard to the temporal goods and privileges, both of the married couple themselves, and of their children, proper laws were made by the different states for settling these matters. In this view, marriage is 'a civil contract,' made according to the laws of the country where the parties dwell, with regard to their temporal concerns, as members of the community.

["3. As 'a sacrament of the new law.' The great end of the Christian religion is, to lead men to heaven, which pre-supposes the existence of men upon earth; and, as marriage is the natural source from which mankind draw their being upon earth, it was necessary that such measures should be taken with respect to marriage among Christians, as to make it conducive to that great end of the Christian religion, the salvation of souls. The trials and afflictions which accompany the marriage state, and that 'tribulation of the flesh,' which St. Paul declares shall be the portion of married people, (1 Cor. vii. 28,) are too often, from the corruption of the heart of man, an occasion of the ruin of their souls; the difficulty of avoiding this ruin is not a little increased from the indissolubility of marriage, which our blessed Saviour restored to its original firmness among his followers; and the necessity of bringing up their children not only as men, or as good citizens, but as good Christians, so as one day to become saints in heaven, which Jesus Christ requires, in the strictest manner, of all his followers, lays an additional duty upon Christian parents, which requires a particular grace and assistance from heaven to enable them to perform. For these reasons, our blessed Saviour was pleased to elevate the natural contract of marriage to the dignity of a sacrament among Christians, so as to annex a particular grace to the lawful celebration of this contract, by which the married people are enabled to bear in a Christian manner all the tribulations incident to that state, to preserve a mutual love and fidelity to one another, as the indissolubility of the bond of marriage requires, and to bring up their children in a Christian manner. Q. Is the marriage of Christians a true sacrament?—A. It is; and has all the three things necessary to make it such. Q. What is the outward sensible sign used in marriage?—A. It is the mutual consent of the parties, expressed by words, or other signs, under those conditions which the laws of God and his church require. Q. What is the inward grace received?—A. It is first an increase of sanctifying grace, and, secondly, the sacramental grace proper to marriage; by which the parties are enabled to perform all its duties as above explained. Q. Where do we find this laid down in the holy Scripture?—A. When the Pharisees put the question to our Saviour, 'Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for any cause?' he declared in his answer, that marriage, at the beginning, was instituted by God himself: and though, from the hardness of their heart, it had very much declined from its original sanctity, he then restored it to its primitive state, by saying, 'Wherefore, they are no more two, but one flesh; what therefore God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.' (Matt. xix. 6.) And St. Paul, repeating the same truth, adds, 'This is a great sacrament; but I speak in Christ and in the church.' (Eph. v. 32.) In which words he shows, that, in the church of Christ, marriage is a great sacrament; and not only a sign of the union and love which is required among Christians in that state, but also of the union and love which subsists inviolably betwixt Christ and his church.

["Q. Wherein does the essence of marriage properly consist?—A. In that sacred bond and union between husband and wife, by which they are no longer considered as two distinct persons, but as two joined together in one flesh: 'For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they two shall be one flesh.' (Matt. xix. 5.)"*

[Joseph Mumford the Jesuit, writing on the sacrament of matrimony, observes: "When our Lord had built the rib which he took of Adam into a woman, and brought her to Adam, Adam said: 'This now is the flesh of my flesh: wherefore a man shall leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall be one flesh.' (Gen. ii. 22.) In the New Testament, our Saviour repeats those words, and hence inferreth: 'Therefore they are not two, but one flesh.' (Matt. xix. 5; Mark x. 7.) Then of himself he adds, 'That therefore which God hath joined together, let not man separate.' Now St. Paul, repeating part of our Saviour's words here cited, saith, 'This is a great mystery, (we read sacrament,) but I speak in Christ and in the church.' (Eph. v. 31.) Although St. Paul applieth here the very name of 'sacrament' to matrimony, which name is not once, in all Scripture, applied to any of the other sacraments; yet it is not from hence we infer matrimony to be a sacrament; for by that word, in this place, we know he only means 'a mystery,' yet 'a sacramental mystery.' But we infer out of his discourse, that this 'mystery' is now elevated by Christ to be 'a sacrament,' because St. Paul citeth the words of Christ, spoken, as we have seen, out of St. Matthew, when he did abrogate the law of Moses, which law permitted in several cases husband and wife to be separated; and spoken also, when he declared expressly, that he would have this contract made hereafter inseparable; saying, 'That which God hath joined together, let no man separate.' Christ then marrying to his church for ever, would elevate this chief contract that is in mankind, which he made from that time to be an inseparable contract, to signify this most sacred mystery; and therefore he saith, 'This is a great sacrament or mystery,' so much, and so nearly 'concerning Christ and the church,' as St. Paul tells us.

[* Sincere Christian, vol. ii., pp. 148—151.

["We may here note the impiety of them, who knowing by St. Paul that Christ thus inseparably had wedded his church, do, notwithstanding, presume to call this his beloved spouse, a 'whore and a harlot,' for her superstition and idolatry. But to proceed, marriage being elevated by Christ to be a 'great sacrament,' or 'sacred mystery,' and to signify the inseparable conjunction between him and his church, a signification so far beyond its own nature, (which was only to be a civil contract,) he made it a fit ceremony, to which now he might annex his grace given, to the parties joined by this sacrament, to observe matrimonial continency: 'That every one may know to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour, and not in passion of lust as Gentiles.' (1 Thess. iv. 4.) They, therefore, having this grace given to this end, are thereby enabled more fitly to express in their mutual fidelity and affection, the mutual fidelity and affection which should be for ever between Christ and his church. This is the proper effect of the grace given in matrimony.

["By this our doctrine of matrimony, let any impartial man judge, whether we or our adversaries honour it more; they having taken this chief honour of being a sacrament from it, which we allow to it, are now come to celebrate it, in profane houses, before justices, and this only for civil ends intended by the commonwealth. Neither have they one text of Scripture to prove that their Ministers ought always to join others in matrimony." *

[On this subject, the Romish authorities are by no means unanimous: "Their profound Doctor Durand, † as Cardinal Bellarmine testifieth, 'judgeth it not to be properly a sacrament;' and both he and the chief Master ‡ of the Romish School taught, that it hath not the virtue of conferring grace." *]

1. In support of this dogma, Romanists quote Eph. v. 32: "This is a great sacrament; but I speak in Christ and in the church." + They say that matrimony is a sign of a holy thing, representing the union of Christ and his church; therefore, it is a sacrament.

[The following paraphrase upon this passage, from the Rhemish Testament, is a curiosity:—

["This is a great sacrament. Marriage, a great sacrament of Christ and his church, prefigured in the first parents. 'Adam,' says St. Augustine, 'who was a form or figure of him that was to come, yea, rather God in him, gave us a great token of a sacrament. For both he deserved sleeping to take a wife, and of his rib his wife was made unto him, because of Christ sleeping on the cross, the church was to be made out of his side.' In another place, he maketh matrimony 'a sacrament of Christ and his church,' in that, 'as the married man must forsake father and mother, and cleave unto his wife, so Christ,' as it were, 'left his Father, exinaniting himself by his incarnation, and left the Synagogue his mother, and joined himself to the church.' In divers other places he maketh it also a sacrament, specially in that it is an inseparable bond betwixt two, and that can never be dissolved but by death; signifying Christ's perpetual and indissoluble conjunction with the church, his only spouse. And in another place, 'The good of marriage among the people of God, is in the holiness of a sacrament.' Who would have thought such mysteries and sacraments to be in marriage, that the joining of man and wife together should represent so great a mystery, if the Apostle himself, and after him this holy Father and others, had not noted it? Or who can marvel that the holy Church taketh this to be a sacrament, and to give grace of sanctification to the parties married, that they may live together in mutual fidelity, bring up their children in faith and fear of God, and possess their vessel (as the Apostle speaketh) in sanctification and honour, and not in passion of lust and ignominy, as the Heathens do, which know not God; and as our brutish new masters seem to do that commend marriage above all things, so far as it feedeth their concupiscence,—but for grace, sacrament, mystery, or sanctification thereby,—they care no more than the Heathen or brute beasts do? And thus we gather that matrimony is a sacrament, and not of the Greek word, 'mystery,' only, as Calvin falsely saith, nor of the Latin word 'sacrament,' both which we know have of their nature a more general signification, and that in the Scriptures also; but whereas these names are here given to matrimony by the Apostle, and are not given in the Scriptures to baptism and the eucharist, let them tell us, why they also apply these words from their general signification, to signify specially and peculiarly those two sacraments never so named expressly in Scripture, and do not likewise follow the (Roman) Catholic Church in calling matrimony by the same name, which is here so called of the Apostle, specially when the signification in [* Mumford's Catholic Scripturist, &c., pp. 183—186. London, 1686.

["† 'Tertio patet idem ex eo quod sacramentum adhibetur ad effectum sanctificationis spiritualis. Ex quo arguitur sic: sacramentum aut confert gratiam non habenti nisi ponat obicem, aut si habet, auget eam; sed matrimonium nullum istorum facit; ergo non est sic et univoce sacramentum, sicut et alia sacramenta.'—Durandi a Sancto Portiano Comment. in Sent., lib. iv., distinct. xxvi., quæst. iii., sect. 12. Fol. Lugd., 1560.

["‡ 'Argumentum duodecimum, quod est Durandi tertium: Sacramentum matrimonii non confert gratiam, cetera conferunt; non igitur est matrimonium sacramentum univoce cum reliquis. Propositionem majorem probat Durandus auctoritate et ratione. Auctoritas est aliquot juris canonici interpretum, ac præterea Magistri Sententiarum in 4 lib. Sent., dist. 2. Ratio est duplex, una, jureconsultorum, quos ipse citat, altera, ipsius propria.

["'Jureconsulti probant, sacramentum matrimonii non conferre gratiam, quia licite fit pactum de matrimonio contrahendo, si certa summa pecuniæ numeretur; quod illicitum videretur, si matrimonium gratiam conferret; est enim simoniæ crimen, gratiam Dei pecuniis emere velle.

["'Ipse vero Durandus hoc argumento utitur: matrimonium non confert primam gratiam, quæ est ipsa justificatio a peccatis; neque secundam gratiam, sive gratiæ incrementum; nullam igitur gratiam confert. Et quidem quod gratiam primam non conferat, probat, quia solus baptismus et pœnitentia ad peccati remissionem instituta sint. Quod non secundam, probat, quia majoris gratiæ esset matrimonium, quam continentia, si continens per matrimonium in gratia divina augeretur.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. iii., De Matrim. Sacram., lib. i., cap. v., col. 1314, C. Fol. Colon., 1619.

["'De matrimonio non modo Petrus Lombardus negavit in eo gratiam conferri, sed longe post eum Durandus diserte inquit non esse matrimonium univoce sacramentum, sicut alia sacramenta, novæ legis; nam nec conferre gratiam non habenti; non esse itaque proprie et stricte dictum sacramentum, in 4 dist. xxvi., quæst. 3.'—Cassandri de Articulis Religionis inter Cath. et Protest. Controv. Consultatio, art. xiii. 12mo. Lugduni, 1608.

["'Imo haud scio an hoc sacramentum septimum a veteribus fuerit cognitum. Primum quod Dionysius enumerans nominatim singula, et singulorum vires, ritus, ac cæremonias explicans, de conjugio nullam facit mentionem; nam quod causantur quidam comprehendi sub sacramento ordinis, id tale est, ut efficiat, ne nihil respondisse videaris, cum omnino nolueris obtumescere.'—Erasmi Annot. in 1 Cor. vii., p. 377."

[* A Catholic Appeal for Protestants, out of the Confessions of the Roman Doctors, &c., &c., written by Thomas Morton, D.D., p. 339. Fol. London, 1609.]

† Douay translation.

it is as great as in any other of the sacraments, and rather greater." *]

To this we reply: (1.) The following is a better translation: "This is a great mystery." Or, indeed, if we render the word "sacrament," still they have no advantage, inasmuch as the original word μυστηριον, "mystery," which they read "sacrament," is employed on other subjects; as, "mystery of godliness;" (1 Tim. iii. 16;) 'a mystery, Babylon the great." (Rev. xvii. 5.) Papists must know that there is no force in the argument. The text, as found in their version, can only influence the minds of ignorant persons, who know not the Scriptures. (2.) The Apostle does not say, that marriage is a mystery; for he speaks concerning Christ and the church. (3.) It is acknowledged that marriage is instituted of God, and is a sign of a holy thing, yet it is no sacrament: the Sabbath was ordained of God, and signified the rest in Christ; (Heb. iv. 8;) yet it was no sacrament. All significant and mystic signs are not necessarily sacraments.

[The word "mystery" has a diversity of meaning. In its ordinary signification, it denotes something incomprehensible; and this interpretation, for want of due consideration, has been applied to certain passages in the New Testament, where the word occurs, but under widely different circumstances. The primary and leading idea communicated by the expression is, "a secret," something that is hidden, not manifest, not fully declared. The accession of the Gentiles to the church of God, under the Christian dispensation, is described as "the mystery hid" in the mind of God. (Rom. xvi. 25, 26; Eph. i. 9, 10; iii. 1—9; vi. 19; Col. i. 26.) So also is it used by St. Paul, when, speaking of a spirit opposed to the Gospel influencing the minds of men, he says, "The mystery of iniquity doth already work;" (2 Thess. ii. 7;) that is, the spirit of antichrist has begun to operate; but the operation is not fully apparent. The word is, again, used to denote any spiritual truth which is concealed under some external and figurative representation or similitude, and requiring explanation. In this sense it is used by our Saviour, when he said to his disciples, "To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God: but to them that are without, all these things are done in parables." (Mark iv. 11.) In the same sense it is employed by the Apostle John, who beheld the apocalyptic symbols: "The mystery," that is, the spiritual meaning, 'of the seven stars which thou sawest in my right hand, and the seven golden candlesticks. The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches; and the seven candlesticks which thou sawest are the seven churches." (Rev. i. 20.) Again: "Upon her forehead was a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth." "I will tell thee the mystery," or spiritual signification, "of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her" (Rev. xvii. 5, 7.)

[Another meaning of the word "mystery" is, some sacred thing, hidden or secret, which can only be made known by a revelation from the Most High. "Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness;" (1 Tim. iii. 16;) a mystery which consists in those several particulars mentioned by the Apostle, which the mind of man could not have conceived, had they not been revealed by the Holy Ghost; and which, being revealed, are intelligible as facts to the meanest capacity. "And though I understand all mysteries;" (1 Cor. xiii. 2;) that is, the revealed truths of religion; which are also termed, "the mystery of faith;" (1 Tim. iii. 9;) and "the mysteries of God." (1 Cor. iv. 1.) But in its theological and more common acceptation, it is applied to those doctrines and things which are wholly, or in part, incomprehensible, and beyond the range of our reason, even after they have been revealed. Hence there are certain principles and facts of the Christian revelation, characteristic of the entire system, known to us because revealed, which, though not contrary to reason, are indeed far above our reason. Such are the doctrines of the Trinity, the incarnation of the Son of God, and the resurrection of the body.

["(1.) The Greek word μυστηριον occurs frequently in the New Testament, and is uniformly rendered, in the English translation, 'mystery.' We all know that by the most current use of the English word 'mystery,' (as well as of the Latin ecclesiastic word mysterium, and the corresponding terms in modern languages,) is denoted some doctrine to human reason incomprehensible; in other words, such a doctrine as exhibits difficulties, and even apparent contradictions, which we cannot solve or explain. Another use of the word, which, though not so universal at present, is often to be met with in ecclesiastic writers of former ages, and in foreign writers of the present age, is to signify some religious ceremony or rite, especially those now denominated sacraments. In the Communion Office of the Church of England, the elements, after consecration, are sometimes termed 'holy mysteries.' But this use seems not now to be common among Protestants, less perhaps in this country than in any other. Johnson has not so much as mentioned it in his Dictionary. Indeed, in the fourth and some succeeding centuries, the word μυστηριον was so much in vogue with the Greek Fathers, and mysterium, or sacramentum, as it was often rendered, with the Latin, that it would be impossible to say in what meaning they used the words; nay, whether or not they affixed any meaning to them at all. In every thing that related to religion, there were found mysteries and sacraments, in doctrines and precepts, in ordinances and petitions; they could even discover numbers of them in the Lord's Prayer. Nay, so late as Father Possevini, this unmeaning application of these terms has prevailed in some places. That Jesuit is cited with approbation by Walton, in the prolegomena to his Polyglot, for saying, Tot esse Hebraica in Scriptura sacramenta, quot literæ; tot mysteria, quot puncta; tot arcana, quot apices: a sentence, I acknowledge, as unintelligible to me, as Father Simon owns it was to him. But passing this indefinite use, of which we know not what to make, the two significations I have mentioned are sufficiently known to theologians, and continue, though not equally, still in use with modern writers.

["(2.) When we come to examine the Scriptures critically, and make them serve for their own interpreters, which is the surest way of attaining the true knowledge of them, we shall find, if I mistake not, that both these senses are unsupported by the usage of the inspired penmen. After the most careful examination of all the passages in the New Testament, in which the Greek word occurs, and after consulting the use made of the term, by the ancient Greek interpreters of the Old, and borrowing aid from the practice of the Hellenist Jews, in the writings called Apocrypha, I can only find two senses nearly related to each other, which can strictly be called scriptural. The first, and what I may call the leading, sense of the word is arcanum, 'a secret,' any thing not disclosed, not published to the world, though perhaps communicated to a select number.

[* Rhem. Test., in loco.]

["(3.) Now, let it be observed, that this is totally different from the current sense of the English word 'mystery,' something incomprehensible. In the former acceptation, a thing was no longer a mystery than whilst it remained unrevealed; in the latter, a thing is equally a mystery after the revelation as before. To the former we apply properly the epithet 'unknown;' to the latter we may, in a great measure, apply the term 'unknowable.' Thus, the proposition that God would call the Gentiles, and receive them into his church, was as intelligible, or, if ye like the term better, comprehensible, as that he once had called the descendants of the Patriarchs, or as any plain proposition or historical fact. Yet, whilst undiscovered, or at least veiled under figures and types, it remained, in the scriptural idiom, a 'mystery,' having been hidden from ages and generations. But, after it had pleased God to reveal this his gracious purpose to the Apostles by his Spirit, it was a mystery no longer.

["The Greek words, αποκαλυψις and μυστηριον, stand in the same relation to each other that the English words 'discovery' and 'secret' do. Μυστηριον αποκαλυφθεν is a 'secret discovered,' and consequently a secret no longer. The discovery is the extinction of the secret, as such. These words, accordingly, or words equivalent, as μυστηριον, γνωρισθεν, φανερωθεν, are often brought together by the Apostles, to show that what were once the secret purposes and counsels of God, had been imparted to them, to be by them promulgated to all the world. Thus they invited the grateful attention of all to what was so distinguished a favour on the part of Heaven, and must be of such unspeakable importance to the apostate race of Adam. The terms, 'communication, revelation, manifestation,' plainly show the import of the term μυστηριον, to which they are applied. As this, indeed, seems to be a point now universally acknowledged by the learned, I shall only refer the judicious reader, for further proof of it from the New Testament, to the passages quoted in the margin; (Rom. xvi. 25, 26; 1 Cor. ii. 7—10; Eph. i. 9; iii. 3, 5, 6, 9; vi. 19; Col. i. 26, 27;) in all which he will plainly perceive that the Apostle treats of something which had been concealed for ages, (and for that reason called μυστηριον,) but was then openly revealed; and not of any thing, in its own nature, dark and inconceivable.

["(4.) If, in addition to the evidence arising from so many direct and clear passages in the writings of Paul, it should be thought necessary to recur to the usage of the Seventy, we find that, in the Prophet Daniel, (ii. 18, 19, 27—30, 47; iv. 9,) the word μυστηριον occurs not fewer than nine times, answering always to the Chaldaic רָזָא—raza, res arcana, and used in relation to Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which was become a secret, even to the dreamer himself, as he had forgot it. The word there is uniformly rendered, in the common version, 'secret;' and it deserves to be remarked, that, in those verses, it is found connected with the verbs γνωριζω, φωτιζω, and αποκαλυπτω, in a way exactly similar to the usage of the New Testament, above observed. It occurs in no other place of that version, but one in Isaiah, of very doubtful import. In the apocryphal writings (which, in matters of criticism on the Hellenistic idiom, are of good authority) the word μυστηριον frequently occurs in the same sense, and is used in reference to human secrets, as well as to divine. Nay, the word is not, even in the New Testament, confined to divine secrets. It expresses sometimes those of a different, and even contrary, nature. Thus, the Apostle, speaking of the antichristian spirit, says, 'The mystery of iniquity doth already work.' (2 Thess. ii. 7.) The spirit of antichrist hath begun to operate; but the operation is latent and unperceived. The Gospel of Christ is a blessing, the spirit of antichrist a curse. Both are equally denominated 'mystery,' or secret, whilst they remain concealed.

["(5.) I shall be much misunderstood, if any one infer, from what has been now advanced, that I mean to signify that there is nothing in the doctrines of religion which is not, on all sides, perfectly comprehensible to us, or nothing from which difficulties may be raised, that we are not able to give a satisfactory solution of. On the contrary, I am fully convinced, that in all sciences, particularly in natural theology, as well as in revelation, there are many truths of this kind, whose evidence such objections are not regarded by a judicious person as of force sufficient to invalidate. For example: the divine omniscience is a tenet of natural religion. This manifestly implies God's foreknowledge of all future events. Yet, to reconcile the divine prescience with the freedom, and even the contingency, and, consequently, with the good or ill desert, of human actions, is what I have never yet seen achieved by any, and indeed despair of seeing. That there are such difficulties, also, in the doctrines of revelation, it would, in my opinion, be very absurd to deny. But the present inquiry does not affect that matter in the least. This inquiry is critical, and concerns solely the scriptural acceptation of the word μυστηριον, which I have shown to relate merely to the secrecy for some time observed with regard to any doctrine, whether mysterious, in the modern acceptation of the word, or not.

["(6.) The foregoing observations will throw some light on what Paul says of the nature of the office with which he was vested: 'Let a man so account of us, as of the Ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God;' (1 Cor. iv. 1;) οικονομους μυστηριων Θεου, dispensers to mankind of the gracious purposes of heaven, heretofore concealed, and therefore denominated secrets. Nor can any thing be more conformable than this interpretation, both to the instructions given to the Apostles during our Lord's ministry, and to the commission they received from him. In regard to the former, he tells them, 'To you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven;' no secret, relating to this subject, is withheld from you; 'but to them it is not given;' (Matt. xiii. 11;) that is, not yet given. For these very Apostles, when commissioned to preach, were not only empowered, but commanded, to disclose to all the world, (Matt. xxviii. 19; Mark xvi. 15,) the whole mystery of God, his secret counsels in regard to man's salvation. And that they might not imagine that the private informations, received from their Master, had never been intended for the public ear, he gave them this express injunction: 'What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in light: and what ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the housetops.' He assigns the reason, the divine decree; a topic to which he oftener than once recurs. 'There is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, and hid that shall not be known.' (Matt. x. 26, 27.) Again: 'There is nothing hid, which shall not be manifested; neither was any thing kept secret, but that it should come abroad.' (Mark iv. 22.) This may serve to explain to us the import of these phrases which occur in the Epistles, as expressing the whole Christian institution, 'the mystery of the Gospel,' 'the mystery of the faith,' 'the mystery of God,' and 'the mystery of Christ;' mystery, in the singular number, not mysteries, in the plural, which would have been more conformable to the modern import of the word, as relating to the incomprehensibility of the different articles of doctrine. But the whole of the Gospel, taken together, is denominated 'the mystery,' the grand secret, in reference to the silence or concealment under which it was formerly kept; as, in like manner, it is styled the revelation of Jesus Christ, in reference to the publication afterwards enjoined.

["(7.) I signified, before, that there was another meaning which the term μυστηριον sometimes bears in the New Testament. But it is so nearly related to, if not coincident with, the former, that I am doubtful whether I can call it other than a particular application of the same meaning. However, if the thing be understood, it is not material which of the two ways we denominate it. The word is sometimes employed to denote the figurative sense, as distinguished from the literal, which is conveyed under any fable, parable, allegory, symbolical action, representation, dream, or vision. It is plain that, in this case, the term μυστηριον is used comparatively; for, however clear the meaning intended to be conveyed in the apologue, or parable, may be to the intelligent, it is obscure compared with the literal sense, which, to the unintelligent, proves a kind of veil. The one is, as it were, open to the senses; the other requires penetration and reflection. Perhaps there was some allusion to this import of the term, when our Lord said to his disciples, 'To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God: but to them that are without, all these things are done in parables.' (Mark iv. 11.) The Apostles were let into the secret, and got the spiritual sense of the similitude, whilst the multitude amused themselves with the letter, and searched no further.

["In this sense μυστηριον is used in these words: 'The mystery of the seven stars which thou sawest in my right hand, and the seven golden candlesticks. The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches, and the seven candlesticks are the seven churches.' (Rev. i. 20.) Again, in the same book: 'I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her,' &c. (Rev. xvii. 7.) There is only one other passage to which this meaning of the word is adapted: 'This is a great mystery; but I speak concerning Christ and the church.' (Eph. v. 32.) Nor is it any objection to this interpretation of the word 'mystery' here, that the Apostle alluded not to any fiction, but to an historical fact, the formation of Eve out of the body of Adam her husband. For, though there is no necessity that the story which supplies us with the body of the parable or allegory (if I may so express myself) be literally true; there is, on the other hand, no necessity that it be false. Passages of true history are sometimes allegorized by the sacred penmen. Witness the story of Abraham and his two sons, Isaac by his wife Sarah, and Ishmael by his bondwoman Hagar, of which the Apostle has made an allegory for representing the comparative natures of the Mosaic dispensation and the Christian. (Gal. iv. 22, &c.)

["(8.) As to the passage quoted from the Epistle to the Ephesians, let it be observed that the word μυστηριον is there rendered, in the Vulgate, sacramentum. Although this Latin word was long used very indefinitely, by ecclesiastical writers, it came, at length, with the more judicious, to acquire a meaning more precise and fixed. Firmilian calls Noah's ark 'the sacrament of the church of Christ.'* It is manifest, from the illustration he subjoins, that he means the symbol, type, or emblem, of the church; alluding to an expression of the Apostle Peter. (1 Peter iii. 20, 21.) This may, on a superficial view, be thought nearly coincident with the second sense of the word μυστηριον above assigned. But, in fact, it is rather an inversion of it. It is not, in Scripture language, the type that is called the 'mystery,' but the antitype; not the sign, in any figurative speech or action, but the thing signified. It would, therefore, have corresponded better to the import of the Greek word, to say, 'The church of Christ is the sacrament of Noah's ark:' το μυστηριον, 'the secret antitype,' which that vessel, destined for the salvation of the chosen few, from the deluge, was intended to adumbrate. This use, however, not uncommon among the Fathers of the third century, has given rise to the definition of a sacrament, as 'the visible sign of an invisible grace;' a definition to which some regard has been paid by most parties, Protestant as well as Romish.

["(9.) But to return to μυστηριον: it is plain that the earliest perversion of this word, from its genuine and original sense, (a 'secret,' or something concealed,) was in making it to denote some solemn and sacred ceremony. Nor is it difficult to point out the causes that would naturally bring ecclesiastic writers to employ it in a sense which has so close an affinity to a common application of the word in profane authors. Among the different ceremonies employed by the Heathen, in their idolatrous superstitions, some were public, and performed in the open courts, or in those parts of the temples to which all had access; others were more secretly performed in places from which the crowd was carefully excluded. To assist, or even be present, at these, a select number only was admitted, to each of whom a formal and solemn initiation was necessary. These secret rites, on account of this very circumstance, their secrecy, were generally denominated 'mysteries.' They were different, according to what was thought agreeable to the different deities, in whose honour they were celebrated. Thus they had the mysteries of Ceres, the mysteries of Proserpine, the mysteries of Bacchus, &c. Now there were some things in the Christian worship, which, though essentially different from all pagan rites, had as much resemblance in this circumstance, the exclusion of the multitude, as would give sufficient handle to the Heathen, to style them 'the Christian mysteries.'

["(10.) Probably the term would be first applied only to what was called, in the primitive church, 'the eucharist,' which we call 'the Lord's supper;' and afterwards extended to baptism and other sacred ceremonies. In regard to the first-mentioned ordinance, it cannot be denied, that in the article of concealment, there was a pretty close analogy. Not only were all infidels, both Jews and Gentiles, excluded from witnessing the commemoration of the death of Christ; but even many believers, particularly the catechumens and the penitents; the former, because not yet initiated by baptism into the church; the latter, because not yet restored to the communion of Christians, after having fallen into some scandalous sin. Besides, the secrecy that Christians were often, on account of the persecutions to which they were exposed, obliged to observe, which made them meet for social worship in the night-time, or very early in the morning, would naturally draw on their ceremonies, from the Gentiles, the name of 'mysteries.' And it is not unreasonable to think that a name, which had its rise among their enemies, might afterwards be adopted by themselves. The name 'Christians,' first used at Antioch, seems, from the manner wherein it is mentioned in the Acts, (xi. 26,) to have been at first given contemptuously to the disciples by infidels, and not assumed by themselves. The common titles by which, for many years after that period, they continued to distinguish those of their own society, as we learn both from the Acts, and from Paul's Epistles, were 'the faithful,' or 'believers,' 'the disciples,' and 'the brethren.' Yet, before the expiration of the apostolic age, they adopted the name 'Christian,' and gloried in it. The Apostle Peter uses it in one place,—1 Peter iv. 16; the only place in Scripture wherein it is used by one of themselves. Some other words and phrases, which became fashionable amongst ecclesiastic writers, might naturally enough be accounted for in the same manner.

["* Cyp. Epist. 75, in some editions, 43.

["(11.) But how the Greek μυστηριον came first to be translated into Latin sacramentum, it is not easy to conjecture. None of the classical significations of the Latin word seem to have any affinity to the Greek term. For whether we understand it simply for a sacred ceremony, sacramentum from sacrare, as juramentum from jurare, or for the pledge deposited by the litigants in a process to insure obedience to the award of the judge, or for the military oath of fidelity, not one of these conveys to us either of the senses of the word μυστηριον, explained above. At the same time, it is not denied that, in the classical import, the Latin word may admit an allusive application to the more solemn ordinances of religion, as implying, in the participants, a sacred engagement equivalent to an oath. All that I here contend for is, that the Latin word sacramentum does not, in any of these senses, convey exactly the meaning of the Greek name, μυστηριον, whose place it occupies in the Vulgate. Houbigant, a Romish Priest, has, in his Latin translation of the Old Testament, used neither sacramentum nor mysterium; but where either of these terms had been employed in the Vulgate, he substitutes secretum, arcanum, or absconditum. Erasmus, though he wrote at an earlier period, has only once admitted sacramentum into his version of the New Testament, and said, with the Vulgate, sacramentum septem stellarum.

["Now, it is to this practice, not easily accounted for, in the old Latin translators, that we owe the ecclesiastical term 'sacrament,' which, though properly not scriptural, even Protestants have not thought fit to reject: they have only confined it a little in the application, using it solely of the two primary institutions of the Gospel, baptism and the Lord's supper; whereas the Romanists apply it also to five other ceremonies, in all, seven. Yet even this application is not of equal latitude with that wherein it is used in the Vulgate. 'The sacrament of God's will,' (Eph. i. 9,) 'the sacrament of piety,' (1 Tim. iii. 16,) the 'sacrament' of a dream, (Dan. ii. 18, 30, 47,) 'the sacrament of the seven stars,' (Rev. i. 20,) and 'the sacrament of the woman,' (Rev. xvii. 7,) are phrases which sound very strangely in our ears.

["(12.) So much for the introduction of the term 'sacrament' into the Christian theology, which (however convenient it may be for expressing some important rites in our religion) has, in none of the places where it occurs in the Vulgate, a reference to any rite or ceremony whatever, but is always the version of the Greek word μυστηριον, or the corresponding term in Hebrew or Chaldee. Now, the term μυστηριον, as has been shown, is always predicated of some doctrine, or of some matter of fact, wherein it is the intention of the writer to denote that the information he gives either was a secret formerly, or is the latent meaning of some type, allegory, figurative description, dream, vision, or fact referred to. No religion abounded more in pompous rites and ordinances than the Jewish; yet they are never, in Scripture, (any more than the ceremonies of the New Testament,) denominated either mysteries or sacraments. Indeed, with us Protestants, the meanings in present use, assigned to these two words, are so totally distinct, the one relating solely to doctrine, the other solely to positive institutions, that it may look a little oddly to bring them together in the discussion of the same critical question. But to those who are acquainted with Christian antiquity, and foreign use in these matters, or have been accustomed to the Vulgate translation, there will be no occasion for an apology.

["It has also been urged," says Dr. Campbell, "that there are some things in the Vulgate, which favour the style and doctrine of Rome, particularly in what regards the sacraments; and that such things are to be found in places where there is no ground to suspect a various reading, nor that the text of the Vulgate has undergone any alteration, either intentional or accidental. Could this point be evinced in a satisfactory manner, it would allow more to Popery, on the score of antiquity, than, in my opinion, she is entitled to. It is true, that marriage appears, in one passage, to be called a sacrament. Paul, after recommending the duties of husbands and wives, and enforcing his recommendations by the resemblance which marriage bears to the relation subsisting between Christ and his church, having quoted these words from Moses, 'For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh;' adds, as it is expessed in the Vulgate, Sacramentum hoc magnum est, ego autem dico in Christo et in ecclesia; (Eph. v. 32;) as expressed in the English translation, 'This is a great mystery: but I speak concerning Christ and the church;' that is, 'it is capable of an important and figurative interpretation, I mean, as it relates to Christ and the church.' Under the Mosaic economy, the relation wherein God stood to Israel is often represented under the figure of marriage; and it is common, with the penmen of the New Testament, to transfer those images, whereby the union between God and his people is illustrated in the Old, to that which subsists between Christ and his church. It is evident, that by the Latin word sacramentum, the Greek μυστηριον is frequently rendered in the New Testament; and it is no less evident, not only from the application of the word in that version, but from the general use of it, in ecclesiastical writers in the primitive ages, that it often denoted no more than an allegorical or figurative meaning, which may be assigned to any narrative or injunction; a meaning more sublime than that which is at first suggested by the words. Thus, the moral conveyed under an apologue or parable was with them the sacrament; that is, the hidden meaning of the apologue or parable. Thus, in Ego dicam tibi, sacramentum mulieris et bestiæ quæ portat eam; (Rev. xvii. 7;) 'I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast which carrieth her;' it is indubitable, that μυστηριον, or sacramentum, signifies the hidden meaning of that vision. It is very plain that, in their use, the sense of the word sacramentum was totally different from that which it has at present, either among Protestants or among Papists. At the same time, there can be no question, that the misunderstanding of the passage quoted above, from the Epistle to the Ephesians, has given rise to the exaltation of matrimony into a sacrament. Such are the effects of the perversion of words through the gradual change of customs: a perversion incident to every language, but which no translator can foresee."*]

["'This mystery is great: but I speak concerning Christ, and concerning the church.' (Eph. v. 32.) In the Vulgate version," says Dr. Macknight, "the first clause is thus translated: Sacramentum hoc magnum est; and it is the sole foundation on which the Papists have set up marriage as a sacrament. The Apostle calls the formation of Eve from Adam's body, and his marriage with her, and the intimate union established between them by that marriage, 'a great mystery,' because it contained an important emblematical meaning concerning the regeneration of believers, and their union with Christ, which hitherto had been kept secret, but which he had discovered in verse 30; for there, in allusion to what Adam said concerning Eve, 'This now is bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh,' the Apostle says, concerning Christ and believers, 'We are bone of his bones, and flesh of his flesh;' that is, we are parts of his body, the church; and by this application of Adam's words concerning Eve, to Christ and to his church, he insinuates, First, That the formation of Eve, of a rib taken out of Adam's body, was a figure of the regeneration of believers by the breaking of Christ's body, mentioned verse 25. Secondly, That Adam's love to Eve, on account of her being formed of his body, was a figure of Christ's love to believers, because they are become his body, as is observed verse 30. Thirdly, That Adam's marriage with Eve was a figure of the eternal union of Christ with believers in heaven, mentioned verse 27; for he left his Father to be united to his church.

["In giving this emblematical representation of these ancient facts, the Apostle has not exceeded the bounds of probability. In the first age, neither the art of writing, nor any permanent method of conveying instruction, being invented, it was necessary to make such striking actions and events as could not easily be forgotten, emblems of the instruction intended to be perpetuated. On this supposition, Adam, in whom the human race began, was a natural image of Christ, in whom the human race was to be restored; and his deep sleep, the opening of his side, and the formation of Eve of a rib taken out of his side, were fit emblems of Christ's death, of the opening of his side on the cross, and of the regeneration of believers by his death. The love which Adam expressed towards Eve, and his union with her by marriage, were lively images of Christ's love to believers, and of his eternal union with them in one society after their resurrection. And Eve herself, who was formed of a rib taken from Adam's side, was a natural image of believers, who are regenerated both in their body and in their mind, by the breaking of Christ's side on the cross. Thus the circumstances which accompanied the formation of Eve, being fit emblems of the formation of the church, we may suppose they were brought to pass to prefigure that great event; and, by prefiguring it, to show that it was decreed of God from the very beginning.

["The aptness, however, of these images is not the only reason for supposing that the formation of Eve, and her marriage with Adam in Paradise, were emblems of the regeneration of believers by the death of Christ, and of their eternal union with him in heaven. The singular manner in which Eve was formed, and the declaration at her marriage with Adam, 'Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and cleave to his wife, and they shall be one flesh,' strongly lead to that conclusion. Eve was not formed of the dust of the earth, as all other living things were made, (not excepting Adam himself,) but of a rib taken from Adam's side while he was in a deep sleep. Now, for this diversity, what reason can be assigned, if that which the Apostle hath suggested is not admitted? Farther, unless some deep instruction were couched under the formation of Eve, what occasion was there for Adam, at his marriage with her, to declare, 'This now is bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man; therefore shall a man leave,' &c.? For although the taking of Eve out of Adam might be a reason for Adam's affection towards her, it was no reason for the affection of his posterity towards their wives, who were not so formed. The reason of their love to their wives is, their being creatures of the same species with themselves. This Eve might have been, though, like Adam, she had been formed of the dust of the earth. Wherefore, Adam's declaration concerning Eve's being taken out of his body, and concerning his love to her on that account, was intended for some purpose peculiar to himself; namely, as he was a type of Him who was to restore the human race by the breaking of his body on the cross, and who, on that account, loves them, and will unite them to himself for ever. Upon the whole, the formation of Eve, and her marriage with Adam, and his love to and union with her, because she was taken out of his side, and the declaration, that on that account all his posterity should love their wives, and continue united to them through life, an union which does not subsist among other animals, are events so singular, that I do not see what account can be given of them, unless with the Apostle Paul we suppose, that, agreeably to the most ancient method of instruction, God intended these things as figurative representations of the regeneration of believers by the death of Christ, and of his eternal union with them in heaven, and that Adam and Eve were taught by God himself to consider them as such.

["It is no small confirmation of the Apostle's emblematical interpretation of the formation and marriage of Eve, that in Scripture we find a variety of images and expressions founded on that interpretation. For example: Adam is expressly called 'a type of him who was to come;' (Rom. v. 14;) on which account Christ is called 'the last Adam.' (1 Cor. xv. 45.) Next, the catholic church, consisting of believers of all nations, is called 'the body of Christ,' and the members thereof are said to be 'members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones,' in allusion to the formation of Eve, the emblem of the church. For as Eve was formed of a rib taken out of Adam's body during his deep sleep, so believers are regenerated both in mind and body, and formed into one great society, and united to Christ as its Head and Governor, by the breaking of his body on the cross. Thirdly, To this emblematical meaning of the formation of Eve, our Lord, I think, alluded, when he instituted his supper. For instead of appointing one symbol only of his death, he appointed two. And in explaining the first of them, he expressed himself in such a manner as to show that he had his eye on what happened to Adam when Eve was formed: 'This is my body, which is broken for you,' for your regeneration. Fourthly, The eternal union of the regenerated with Christ after the resurrection, is called 'a marriage.' (Rev. xix. 7.) And the 'new Jerusalem,' that is, the inhabitants of the new Jerusalem, the society of the redeemed, is termed 'the bride, the Lamb's wife;' and the preparing of men for that happy union, by introducing them into the church on earth through faith, and by sanctifying them through the word, is called 'a fitting them for one husband, that,' at the resurrection, 'they may be presented a chaste virgin to Christ,' (2 Cor. xi. 2,) in allusion, I suppose, to the presenting of Eve to Adam, in order to her marriage with him. And to show that in this expression the Apostle had the figurative meaning of Eve's marriage in his mind, he mentions, verse 3, the subtlety of the devil in deceiving Eve. Finally, The union of the Jewish Church with God, as the figure of the catholic church, consisting of the regenerated of all nations, is, by God himself, termed 'a marriage,' (Jer. iii. 14; Ezek. xvi. 8, 32,) and God is called 'the husband' of that people, (Isai. liv. 5,) and their union to him by the law of Moses is termed 'the day of their espousals.' (Jer. ii. 2.)"*

[* Campbell on the Four Gospels, vol. i., prelim. dis. ix., x., pp. 352—361, 423, 424.]

[Mr. Watson justly observes, "As it is usual among men to confirm covenants by visible and solemn forms, and has been so from the most ancient times; so when Almighty God was pleased to enter into covenant-engagements with men, he condescended to the same methods of affording, on his part, sensible assurances of his fidelity, and to require the same from them. Thus circumcision was the sign and seal of the covenant with Abraham; and when the great covenant of grace was made in the Son of God with all nations, it was agreeable to this analogy to expect that he would institute some constantly-recurring visible sign, in confirmation of his mercy to us, which should encourage our reliance upon his promises, and have the force of a perpetual renewal of the covenant between the parties. Such is manifestly the character and ends both of the institution of baptism and the Lord's supper; but as to the five additional sacraments of the Church of Rome, 'they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God,'† and they stand in no direct connexion with any covenant-engagement entered into by him with his creatures. Confirmation rests upon no scriptural authority at all. Penance, if it mean any thing more than repentance, is equally unsanctioned by Scripture; and if it mean, 'repentance toward God,' it is no more a sacrament than faith. Orders, or the ordination of Ministers, is an apostolic command, but has in it no greater indication of a sacramental act, than any other such command,—say the excommunication of obstinate sinners from the church; which, with just as good a reason, might be elevated into a sacrament. Marriage appears to have been made by the Papists a sacrament for this curious reason, that the Apostle Paul, when speaking of the love and union of husband and wife, and taking occasion from that to allude to the love of Christ to his church, says, 'This is a great mystery,' which the Vulgate version translates, Sacramentum hoc magnum est. Thus they confound the large and the restricted sense of the word 'sacrament,' and forget that the true 'mystery' spoken of by the Apostle lies not in marriage, but in the union of Christ with his people: 'This is a great mystery: but I speak concerning Christ and the church.' If, however, the use of the word 'mystery' in this passage by St. Paul, were sufficient to prove marriage a sacrament, then the calling of the Gentiles, as Beza observes, might be the eighth sacrament, since St. Paul terms that 'a mystery,' (Eph. i. 9,) which the Vulgate, in like manner, translates by sacramentum. The last of their sacraments is extreme unction: of which it is enough to say, that it is nowhere prescribed in Scripture; and if it were, has clearly nothing in it of a sacramental character."*]

Romanists further quote the following passage to support their doctrine: "She shall be saved in child-bearing, if they continue in faith and love;"(1 Tim. ii. 15;) inferring, that the grace of sanctification is given to the parties married. To this we answer: (1.) We deny that any sacraments give or confer grace: they are only means or instruments of its communication. (2.) It is allowed that God does give to pious married persons grace to live in piety and holiness; but it is unnecessary to constitute marriage into a sacrament for this purpose. (3.) Those who are not married may possess the sanctifying grace of God, which is sufficient to preserve all in a state of inward as well as outward holiness.

2. That marriage is no sacrament of the Gospel, speaking of such an institution in its proper scriptural acceptation, may be proved by the following arguments:—

(1.) Matrimony was instituted in Paradise long before sin had entered; therefore it cannot be a sacrament of the Gospel. Marriage is observed among infidels and wicked persons, who are incapable of receiving worthily the sacraments of the Church.

(2.) Papists are inconsistent with themselves, in calling marriage a profanation of orders. Some with consummate effrontery assert, that to live in a state of concubinage is more tolerable for a Priest than to marry. Can they really believe marriage to be a sacrament, which they contemn as vile and polluted? Pope Siricius applied the words of St. Paul, "They that are in the flesh cannot please God," in favour of the celibacy of the Clergy; thus proving that this Pope, in common with many other Pontiffs, knew but little of scriptural interpretation, seeing the reference is plainly to deep human depravity and wickedness, but not to the marriage state.

(3.) In every sacrament, there must be an external sensible sign, as the matter; and an appropriate order of words, as the form. But in matrimony there is neither; therefore it is no sacrament.

(4.) Again: None but pious persons can be partakers of the sacraments of the Church; but piety is not a necessary condition of marriage; therefore marriage is not a sacrament. The conditions of confession and absolution which are sometimes enjoined in the Church of Rome, cannot be pleaded as teaching that piety is required of those who are to be married; for confession and absolution are no proper concomitants of true piety, seeing the greatest part of those who confess and receive absolution are no otherwise religious than as members of the Church of Rome; and membership in that community is rather a presumption against, than in favour of, true religion.

It does not alter the case to introduce the distinctions which have been made by their theologians; namely, that marriage is often a civil or natural contract, and not a sacrament. This distinction is founded on mere technicalities, and not on any scriptural authority, either direct or inferential.

3. It is necessary, as they acknowledge, that a sacrament should be instituted by Christ; but matrimony was not instituted by him; therefore, according to their own rule, it is no sacrament. It is in vain for them to [* Macknight's Commentary and Notes on the Apostolical Epistles, vol. ii., pp. 424—427.

[" † Article XXV. of the Church of England.]

[* Watson's Works, vol. xii., pp. 214, 215.]

say that Christ instituted the sacrament of marriage, when they are unable to produce the words of institution, or to adduce a single circumstance connected with its institution. It is true, the Council of Trent most positively, in their first canon, affirm that Christ did institute the sacrament of matrimony. But then neither chapter nor verse is given to prove the fact. Indeed, so divided among themselves are they respecting the time in which Christ converted matrimony into a sacrament, that the most discordant opinions exist. Let the Roman Catholic Dens speak on the subject. "Some," says he, "say that it was instituted when Christ was present at the marriage at Cana of Galilee, which he is said to honour with his presence and to bless it. (John ii.) According to others, when Christ, revoking matrimony to its primeval unity and indissolubleness, rejecting the bill of divorce, said, 'What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.' (Matt. xix.) But others refer its institution to the time of the forty days between the resurrection and ascension, during which Christ often taught his Apostles concerning the kingdom of God, or his church. Others say the time is uncertain."* Thus the institution of marriage, as a sacrament, cannot be discovered by their ablest Divines. The Council of Trent is unable to find the place where Christ established it. The Roman Catechism adroitly evades this point, and leaves the matter in the same uncertainty as it found it. We therefore hesitate not to affirm, that although marriage was originally instituted by Almighty God, recognised by Christ, and its duties explained and enforced by the Apostles; nevertheless, its institution, as a sacrament, cannot be found in any part of the New Testament.

III. Of impediments dissolving matrimony.

1. The Council of Trent teaches, that the Church hath power to annul any of the impediments mentioned in Leviticus, add new ones, or dissolve any which are now in use. Thus the Council undertakes to add to or rescind the laws of God. Hence the language of Bailly: "The Church can use the powers which the Apostles exercised, as her Ministers; but the Apostles, as Ministers of the church, have determined upon those impediments which dissolve marriage. For St. Paul (1 Cor. vii. 15) introduces an impediment which is called disparity of worship; and permits the believing wife to depart from the unbelieving husband: 'If the unbeliever depart, let him depart; for a brother or a sister is not in subjection in such a case.'"† That the Church of Rome possesses powers equal to the Apostles, who were guided by plenary inspiration, is absurd, and cannot for a moment be tolerated; because it would follow that the Church is authorized to change the nature of the sacraments, as well as add to, and take from, the word of God. The Pope or a General Council, but rather the former, is the person to make these dispensations.

With regard to the foregoing text of Scripture, it may be remarked, that St. Paul does not give liberty to one party at pleasure to renounce the other, as though they were no longer man and wife; for he expressly says, if the infidel party be content to dwell with the other, he or she is not to put the other away. His meaning is, that if the unbeliever wilfully depart, the other is not bound to perform the mutual requirements of marriage; and if the infidel be content to dwell with the Christian, she is not to forsake him; the reason adduced being, "What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband?"

[These arrogant claims of the Paparchy were in perfect keeping with the degenerate spirit of the age, which had developed itself to such an awful extent during our Saviour's ministry, as to call forth from him numerous expressions of righteous indignation and anger. "The tie of marriage," says Dr. Croly, "was becoming constantly weaker. Divorce, for all reasons, or for none, was the growing habit of the time. Temper, casual quarrel, passion for another, or mere weariness of the bond, were grounds of divorce. The results of this gross mutilation of the Mosaic code must have shown themselves in the abandonment of wives and children, and the impurity of general life. The spot of leprosy was already abroad on the national frame. Against this comprehensive crime our Lord, on the first and most solemn occasion of his ministry, declared himself. In the Sermon on the Mount, in which he superseded all the moral laws of Jew and Heathen, to purify their principle, he relaid the foundations of marriage in the original command of heaven.

["He pronounced all capricious changes of the married bond to be crimes amounting to the sin against the seventh commandment. He even went to the extent of placing in the same condemnation the most trivial indulgences which threatened to lead to the sin. (Matt. v. 28.) He went further still; and, among all the conceivable causes of divorce, allowed but one to be received as authentic, and that one the sin itself; that act of guilt which, breaking up the succession of children, totally disuniting the affections, and making the very presence of the criminal a source of justified disgust and honest shame, extinguishes, at once and for ever, all the divine purposes of marriage.

["But a more detailed instruction on the subject was yet to be given. Our Lord's mission had evidently caught the eye of Jewish authority from its earliest period. But, from the time when it began to act powerfully on the popular mind, and the multitude, following him, in involuntary wonder acknowledged that 'he spake as never man spake;' and, scarcely doubting, asked, 'Whether, when Messiah came, should he do more miracles than this man had done;' the scribes and Pharisees, probably by the immediate direction of the heads of the state, seem to have been continually on his path. Their first object was to detach the people; and this was, of course, most effectually to be done by forcing him either to contradict his principles, and thus degrade himself in all eyes; or to declare against the national indulgences, and thus alienate the multitude. The licence of divorce had grown into an indispensable privilege; and upon this they constructed an expedient worthy of their indefatigable subtlety. In the nineteenth chapter of St. Matthew the history is thus given: 'The Pharisees came to him, tempting him, and saying unto him, Master, is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause' (for general causes)?* Our Lord, with that fearless truth and unblemished sanctity which characterized all his conduct, answers unhesitatingly, 'Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning,* made them male and female, and said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh?'

["* 'Κατα πασαν αιτιαν.'

[* "Prout est sacramentum, institutum est a Christo Domino, ut definivit Concilium Tridentinum, sess. xxiv., de Sac. Matr., can. i., sed quandonam, non ita constat. Alii institutum esse dicunt, quando Christus (Joannis ii.) interfuit nuptiis in Cana Galilææ, quas sua præsentia cohonestavit, eisque dicitur benedixisse. Juxta alios, dum Christus, (Matt. xix.,) matrimonium revocans ad primævam suam unitatem et indissolubilitatem, sublato repudii libello, dixit: 'Quod Deus conjunxit, homo non separet.' Alii autem institutionem ejus referunt ad tempus quadraginta dierum inter resurrectionem et ascensionem, quibus Apostolos frequenter instruxit Christus de regno Dei, sive ecclesia. Alii dicunt tempus esse incertum."—Dens Theol., tom. vii.; De Matrimonio, No. 26; De Institutione Matrimonii.]

† Bailly, Theol., tom. vi.; De Matrimonio, pars i., cap. i., sect. 2.

["Having thus delivered the principle contained in the perhaps keenly-felt rebuke to their ignorance of the Scriptures, he draws the direct conclusion: 'Therefore they shall be no more twain.' He here decides the question at once: from the moment of their union, they shall be separable no more; they are thenceforth to be regarded as one being, with but one interest, one heart, one purpose in life, combined in every aspect and faculty of human existence, one down to the grave. He then seals all by the solemn, comprehensive, and strikingly-authoritative declaration, almost the blessing, 'What God hath joined together, let no man † put asunder.' The validity of the rite is thus established, in all instances, as the work of God, and not of man. No variety of ceremonial, no vicissitude of circumstance, no length of duration, no act of human will, no influence of human law, can thenceforth annul the bond: it is fixed on the conscience, superior to change; for it is the act of Him who is above all change: it is indissoluble, for it is divine.

["His cavillers return to the charge; but it is only with the effect of reinforcing the principle. Probably not less in the intention of placing him in hostility with his hearers, who venerated the law as the peculiar glory of their country, than of covering their own retreat by a dexterous, legal subterfuge, they say unto him, 'Why did Moses then command us to give her a writing of divorcement, and to put her away?' Our Lord instantly defies the unpopularity, and detects the subterfuge, alike. 'He saith unto them, Moses, because of the hardness of your hearts, suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so.' Here he rebukes at once the people and the Priests, laying the deficiency of the law to the account of the national character, and marking the pharisaical equivocation of assuming that as a command which was, at most, but a sufferance. He then, on his own authority, 'But I say unto you,' pronounces the perpetual law; that the man who puts away his wife (for any cause but the sin of the Decalogue) is not entitled to the rights of divorce, and must not marry; further declaring, that even the innocent party cannot find in her injury a claim to her freedom. If she marry, she too becomes guilty. Thus the original bond subsists through every form even of the separation. The principle of indissolubility masters all.

["It is remarkable that the circumstances of the time give an additional proof of the holy intrepidity of our Lord, and of the pressing and universal necessity of the precept. It was altogether contrary to his custom to solicit peril by provoking either the government or the people on trivial grounds. And these times were peculiarly perilous for animadversions on capricious divorce. In the earlier stages of the Jewish law women had not been suffered to claim divorce; but by the increased intercourse with the nations of Gentilism, this habit had become familiar, and was already shamelessly adopted by the highest females of the country. Salome, a daughter of Herod, had but a short time before sent a bill of divorce to her husband, Costobarus, the Governor of Idumæa. The example was rapidly followed by females of the same rank. Herodias divorced her husband, Philip the Tetrarch, to marry his brother. The subsequent instances of Drusilla, wife of the King of Emesa,* and of Berenice and Mariamne, sisters of King Agrippa, show the popularity of the offence.

["Thus our Lord denounced a practice which involved the most powerful personages of the country. We may easily calculate the hazards encountered by the individual who should impeach the Princesses of the land as guilty of the foul and startling crime for which the legal punishment was stoning to death. John the Baptist, for a more measured charge against Herodias, had been but lately murdered. We know of no other cause which those high-born criminals had for claiming divorce, than the wish to marry other husbands. The heartless liberty of divorce had already degenerated, as it always tends to degenerate, into the mere scandalous love of change.

["The deviation of the Mosaic code from the primal law was palpably no more than one of those expedients by which Providence seeks to guide the heart of nations without coercing the will. The Mosaic bill of divorcement seems to have been limited to a single cause, that of personal infirmity, or, perhaps, some disease of climate, which rendered the wife unable to sustain the duties of the household. Even this is declared by our Lord to be only for 'the hardness of their hearts;' less a privilege than a penalty.† The long sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt, the most corrupt region of the earth, and their general intercourse with the barbarism of the East, had strongly infected them with the prejudice of regarding women as

["* 'In Beresith,' says Clarke, 'in the Book of Genesis, which was named from its first word.' But if Matthew's 'ὁ ποιησας απ' αρχης' may allow this, the conjecture seems to be altogether unhinged by Mark, (x. 6,) 'Απο δε αρχης κτισεως.'

["† The translation would be more expressively, 'Let not man.' 'Ὁ ουν ὁ Θεος συνεζευξεν, ανθρωπος μη χωριζετω.' (Matt. xix. 6.) Man is thus taken in the most general sense, human being. It shall be in the power of neither man nor woman to dissolve the bond.

["Paley justly observes, that our Lord's dismissal of the woman brought for his sentence by the Pharisees, (John viii.,) was in contempt of their hypocrisy, not in acquittal of her crime. 'Does no man condemn thee? None, Lord.' The answer tells him that the charge is unsupported. Of course, formally knowing nothing of it, but from the report of the Pharisees, his reply is natural. Where there is no valid charge, sentence cannot be called for. He sends her away; but with his own expressive admonition, 'Go, and sin no more.'—Moral Philosophy.

["* Josephus, Antiquities, xx. 7. The school of Hillel was the popular authority of the time. It interpreted the single Mosaic cause of 'putting away,' to imply any possible cause of dislike, such as dressing the husband's meat badly, &c. The Rabbi Akiba even declares it to have been the meaning of the law, that if a husband saw a woman who pleased him better than his wife, he might marry her, dismissing the former.—Selden, Uxor. Hebr.

["Josephus, though a man of rank, character, and learning, says, 'If any man has a mind to part from his wife, for any cause whatever, (for there are pretences in abundance,) let him give her under his hand a bill of divorce, and they shall never come together again.' And he fully acted on this extraordinary conception; for he tells us that 'he divorced his wife, the mother of three children, not liking her.' 'Μη αρεσκομενος τοις ηθεσι.'

["† Deut. xxiv. 1—4. Whatever may have been the peculiar source of aversion, (a matter which was doubtless well understood in the time of the Lawgiver, though the Rabbins have perplexed it,) it appears to have been some one with respect to which the husband had been deceived, and which the wife, or her friends, were culpable in concealing: her divorce was, therefore, in a certain degree, a just retribution. But from the text it would appear, that the divorce must be demanded immediately on the discovery. Thus it would be, bona fide, the ground of the claim. And the more strictly to render this the fact, and prevent the habit, not infrequent, among the corrupt Asiatics, of hiring out wives to strangers, the husband, who had thus divorced his wife, was prohibited from ever taking her back again. 'Ne specie divortii alii aliis uxores darent usurarias.'—Grotius.

a subordinate class of beings; and without the permission to put away the wife, when this unexpected infirmity was discovered, they would probably have followed the barbarian custom which exposed unpromising infancy, and helpless age, and have either sold her into slavery, or put her to death. To prevent those atrocities, in a race singularly stubborn, and tardily advancing to civilization, divorce, for this single cause, was suffered. But even then, it was clearly less a change of the original rule, than a restriction on the native vices of the people. This divorce was fenced round by such strict formalities, and mingled with provisions of such number and care, that it wholly precluded haste of temper, and, as far as possible, extinguished caprice and cruelty.*

[" It was thus an advance of humanity upon the rude, rash, and merciless treatment of women in the ancient world. But, as the sufficient answer to all objections on this point, it must be remembered, that the permission was given in this peculiar instance by Him who alone had the right to change a law of the divine government, and also that the law has been renewed to us in its original force by the divine Lawgiver.

[" Perhaps among all the shocks to popularity, our Lord could not have hazarded one more violent than his denial of capricious divorce. What must the effect have been with the intractable multitude, when we find the doctrine so anxiously questioned even by the disciples? The change of wives according to will, had been adopted as an indulgence, till it was universally claimed as a right. When the argument with the Pharisees was ended, his disciples, still repugnant, came round him, and said, 'If a man can put away his wife only for the one cause, it is not good to marry.' He answered, with even more than his usual fulness of illustration, that on no man is laid any necessity whatever of entering into the married state; that it must depend on the circumstances and inclinations of the individual; (Matt. xix. 12;) that it is wholly voluntary; but that, when once adopted, it must be adopted in its full obligation. Being divine, it must be acknowledged incapable of being reached by any caprice of passion, insolence of power, or rashness of human legislation.

[" This submission of all the laws of society to the married bond is the spirit of the whole Scripture. When, in the Old Testament, God would pour out his strongest indignation on the impurities and Heathenisms of the Israelites, he charges Judah, as the essence of all evil, with the desertion of the husband of her youth,—he freights one word with the whole burden of his scorn, and that word is ADULTERY. When, in the New Testament, he would pronounce the sincerity, the truth, and the permanency, of his love for the Christian world, he names himself the 'Bridegroom.' When he would stamp, in one word of inimitable expression, the generous faith, the glowing hope, and the celestial purity, which unite the redeemed with the Redeemer, the sublime communion of the church with Christ, he names her the 'Bride.' Thus seeking the most powerful human conceptions to realize an union of soul which is to last through eternity, he finds them in the married state alone; and, from the noblest and most permanent tie of earth, furnishes the language of heaven.

[" It was obviously in the same spirit, that our Lord adopted a marriage as the first instance of his miraculous power; by attending it at the head of his disciples, made it the public commencement of his mission; and by there 'showing forth his glory,' restored it to its original rank, and invested it with a perpetual reverence among mankind.

[" The same principle of indissolubility was strictly followed by the Apostles. In the new difficulties which arose out of the conversion of the Heathen, St. Paul, replying to the application of the Corinthian Christians relative to marriage, lays down, as the unequivocal and universal law, 'Let not the wife depart from her husband.' Thus even the marriage solemnized in their heathen state was not to be made void by any circumstance arising out of their conversion: the original tie, formed under whatever conditions of religious belief, was formed by Heaven, and therefore not to be broken by any subsequent human contingency. He further enforces the law, by what seems to announce the express dictate of our Lord, again and immediately legislating for marriage. 'This I command, yet not I, but the Lord.' *

[" But the new case occurs, where, instead of the conversion of both husband and wife, either of them continues heathen.

[" If there ever were a case which would justify divorce, it might be found in the singular and complete disjunction of habit and hope, of belief and duty, arising from this close contrast of Heathenism and Christianity. Here, too, divorce could be charged to no ungenerous or guilty motive. There was no rash offence, no wilful caprice, no culpable passion for another. The heart might feel itself stimulated to the sacrifice only by a zeal of higher excellence, a desire to abandon human affections for heaven, a holy horror of sharing, even by implication, in the stains and follies of idolatry. Nay, the question might be one which lays the strongest hold on the purest feelings, the fate of children, the here and hereafter of beings, whom total and final separation alone might seem equal to snatch from the contagion of idolatry in the person of a parent. Yet, what is the language of inspiration? It declares that, strong as those circumstances are, the principle of the law is stronger. Indissolubility is paramount. 'If any brother,' (a disciple,) says St. Paul, 'hath a wife that believeth not,' (a Heathen,) 'and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away.' The same rule extends to the more anxious and dependent state of the wife. 'And the woman which hath a husband that believeth not; if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him.' The most trembling interest of the whole, the peril of the children, is especially tranquillized by the apostolic declaration, that they cannot be deprived of their Christian privileges by the continuance of the parental union. 'For the unbe-

[" * Spencer remarks, 'Cum libellus non nisi subducta ratione et animo sedatiore scribi potuerit, multis inde divortiis obstaculo fuit.'—(De Legib. Hebr.) Picart's observation tends to the same point. 'These many formalities took up a great deal of time, in order to prevent the people from making an ill use of this privilege of divorce. So that it often happened, that they changed their minds, and were reconciled before the instruments of divorce could be made out.'—(Religious Customs, vol. iii.) The divorced wife could not marry until the expiration of ninety days, a time during which she might return, and be reconciled to her husband.

[" * This has been supposed to refer to our Lord's words in Matt. xix. 11, 12. But the First Epistle to the Corinthians was probably written A. D. 57. We have no proof that St. Matthew's Gospel was written before 63; though the conjectures vary from 38, up to that time. St. Mark's Gospel could scarcely have been written before 64. Thus we want evidence that St. Paul could have seen any written document of our Lord's words on the subject, before he wrote his Epistle; though undoubtedly he might have received them from the disciples. But in this very chapter, (1 Cor. vii. 40,) he speaks of his direct inspiration: 'In this I think' (I am conscious) 'I have the Spirit of God.'

lieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband. Else were your children unclean; but now are they holy.'

["It is true that if the heathen partner, on either side, made a return to Heathenism the absolute condition of their continuing together, the Christian was not to be held bound by a bigotry, irrational, oppressive, and involving treason to Heaven. In that case, if the demand of separation were insisted on by the Heathen, the Christian was under no obligation to follow. 'If the unbelieving depart, let him depart.' But it is clear, that this established no divorce, and, in consequence, none of the rights issuing from divorce. Whether the husband had abandoned the wife, or the wife the husband, it was without justifiable cause. The one legal ground had not been alleged; the marriage-bond, therefore, virtually remained intact.

["What God had joined, no man, nor intolerance, nor superstition of man, could put asunder. However the bond may be dissolved by the forms of vitiated law, it is not the less existing; it still binds the conscience; the new marriage is not a new right, but a violation of the old. It lives to the last pulse of the frame." *]

2. The impediments which Romanists throw in the way of marriage are various; the principal of which is the reception of holy orders, or the adoption of a religious life, as it is termed. Thus they have added to the Levitical law, as well as to the prohibitions of the New Testament. The degrees of affinity, also, have been made void in numberless instances. The Pope granted to Henry VIII. a dispensation to marry his brother's wife while he was yet a true Catholic; and the Pontiff would doubtless have granted him subsequent divorces, had the politics of that Monarch suited his views, or could he have done so without giving offence to the Emperor of Germany.

Papists say that separation from bed and board may be admitted for several reasons; such as adultery, heresy, &c. But according to Scripture, fornication is the only exception. "For whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication," &c. (Matt. v. 32; xix. 9.)

It is unlawful for Christians to marry within the degrees prohibited by Scripture, nor can any human power authorize such association; for the equity of the law is founded on nature, and is of perpetual force. Wherefore the Pope of Rome, in granting these dispensations, hath erred egregiously.† The following are the reasons:—(1.) The law was, (Lev. xviii. 24,) that they should not defile themselves in any one of these things, because the Gentiles were guilty of this, and on that account were cast out before the children of Israel. Therefore it is a perpetual law. (2.) John the Baptist said to Herod, "It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife;" therefore the law forbidding it was not abrogated, being in force in our Saviour's time. (3.) St. Paul reproved the incestuous man who had his father's wife, (1 Cor. v. 1,) and excommunicated him on that account; a crime which was nowhere forbidden except in the law of Moses: therefore, that law concerning degrees of kindred continues in full force.

It is unlawful for the Church of Rome to restrain other degrees than those which are commanded in Scripture; such as forbidding marriage arising from spiritual kindred, of godfathers and godmothers, affinity of espousals, &c. To forbid more degrees in marriage than what are either directly or by necessary consequence prohibited in the law, is presumptuous, as the Most High best knew what persons were fit for marriage, and how far the line of marriage was intended to reach. The invention of spiritual kindred was a mere expedient to obtain money by granting dispensations; for, according to this rule, Christians ought not to intermarry, inasmuch as they are all of one family in Christ. The new affinity that cometh from espousals is of human invention, and ought not to be imposed on Christendom.

They say the vow of chastity, and entering into orders, loose the bonds of marriage. To this end they quote, "Having damnation, because they have forsaken their first faith." (1 Tim. v. 12.) The "first faith," Popish expositors say, was the vow of continency, which was a sufficient impediment to matrimony. But that this is a forced and wrong interpretation, we prove from the fact, that by their "first faith" is to be understood that which was exercised when they first believed on Christ, which certain wanton widows had forsaken. The Apostle afterward gives these widows licence to marry. Therefore this text does not assist the Papists, seeing that it was not a vow of chastity which was violated, but the faith of the Gospel.

That taking orders cannot dissolve marriage, we are certain, because our Saviour gives this perpetual rule, that no man should dismiss his wife except for fornication; but orders is not fornication; therefore a wife is not to be dismissed that the husband might receive them.

IV. Of the validity or invalidity of marriages.

1. The following distinctions are usually made by Roman Catholic Divines, when treating on the subject of matrimony. Matrimony may be considered in a threefold manner, either as a natural contract, or an office of nature, or as a civil contract; or as a sacrament of the new law. As a natural contract, or an office of nature, it is ordained for the propagation and preservation of the human species. As a civil or political contract, it consults the perpetuity and good of the republic; thus considered, it is regulated by political laws. As a sacrament of the new law, it secures grace for the married persons, it enriches the Church with a pious offspring, and tempers the ardour of concupiscence.* There is a great propriety

[* Dr. Croly on the divine Origin, Appointment, and Obligation of Marriage, pp. 15—22. 8vo. London, 1836.]

[† "The Church of Rome also prohibits the marriage of first cousins; but she grants a dispensation for the marriage, and even for that of uncle and niece; thus going farther than the strictness of the Mosaic code on one side, as it had done in Christianity, it alike relaxes the practice on the other, and in both instances relaxes it for revenue. If the Gospel declares the narrowness of the gate for the rich, Rome throws it open abundantly. Selling absolution for all things here, it extends its skill even beyond the grave, turns its imagination to account, and extorts gold out of purgatory."—Dr. Croly on Marriage.]

[* "Matrimonii contractus, ut omnes alii, quibusdam subjacet legibus et conditionibus quæ requiruntur ut licite aut valide contrahi possit. Illæ autem leges oriri possunt vel ex matrimonii natura et Dei institutione, vel a societate civili, vel tandem ab Ecclesia; prout matrimonium spectatur vel in ordine ad propagationem generis humani, vel in ordine ad bonum societatis civilis, vel in ordine ad bonum societatis Christianæ.

["Si spectetur prout est institutum in officium naturæ, ad propagationem generis humani, et lege naturali vel divina regitur, dicitur contractus naturalis; si spectetur prout legi civili subjacet, dicitur contractus civilis; si demum spectetur prout ordinem ducet ad bonum fidelium aut societatis Christianæ, et legibus Ecclesiæ regitur, dicitur contractus ecclesiasticus aut matrimonium ecclesiasticum.

["At hic sedulo notandum est, matrimonii contractum dici vel naturalem, vel civilem, vel ecclesiasticum, non quod revera triplex sit, sed ex eo quod idem contractus quo vir et fœmina sibi jus mutuum tradunt, sub triplici respectu consideratur, scilicet attendendo ad leges triplicis generis quibus subjacet, vel ab his abstrahendo.

["Matrimonium quatenus elevatum ad dignitatem sacramenti

in some parts of the foregoing distinctions; but when matrimony is made into a sacrament, and various ecclesiastical regulations are connected with it, so that marriage, as a natural contract, instituted by the Creator, is perverted, and these ecclesiastical laws are suffered to come in constant collision with wholesome political matrimonial regulations, so as either to suspend or to annul them; then such a sacramental character is neither scriptural nor useful, but tends to numerous political and ecclesiastical evils, as the history of Europe, and of the world, can testify. At present there are several questions connected with the validity of marriage, stated and answered by Popish Divines, which exhibit the high assumptions of the Papal hierarchy, and manifest its impious perversions of an ordinance of God. The following interrogatories, with their corresponding replies, throw light on this subject:—

2. "What are we to think of the marriages of heretics (Protestants) among themselves?—Answer. (1.) Their marriages, if celebrated according to the just laws of their country, are valid in the form of a contract. (2.) They possess not the nature of a sacrament, among those heretics who do not observe the rules of the Church of Rome, and have not a Priest to celebrate the marriages. These heretics, on account of their baptism, are subject to the Church. (3.) But if the inquiry is concerning those heretics who, using the rites of the Roman Church, and the ministry of Priests, contract marriage in their own conventicles, or, to shun certain evils, in the churches of Catholics, some suppose that they receive the sacrament. But this is in the sense when an external sign, having the power of conferring sacramental grace, is conferred on them. But it is certain that they do not receive the grace annexed to the sacrament. (4.) If this last class of Protestants, or heretics, struck with penitence, return to the Catholic Church, some suppose that they then receive the grace annexed to the institution, and their marriage rises to the nature of a sacrament, although formerly it was not one; but this opinion seems to be uncertain, nor is it supported by any foundation. (5.) According to the constant discipline of the Church, the marriages of heretics returning to the Catholic faith are not to be reiterated in the presence of the Church and with the nuptial blessing, if before their conversion they were validly married. This discipline is to be observed in practice, unless the Bishop decree otherwise. But if these heretics contracted marriage invalidly before their conversion, without doubt, on their returning to the Church, the marriage, with the nuptial blessing, is to be repeated; otherwise they live in fornication." *

3. The following, on the marriages of Roman Catholics solemnized by Protestants, is taken from Dens:—

"Whether matrimony between two Catholics, in the United Provinces of Belgium, contracted without the presence of a Priest, who can easily be obtained, in the presence of a Magistrate or non-Catholic Minister, is valid?—Answer. Negatively: because the Doctors are unanimous, that the law of the Council of Trent is there sufficiently received in the Catholic community. Catholics indeed are there compelled to contract marriage before a Magistrate, or a non-Catholic Minister, otherwise their marriages in civil matters are not valid; but the matrimonial contract before these is not valid: but afterward, in the presence of a Priest, they are compelled to be married anew, the rites of the Church prescribed by the Council of Trent being observed, and then the marriage is properly valid." *

The above will show in what light marriages celebrated among Protestants are viewed by the Church of Rome. Nothing, among them, can have any claims to sanctity or validity, unless Romish Priests officiate, and Romish rites are observed.

4. ["The marriage of Roman Catholics with heretics has universally been deprecated by the Court of Rome. If, however, such an association take place, a severe penance is imposed upon the offender, and a promise is extorted, that every effort shall be made to induce the heretical party to embrace the Romish faith. When persons of distinction offend in this manner, a dispensation from the Pontiff is necessary; but in the case of others, that of the Bishop is said to be sufficient. Two conditions are generally enacted, otherwise the dispensation, whether proceeding from the Pope or Bishop, is futile, and the parties concerned are considered as fornicators, with the great aggravation that the sin is committed with a heretic; † first, to use all endeavours to effect the conversion of the heretic to Popery; and, secondly, to promise upon oath, that all the children, the fruit of such marriage, be educated in the Romish religion."]

"Is it repugnant," says Dens, "to the substance of matrimony to educate the children in heresy, that is, that the sons should follow an heretical father in his own sect, and the daughters a Catholic mother?—Answer. Daelman observes, that if the Catholic party, entering matrimony under such condition, directly intended the education of the offspring in heresy, the marriage would be invalid: whence it is supposed," says he, "that she only obliges herself not to prevent such education. Schmier sustains that marriage, contracted under such a condition, as repugnant to the good of children, to be invalid; yet he confesses that he has no author agreeing with him.

"The reason of the disparity between this case and the preceding, concerning the education of offspring in positive infidelity, is given, because heresy is comprehended definiri potest: Sacramentum novæ legis quo gratia confertur ad sanctificandam legitimam viri et mulieris conjunctionem et ad præstanda officia quæ inde resultant. Hinc sacramentum non conficitur, nisi etiam adsit contractus validus qui sit ejus materia; nec distinguitur a contractu matrimoniali nisi quatenus ille fit, ex voluntate Christi, gratiæ productivus vel per se, vel accedente benedictione Sacerdotis."—Bailly, Theol., tom. vi., De Matrimonio, Proœm.

["Post eorum peccatum (primorum parentum) dicitur institutum in remedium contra vulnus peccati, in quantum Deo volente tum accessit matrimonio, quod foret concupiscentiæ remedium: est institutio minus rigorose dicta."—Dens Theol., tom. vii., De Matrimonio, No. 26, De Institutione Matrimonii.]

* Bailly, Theol., tom. vi., De Matrim., pars i., cap. i., sect. 2. De firmitate matrimonii apud infideles; an dissolvi possint eorum conjugia, &c.

[* "Quæritur, an matrimonium inter duos Catholicos in Fœderatis Belgii Provinciis contractum absque præsentia Parochi, qui facile haberi potest, coram Magistratu vel Ministro Acatholico sit validum?—R. Negative: quia concors est Doctorum sententia, legem Tridentini sufficienter ibidem esse receptam respectu communitatis Catholicorum. Coguntur quidem Catholici ibidem contrahere coram Magistratu vel Ministro Acatholico, alias eorum matrimonia in civilibus ibidem haberentur invalida; verum contractus ille matrimonialis coram istis non est validus; sed postea coram Parocho, seu Sacerdote Catholico contrahunt de novo, servatis a Tridentino præscriptis solennitatibus, et tunc proprie validum initur matrimonium."—Dens Theol., tom. vii., De Matrimonio, No. 113, De Matrimoniis Catholicorum in Hollandia.]

[† Hence the language of Dens, which we hesitate to present to our readers in an English dress: "Similiter Sanchez existimat in copula fornicaria partis Catholicæ cum hæretica reperiri malitiam contra religionem; quia quamvis validum sit matrimonium cum parte hæretica, per se tamen est illicitum et dedecus religionis, item ob periculum perversionis, educationis prolis in hæresi, quæ rationes militant etiam in copula fornicaria."—Idem, No. 70, De Imped. Mat. Dirimenti.] under the Christian religion generally so called, in some manner.

"Hence a stipulation of this kind is null, since it is repugnant to the obligation of parents. And although some endeavour to excuse such compact, while the Catholic party only obliges herself to permit such an education on account of shunning a greater evil in a community, where Catholics and Protestants live mingled together; nevertheless, it is to be observed, with Pontius, Braunman, and Reiffenstuel, that such marriage, with the express or tacit agreement, or under such condition that either all or some of the children, for example, that males should be educated in the sect of their heretical father, is always and everywhere unlawful, most wicked, and grievously sinful, against the natural obligation of parents, and contrary to divine and ecclesiastical right. For every parent is bound, from piety, to take care that her children be educated in the true faith, and should receive the necessary means of salvation. Therefore she cannot oblige herself by any promise or covenant, by which she would permit the education of her children in a damnable sect.

"Nor does usage and custom openly existing in several places make against this; for this compact is contrary to divine law, against which custom, though immemorial, operates nothing." *

["Take note," says the same authority, "that if a (Roman) Catholic knowingly contract marriage with a heretic, he cannot on that head separate himself from her, because he has renounced the right of divorce; except, however, unless the heretic promised her conversion, and would not stand to her promise: in like manner, if the Catholic knows that he is in imminent danger of losing the faith by cohabiting with a heretic." †

[The unblushing depravity of the above, needs no comment. If a Protestant female married to a Roman Catholic renounce not her religion at the bidding of the Priest, the marriage is pronounced invalid, and the husband may sue for a divorce. Nay, more, if an unprincipled and licentious monster in human shape wish to abandon his wife, he has only to declare that he is in danger of losing his faith by cohabiting with a heretic, and the marriage is dissolved. Such are some of the doctrines inculcated in the Theologia Moralis of Dens!]

From the foregoing, we are able to ascertain the true condition on which Roman Catholics are allowed to marry Protestants. In such cases the children must all be educated in the doctrines of the Church of Rome. The Protestant party may expect violent means to be used, if others will not suffice to effect a conversion to the true faith. Nor can any vows, promises, or oaths, made before marriage, be of any avail to give security, seeing all such are null and void by virtue of ecclesiastical decision, which must be respected. Besides, there is a promise, or rather an oath, exacted by the Priest, from every Roman Catholic who marries a Protestant, that he will cause the offspring to be instructed in his religion, and that all means will be employed to convert his wife from a damnable sect.

5. The extremities to which the Popes of Rome have carried their dispensations, receive a striking illustration in that which was granted to Henry, Prince of Wales, afterward Henry VIII., by which he was permitted to marry his brother's wife. Henry VII., for political reasons, consented to a marriage between Arthur, Prince of Wales, and Catharine, daughter of the King of Spain. They were married on the 14th of November, 1501, their bridal bed was solemnly blessed on the night of their marriage, and they lived together as man and wife till the death of the Prince on the 2d of April following. The reasons still continuing for the alliance between the two countries, Henry VII., after ascertaining the improbability of issue from the former alliance, proposed that Catharine should be married to his son Henry, who had recently been created Prince of Wales. Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, was against the union, while Fox, Bishop of Winchester, was in favour of it; who, to prevent the murmurs of the people, advised that the Pope's dispensation should be obtained, which would obviate all difficulties.

Accordingly a Bull was issued on the 26th of December, 1503, to this effect: "That the Pope, according to the greatness of his authority, having received a petition from Prince Henry and the Princess Catharine, stating, that whereas the Princess was lawfully married to Prince Arthur, who was dead without any issue; but they being desirous to marry for preserving peace between the crowns of England and Spain, did petition His Holiness for his dispensation; therefore the Pope, out of his care to maintain concord among all Catholic Kings, did absolve them from all censures under which they might be, and dispensed with the impediments of their affinity, notwithstanding any apostolical constitutions or ordinances to the contrary, and gave them leave to marry: or if they were already married, he, confirming it, required their Confessor to enjoin them some healthful penance, for their having married before the dispensation was obtained." *

The Pope readily granted the dispensation; and though many Cardinals and Divines were opposed to it, never-

[* "An autem conditio educandi prolem in hæresi, v. g., filii sequantur patrem hæreticum in sua secta, et filiæ matrem Catholicam, repugnet substantiæ matrimonii?

["R. Observat Daelman, quod si pars Catholica, sub tali conditione iniens matrimonium, directe intenderet educationem prolis in hæresi, invalidum foret matrimonium; unde supponitur, inquit, quod dumtaxat se obliget, quod talem educationem non sit impeditura. Schmier, tom. iii., lib. iv., tract. iii., cap. v., sustinet matrimonium sub tali conditione contractum, tanquam bono prolis repugnans, esse invalidum: fatetur tamen, se non habere auctorem sibi consentientem.

["Ratio disparitatis inter hunc casum et præcedentem, de educanda prole in infidelitate positiva, datur, quod hæresis sub religione Christiana generaliter dicta aliquo modo comprehendatur.

["Irrita interim est hujusmodi stipulatio, cum repugnet obligationi parentum; et licet aliqui conentur tale pactum excusare, dum compars Catholica tantum se obligat ad permittendam talem educationem ex causa vitandi majoris mali in communitate, ubi Catholici et hæretici permixti vivunt; attamen dicendum cum Pontio, Braunman, et Reiffenstuel, simile matrimonium, cum expresso aut tacito pacto, vel sub conditione, 'ut vel omnes vel aliquæ proles, v. g., masculæ educentur in secta patris hæretici,' semper et ubique esse illicitum, iniquissimum, et graviter peccaminosum contra naturalem parentum obligationem, ac contra jus divinum et ecclesiasticum; etenim quivis parentum tenetur ex pietate curare, ut proles in vera fide educetur, mediaque ad salutem necessaria acquirat: ergo non potest pacto se obligare, quo permitteret educationem prolis in secta damnabili.

["Nec contra faciunt usus et consuetudo palam in pluribus locis existentes: nam pactum hoc est contra jus divinum, contra quod consuetudo etiam immemorialis nihil operatur."—Idem, No. 41, De Conditione educandi Prolem in Infidelitate vel in Hæresi.]

[† "Nota, quod si Catholicus scienter contrahat matrimonium cum parte hæretica, non possit ex eo capite se ab ea separare; quia renunciavit jura divortii; excipe tamen, nisi hæreticus conversionem suam promisisset, nec staret promissis; item si Catholicus sciat sibi imminere periculum amittendæ fidei ex cohabitatione cum hæretica."—Idem, No. 61, De Divortio.]

* Burnet's Hist. of the Reform., vol. i., book ii, p. 46. Collection of Records, No. 1. London, 1825.

theless the interests of the Papacy, which are preferred to all other considerations, seemed to demand it. The Pope being the enemy of Louis XII., the French King, would do any thing in his power in opposition to him; he was also a warlike Pontiff, and much more influenced by political than religious considerations. Multitudes of cases might be adduced, in which the Pope has contravened the law of God in reference to the institution of marriage.

That which is particularly worthy of observation is, the fact that by the overruling providence of God the dispensations which were granted to Henry VIII. furnished occasion for the rejection of the Papal power in England, and prepared the way for the Reformation. "Whom God hath joined together let not man put asunder," is a precept with which no human power can dispense. Yet the Pope did attempt it, in the case of Henry and Catharine; and he would have continued his presumptuous interference, had not his worldly policy prevented. His dispensations respecting marriage in this country gave rise to proceedings which terminated in the prostration of Popery, and in opening a door for the Gospel. The doctrine and practice of indulgences furnished an occasion for the Reformation in Germany.

[The disgraceful flippancy which is manifest in the writings of Romish Divines, when treating on the subject of divorce, cannot fail to meet with merited execration from all who are interested in the prosperity of the commonwealth. Were such baneful doctrines as those which are inculcated on these subjects received, the frame-work of civil society would speedily be broken in pieces. If society is to exist, it must be by honouring the great principle of society. Marriage must be held INDISSOLUBLE: and it is indissoluble because it is DIVINE.

["It will be found," observes Dr. Croly, "that the more or less rapid advance of public depravity was closely regulated by the comparative facility of divorce. In all nations the era of reverence for marriage had been the era of national virtue. For the first five hundred years of ancient Rome, the time when all the foundations of its power were laid, divorce was unknown.* But in all lands, its tendency, when once begun, was to adopt grounds more and more frivolous, until it became the mere indulgence of volatility, captiousness, and passion. Is the evidence to be still demanded? Unhappily, we are not left to wander for it through Roman or Grecian remembrances. We have more substantial proof than is to be painfully recovered out of the dust of the world gone by. The great bank and deposit of pagan evil has found a more than competitor in the redundant mischief of our own day. It may be a lesson to the lovers of democracy, if that last frenzy of nations is to be disciplined by any thing short of the scourge and the chain; that in the French Republic, we have examples of atrocity, which make it altogether useless to go back to Heathenism. The dried specimens of human vice to be found within the old book of treason to God and man, are thin and colourless to the strong succulence, and living poison, of the plant that may be gathered by the hand from the republican swamp of mire and blood. It is in no desire of dwelling on such horrors, that I recur to the French Revolution; but never was a mightier, or more speaking, document put into the hand of nations still capable of being saved. We see in it the whole natural progress of public guilt; from the infant contagion, to the terrible maturity, when it went forth, spreading pestilence through the world, and even at this hour, an object of just and general fear; the earth that was so eagerly thrown over it, melting away before the eye; and the naked, revolutionary form, in life or death, equally abhorred, palpably gathering new life in the grave, perhaps at no distant period to return armed with a still subtler venom; and as it once covered Europe with corpses, come to slay the European mind.

["All national sufferings date their birth from national vice. The corruption of the marriage-bond was the origin and sign of the general dissolution of manners in France.

["At length marriage was declared to be simply a civil contract. Europe then had evidence of the natural operation of this ignorant and lawless principle, in the clearest point of view. In a nation distinguished for its emulous homage to the sex, one of the most highly cultivated by literature, the most enlightened by science, and even the most ostentatious of the romance and refinements of life; in France, the boasted soil of all the sensibilities, woman was instantly sunk into a state of degradation scarcely exampled in the most profligate or most barbarian scenes of Paganism. In 1793, in the first year of the Republic, that Republic which was to bring back the golden age of public and personal virtue, the decree was issued which sanctioned divorce for incompatibility of disposition. What was the direct consequence? A cloud of abomination, dark as if it rose from the bottomless pit, covered the land; vice became universal. Within three months the registered divorces in the capital alone amounted to above five hundred. In little more than this year of horror, the divorces of France approached twenty thousand! But how small a proportion must those public and formal acts of guilt have borne to those which neglected or disdained the forms of law! Or what must we think of the state of society, which could actu-

["* 'The first recorded Roman divorce was that of Spurius Corvilius Ruga, about the 505th year of Rome. The Censors having made some ordinances with respect to the failure of the population, Ruga, whose wife had not borne him children, divorced her, and married another. This act greatly offended the people; Montesquieu, however, thinks that the offence arose from popular jealousy of the censorial power. (Esprit des Loix, xvi.) Gibbon conceives, with some probability, that the absence of divorce may have been partially owing to the heathen inferiority of women. The slave unable to renounce her tyrant, the tyrant unwilling to relinquish his slave. The severity of the fine enacted by Romulus, (one-half of the husband's goods forfeited to the wife, and the other to the goddess Ceres,) must also have operated powerfully as a bar, if it were strictly imposed, which seems improbable; yet there can be no doubt that the purity of women was regarded as essential in the earlier times. The injury and death of Lucretia overthrew a dynasty.

["'But, once begun, divorces multiplied. The most trivial reason became sufficient: Gallus put away his wife for having seen her head uncovered in the street; Vetus, because his wife had been seen conversing with women of low condition; Sophus, because his wife had been seen at a public show; Cæsar, as is well known, because she had been suspected; Augustus, because he disliked her temper. There was even divorce without any reason required, named Repudium sine ulla querela. Those mentioned were apparently all of high rank. The Consul Æmilius sent away his wife, declaring that he would assign no reason for it. The profligacy of manners under those circumstances became excessive. The women soon demanded a similar privilege of divorce, and, of course, of marrying whom they would. Seneca indignantly declares, that they had begun to reckon not by the years of the Consuls, but by the number of husbands whom they had thus summarily adopted, and sent away.

["'Augustus attempted to stop this career, and made the sin against marriage high treason, and the penalty death. But the popular vice was too strong, even for despotism. At the accession of Severus, there were three thousand prosecutions for this especial crime. The divorces were innumerable, and on innumerable grounds. The ceremony was at last simplified into the mere sending a letter of separation, by a slave. It had its name, renunciatio, from this practice, as conveyed by a messenger.'—Tebbs on Divorce.

ally require, to meet it, so total a perversion of all the ideas of descent, as the statute which followed; a statute declaring an equality of rights in children, born 'in and out of matrimony?' A law against all law.*

["The ultimate evil was for the nation; but the first misery was for the women. The wretchedness of the hundreds and thousands of those helpless beings, thus suddenly cast loose upon the world, (for it is only justice to the sex to acknowledge, that the desertion was chiefly on the side of the husband,) the sudden sense of insult and ingratitude, the stings of soul, the natural fear of utter destitution, the deplorable struggles to avert actual famine, the still more deplorable temptations by which guilt earns the bread of despair, the severance of parents and children, the universal plunge of the public mind into one gloomy depth of vice and sorrow, defy all language. The colours of that picture are scarcely to be mixed by the human hand; the true agonies of the hour are to be revealed only when the grave keeps its secrets no more, and the injurer and the injured are alike summoned before the final throne.

["The heart can scarcely trust itself with the simplest scene among the thousands that disfigured life in those days of wretchedness. The wife, perhaps a high-minded, pure, and loving creature, suddenly forced into the presence of some base tribunal; there to be mingled with the rabble of culprits, the refuse of the streets and the gaol; and in the scoffs of the low, the laughter of the profligate, and, bitterest of all, in the hardened brow of the frigid villain who had flung her off, read the sentence of her ruin, before it fell from the mock depository of justice. From that day she was to be a wife no more. The brute law of caprice, clothed in the power of a polluted national will, was to extinguish for ever all her pledges of heart and hand. She was to be driven from her home; to see it usurped by another, probably that other, one with whose name she would not have stained her lips; she was to fall at the instant, from all the graceful enjoyments of her condition into desolateness. Her children were to be hers no longer, or hers only to share the bitter communion of her poverty and her tears. She whom once the very winds of heaven had not been suffered to visit too roughly, must seek some hovel where to lay her head. She must exert the relics of those fine tastes which formed the ornament of her earlier days, to obtain bread for her infants; until, having gone through the whole gradation of suffering, and exhausted all, health, mind, and hope, she withered into the grave.

["But is there not a still more appalling conception? The career of the woman conscious of her beauty and her powers; taking a terrible revenge on the world that had undone her; rushing back, after the first shock of her feelings, into the midst of its heated festivity, to tempt and to betray; dazzling, reckless, and desperate; filling the cup of vice to the brim, and forcing it on every lip round the circle; pampered with passion, a noble and undone being, a brilliant and unhappy wretch, until her course, too, was run; a brief and bitter stage alone lay between her and the tomb, and she perished in her pride; with her wasted talents, her maddened sensibilities, her serpent beauty, stretched upon a pauper's bier, and sinking from pang to pang of heart, until it broke, and all was done. A fallen angel, and, like it, fallen for ever!"*]

["* Alison, the latest and most authentic historian of the Revolution, thus describes this period: 'Marriage was declared a civil contract, binding only during the pleasure of the contracting parties. Divorce became general. The corruption of manners reached a pitch unknown in the worst days of the monarchy. The vices of the Marquises and Countesses of Louis XV. descended to the shopkeepers and artisans of Paris. So indiscriminate did this vice become, that by a decree of the Convention, bastards were declared entitled to an equal share of the succession with legitimate children. The divorces in Paris in the first three months of 1793, were 562, while the marriages were only 1785, a proportion probably unexampled among mankind. The consequence soon became apparent. Before the era of the Consulate, one-half of the births in Paris were illegitimate. And at this moment, (1835,) notwithstanding the apparent reformation which has taken place since the Revolution (of 1830), the dissolution of manners is extreme.'—History of Europe, vol. ii., p. 91.

["'The well-known Abbé Gregoire, in a Report on the subject, drawn up by a Committee of the National Convention, pronounces that the law of divorce threatened the depopulation of France: Vraiment cette loi-ci veut bientot desoler toute la nation. But, in a people more allied to ourselves, the effect of this laxity of divorce seems to be already growing formidable. In the single town of Newhaven, in the United States, more than fifty divorces had happened within five years from the extension of the divorce laws. And in the state of Connecticut, more than four hundred in the same period, averaging one in every hundred married couples!'—Tebbs, 248."

[* Croly on the Divine Origin, Appointment, and Obligation of Marriage, pp. 27—31. 8vo. London, 1836.]

BOOK III.

GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

CHAPTER I.

THE CHURCH.

I. NAME AND DEFINITION. 1. Meaning of the word in general: 2. Particular meaning: 3. Bellarmine's definition—its absurdity: 4. Not supported by antiquity.—II. SCRIPTURE CHARACTER OF THE TRUE CHURCH. 1. It receives and holds the true doctrine: 2. Has an apostolic ministry: 3. Has true sacraments: 4. And exercises a pure discipline.—III. MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH. 1. Are of two classes: 2. Improper persons occasionally become members: 3. The proper members of the Church: 4. The views given defended: 5. Roman Catholic definition of a church faulty: 6. Of the unbaptized as members: 7. Heretics and apostates: 8. Schismatics: 9. The excommunicate: 10. Papists teach that open and scandalous sinners and concealed heretics are members. Their Divines cited. Discordant sentiments.—IV. OF THE CHURCH AS VISIBLE, OR INVISIBLE. 1. Sentiments of Protestants faulty: 2. Protestant distinction: 3. Definition of Dens: 4. Renovation of heart and newness of life necessary. Four proofs of this: 5. Outlines of morality from the General Rules of the Wesleyans: 6. Notes of the Church.—V. UNITY OF THE CHURCH. 1. The union taught in Scripture: 2. Unity of itself not a true note: 3. Popish plea for unity unfounded: 4. Adhesion to the Pope no proper mark of unity. Various arguments on this head: 5. No parallel between the agreement of Scripture, and the decrees of Popes and Councils: 6. The decrees of Councils differ among themselves: 7. So also do those of Popes: 8. True character of Roman Catholic unity. Numerous traits of it: 9. Alterations in Popish divinity at different times. Five species given: 10. Papists internally divided by their different orders, schools, &c.: 11. Are divided on the rule of faith: 12. Their unity defective in its head: 13. They differ on the limits and extent of the Pope's authority: 14. On the extent and prerogatives of the Church: 15. On the doctrines of grace, predestination, human liberty, and original sin: 16. On morals: 17 On the sacraments: 18. On the mode of instructing Christians: 19. On the immaculate conception. The Bull Unigenitus: 20. Their principles necessarily divisive. Instances of this. Divines cited: 21. Exact uniformity of opinion not necessary. Proofs of this: 22. Protestants united in a great degree. Points of agreement: 23. Their unity preferable to that of Rome: 24. Importance of scriptural unity. Mistakes of the early Christians on this point.

I. Name and definition of the term "church."

1. The word εκκλησια, "church," means an "assembly" or "congregation" of any kind, the nature of which is to be gathered from connecting circumstances. It is used for the mob, or confused rabble collected together against Paul. (Acts xix. 32—39.) The word is derived from εκκαλεω, "to call out of," or "from;" that is, an assembly gathered out of a multitude. It must have some other word joined with it to determine its nature; as, "the church of God," "the church of Christ." It is understood of the collective body of Christians, or all those over the face of the earth who profess to believe in Christ, and who acknowledge him to be the Saviour of mankind. This is called "the visible church." (Eph. iii. 21; iv. 11, 12; 1 Tim. iii. 15.) By the word "church" also, we understand the whole body of God's chosen people in every period of time; which is "the invisible church." Those on earth are called "the militant," and those in heaven are designated "the triumphant, church." (Heb. xii. 23; Acts xx. 28; Eph. i. 22; Matt. xvi. 18.)

2. The word "church" denotes also in Scripture a particular congregation of Christians united together, and meeting in one place for the solemn worship of God: hence, "the church which was in the house of Aquila and Priscilla;" (Rom. xvi. 3, 5; 1 Cor. xvi. 19;) and "the church which was in the house of Nymphas." (Col. iv. 15.) We have also an account of several churches existing in one place or province; as the seven churches which were in Asia, the churches of Achaia, of Judea, &c.

3. The following definition of Bellarmine is generally adopted by most Roman Catholics: "The church is an assembly of men, united in the profession of one and the same Christian faith, and in the communion of the same sacraments, under the government of their lawful Pastors, but especially of the Roman Pontiff."*

"That the church of Christ has a visible unity throughout the world, under the Pope as a visible head, is manifestly contradicted by the language of the Apostles, who, while they teach there is but one church, composed of believers throughout the whole world, think it not at all inconsistent with this view to speak of 'the churches of Judea,' 'of Achaia,' 'the seven churches of Asia,' 'the church of Ephesus,' &c. Among themselves the Apostles had no common head; but planted churches, and gave directions for their government, in most cases without any apparent correspondence with each other. The Popish idea of a church is not found in their writings; and so far were they from making provision for the government of this one supposed church, by the appointment of one visible and exclusive head, that they provide for the government of the respective churches raised up by them in a totally different manner; that is, by the ordination of Ministers for each church, who are indifferently called Bishops, Presbyters, and Pastors. The only unity of which they speak is the unity of the whole church in Christ, the invisible head by faith; and the unity produced by 'fervent love toward each other.'

4. "Nor has the Popish doctrine of the visibility of the church any countenance from early antiquity. Shortly after the Apostles, all the churches of a province were formed into one large ecclesiastical body, which, like confederate states, assembled at certain times, in order to deliberate on the common interests of the whole. No very large association, however, of churches assembled till toward the close of the second century, which sufficiently refutes the Papal argument from antiquity."*

* "Ecclesia est cœtus hominum unius et ejusdem fidei Christianæ professione, et eorumdem sacramentorum communione conjunctus, sub regimine legitimorum Pastorum ac præcipue Romani Pontificis."—Vide Liebermann. Theol., tom. ii., pars i.; De vera Christi Ecclesia, cap. i.; Qualis esse debeat Christi Ecclesia.

Some observations on the nature of the true church of Christ may be necessary before we examine particularly the claims of the Popish hierarchy to be the only true church.

II. Scriptural character or marks of the true church of Christ.

The following characteristics we find attached to the true church of Christ: they are briefly set before the reader, not as a complete enumeration of those marks which the Holy Spirit has furnished, but as the most prominent which are recognised in the sacred writings.

1. The true church receives and retains the doctrine or faith of the inspired Apostles. It is "built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone." (Eph. ii. 20.) "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." (1 Cor. iii. 11.) Faith is the medium which unites us to Christ; and his doctrine, which is the object of faith, is the foundation of the church.

To establish, then, the claims of any association to be the true church of Christ, it is indispensably necessary that it should hold the same truths which the inspired Prophets and Apostles taught, and which are contained in the canonical Scriptures. This test is laid down by the Saviour himself: "My sheep hear my voice, and they follow me." (John x. 27.) "A stranger will they not follow." (John x. 5.) St. John also says: "Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son." (2 John 9.) "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed." (2 John 10.) From these and other similar passages, it is evident that all societies which hold or teach doctrines contrary to the written word of God, are heretical in proportion to the number and magnitude of their errors. From these the true church withdraws herself, and expels them from her communion, after suitable efforts to reclaim them.

The duty of testing the doctrines of all persons and societies by the Scriptures is repeatedly enjoined. "Search the Scriptures," said the Saviour to the Jews. (John v. 39.) "Try the spirits," saith St. John. (1 John iv. 1.) St. Luke eulogizes the Bereans for comparing the preaching even of St. Paul himself with the sacred records. (Acts xvii. 11.)

It is not the sentiments of Fathers, Pontiffs, or Bishops, but of Prophets and Apostles, which constitute the foundation of the faith of the church. Assuredly we should honour the Fathers, and pay them all the respect and deference that the holiness of their lives, the excellence of their knowledge, and the antiquity of their characters, deserve. But at the same time we should remember, they were fallible men, the subjects of infirmity and of error. It is the word of God, uttered and committed to writing by the Apostles, that alone is infallible, and is entitled, by way of emphasis, "the truth." St. Augustine, therefore, when refuting the Donatists, says: "Let them show me their church; not in the councils of their Bishops, not in the writings of disputers, not in the miracles and prodigies of which they boast; but let them show it me in the ordinances of the law, in the predictions of the Prophets, in the songs of the Psalms, in the preaching of the Evangelists, and in the canonical authorities of the sacred books. This is our foundation, to which we inviolably attach ourselves, reposing only upon this Scripture, which is come from the Prophets and Apostles."

Apostolic doctrine is the first test of the true church, which St. Paul emphatically designates, "the pillar and ground of the truth." (1 Tim. iii. 15.) If this be wanting, no other quality, not even that of apostolic succession, can avail. If those to whom the ministry were confided become apostate, they must be regarded in the same light as Generals, or officers, who, though commissioned by their Government or King, have forsaken their loyalty, disobeyed their orders, and indulged in treasonable practices. Gregory Nazianzen, in his eulogy upon Athanasius, says: "This is the law of the family of God, that it is neither flesh nor blood, nor the transmission of pulpits and benefices, which constitutes the succession, but the Spirit of Jesus Christ;" and, quoting from Tertullian, he observes, "If there be any heresies, which venture to plant themselves in the midst of the age of the Apostles, that they may therefore be thought to have been handed down from the Apostles, we may say, let them make known the originals of their churches; let them unfold the roll of their Bishops, so coming down in succession from the beginning, that their first Bishop had for his ordainer and predecessor some one of the Apostles, or of apostolic men, so he were one that continued steadfast with the Apostles. For in this manner do the apostolic churches reckon their origin; as the church of Smyrna recounteth that Polycarp was placed there by John; as that of Rome doth that Clement was in like manner ordained by Peter. Just so can the rest also show those, whom the Apostles, having appointed them to the episcopate, account to be the transmitters of the apostolic seed. Let heretics invent something of the same sort; for after blasphemy what is withholden from them? But even though they invent it, they will advance never a step; for their doctrine, when compared with that of the Apostles, will, of itself, declare, that by the difference and contrariety between them, it had neither an Apostle for its author, nor any apostolic man; because, as the Apostles would not have taught things differing from each other, so neither would apostolic men have set forth things contrary to the Apostles, except such men as, having departed from the Apostles, preached a different doctrine! To this test, then, they will be challenged by those churches, which, although they can bring forward as their founder no one of the Apostles or of apostolic men, as being of much later date, and indeed being founded daily, nevertheless, since they agree in the same faith, are, by reason of their consanguinity in doctrine, counted not the less apostolical. So let all heresies, when challenged by our churches to both these tests, prove themselves apostolical in whatever way they think themselves to be so. But in truth, they neither are so, nor can they prove themselves to be what they are not, nor are they received into union and communion by churches in any way apostolical, to wit, because they are in no way apostolical, by reason of the difference of the sacred mystery which they teach." *

* Watson's Biblical Dictionary, art. Church, No. 3.

[* "Ceterum si quæ audent interserere se ætati apostolicæ, ut ideo videantur ab Apostolis traditæ, quia sub Apostolis fuerunt: possumus dicere, edant ergo origines ecclesiarum suarum; evolvant ordinem Episcoporum suorum, ita per successiones ab initio decurrentem, ut primus ille Episcopus aliquem ex Apostolis, vel apostolicis viris, qui tamen cum Apostolis perseveraverit, habuerit auctorem et antecessorem. Hoc enim modo ecclesiæ apostolicæ census suos de-

2. The second mark of the true church is an apostolical ministry.

The office of the ministry, if not absolutely necessary to the existence of the church, is requisite to its well-being. It was the ordinary means appointed by God for its formation, which consists in calling men into the light of the Gospel, and uniting them in Christian communion and fellowship. It is the means appointed by the Most High for the increase and edification of the church; for it is the office of the ministry to feed the flock with the divine word, to guide it with the pastoral rod of discipline, and to administer unto it the holy sacraments. So evidently necessary is this office to the church, that none dispute it; all religious societies, however distracted by the wildest misrule and disorder, pretend to have the ministerial office established among them.

The Scriptures instruct us, that a divine vocation is necessary to the exercise of this ministry; so that none may presume to discharge its functions, till he be first legitimately invested with the office. "No man taketh this honour to himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron." (Heb. v. 4.) "How," says the same Apostle, "shall they preach, except they be sent?" (Rom. x. 15.) They are called "watchmen;" (Ezek. iii. 17;) but watchmen must be appointed by persons in authority: "messengers;" (2 Cor. viii. 23;) but they must be commissioned by the Master: "ambassadors;" (2 Cor. v. 20;) such, however, do not act upon their own authority, they must be furnished with credentials: "stewards;" (1 Cor. iv. 1;) yet these must have the charge of the keys intrusted to them by the Lord of the house. In a word, every representation given of the ministerial character in Scripture, conveys with it the idea of an office bestowed by divine investiture and vocation.

In the ancient Scriptures, the Jews were frequently warned against false prophets, whom God declared "he had not sent." (Jer. xxiii. 32.) In the Scriptures of the New Testament, the Apostles utter similar admonitions. (2 Peter ii. 1.) Our blessed Lord said, "Many false prophets shall rise, and shall deceive many." (Matt. xxiv. 11.) And in the Revelation of St. John he utters the following commendation to the Angel or Bishop of the Ephesian Church: "Thou hast tried them which say they are Apostles, and are not, and hast found them liars." (Rev. ii. 2.)

It is therefore evident, that men may pretend to be Ministers of Christ, who have no right to that title; that it is the duty of Christians to test their pretensions; and that there must be some standard to which all might appeal, otherwise it would be absurd to require that we should examine or guard against them.

What, then, is the vocation to the ministry of which the Scriptures speak?

To understand this, some have distinguished two sorts of vocation, which they denominate an internal and an external calling. By the former is meant that disposition of mind which a person feels who is powerfully influenced by the grace of God to consecrate himself to the work of the Christian ministry; by the latter, the public recognition and investiture of a person with this office and charge.

It should be observed, that in order to constitute a legitimate call to the ministry, both should be united. The mind ought to be disposed by the Holy Spirit to desire this office; at the same time, such a disposition, however necessary it may be as a qualification for the work, does not of itself constitute a scriptural call. Man is often the subject of self-deception. Not only is he occasionally ignorant of the motives that govern him, which self-love may often disguise, but he may also be under the influence of irrational impulses; and a mere impulse of the mind will not serve to furnish credentials sufficient to satisfy the minds of others. If this were enough, then every fanatic, however wild his delusions, might put in a claim to our deference and credit.

There must, of necessity, be some credentials duly sealed and certified, by which the mission may be attested to the world. There must also be some exterior vocation by which the office may be made known. This may be either immediate or mediate. If it be immediately from God, without the intervention of men, as was the vocation of Moses, St. Paul, and others, then must it be attested, as in their case, with extraordinary endowments as proof. But if it be mediate, or by the intervention of men, as in the case of the Jewish priesthood and also in that of the primitive Christian ministry, then it must be conferred by authorized persons, and miraculous endowments are unnecessary.

Ordination, by men duly authorized from God, is necessary to constitute a legitimate ministry. If any should object, and say, that ordination is only a ceremony, let them remember, that it is one of divine appointment. The consecration of the Jewish priesthood was a ceremony; but without it the office could not be sustained. The anointing of Kings was a ceremony; but it was absolutely necessary to the exercise of regal duty. The baptism of Christ was a ceremony; but he declared, "Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." (Matt. iii. 15.)

It is proper to observe, that neither the wicked, the unqualified, nor those destitute of Christian grace, are eligible for the Christian ministry; nor can any individuals, whether Bishops or others, appoint them. "For a Bishop," or Pastor, "must be blameless, the husband of one wife," &c. (1 Tim. iii. 2.)

3. Apostolic sacraments are a mark of the true church. These are baptism and the Lord's supper; which are clearly exhibited in the holy Scripture, as ordinances binding on every Christian.

4. The establishment and exercise of a pure discipline is also an indispensable mark of the true church. Holiness is a distinguishing feature. Sincere believers are called "saints," or holy persons; whose hearts are purified by faith, who shun every known sin, and who bring forth all the fruits of the Spirit in their hearts and lives.

ferunt; sicut Smyrnæorum ecclesia Polycarpum ab Johanne conlocatum refert; sicut Romanorum, Clementem a Petro ordinatum; id et proinde utique et ceteræ exhibent, quos Apostoli in episcopatum constitutos apostolici seminis traduces habeant. Confingant tale aliquid hæretici. Quid enim illis post blasphemiam inlicitum est? Sed etsi confinxerint, nihil promovebunt. Ipsa enim doctrina eorum, cum apostolica comparata, ex diversitate et contrarietate sua pronunciabit, neque Apostoli alicujus auctoris esse neque apostolici; quia sicut Apostoli non diversa inter se docuissent, ita et apostolici non contraria Apostolis edidissent, nisi illi qui ab Apostolis desciverunt, et aliter prædicaverunt. Ad hanc itaque formam provocabuntur ab illis ecclesiis, quæ licet nullam ex Apostolis vel apostolicis auctorem suum proferant, ut multo posteriores, quæ denique quotidie instituuntur; tamen in eadem fide conspirantes, non minus apostolicæ deputantur pro consanguinitate doctrinæ. Ita omnes hæreses, ad utramque formam nostris ecclesiis provocatæ, probent se quaqua putant apostolicas. Sed adeo nec sunt, nec possunt probare, quod non sunt; nec recipiuntur in pacem et communicationem ab ecclesiis quoquo modo apostolicis; scilicet, ob diversitatem sacramenti, nullo modo apostolicæ."—Tertul. Opera, tom. ii., De Præscript. Hæret., cap. xxxii. Wirceb., 1781.]

The Christian vocation is emphatically termed a "holy calling."

It is admitted, that some, who are professedly members of the church, may indulge in secret sins; but as they are concealed, they cannot render the guilty party liable to discipline. It is also granted, that in the purest churches, discipline may occasionally be exercised by its administrators too leniently. Still, as secret offenders may ere long become public transgressors, a vigilant ministry and a holy people will soon detect the hypocrites, and expel them when they are discovered. A few may for a while mingle with the good; but these cannot constitute the character of the community. A pure church will drive from it all scandals. It will not allow those guilty of known or notorious crimes to remain in communion with it. Private admonition, public censure, and even excommunications, will be requisite, according to the nature of the offence, and the degree to which the church may be polluted.

But if discipline be neglected, and men be permitted without restraint to live in open transgression, then such a society is destitute of an essential mark of a Christian church. Such an association is "a synagogue of Satan." (Rev. iii. 9.) "For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? And what communion hath light with darkness?" (2 Cor. vi. 14.) Purity of character and conduct must at all times distinguish the spouse of Christ.

III. Of the members of the church.

1. Those who are collected into the church of Christ may be considered in a twofold view. Some are inwardly renewed by the Holy Ghost; are sanctified by the Spirit, are implanted in Christ, and live piously. These are the true and living members of the church. Others are destitute of regeneration and holiness, are joined only to the outward visible society of the church, which consists in a profession of the faith, and the use of the sacraments. The former are the true and living members, who receive spiritual life and energy from Christ, the Head; the latter are useless and dead. One belongs to the church internally; the other externally: the former, in respect of their interior and spiritual conjunction with Christ; the latter, in regard of external custom, profession, and association.

Two things are therefore to be proved here. In the first place, that there are more or less unsanctified persons in the community of the church; and, secondly, that the church is properly and principally called a society, or congregation of saints or holy people.

2. (1.) There are unsanctified persons in the society of the church. If it could be said, that in the church there existed any considerable number of impious or flagrantly wicked individuals, this might be understood of open and vicious transgressors, who ought to be excluded from the church. Such unrenewed persons, as have not the power of godliness, and are not seeking it, may be mingled with true members of the church, by consenting to a profession of faith, and by receiving the sacraments; inasmuch as the church cannot always discern their true character, it being her province to separate from her members those who are obstinate heretics, manifestly wicked persons, together with those who do not use the appointed means of grace; as reading the Scripture, prayer, public worship, &c. The following are the proofs which we adduce:—(i.) As God alone can judge the heart, and as some counterfeit, for a time, the character of Christians, the utmost vigilance of man cannot always preserve the church entirely free from unsound professors. (ii.) We find some of this character in the churches of Judea, Corinth, Galatia, &c. (iii.) The state of human society is such, that even to the end of the world there will be more or less of the unsanctified associating with the people of God. This is exhibited in various parables of our Lord: and though these representations give no countenance to the fact, nevertheless, this worldly admixture will occasionally find its way into the church.

3. (2.) The true church is properly a congregation of holy or pious persons. This is proved by the following:—

(i.) The church of God is the "body of Christ;" but the mere profession of Christianity cannot make a man a member of this body. "In Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision availeth any thing;" nothing "but a new creature;" nothing but "faith that worketh by love;" and "keeping the commandments of God." "Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ?" "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you?" (1 Cor. vi. 15, 19.) Whoever is a true and genuine member of this body, is governed by the Holy Spirit; and consequently he who has not this indwelling Spirit is not governed thereby, and is not really a member of Christ's body, the church. And since all the members of Christ are governed by the Holy Spirit, therefore wicked men cannot be members of Christ's church, because they are not thus governed. They are dead and unprofitable members, and do not constitute legitimate portions of this community.

(ii.) Sincere members of the church are "born of God" by the Spirit, and are "the sons of God." (John i. 12.) They are "heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." (Rom. viii. 17.) "They are led by the Spirit." (Verse 14.) They imitate the works of their heavenly Father. (Matt. v. 45.) Those who have not this Spirit of Christ are none of his. (Rom. viii. 9.) It is manifest, therefore, that these properties belong only to the regenerated, and not to any class of mere outward professors. The expression, "He that hath not the church for his mother hath not God for his Father," can be understood only of those sons who are such by regeneration. For they who are sons, not by regeneration, but by association and the creed which may be held, are the children of the wicked one, and not the sons of God, and the true catholic church, properly so called. Bellarmine, in order to show that the mali, "wicked," may be designated the sons of God, when they believe in the doctrines of Christianity, reasons thus: "The word 'son' may be taken in a threefold sense. First, on account of production; secondly, on account of imitation; thirdly, on account of doctrine. The wicked are the sons of God, not on account of regeneration, but on account of doctrine; yet this is a sufficient reason why they should be called the sons of the Church."*

(iii.) Members of the church are called "the sheep of Christ," and are thus described: "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand." (John x. 27, 28.) This description agrees not with those who are only externally united with the church.

* "Filii nomen tripliciter sumi: primo, ratione productionis, secundo, ratione imitationis, tertio, ratione doctrinæ. Malos esse Dei filios, non quidem ratione regenerationis, sed tamen ratione doctrinæ; idque sufficere ut possint dici ecclesiæ filii."—Bellarm. de Regener.

(iv.) They are also distinguished from the bad, or wicked, because they forsake sin, do all the good in their power, and use the means of grace. By these traits are they known among men. Such is their outward character; and to distinguish them from professors, who have only a name, they "worship God in the Spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh."

4. The foregoing distinction may be justified and defended, by the consideration that the church is a congregation of saints, or true believers, to which, in the present state, hypocrites and unholy persons may be joined in external society. We maintain that hypocrites, wicked persons, and concealed infidels, as long as they remain such, are not true members of the church, although they may profess, externally, the same faith, and partake of the same sacraments.

Not that there are two churches or two societies. They are parts of the one visible association. But the truly pious constitute the church by way of proper character; the others are the church only by denomination of law: not having union with Christ, they are not the house of God, nor the temples of the Holy Ghost. Hypocrites are not the servants of Christ, and therefore are not members of his body, and form no part of the church, except improperly and equivocally, as a corpse, or an inanimate picture, is said to be a man. They who are of their father the devil, and the synagogue of Satan, are not of the kingdom of God. "They are not all Israel which are of Israel." (Rom. ix. 6.) And "he is not a Jew which is one outwardly; but he is a Jew which is one inwardly." (Rom. ii. 28, 29.) The true servants of Christ only are the church; to them pertain the Spirit and the truth, the promises and the grace, the privileges and advantages, of the Gospel.

To others these privileges pertain as promised blessings, as that of pardon. The difference between the faith of a devil and that of a wicked man is, that there are hopes that the latter may be converted to holiness of heart and life, and consequently become a member of Christ and of his church, while there can be no such hope entertained of the former. Christ hath taught us that the promises and privileges of the Gospel are realized only by the faithful. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." (John xiv. 21; xv. 14.) Here the condition is, doing what Christ hath commanded. And this very blessing and promise, according to the following passage of Scripture, appertain to the godly alone: "Henceforth I call you not servants, for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth; but I have called you friends, for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you." So that being the friends of God is the only way by which we may know the will of God; and such will certainly be directed by Christ and the Spirit of truth. "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." (John vii. 17.) And St. John says, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things." (1 John ii. 20.) The Spirit of God is the great Teacher of truth to the church; and from those who "grieve the Spirit of God," "quench the Spirit," or "defile his temple," he will surely depart. That "he shall abide with men to the end of the world," is a promise not belonging to the ungodly, but to those who "keep his commandments."

The external parts of religion may be administered by wicked persons, and by such they may be received; but the spiritual excellences of the Gospel, truth and holiness, are the portion only of saints, and not of wicked persons, whether Clergy or laity. Those who "hold the truth in unrighteousness" are given over to delusion to believe a lie. As all the principles and graces of the Gospel are the property of the godly; so they only are the church of whom such glorious things are spoken. This church is the "pillar and ground of truth." Church members, who are such by profession only, cannot claim the promises which are given to those who turn from sin to God.

["The church of Christ," to use the language of the Rev. Richard Watson, "in its largest sense, consists of all who have been baptized in the name of Christ, and who thereby make a visible profession of faith in his divine mission, and in all the doctrines taught by him and his inspired Apostles. In a stricter sense, it consists of those who are vitally united to Christ, as the members of the body to the head, and who, being thus imbued with spiritual life, walk no longer 'after the flesh, but after the Spirit.' Taken in either view, it is a visible society, bound to observe the laws of Christ, its sole Head and Lord. Visible fellowship with this church is the duty of all who profess faith in Christ; for in this, in part, consists that 'confession of Christ before men,' on which so much stress is laid in the discourses of our Lord. It is obligatory on all who are convinced of the truth of Christianity to be baptized; and upon all thus baptized frequently to partake of the Lord's supper, in order to testify their continued faith in that great and distinguishing doctrine of the religion of Christ, the redemption of the world by the sacrificial effusion of his blood, both of which suppose union with his church. The ends of this fellowship or association are, to proclaim our faith in the doctrine of Christ as divine in its origin, and necessary to salvation; to offer public prayers and thanksgivings to God through Christ, as the sole Mediator; to hear God's word explained and enforced; and to place ourselves under that discipline which consists in the enforcement of the laws of Christ (which are the rules of the society called 'the church') upon the members, not merely by general exhortation, but by kind oversight, and personal injunction and admonition of its Ministers. All these flow from the original obligation to avow our faith in Christ, and our love to him.

["The church of Christ being then a visible and permanent society, bound to observe certain rites, and to obey certain rules, the existence of government in it is necessarily supposed. All religious rites suppose order, all order direction and control, and these a directive and controlling power. Again: all laws are nugatory without enforcement, in the present mixed and imperfect state of society; and all enforcement supposes an executive. If baptism be the door of admission into the church, some must judge of the fitness of candidates, and administrators of the rite must be appointed; if the Lord's supper must be partaken of, the times and the mode are to be determined, the qualifications of communicants judged of, and the administration placed in suitable hands; if worship must be social and public, here again there must be an appointment of times, an order, and an administration; if the word of God is to be read and preached, then readers and Preachers are necessary; if the continuance of any one in the fellowship of Christians be conditional upon good conduct, so that the purity and credit of the church may be guarded, then the power of enforcing discipline must be lodged somewhere. Thus government flows necessarily from the very nature of the institution of the Christian church; and since this institution has the authority of Christ and his Apostles, it is not to be supposed that its government was left unprovided for; and if they have in fact made such a provision, it is no more a matter of mere option with Christians whether they will be subject to government in the church, than it is optional with them to confess Christ by becoming its members.

["It is wholly spiritual:—'My kingdom,' says our Lord, 'is not of this world.' The church is a society founded upon faith, and united by mutual love, for the personal edification of its members in holiness, and for the religious benefit of the world. The nature of its government is thus determined;—it is concerned only with spiritual objects. It cannot employ force to compel men into its pale; for the only door of the church is faith, to which there can be no compulsion,—'he that believeth and is baptized' becomes a member. It cannot inflict pains and penalties upon the disobedient and refractory, like civil governments: for the only punitive discipline authorized in the New Testament, is comprised in 'admonition,' 'reproof,' 'sharp rebukes,' and, finally, 'excision from the society.' The last will be better understood if we consider the special relations in which true Christians stand to each other, and the duties resulting from them. They are members of one body, and are therefore bound to tenderness and sympathy; they are the conjoint instructers of others, and are therefore to strive to be of 'one judgment;' they are brethren, and they are to love one another as such, that is, with an affection more special than that general good-will which they are commanded to bear to all mankind; they are therefore to seek the intimacy of friendly society among themselves; and, except in the ordinary and courteous intercourse of life, they are bound to keep themselves separate from the world; they are enjoined to do good unto all men, but 'specially to them that are of the household of faith;' and they are forbidden 'to eat' at the Lord's table with immoral persons, that is, with those who, although they continue their Christian profession, dishonour it by their practice. With these relations of Christians to each other, and to the world, and their correspondent duties before our minds, we may easily interpret the nature of that extreme discipline which is vested in the church. 'Persons who will not hear the church' are to be held 'as heathen men and publicans,' as those who are not members of it; that is, they are to be separated from it, and regarded as of 'the world,' quite out of the range of the above-mentioned relations of Christians to each other, and their correspondent duties; but still, like 'heathen men and publicans,' they are to be the objects of pity, and general benevolence. Nor is this extreme discipline to be hastily inflicted before 'a first and second admonition,' nor before those who are 'spiritual' have attempted 'to restore a brother overtaken in a fault;' and when the 'wicked person' is 'put away,' still the door is to be kept open for his reception again upon repentance. The true excommunication of the Christian church is therefore a merciful and considerate separation of an incorrigible offender from the body of Christians, without any infliction of civil pains or penalties. 'Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which ye have received from us.' (2 Thess. iii. 6.) 'Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump.' (1 Cor. v. 7.) 'But now I have written to you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with such an one, no not to eat.' (1 Cor. v. 11.) This, then, is the moral discipline which is imperative upon the church of Christ; and its government is criminally defective whenever it is not enforced. On the other hand, the disabilities and penalties which established churches in different places have connected with these sentences of excommunication, have no countenance at all in Scripture, and are wholly inconsistent with the spiritual character and ends of the Christian association." *]

5. The Roman Catholic definition of a church is peculiarly faulty. It requires, in order to constitute a member, three qualifications; namely, profession of faith, use of the same sacraments, and submission to the Pope. By the first, all infidels, such as those who never were in the church, as Jews, Turks, and Pagans, as well as those who leave the church, as heretics, apostates, &c., are excluded. On account of the second, catechumens and excommunicated persons are shut out. The third part of the definition prohibits heretics. Nevertheless this description recognises as church members notorious sinners of every grade.† If by the faith is meant the doctrines taught by Christ and his Apostles, then no Roman Catholic can be a member of the true church, because many of the Popish doctrines, as we have seen, are contrary to those taught by Christ and his Apostles. How easily can it be proved that multitudes of genuine Christians never acknowledged the supremacy of Rome! True piety, or faith that works by love, forms no prominent trait of the Papal Church.

6. Whether the unbaptized belong to the Church? These are excluded from that of Rome, and from salvation, as a matter of course. Catechumens, because they are unbaptized, are considered to be out of her pale by some Divines, but in the opinion of others they belong to the Church. Romanists, however, suppose they may be saved, even should they die unbaptized, provided they expressed a desire for baptism.

7. Manifest heretics and apostates, we are told, are not in the church, because they do not profess the same faith and doctrine with the Papacy. Nevertheless, "heretics, on account of their baptism, are subject to the Church; hence she deservedly punishes them as deserters from the camp, so that they may be obliged to return."‡

[* Watson's Works, vol. xii., pp. 166—169.]

[† "Nostra autem sententia est, Ecclesiam unam tantum esse, non duas; et illam unam et veram esse cœtum hominum ejusdem Christianæ fidei professione, et eorumdem sacramentorum communione colligatum, sub regimine legitimorum Pastorum, ac præcipue unius Christi in terris Vicarii Rom. Pontificis. Ex qua definitione facile colligi potest, qui homines ad Ecclesiam pertineant, qui vero ad eam non pertineant. Tres enim sunt partes hujus definitionis: professio veræ fidei, sacramentorum communio, et subjectio ad legitimum Pastorem Romanum Pontificem. Ratione primæ partis excluduntur omnes infideles, tam qui numquam fuerunt in Ecclesia, ut Judæi, Turcæ, Pagani, quam qui fuerunt et recesserunt, ut hæretici et apostatæ. Ratione secundæ excluduntur catechumeni et excommunicati, quoniam illi non sunt admissi ad sacramentorum communionem, isti sunt dimissi. Ratione tertiæ excluduntur schismatici qui habent fidem et sacramenta, sed non subduntur legitimo Pastori, et ideo foris profitentur fidem et sacramenta percipiunt. Includuntur autem omnes alii, etiamsi reprobi, scelesti, et impii sint."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Eccles. Milit., lib. iii., cap. ii., col. 108, D. Colon., 1620.]

[‡ "An non baptizati sunt in Ecclesia?—R. Negative: quia baptismus est janua, per quam ingredimur in Ecclesiam, ut docet Trid. sess. xiv., cap. 2; unde etiam, Actor. cap. 2, illi qui baptizabantur, dicebantur 'apponi,' utique ad Corpus Christi mysticum, quod est Ecclesia: ergo ante non erant de Ecclesia.

["An equidem catechumeni dici non possunt esse de Ecclesia?—

8. The Church of Rome pronounces schismatics, that is, all who are not subject to the See of Rome, to be out of the church of Christ.

9. The excommunicated, also, are placed in the same relation; which term embraces all who have been formally expelled from the Papal communion. It is worth remarking, that the Church of Rome never expels wicked or profane persons from her pale, provided they acknowledge the authority of the Pope and Clergy; but should the most pious in the world deny such authority, in their sense of it, they must be cast out.

10. Roman Catholics teach that open and notorious sinners, together with concealed infidels and heretics, are true members of the Church.

Liebermann, in his Institutiones Theologicæ, may legitimately be taken as the voice of the Church of Rome on this subject. He lays down the following extravagant proposition, and its assumed proofs:—

"Moreover, manifest sinners, as well as concealed heretics and infidels, pertain to the external and visible Church of Christ.

"PROOF OF THE FIRST PART. Sinners, in common with believers, are joined in the profession of the same Christian faith, and communion of the same sacraments, and are held under the same government of legitimate Pastors. Therefore, they have all things which are required for a member of the Church.

"PROOF OF THE SECOND PART. They belong to the external and visible Church who, 1. Are not separated from the body of the Church; and, 2. They retain all those bonds by which the members of the Church are bound together. But concealed heretics and hypocrites, 1. Are not separated from the body of the Church; 2. They retain all the bonds of external unity. Therefore, &c.

"PROOF OF THE MINOR. 1. Separation from the Church is twofold, such as in any other external society: the one voluntary, by which a person secedes of his own choice; the other penal, by which, on account of some crime, he is ejected. But it is manifest that concealed heretics and infidels neither secede of their own accord, nor are they ejected by the Church. Therefore, &c. 2. The bonds by which the members of the Church are connected are, profession of the same faith, participation of the same sacraments, and subjection to legitimate Pastors; as appears from the definition of the Church. But concealed heretics and infidels retain these bonds. Therefore," &c.*

The same author, on the note of the Church denominated "Sanctity," maintains the following monstrous proposition:—

"The sanctity, such as Christ wills to exist in his Church in this earth, does not exclude wicked men and sinners.

"This is proved from the practice of the Apostles and of the first ages. Although the Apostles paid attention to this very thing, that they might teach and form all Christians to a more holy state of life, yet they never supposed that wicked persons were out of the Church. They reproved them, they exhorted them, neither did they spare any labour, prayer, or threats, that they might bring them to a better state. But they treated them as men who were in the Church, not out of it. Thus when the Apostle (1 Cor. v.) judges the avaricious, fornicators, &c., nay, also the incestuous Corinthian, he supposed that they still belonged to the Church, since he there openly declares, 'What have I to do to judge them also that are without?'"†

From the foregoing extracts it will be seen that Romanists have no proper idea of the true character of the church of Christ. The most flagrant transgressors, drunkards, swearers, and incestuous persons, may live and die accredited members of their community. The most notorious and scandalous sinners retain membership with them; and it is only when the authority of the Clergy is rejected that they are expelled. So their Divines teach.

Bailly asserts that, "the Church is constituted not

R. Negative, propter eandem rationem, quod necdum ingressi sint per baptismum. Obj. Juxta Conc. Lateran. IV., extra Ecclesiam nemo potest salvari; atqui catechumenus potest salvari per contritionem perfectam: ergo est in Ecclesia.—R. Distinguendo consequens: ergo est in Ecclesia realiter, neg. conseq.; ergo est in Ecclesia voto et desiderio, concedo totum: sufficit autem, quod catechumenus voto vel desiderio (quod in contritione perfecta involvitur) sit in Ecclesia, ut salvetur: proinde verba Concilii Lateranensis intelligi debent de iis, qui nec re nec voto sunt in Ecclesia.

["An saltem illi non sunt in Ecclesia, qui putantur baptizati et ita communicant in sacramentorum participatione, et fidei confessione, quamvis a parte rei baptizati non sint?—R. Wiggers cum quibusdam affirmat; sed Bellarminus, Steyaert, Daelman, Danes, &c., negant, propter rationes jam dictas; tales interim, etsi non re, voto tamen sunt de Ecclesia, sicque possunt salvari.

["An omnes baptizati sunt in Ecclesia?—R. Negative: et imprimis hæretici et apostatæ manifesti non sunt de Ecclesia: quia non profitentur eandem fidem et doctrinam cum iis, qui sunt in Ecclesia, quod tamen in definitione Ecclesiæ exprimitur. Obj. Ecclesia judicat et punit hæreticos: atqui non judicat eos, qui foris sunt, juxta Apost.: (1 ad Cor. cap. v.:) ergo sunt in Fclesia.—R. Neg. cons.: quamvis enim hæretici sint extra Ecclesiam; manent tamen ratione baptismi Ecclesiæ subjecti: unde merito illos sumit tanquam transfugas ex Ecclesiæ castris, adeoque redeundi obligationem habent: Apost. vero agit de illis, qui nunquam intrarunt Ecclesiam, sive qui baptizati non sunt.

["Similiter schismatici manifesti in Ecclesia non sunt; nam ipsi se separarunt ab unitate Ecclesiæ: unde Ecclesia in Parasceve, sicuti orat pro hæreticis, ut ad Ecclesiam redeant, ita orat pro schismaticis."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Eccles., No. 71, De iis, qui sunt in Ecclesia.]

[* "Peccatores etiam manifesti, item hæretici et infideles occulti, ad externam et visibilem Christi Ecclesiam pertinent.—Probat. i. pars. Peccatores cum reliquis fidelibus ejusdem fidei Christianæ professione et eorundem sacramentorum communione conjuncti sunt, atque sub eodem tenentur regimine legitimorum Pastorum. Ergo habent omnia, quæ ad membrum Ecclesiæ requiruntur. Quod autem Ecclesiæ sanctitas in his terris cum hac peccatorum commixtione consistere possit, art. ii., sec. iii., prop. ii., probatum est.

["Probat. ii. pars. Illi ad Ecclesiam externam ac visibilem pertinent, qui, 1. Ab Ecclesiæ corpore separati non sunt; et, 2. Omnia illa vincula retinent quibus membra Ecclesiæ colligantur. Atqui hæretici et infideles occulti, 1. Ab Ecclesiæ corpore non sunt separati. 2. Omnia unitatis externæ vincula retinent. Ergo, &c.

["Probat. Min. 1. Duplex tantum datur ab Ecclesiæ communione separatio, quemadmodum a quacunque societate exteriori: altera voluntaria, qua aliquis sponte secedit; altera pœnalis, qua propter delictum aliquis ejicitur. Atqui manifestum est hæreticos et infideles occultos nec sponte secedere nec ab Ecclesia ejici. Ergo, &c. 2. Vincula quibus membra Ecclesiæ nectuntur, sunt ejusdem fidei professio, sacramentorum participatio, et legitimis Pastoribus subjectio; ut ex Ecclesiæ definitione patet. Atqui hæc vincula hæretici et infideles occulti retinent. Ergo," &c.—Liebermann, Instit. Theol., tom. ii., pars i., De vera Christi Ecclesia, cap. i., art. iv., consect. 5.]

[† "Sanctitas, qualem Christus Ecclesiæ suæ in hac terra inesse voluit, non excludit homines improbos et peccatores.—Probatur ex praxi Apostolorum et primorum temporum. Quamvis Apostoli omnem in id operam contulerint, ut Christianos omnes ad sanctiorem vitam erudirent et informarent, nunquam tamen malos putarunt extra Ecclesiam versari: eos redarguebant, hortabantur, nec laboribus parcebant, nec precibus aut minis, ut eos ad saniora consilia reducerent. Verum cum illis agebant tanquam hominibus, qui intus essent non foris. Sic quando Apostolus, 1 Cor. v., avaros, fornicarios, etc., imo et incestuosum Corinthium judicat, utique eos ad Ecclesiam pertinere putavit, cum ibidem aperte dicat, 'Quid mihi de iis, qui foris sunt, judicare?'"—Idem, tom. ii., pars i., cap. i., art. ii., sect. iii., prop. ii.]

only of the perfect and just, but it hath mixed the wicked and sinners, even notable and wicked sinners." He attempts to maintain this as a thesis, from the following arguments:—1. From parables. 2. St. Paul. (1 Cor. v.) 3. Augustine. 4. The consent of all theologians. 5. The absurdity of the contrary doctrine. And, 6. From theological analogy.*

Dens maintains in like manner that open transgressors are members of the Church.†

Bellarmine says, "In the one true and Catholic Church of Christ, there are not only the imperfect, but also great sinners, and that not only concealed, but manifest."‡

Many Doctors, however, of the Church of Rome previous to the Council of Trent, believed and taught that wicked men are not true members of the Church, but equivocally. So Alexander of Ales, Hugo and Aquinas as quoted by Turrecremata; so Petrus a Soto, Melchior Canus, and others. But ever since the Council of Trent, it became the settled doctrine of the Church of Rome that notorious, scandalous sinners are true members of the Church. This Council decided that the ministrations and acts of wicked Clergymen were valid to all intents and purposes; so that however wicked they might be, their absolutions, consecrations, and other acts possessed all the sanctity and authority of those of the best of men. It is allowed that unrenewed and even wicked men may creep into the purest church. But there is this essential difference between the treatment which such persons will receive in a true and in a false or corrupt church. A true church, if she cannot reform them by Gospel remedies, will remove them from her pale by exclusion. A corrupt one, though she may reprove and threaten them with hell, will still permit them to remain associated with her, on the condition that they acknowledge her authority. In no other point does the apostasy of the Church of Rome appear more alarming and evident than in her permitting the wicked to remain church members. Yet they must maintain this corrupt doctrine in order to support their system, agreeably to the position of Bellarmine: "If wicked members were not true members of the Church, a wicked Pope could not be the head of the church."* Thus to maintain a wicked head, the Clergy and laity are allowed to be wicked! Such is the morality of Rome! And such also is her practice; a great number of her acknowledged and approved Clergy and laity being manifest and flagrant sinners!

IV. *Of the church, considered as visible or invisible—*THE MARKS, or notes, of the church.

1. We are not prepared to adopt all the sentiments which have been uttered by various Protestants respecting the church, considered as visible and invisible. By the invisible church they mean all pious Christians, who are truly such in the sight of God. By the visible church they imply all those who in outward and visible society are professed Christians. On the other hand, Romanists discard the character of the church which is called invisible, and rest their claims entirely on that of the visible. We can assign no other reason for this, than that they do not desire to found their claims of being the true church on the marks of true piety pertaining to its members, which marks have, by some Protestants, been improperly called invisible. Romanists place their pretensions solely on the outward organization of the church.

2. Protestants consider the church visible with regard to its outward organization, consisting of a profession of faith, the use of the sacraments, the ministry of the word, and the exercise of discipline. They call the church invisible in reference to the graces of the Holy Spirit, such as love, peace, joy, &c., which are not the immediate objects of sense, and the existence of which are infallibly known to God alone. Romanists consider this idea of the church preposterous, and contend for that character only which represents it as a visible organization, over-

[* "PROP. II. Non ex solis perfectis et justis ecclesia constituitur, sed admixtos habet malos et peccatores, etiam insignes ac manifestos.

["Prob. 1. Ex parabolis. Regnum cœlorum seu ecclesia in Novo Testamento assimilatur sagenæ missæ in mare, quæ pisces ex omni genere congregat; agro in quo zizania cum tritico nascitur; domui magnæ in qua sunt vasa argentea et lignea, aurea et fictilia. Vide Matt. 13 et 2; 2 Timoth. 2: porro ex communi SS. PP. interpretatione, per zizaniam, malos pisces, vasa lignea et fictilia, significantur peccatores seu improbi; ergo, &c.

["2. Ex S. Paulo, 1 Cor. v. 1: 'Auditur inter vos fornicatio, qualis nec inter gentes, ita ut uxorem patris sui aliquis habeat.' Paulus hic loquitur de peccatore insigni ac publico, ut patet: atqui peccator ille erat de ecclesia, siquidem Apostolus eum versiculis sequentibus separat ab ecclesia, ipsum Satanæ tradendo, ac jubendo ut tollatur e medio eorum. Aliunde Paulus ait: 'Auditur inter vos,' id est, inter Corinthios, quos Epistolæ exordio Dei ecclesiam appellat; ergo peccatores etiam publici et insignes, si baptizati fuerint, ad ecclesiam pertinent, nisi per excommunicationem vel hæresim sint ab ea separati.

["3. Ex S. August., lib. iv. de Baptismo, c. 9, n. 13: 'Sunt in unitate Christi, qui sunt ex parte diaboli.' Ita Chrysost., Greg., Fulgentius, et alii Patres unanimi voce contra Pelagianos et Novatianos.

["4. Ex consensu omnium theologorum.

["5. Ex pravis consectariis. Si vera Christi ecclesia ex solis justis aut perfectis constaret, sequeretur, (1.) Ecclesiam esse invisibilem, cum boni mixti malis sæpe non possint ab illis distingui; (2.) Ecclesiam non esse fidei controversiarum judicem, propter eamdem rationem; (3.) Nescire fideles quinam sint legitimi Pastores proindeque dissolvi omne obedientiæ jugum.

["6. Ex ratione theologica. Nam peccatores etiam manifesti cum ecclesia conjunguntur omnibus vinculis externis, videlicet ejusdem fidei professione, sacramentorum communione, iisdem Pastoribus subjectione; igitur sunt de corpore Ecclesiæ. Imo nonnihil vitæ imperfectæ habent, vitæ non penitus extinctæ; et sub eo respectu aliquatenus pertinent ad animam Ecclesiæ, videlicet in quantum cum ea conjunguntur quibusdam vinculis internis, per fidem et spem quæ sine charitate aut gratia sanctificante servari possunt, ut definitum est a Concilio Tridentino, sess. vi., can. 28: utque in tractatu de gratia comprobatur; ergo," &c.—Bailly, Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, cap. ii., sect. 2.]

[† "An peccatores etiam manifesti sunt in Ecclesia?—R. Illos non esse in Ecclesia, docuerunt olim Novatiani et Donatistæ, item Pelagiani, qui solos perfectos Ecclesiæ adscribebant: hos errores secutus est Lutherus, ut constat ex supra dictis, et novissime Quesnellus in damnatis propositionibus a 72 ad 78. Quod autem peccatores etiam manifesti sint in Ecclesia, probatur ex citatis supra comparationibus de area, sagena, &c. Item ex Matth. cap. xviii., ubi jubet Christus, ut peccatores, qui privatæ correptioni non attenderint, deferantur ad Ecclesiam, quam si non audierint ex ea dejiciantur: supponit ergo Christus, tales esse in ecclesia. Liquet etiam ex 1 ad Corinth. cap. v. in ecclesiam Corinthiorum fuisse incestuosum, quem Apostolus ob criminis enormitatem ab ecclesia abscindi jussit."—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 72; An omnes et soli Prædestinati sint in Ecclesia?]

[‡ "In una vera et Catholica Christi Ecclesia non solum imperfectos, sed etiam graves peccatores esse, et non solum occultos, sed etiam manifestos."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Eccles., lib. iii., cap. ix., col. 126, A. Colon., 1620.

[* "Ad ultimum dico, malos non esse membra viva corporis Christi, et hoc significari illis Scripturis. Ad id, quod addebatur, Igitur sunt æquivoce membra, &c.; a multis solet concedi, malos non esse membra vera, nec simpliciter, corporis Ecclesiæ, sed tantum secundum quid, et æquivoce. Ita Joannes de Turrecremata, lib. i., cap. lvii., ubi id probat ex Alexandro de Ales, Hugone, et B. Thoma; idem etiam docent Petrus a Soto, Melchior Canus, et alii, qui tamen, etsi dicant malos non esse membra vera, dicunt nihilominus vere esse in Ecclesia, sive in corpore Ecclesiæ, et esse simpliciter fideles, seu Christianos. Neque enim sola membra sunt in corpore, sed etiam humores, dentes, pili, et alia quæ non sunt membra. Neque fideles, aut Christiani dicuntur tales a caritate, sed a fide, sive a fidei professione. At si ita est, sequitur, Pontificem malum non esse caput Ecclesiæ; et alios Episcopos, si mali sint, non esse capita suarum Ecclesiarum."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, lib. iii., cap. ix., col. 129, B. Colon., 1620.]

looking the direct and peculiar influences of the grace of God.

3. The following definition of Dens may be safely adopted:—"How is the church called visible? The church is formally called visible, as known, not only by faith and intellect, but also by corporeal senses: because the church is not only spiritual in consequence of the interior form of faith, hope, and charity; but it is also a certain material and sensible body." He then adds the following:—"Because it embraces a visible head, visible men, an external profession of faith, sensible sacraments, and order of a visible hierarchy."* To the former part of the definition we have no particular objection; but when he applies it to embrace the Pope as the true head of the church of Christ, we gravely demur. Our author adds the following:—"By what is the church sensibly seen? By her notes, which are so proper to our Church, that they are not found in any other congregation or sect: hence the church is not only visible to the faithful, but also to those who have not faith, as heretics, (Protestants,) Jews, and Gentiles."†

We propose to examine what the Scriptures teach in reference to this subject.

4. Renovation of heart, and newness of life, are taught in the sacred writings as belonging to all the true children of God; and although the heart of man may not be known infallibly to others, yet a sober judgment can be formed of it from the character which the individual sustains in the world. This will be manifest from the following:—

(1.) The outward conduct of men is generally a sure index of the state of the heart. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, nor a bad tree good fruit. An impure fountain doth not send forth pure water. Hence a good man, out of the good treasure of his heart, bringeth forth good things; and an evil man, out of the evil treasure of his heart, bringeth forth evil things: for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.

(2.) The true followers of Christ may be distinguished from the false by their outward deportment. "Ye shall know them by their fruits." (Matt. vii. 16.) This was spoken respecting false prophets, who came in sheep's clothing, but inwardly were ravening wolves. And after reasoning on the certainty of distinguishing such, our Lord infers, "Wherefore, by their fruits ye shall know them." (Verse 20.) So John the Baptist required that his converts should bring forth "fruits meet for repentance." (Matt. iii. 8.) They that had two coats were to impart to those that had none; the publicans were to exact no more than what was appointed them; and the soldiers were to do violence to no man, to accuse none falsely, and to be content with their wages. (Luke iii. 8—14.)

(3.) The spiritual influence of the grace of God on the heart is manifest in the tempers, dispositions, and actions of their possessors. "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such there is no law. And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." (Gal. v. 22—24.) Thus the pious bring forth good fruits: they "crucify," or "put to death," the "flesh," or the wicked principle; and do not bring forth the fruits of the flesh, such as hatred, variance, drunkenness, &c.

(4.) The wicked, or the unrenewed, manifest themselves by their conduct also. "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." (Gal. v. 19—21.)

If the foregoing scriptural canons or rules were observed, few hypocrites or wicked persons would be found in the church. Such as might occasionally manifest themselves would easily be separated from the pious, so that the church would integrally be sound, and true piety would predominate, so as to give a character to the body.

5. The foregoing scriptural notes or marks of true Christians may be comprehended in the following outline:—Wherever there is a true profession of Christianity, embracing at least a firm purpose to flee from sin and seek salvation, and where this purpose is fixed in the mind, it will be shown by its fruits.

First, "By doing no harm, by avoiding evil of every kind, especially that which is most generally practised; such is the taking the name of God in vain: the profaning the day of the Lord, either by doing ordinary work thereon, or by buying and selling: drunkenness; buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity: fighting, quarrelling, brawling, brother going to law with brother; returning evil for evil, or railing for railing; the using many words in buying or selling: the buying or selling goods uncustomed: the giving or taking things on usury; that is, unlawful interest: uncharitable or unprofitable conversation; particularly, speaking evil of Magistrates or of Ministers: doing to others as we would not they should do unto us: doing what we know is not for the glory of God; as the putting on of gold or costly apparel; the taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus; the singing those songs, or reading those books, which do not tend to the knowledge or love of God: softness and needless self-indulgence: laying up treasures upon earth: borrowing without a probability of paying; or taking up goods without a probability of paying for them."

Secondly, Those who profess to be Christians should manifest the sincerity and reality of their faith "by doing good; by being in every kind merciful after their power; as they have opportunity, doing good of every possible sort, and, as far as is possible, to all men: to their bodies, of the ability which God giveth, by giving food to the hungry, by clothing the naked, by visiting or helping them that are sick or in prison: to their souls, by instructing, reproving, or exhorting all they have any intercourse with; trampling under foot that enthusiastic doctrine of devils, that we are not to do good unless our heart be free to it: by doing good especially to them who are of the household of faith, or groaning so to be:—by all possible diligence and frugality, that the Gospel be not blamed: by running with patience the race that is set before them, denying themselves, and taking up their cross daily; submitting to bear the reproach of Christ, to be as the filth and offscouring of the world; and looking that men should say all manner of evil of them falsely for the Lord's sake."

[* "Quomodo ecclesia dicitur visibilis?—R. Ecclesia dicitur formaliter visibilis ut cognoscibilis non solum per fidem et intellectum, sed etiam per sensus corporales; quia ecclesia non solum est spiritualis ratione formæ interioris fidei, spei, charitatis, &c.; sed etiam est quoddam corpus materiale et sensibile, quia complectitur caput visibile, homines visibiles, externam fidei professionem, sacramenta sensibilia, ordinem visibilis hierarchiæ," &c.—Dens Theol., tom. ii.; De Ecclesia, No. 73; De Ecclesiæ Visibilitate.]

[† "Per quid sensibiliter videtur ecclesia?—R. Per suas notas, quæ ecclesiæ nostræ ita sunt propriæ, ut in nulla alia congregatione vel secta inveniantur: unde ecclesia non solum visibilis est fidelibus, sed etiam iis, qui fidem non habeant, ut hæreticis, Judæis, et Gentilibus."—Idem.]

Thirdly, They should manifest their desire of salvation, "by attending upon all the ordinances of God: such are, the public worship of God; the ministry of the word, either read or expounded; the supper of the Lord; family and private prayer; searching the Scriptures; and fasting or abstinence."

These, and similar regulations are taught in the word of God, the only and sufficient rule of faith and practice; and the Spirit of God inscribes them on every truly-awakened heart. If there be a member who observes them not, who habitually breaks any of them, he that hath pastoral charge over this person should be informed of such delinquency. The offender would be admonished of the error of his ways, borne with for a season; but if he repent not, he would be separated from the communion of the church.

The above constitute the outlines of the General Rules of the Wesleyan-Methodist societies, which form the best system of church-regulations extant, because they are taken from the word of God. By enforcing these, the Wesleyan Methodists have preserved the purity of primitive Christianity in its doctrines and discipline for an entire century, without any material deviation.

When unmasked hypocrites are permitted to dwell in the church, and the profane and profligate are allowed to be members, and experimental and practical religion is neither promoted nor regarded, then corruption of doctrines and profligacy of manners prevail. It is, then, in vain for Protestants or Roman Catholics to contend that they are the true church; for this plain reason, that the children of the wicked one are not the children of God.

6. Roman Catholics specify various notes or marks by which they designate their Church "the only true one." Some mention only two, while others extend the number, with Bellarmine, to as many as fifteen marks; and others even exceed this number in their enumeration. They vary considerably in reference to what are said to be the true notes of the Church.*

More recent writers confine these notes to four, according to the statement in the Constantinopolitan creed; namely, unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity. Bellarmine asserts that the following constitute the notes of the Church; namely,—(1.) The term Catholic, and Christian. (2.) Antiquity. (3.) Perpetual and uninterrupted duration. (4.) Amplitude, or the number and variety of believers. (5.) Succession of Bishops from the Apostles. (6.) Agreement in doctrine with the ancient church. (7.) Union of the members among themselves, and with the head. (8.) Sanctity of doctrine. (9.) Efficacy of doctrine. (10.) Sanctity of the life of their authors. (11.) The glory of miracles. (12.) Prophetic light. (13.) Confession of adversaries. (14.) Unhappy end of opposers. (15.) Temporal felicity. We shall proceed to examine the most notable, such as unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity.

V. Unity of the church.

On this note we examine, first, The proper and scriptural idea of Christian unity; secondly, Unity as it exists in the Church of Rome; and, thirdly, The unity of Protestants.

1. First, we examine the character of that unity which is taught in the sacred Scriptures. The following presents this in a clear view:—"I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." (Eph. iv. 1—6.) From this passage, in connexion with many others, we learn what are the true properties of Christian unity.

[* "Atque hæc dicta sint de veris et propriis Ecclesiæ notis. Pontificii illis repudiatis alias constituunt notas, sed in numero earum plurimum variant. Lindanus in Panoplia, lib. iv., cap. lxxxiii., ac Canisius in Catech. tract. de præcept. Eccles., cap. ix., statuunt Romanum Pontificem et cathedram Romanam esse indubitatam Ecclesiæ notam. Horantius, lib. vi., cont. Instit. Calvin., cap. vi., unam facit Ecclesiæ notam certissimam, continuatam Sacerdotum ac Prælatorum præcipue Romanorum successionem. Catechismus Synodi Tridentinæ duas facit Ecclesiæ notas, quod sit et dicatur, 1. Catholica. 2. Apostolica. Stapletonus in procemio libri quarti de principiis fidei tres constituit Ecclesiæ notas, quibus a falsa hæreticorum et schismaticorum Ecclesia discerni debeat; scilicet, multitudinem, visibilitatem, et perpetuitatem. Driedo, lib. iv., cap. ii., pars 2, de Eccles. dogmat., et Petrus a Soto, parte prima defens., cap. xliv., alias tres constituunt, referente Bellarm., lib. iv., de Eccles., cap. v. Sixtus Senensis, lib. vi., Biblioth. annot. 104, laudat tres notas Vincentii Lyrinensis, quæ sunt ecclesiasticæ traditionis universitas, antiquitas, et consensio. Hosius Cardinalis in Explicat. Symb., et Costerus in Enchirid., cap. ii., p. 86, quatuor ponunt Ecclesiæ notas, quod sit sancta, quod sit Catholica, quod una, quod apostolica. Sanderus, lib. viii., de visibili Monarch., cap. i., sex proponit notas, quarum prima est altitudo et sublimitas; secunda, splendor et claritas; tertia, latitudo et immensitas; quarta, successio et perpetuitas; quinta, consensio et unitas; sexta, invicta fides et constantia. Jesuitæ Posnanienses septem constituunt Ecclesiæ notas, quæ sunt claritas, diffusio, antiquitas, appellatio Ecclesiæ Apostolicæ, Pastorum ordinatio et vocatio legitima, sanctitas, unitas. Michael Medina, lib. ii., de recta fide, ponit decem; et lib. vii., cap. xxvi., addit undecimam. Cunerus Petri in lib. de Notis Ecclesiæ ponit duodecim. Eundem numerum observat Pistorius in Hodeg., cap. iv., ubi Ecclesiæ notas enumerat hoc ordine. 1. Christus ad finem mundi affuturus est Ecclesiæ duraturæ usque ad finem mundi. 2. Christi Ecclesia cœpit Hierosolymis, et inde progressa fuit usque ad extremas mundi partes. 3. Ex seipsa propagata fuit, et sequens Ecclesia ex antegressa enata est. 4. Semper habet veros in Ecclesia positos et legitime vocatos doctores eosque puros. 5. Semper habet oves non tantum malas, verum etiam electas. 6. Nunquam tota ne minimum quidem errat, sed semper est pura Ecclesia et pura in ea fides, pura sacramenta. 7. Ecclesia audiri debet, quia suo officio et regimine filios suos procurat eosque obedientes habet. 8. Non tantum crucem et contemptum habet, sed etiam suo tempore gloriam, pacem, et felicitatem. 9. Ab uno mari ad alterum extenditur. 10. Ecclesia Christi separata est a Judaica, ad illam enim se alligavit Deus sine conditione. 11. Una semper mansura est in omnibus consentiens. 12. Est visibilis et conspicua. Jacob Reihing., in muris civitatis sanctæ, duodecim enumerat fidei Papisticæ fundamenta, quæ appellat rationes solidissimas, quibus cuique prudenti persuasissima fiat Papistica religio: 1. Falsorum dogmatum impositionem qualia non tradantur a Pontificiis. 2. Ecclesiæ in Scripturis interpretandis magisterium. 3. Apostolicam originem. 4. Petri Primatum. 5. Romanorum Pontificum successionem. 6. Conciliorum auctoritatem. 7. Patrum consensum. 8. Cultorum sanctitatem et miracula. 9. Nomen Ecclesiæ Catholicæ. 10. Concordiam et unitatem Romanensium; quibus subjungit, 11. Eum, qui Ecclesiæ Papisticæ se adjungere nolit reum esse inexcusabilis imprudentiæ, et, 12. Extremæ superbiæ. Quæ duo postrema membra non tam nova et distincta sunt fundamenta, quam conclusiones ex prioribus fundamentis collectæ, ideo solum additæ, ut rationes illæ utcunque responderent numero fundamentorum, Apoc. xxi. 14, cœlesti Hierosolymæ assignatorum. Bellarm., lib. iv., de Eccles., cap. iv., et seq., quindecim annumerat notas, quas dicit aliquo modo revocari posse ad illas quatuor, quæ communiter a recentioribus assignantur ex Symbolo Constantinopolitano: Unam, sanctam, catholicam, et apostolicam. Sunt autem istæ: 1. Ipsum Catholicæ Ecclesiæ et Christianorum nomen. 2. Antiquitas. 3. Duratio diuturna et nunquam interrupta. 4. Amplitudo sive multitudo et varietas credentium. 5. Successio Episcoporum ab Apostolis. 6. Conspiratio in doctrina cum Ecclesia antiqua. 7. Unio membrorum inter se et cum capite. 8. Sanctitas doctrinæ. 9. Efficacia doctrinæ. 10. Sanctitas vitæ auctorum. 11. Gloria miraculorum. 12. Lumen propheticum. 13. Confessio adversariorum. 14. Infelix exitus eorum, qui Ecclesiam oppugnant. 15. Felicitas temporalis. Socolovius in lib. de Notis Ecclesiæ habet viginti notas; Thomas Bozius, centum. Nobis cum Bellarmino res erit, de cujus notis in genere dicimus, quod non sint propriæ, certæ, adæquatæ, perpetuæ, et infallibiles veræ Ecclesiæ notæ, si a puritate doctrinæ separentur; quod si vim quandam notandi veram Ecclesiam habeant, eam totam ex puritate doctrinæ sibi conjuncta mutuari debeant, id quod ex speciali singularum notarum examine manifestum evadet."—Gerhard. Locorum Theologicorum tom. v., De Ecclesia, cap. x., sect. cxlvii., 4to., p. 872. Jenæ, 1617.]

(1.) "One God," the fountain of all being, self-existent and eternal. The "Father of all," both Jews and Gentiles, because he is the Father of the spirits of all flesh. "Who is over," or "above all," as the King of kings, and Lord of lords. "And through all," pervading every thing; being present with every thing; providing for all his creatures; and by his energy supporting all things. "And in you all," by the energy of his Spirit enlightening, quickening, purifying, and comforting true believers, constituting their hearts the temples of the Holy Ghost.

(2.) "One Lord," Christ, the Saviour, who is the Head of the church, to whom, by God's appointment, all Christians are immediately subject.

(3.) "One Spirit," the Holy Ghost, who animates the church of God.

(4.) "One body," which is the church, composed of many members. "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit—that there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another. And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it. Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular." (1 Cor. xii. 12, 13, 25—27.)

(5.) "One faith." It is asserted most distinctly that there is one "common faith:" (Titus i. 4:) one "like precious faith" among all who bear the name of Christian: (2 Peter i. 1:) a "unity of faith," and of the "knowledge of the Son of God," to which we must attain: (Eph. iv. 13:) a "faith once delivered to the saints," (Jude 3,) for which we are to "strive earnestly," and in which we must be built up. There is a "faith of the Gospel," for which we are exhorted "to strive as with one mind." (Phil. i. 27.) Viewing this one faith as being the object of all faith, it comprehends every truth which is contained in Scripture. Looking at it as the exercise of faith, it justifies the sinner, it purifies him from sin, and by it he overcomes the world. The inference of Romanists respecting this one faith is vain; namely, That it must either be theirs, and then we cannot be saved without it, or ours, and then they cannot be saved. For this one faith, into which all Christians are baptized, contains the great truths of Christianity as to its object; and its exercise consists not merely in assenting to certain dogmas of belief, but confiding in and relying upon Jesus Christ for salvation, accompanied with renunciation of sin and true penitence, which are followed by the fruits of the Spirit in the heart and life.

(6.) "One baptism," by which we profess our faith: it is administered in the name of the Trinity, and is the sacramental covenant in which we engage ourselves to the service of the Lord Christ: it is also indicative of the influences, privileges, and effects of the Christian religion.

(7.) "One hope," even of everlasting glory, to which Christians have been called by the preaching of the Gospel, and in which they should live, expecting to be brought to the same blessed and glorious abode in heaven.

(8.) The nature of this unity, which the Apostle prescribes, is, "the unity of the Spirit." For the whole body of Christians is here said to have "one Spirit," and their unity is styled "the unity of the Spirit." The body is one; for "by one Spirit we are all baptized into one body." To the church of Corinth he speaks thus: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" (1 Cor. iii. 16.) "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, that is in you?" (1 Cor. vi. 19.) By the unity of the Spirit we are to understand not only a spiritual unity, but also a unity of sentiment, desires, pursuits, &c., such as is worthy of, and which springs from, the Spirit of God. The seat of Christian unity is in the heart: it does not lie in one class of thoughts, or in one form of worship, but in the heart and soul. This unity we are to endeavour to keep, by exerting ourselves to the utmost to do so. If others quarrel with us, we must take care not to quarrel with them. If others despise and hate us, we must not despise and hate them. "In the bond of peace." Peace, as a bond, unites individuals, making them friendly with each other. A peaceable disposition and conduct bind Christians together; whereas discord and contention separate them. Christ, says St. Paul, hath reconciled both Jew and Gentile into one body unto God, and hath made peace between them; "for by him both have access by one Spirit unto the Father;" and therefore having this one Spirit, by which we are constituted one body, and the sons of the same Father, "we are fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God:" and are all built "into a habitation of God through the Spirit." (Eph. ii. 16—19.) From the foregoing the following inferences are drawn:—

Inference 1. None but true Christians can be members of that catholic church of which Christ is the Head, since the whole body is united to him by the communication of the Holy Spirit, whom the wicked "cannot receive;" (John xiv. 17;) they being "sensual, having not the Spirit." (Jude 19.)

Inference 2. Nothing can unite a professor of Christianity to this body, but a participation of the Holy Spirit; and therefore this only can make him a true member of that church which is the body of Christ. Hence the Apostle informs us negatively, that "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." (Rom. viii. 9.) He declares affirmatively, that "by this we know that we dwell in him, and He in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit." (1 John iv. 13.) "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." (Rom. viii. 14.) "And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts." (Gal. iv. 6.) It is therefore a positive truth, that nothing can unite us to that church, or body, of which Christ Jesus is the Head, but a participation of the Spirit.

Inference 3. That no error in judgment, or mistake in practice, which does not tend to deprive a Christian of the Spirit, can separate him from the church of Christ.

Inference 4. That we are not to acknowledge any persons as our spiritual guides, unless we have reason to believe that they belong to that church of which Christ is the Head, and to which only the promise of the Spirit is given.

(9.) The means of preserving this unity are, "lowli-ness" and "meekness," "long-suffering" and "forbearing one another in love, walking worthy of our vocation." By "lowliness" we are to understand "humility," not entertaining lofty thoughts of ourselves, which is opposed to pride. By "meekness" is meant that disposition of soul which leads us to be unwilling to provoke others, is not easily provoked or offended with the infirmities of those around us, and is opposed to angry resentment or peevishness. "Long-suffering" implies a patient bearing of injuries, without seeking or desiring revenge. "Forbearing one another in love," signifies bearing their infirmities out of a principle of love; so as not to cease to love them on that account. The holiest Christians have need to bear each other's burdens; to provoke each other's graces, and not their passions. Without these, unity cannot be preserved. Pride and passion tend to the breach of peace, and make mischief. Humility and meekness restore and maintain peace. "Only by pride cometh contention;" by love and humility, peace and unity are promoted. We do not walk "worthy of the vocation" wherewith we are called, unless we be meek and lowly of heart: and such was Christ.

(10.) The reasons or motives for this unity. We are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus, redeemed by the same Saviour, enlightened and renewed by the same Spirit, baptized with the same baptism, members of one body, exercising the same faith, aiming at the same end, and walking in the same way of holiness. Such are the reasons for unity. But they are such as are rejected by wicked men, and followed only by the godly.

(11.) The importance of unity. How can brethren fall out by the way? Have they not all one Father, and one Head? Do they not form one body, and are they not members one of another? How monstrous it is to see the nails pulling out the eyes, the hands tearing the flesh from the body, the teeth biting off the tongue, &c.! And is it less so to see the members of a Christian society bite and devour each other, till they are consumed one of another? Every member of the mystical body should labour for the edification and comfort of the whole, and the honour of the Head. Did all Christians live peaceably with each other, glory would be given to God, and peace and good-will abound among men.

2. Unity, abstractedly considered, is not a mark of the true church. It is necessary that unity should be joined with faith and doctrine. Nor is every union even of faith and doctrine a mark of the true church: it must be a unity of true faith and true doctrine, that is, of the doctrines of the Apostles and Prophets. "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed." (John viii. 31.) Although the true church is one, and its true members agree in one faith, it cannot be inferred from thence, that wherever unity and concert in religion exist, is found the true apostolical church. There is a twofold unity, as Thomas Aquinas on Eph. iv., sect. 1, says, "the one good, the other bad; the one of the Spirit, the other of the flesh." As there is one church of God, there is one Babylon of Satan. "If Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself; how shall then his kingdom stand?" (Matt. xii. 26.) A scriptural unity is productive of great advantages: if the unity be bad, it is a fruitful source of mischief. When Aaron and the congregation of Israel worshipped the golden calf, was their unity a proof of the purity of their worship? All the Priests of Baal conspired against the Prophets of the Most High. In the time of Jeremiah, the people concerted against the true worship of God. The ten tribes at Bethel were as much united as the two at Jerusalem; but notwithstanding their union, and the superiority of their numbers, they were guilty of schism. Christ, by the common counsel of the Priests and Elders, and by the suffrage of the people, was condemned to death. The heretics, too, of the first ages were closely united against the orthodox faith. All which go to show, that not every unity, but one of faith and doctrine,—nor indeed this, unless it be a unity of the true apostolical faith and doctrine,—is a mark of the church of Christ.

It is therefore certain, that concord, abstractedly considered, is no proof of a pure and sound church. If the Romanists would derive any advantage from their professed union, they must prove to us that their doctrines are apostolical, that their terms of communion are not sinful; in short, that they are united by the love of God and man, in the practice and profession of Christian truth, as taught in the canonical Scriptures. Without this, their oneness will prove that their Church is a mischievous schism from that which is catholic and apostolical.

The unity existing in or professed by the Church of Rome claims our attention.

3. Roman Catholics plead those scriptural declarations in which the church is called "one body, one fold," &c. They also quote the passage, "Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation." (Matt. xii. 25.) "God is not the author of confusion, but of peace." (1 Cor. xiv. 33.)

No Protestant will deny that the church is one; but he repudiates the idea that unity of itself is a mark of the true church. All unity is not of God; nor is all dissent derived from Satan. But the unity of sound doctrine and Christian love is specially enjoined. Romanists evade coming to a test by this unity, and endeavour to lead us to that which is outward and artificial, existing only between the Pope and the Clergy. Such claims to unity must be impartially examined.

4. Adhesion to the Pope of Rome is no part of Christian unity. The members of the true church are joined to one another, and to Christ their Head, by charity. The Romish hierarchy makes allegiance to the Pope, and not to Jesus Christ, the essential constitution of a church. This, being the great point of difference between the Latin and the Greek, together with all other churches in the world, is so far from being a sign by which to know the church, that it is a question of dispute in Christendom, and condemned by all but themselves: it is, therefore, to say the least of it, suspicious as a fundamental article of religion. That adherence to the Pope cannot be a certain mark of the mystical body of Christ, is proved by the following considerations:—

(1.) There is no direct or even inferential evidence from Scripture, that the Pope is the head of all Christians. The scriptures adduced by Papists to prove this dogma would never occur to an unprejudiced person as conveying any thing relative to such a headship.

(2.) The Scriptures not only nowhere teach that the Roman Pontiff is head of the church; but, on the other hand, contradict it. They acknowledge no head but Christ. (Eph. i. 22; v. 23.) None other is chief Shepherd. (John x. 11; 1 Peter v. 4.) Hence the primitive church, immediately succeeding the apostolic times, acknowledged no Roman supremacy, but gave this honour to Christ, who alone supplies life and spirit to his mystical body.

(3.) When primitive churches cultivated intercourse with Rome, she at that time held fast the apostolic faith; but in later times her doctrine has become corrupted by error. Wherefore, as formerly, on account of the preservation of apostolic doctrine, all the churches communicated with her; so, in later days, by reason of the depravation of Christian truth, they have seceded. As the Roman Pontiffs have degenerated from the faith and piety of the ancient Bishops of Rome, so the Papal hierarchy of the present day has awfully departed from primitive purity.

(4.) The Fathers never ascribe such monarchy to the Pope. Proofs of this are ample.*

(5.) Those who separate from Christ, but not from the Pope, cease to be members of the true church; because Christ, and not the Pope, is the Head. "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." (John xv. 6.) "Which is the head, even Christ, from whom the whole body, fitly joined together and compacted,.....maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love." (Eph. iv. 15, 16.)

(6.) Many have been separated from the Pope who were, nevertheless, true members of the church of Christ. Victor excommunicated the Asiatic churches; they nevertheless continued true churches, and had many synods and orthodox Bishops. Marcellinus was condemned for idolatry by a Roman synod; therefore the Church of Rome, which was then a true Church, separated from him. Pope Liberius condemned Athanasius, the defender of the catholic faith. So says Baronius: "Liberius subscribed to the decision that was introduced against Athanasius, and received the decrees of faith adopted by the Syrmian Council." † Liberius, writing to Ursacius and Valens, the Arians, says: "Let your prudence acknowledge, that Athanasius is separated from the communion of the Church of Rome." ‡ Athanasius, however, did not cease to be a member of the true church, though he was separated both from the Church and Pope of Rome. Honorius was condemned as a Monothelite by the sixth Council of Constantinople, which retained the communion of the Catholic Church. The Council of Basil deprived Eugenius of his seat. Many other instances might be given. From the foregoing cases it is clear, that union with the Pope is not necessary to the unity of the true and catholic church of Christ.

(7.) Many of the Roman Pontiffs were not even members of Christ, but the basest of criminals, and enemies of all godliness. Of others who were not so notoriously wicked, it would not be difficult to say whether they were the members of Christ, or the children of their father, the devil. To make communion with men confessedly depraved a note of Christian unity, is the highest absurdity, and consummate sinfulness.

(8.) Others were heretics; and, certainly, communion with them is a strange mark of Christian unity. If the Pope be a heretic, he is, ipso facto, no Pope; because heresy, as Bellarmine allows, is one of those cases in which a General Council may interfere. This was manifest in the case of Liberius, who was deprived by the Roman Clergy, they electing Felix in his place.

["Liberius, who for a time was opposed to Arianism, was banished in 355 to Berea, by the Emperor Constantius. Felix, in the mean time, was, by the Arian faction, elected in the room of Liberius, and ordained by Epictetus, Basil, and Acasius. Liberius, afterwards, weary of exile, signed the Arian creed, and was recalled from banishment, and restored to the Popedom. His return was followed by sanguinary battles between the two contending factions. The Clergy were murdered in the very churches. Felix, however, with his party, was at length overthrown and forced to yield. He retired to his estate on the road to Ponto, where, at the end of seven years, he died."*]

(9.) No man can be certain who is the true Pope. If he be a simoniac, he is, ipso facto, no Pope. Many have been shown to be such, and strong suspicions were entertained of others. And since no one can know that the Pope is not simoniacal, none can safely rely on him as the head of the church.

(10.) A Pope may be deposed by the Church, and her unity yet remain; as is taught by Gerson in his book De Auferibilitate Papæ, "Of the Deposition of a Pope." This is proved from the frequent vacancies in the Roman See, and from the schismatic dissensions of the Popes, which are numbered at twenty or upwards: sometimes there were even two or three Pontiffs at the same period. Union, therefore, with this visible head, is not essential to the oneness of the Catholic Church; else, at the time in which there is no Pope, or a dubious one, the unity of the Catholic Church must necessarily cease.

From the above we infer, that fealty to the Pope cannot be a necessary mark of Christian unity. In behalf of this Romanists use several arguments, which we shall consider. They maintain that they have the consent of the Scriptures, the agreement of Councils and Pontiffs, and the concord of Catholics in doctrine throughout the world.

5. They adduce the agreement of the sacred penmen as a proof of the unity existing among them. But what applies to the writers of Scripture is not available; because the doctrines of the Romanists, in many points, are at variance with the unanimous decisions of the word of God, which has already been shown in the discussion of several controverted topics. Besides, they refuse to deduce their doctrines and rule of faith from Scripture alone, adding thereto tradition. The concord of the sacred writers which exists among themselves has no affinity whatever with the unscriptural unity of the Church of Rome.

6. Papists say that the decrees of their Popes and General Councils in all matters of importance agree, and that this is another proof of their unity in faith and doctrine. But this agreement, did it exist, signifies nothing, seeing that the decrees of their Councils are opposed to Scripture; and we have already shown, that the decisions of Councils are often contradictory. †

* Gerhardi Loc. Theolog., tom. v., De Ecclesia, sect. 234. 4to. Jenæ, 1617.

† "Liberius sententiæ adversus Athanasium latæ subscripsit, et decreta fidei in Sirminensi Synodo scripta suscepit."—Baron. Annal., tom. iii., anno 357, p. 709.

‡ "Cognoscat prudentia vestra, Athanasium ab Ecclesiæ Romanæ communione separatum esse."

[* Edgar's Variations of Popery, p. 49.]

[† "'Omnia legitimorum Conciliorum et Pontificum decreta etiam in omnibus dogmatibus inter se conveniunt, licet edita sint a diversis hominibus, diversis locis, temporibus, occasionibus, et contra diversissimas, imo sæpe contrarias hæreses.'—Resp. Et Concilia et Pontifices in suis decretis errare posse, ac sæpius etiam errasse proferendo decreta et Scripturis et aliis legitimis Conciliis contraria, demonstrabitur suo loco. Concilium Ariminense, Seleuciense, Sardicense II., &c., ediderunt decreta Catholicæ fidei et Nicenæ Synodi decretis de ὁμοουσιῳ contraria. Ephesinum II. Eutychis hæresin stabilivit. Neocæsariense, can. 7, prohibuit, 'Presbyterum interesse convivio secundarum nuptiarum.' Nicenum, can. 12. prohibuit, 'eos redire ad militiam, qui cingulum abjecissent.' Arelatense II., can. 2, statuit, 'non esse assumendum ad sacerdotium eum, qui in

7. The decrees or decisions of Popes are often contrary to the word of God, and to each other.*

vinculo conjugii constitutus est, nisi fuerit promissa conversio,' quod pugnat cum decretis Concilii Gangrensis, can. 4. Concilium Laodicenum, cap. 1, statuit, 'ut secundum indulgentiam reddatur communio illis, qui secundis nuptiis juncti sunt.' Consilium Constantinopol. I., quod fuit generale secundum, statuit, can. 5, quod 'primatus Ecclesiasticus tribuendus sit Romano Pontifici;' sed hoc pugnat cum cap. 26 Concilii Carthaginensis III., ubi statuitur, 'neminem vocari debere Principem Sacerdotum.' Idem Carthaginense III., can. 47, numerat in canone libros V. T. Apocryphos, quod pugnat cum Concilio Laodiceno, cap. ult., nisi Canonici nomen late accipiatur pro libro, qui in Ecclesia legitur. Concilium Toletanum I., can. 17, statuit, 'posse admitti eum ad communionem, qui habeat concubinam, modo non sit uxoratus.' Concilium Wormatiense, can. 3, jubet, 'fures occultos explorari per sacræ eucharistiæ perceptionem.' Concilium Constantinopolitanum III., quod fuit sextum generale, can. 2, recipit decretum Concilii Africani sub Cypriano de rebaptizandis hæreticis; can. 72, judicat, 'irrita et solvenda conjugia Catholicorum cum hæreticis.' Concilium Nicenum II. statuit, 'imagines esse colendas;' quod pugnat cum decretis Concilii Constantinopolitani, ut fatentur Patres Nicenæ Synodi, act. 6, et cum decretis Concilii Francofurtensis. In Concilio Romano sub Stephano VII., damnatus est Formosus Pontifex, et omnia illius acta abrogata. Postea aliud Concilium habitum fuit Ravennæ sub Johanne IX., in quo 'Formosus restitutus fuit, et Stephanus damnatus,' omniaque acta ejus Concilii, quod sub Stephano fuit habitum, abrogata. Quid quod disertis verbis Platina in Stephano scribit: 'Post Stephanum semper hæc consuetudo servata est, ut acta priorum Pontificum sequentes aut infringerent aut omnino tollerent.' Plura exempla in quæstione de auctoritate Conciliorum adducuntur, ubi etiam refelluntur ea, quæ pro palliandis Conciliorum erroribus Bellarminus argute magis quam vere excogitavit. Augustinus, lib. ii., de Baptismo contra Donatist., cap. 3, diserte scribit: 'Concilia regionalia et provincialia debere cedere plenariis, et inter ipsa plenaria priora a posterioribus emendari:' omnium vero auctoritatem Scripturæ subjicit, lib. iii., contra Maximin. Arian., cap. 14: 'Nec ego Nicenum, nec tu debes Ariminense tanquam præjudicaturus proferre Concilium, nec ego hujus auctoritate, nec tu illius detineris. Scripturarum autoritatibus, non quorumcunque propriis, sed utrisque communibus testibus, res cum re, causa cum causa, ratio cum ratione concertet.'"—Gerhardi Loc. Theolog., tom. v., De Ecclesia, sect. 237. Jenæ, 1617.]

[* "De Pontificum decretis idem asserimus, quod sc. et Scripturis et aliorum Pontificum decretis sæpe sint contraria. Zepherinus fuit Montanista, Marcellinus idololatra, Liberius et Felix fuerunt Ariani. Anastasius communicavit cum Photino, et Achatium hæreticum occulte revocare voluit. Vigilius fuit Eutychianus, Honorius Monothelita. Johannes XXIII. negavit vitam æternam; credidit animam hominis cum corpore mori et extingui ad instar animalium brutorum, dixitque mortuam semel ne in novissimo quidem die resurrecturam. Aut ergo omnes Papæ illis hæresibus fuerunt infecti, aut non omnes in dogmatibus et decretis consenserunt. Gregorius de quatuor Synodis, inter quas est etiam Chalcedonensis, dicit, quod 'eas amplectatur ut quatuor Evangelia.' Sed Leo, Epist. 59, de Synodo Chalcedonensi dicit 'se semper reprehendisse quæ in hac Synodo decreta sunt.' Martinus statuit, 'eum, qui semel post suam ordinationem in lapsum inciderit, deinceps non posse ullum gradum sacerdotii adipisci;' cap. Qui semel, distinct. 50: contrarium decrevit Siricius, cap. Quia, distinct. 82, 'eos qui propter peccata jubentur deponi post condignam pœnitentiam in suo ordine posse reparari.' Gregorius in Epistola ad Bonifacium statuit, 'si mulier infirmitate correpta non valuerit debitum viro reddere, virum, si continere nequeat, posse alteri nubere.' Contrarium statuerunt alii Pontifices, cap. Quoniam, lib. iv. decretal., tit. 9, de conjugio leprosorum. Nicolaus I. docet, 'Baptismum in nomine Christi sine expressa mentione trium personarum prolatum esse ratum,' c. a quodam, dist. 4, de consecrat. Contrarium docuit Zacharias itidem Papa, 'scilicet verum baptisma esse non posse, si vel una persona de Trinitate non nominetur,' cap. in Synodo, de consecr., dist. ead. Sabinianus Gregorii Primi antecessoris sui libros comburi jussit. Formosi decreta abrogavit Stephanus VI. Stephani decreta et acta abrogavit Romanus I. Romani acta abrogavit Johannes. Julius, Innocentius, et Cœlestinus Romani Pontifices decreverunt, 'ut viri ab uxoribus separentur, qui vel nescientes proprios filios ex lavacro baptismi suscepissent,' cap. pervenit xxx., q. 1; at hoc est contrarium præcepto Christi Matt. xix. 6, et Apostoli 1 Cor. vii. 10. Alexander III., cap. Licet de sponsa duorum, dicit, 'quosdam suos prædecessores judicasse matrimonium per verba de præsenti contractum non tamen consummatum posse dirimi per aliud matrimonium, se tamen contrarium sentire.' Aut igitur hic, aut ejus prædecessores errarunt. Onuphrius triginta schismata inter Pontifices Romanos contigisse scribit. Stapleton., relect. princip. fid., contr. i., quæst. v., art. 3, viginti quinque schismata enumerat, atque addit, 'quod omnia pariter computata non amplius conficiant quam annos centum et viginti quatuor et menses decem.' Quasi vero hoc non sit temporis plus satis, quo Romana Ecclesia fuit plane ακεφαλος, quia dubius Papa habetur pro non Papa, ut scribit Bellarm., lib. ii., de Concil., cap. xix., resp. ad 3 arg. Idipsum agnoscit Glovian., quando in lib. de schismate, p. 181, sic scribit: 'Schisma ambiguum Christianum orbem concussit, quando alter Pontifex Romæ, alter Avenione creatur, cum uterque magna Cardinalium, Episcoporum, Sacerdotum, Principum, ac populorum assensione Pontificatu defungeretur; nam cum tres simul Pontifices inaugurati essent, Johannes XXIII., Gregorius XII., Benedictus XIII., tum quidem gravi schismate est ecclesia Christi dilacerata et in partes dissecta.' Quinimo ipse Bellarminus non audet hoc negare, sic enim scribit, præfat. in controv. de Rom. Pontif.: 'Non ignoratis, quas tragœdias in Ecclesia Imperatores excitarunt, et quasi hæc parva fuissent, addidit Satan Romanos Pontifices contra Pontifices commovere.' Atqui si Pontifices contra Pontifices commoti sunt, quomodo omnia Pontificum decreta consentiunt? Referenda est ad hunc locum disputatio Erasmi in annot. 1 Cor. vii., p. 327. Si verum est, quod quidam asseverant, Romanum Pontificem errore judiciali non posse unquam errare, quid opus generalibus Conciliis, quid opus in Concilium accersere jureconsultos ac theologos eruditos, si pronuncians labi non possit? cur datus est appellationi locus vel ad Synodum vel ad eundem rectius edoctum, posteaquam semel de causa pronunciavit Pontifex? Quorsum attinet tot academias in tractandis fidei causis distorqueri, cum ex uno Pontifice, quod verum est, audire liceat? imo qui fit, ut Pontificis hujus decreta cum illius pugnent decretis? ut enim taceam de Formoso, nonne Papa Johannes XXII. et Nicolaus decretis totis inter se pugnant, idque in his quæ videntur ad fidei negotium pertinere? quorum alter, Nicolaus IV., pronunciavit judicialiter, ut illorum ore loquar, 'Christum et Apostolos nihil habuisse nec in commune, nec privatim;' (c. exiit de verbor. significat. in sexto;) alter (Johan.) contra pronunciat habuisse (c. cum inter. extr. de verbor. significat.). Id ex ipsorum extravagantibus licet cognoscere, sed proprius ad id, quod hic agimus, facit, quod Innocentius III. ac Cœlestinus de matrimonio dirimendo prorsus pugnantia definierunt; quorum hic jus facit alteri conjugum iterare matrimonium, si alter fuerit in hæresin prolapsus. Innocentius negat, quemadmodum legimus libro decretalium quarto, tit. de divortiis, cap. Quanto. Nec illic dissimulat Innocentius quendam prædecessorem suum secus statuisse, Cœlestinum indicans, ut apparet glossema, declarans Cœlestini super hac re constitutionem olim extitisse in decretalibus, lib. 3, titulo de conversione infidelium, in fine. Ideo magis verisimile est, quod is titulus paucissimis constet capitibus, ut intelligas esse decurtatum. (Huc pertinet, quod Alphonsus de Castro, lib. i., contra hæres., cap. iv., refert, se decretum illud Cœlestini vidisse.) Præterea Pelagius, ut extat in decretis, distinctione 31, cap. ante triennium, constituerat, ut hypodiaconi Siciliæ ab uxoribus abstinerent, quas ante constitutionem legitime duxerunt. Id decretum velut iniquum et cum evangelico pugnans præcepto retractat et abrogat Gregorius ejus nominis primus, qui Pelagio successit, statuens, 'ut in posterum nemini ad eum ordinem pateret aditus, nisi vovisset castitatem; ceterum durum et iniquum esse, ut ad castitatem cogatur, qui non voverit castitatem, nec ulla culpa commeruerit, ut eo debuerit compelli.' At quod hic iniquum videtur Gregorio, non visum est iniquum Innocentio III., loco quem modo adduximus, qui ita respondet iis, qui objiciebant, 'præter æquum videri, conjugem relictum suo jure privari sine culpa, præsertim cum contumeliosior sit in Christum, qui baptizatus recidit in hæresin, quam qui natus Ethnicus recusat ad Christi professionem converti.' Ad hæc seculis aliquot hanc sententiam amplexa est Ecclesia Mutinensis, ut qui contraxisset cum Barbara verbis legitimis et ex animo, sed non intercedente coitu postea contraheret cum Cornelia et coitum adjungeret, cogeretur priore relicta posteriori convivere. Id palam rescindit Innocentius Rom. Pont., ex diametro, quod aiunt, diversam pronuncians sententiam, videlicet priorem esse legitimam uxorem, quod cum posteriore sit actum, adulterium esse non matrimonium, ut proditum est libro decretalium Epistolarum iv., tit. iv., cap. Tuas dudum, et ejusdem tituli cap. Licet. Alexander Tertius indicat suo rescripto fuisse statutum ac definitum aliquando a prædecessoribus suis, id est, Romanis Pontificibus, quod in Mutinensi Ecclesia damnat Innoc., &c., ut non commemorem interim, quod in causa fidei schola Parisiens. aliquando publicitus improbarit Romani Pontificis sententiam, eumque ad palinodiam compulerit, si qua fides historiis. Hæc omnia Erasmus, Leonis X., Pont. Rom., dilectus filius. Quæ vero a Bellarmino afferuntur ad palpabiles illas Pontificiorum decretorum contradictiones palliandas et excusandas primo statim intuitu sui infirmitatem demonstrant et diligenter expenduntur a Guil. Witakero in controv. de Pontif. Rom. quæst. 6."—Idem, sect. 238.]

8. That Roman Catholics do not possess true Christian unity, we gather from the nature of that which already exists among them, as well as from their dissensions of a more general and special character.

They maintain, to quote Bellarmine, that "all Catholics, dispersed throughout the whole world, agree in every article of faith; nor can they believe differently, when they subject their understanding to the Pope in the chair of Peter, with the consent of the other Pastors of the Church."* To this we answer, that, formidable as the argument may appear, it is destitute of foundation when duly examined. That such an unity exists in the Romish Church we may admit, without giving them any advantage; for all that is proved is that which Protestants have invariably and with great justice objected to them as a reproach; that is, that under their system submission to authority has been substituted for faith, and uniformity of ignorance has been preferred to the investigation of truth. And since the right of private judgment, exercised among them, has something in its nature so monstrous, it is no more to be wondered at that no difference of opinion exists where no one is allowed to have an opinion, than that the blind should not dispute concerning colours, or the deaf respecting the nature of sound. It is for want of a salutary spirit of discussion and inquiry, which is equally consistent with sincere piety and Christian liberty, that Popery has subsided into a stagnant pool of corruption. The unity or concord of the Church of Rome has very aptly been compared to the stillness of night when all is in a state of repose; and to the quietude of a church-yard, where all around are in the sleep of death.

We allow that in the Papal kingdom there is an external unity; but we deny that it is the unity of faith, and love, and truth, which the Spirit of God inculcates. Matthew Flaccius wrote concerning the sects, divisions, and dissensions among Roman Catholics, and describes seven kinds of Popish concord; namely, Satanic, political, brutish, Iscariotic, tyrannical and servile, Herodian, extrinsical and accidental.

(1.) The first is Satanic, which is derived from Satan, who is ever on the alert, lest this kingdom of the Pope should be dissolved. "For if Satan be divided against himself, how shall his kingdom stand?" (Luke xi. 18; Matt. xii. 25.) Hence Cardinals, Bishops, and various orders of Monks, though they warmly contend among themselves, nevertheless repress and conceal their dissensions, lest Popery should suffer.

(2.) The second is political, when men so agree that they are subject to the will of a Monarch. Thus their writers submit every topic to the judgment of the Pope. All Bishops, by the strict obligation of an oath, are held in subjection to the same, whom they fear to contradict in the smallest matters.

(3.) The third is founded in ignorance or stupidity, in which men understand nothing of religion, and blindly follow the opinion of others, considering those things to be true which are commonly received. Such is the unity among the laity, who, without examination and inquiry, receive whatever is declared by the Clergy; for they are not to read the Scriptures, but to hear what their Pastors propose. This is the collier's faith, which "believes what the Church believes."

(4.) The fourth is called Iscariotic, and is illustrated by those who are attached to the Church through motives of gain. Many adhere to the Church of Rome for this. From most authentic testimony it appears, that the present race of Roman Catholic Clergy, to a great extent, embraced their profession through the influence of worldly advantage.

(5.) A fifth trait of their unity is, that which is termed tyrannical and servile, and is displayed when men, by threats, persecution, and imprisonment, are prohibited from thinking independently. Thus, in the dominions of the Pope, and in other Roman Catholic countries, no one is permitted to utter a word against the corruptions of the Papacy. Tyranny on the one hand, and servility on the other, mutually assist in preventing the free exercise of thought.

(6.) A sixth is termed Herodian. As Herod and Pilate, though at variance with each other, consented to the death of Christ, so Romanists agree in opposing the Protestants, though at variance among themselves, and that, not merely in the comparatively harmless dissent of entertaining different opinions on minor points, but in the worst of all dissension, the exercise of bad passions, and in the utter extinction of brotherly love.

(7.) The seventh species of unity among Romanists is termed extrinsic and accidental; consisting, not in the spiritual union of faith, but in the conformity of ceremonies, rites, and external worship. For though they cherish bitter contentions concerning various articles of belief, yet, by a similarity of church service, they exhibit an appearance of unity.

Were we to listen to the pretensions of the Romanists, we might suppose their Church was so much united, that little room was left among them for difference of opinion of any kind. On examination, however, we shall find, that, notwithstanding its boasted uniformity, it has always been divided by a multitude of controversies. Their unity, so far from being real, is only the shadow of what is pretended. The great mass of the uninstructed, who are not allowed to be inquisitive or curious in matters of religion, are silent on controversy. But this is a unity chargeable with all the objections mentioned above. The learned and the Clergy are much divided in matters of religion; and their disputes must affect the crowd, sooner or later. A reference to the several points on which they disagree, will fully justify this statement. These dissensions may be divided into two classes; namely, "general," and "special." Those may be called general that refer to Romish doctrines, which have varied and changed at different times. The special dissensions of Romanists may be reduced to two; namely, those which concern the standards of religion, and those which have reference to other articles of faith, deduced from these standards.

9. The very body of Roman Catholic divinity has been altered in different times. The five following forms are the principal; namely, the Lombardic, scholastic, monastic, the mixed, and Jesuitic.

(1.) The first is the Lombardic theology, which arose about the year 1150. There is a confused chaos of doctrine in this system, which taught that justification arose from grace and works. This theology was purer, in many respects, than modern Popery, as may be seen in the four Books of the Sentences. Hence the Parisian Doctors usually wrote in the margin of Lombard, when they dissented from him, Hic magister non tenetur, "Here the master is not to be adhered to." The Book of Sentences, which rendered the name of Peter Lombard so illustrious, was a compilation of sentences and passages drawn from the Fathers, whose manifold contradictions he endeavoured to reconcile. This production became the text-book of theologians, and was preferred to the doctrines of Jesus Christ, as appears from a remarkable passage in the works of Roger Bacon.*

[* "Omnes Catholici, toto orbe dispersi, de omnibus dogmatibus fidei sentiunt idem: nec possunt aliter sentire, cum omnes subjiciant sensum suum sensui unius et ejusdem summi Pastoris ex cathedra Petri cum consilio aliorum Pastorum Ecclesiam dirigentis."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Notis Ecclesiæ, lib. iv., cap. x., col. 195, C. Colon., 1619.]

(2.) The second is the scholastic theology, which arose about one hundred years subsequent to the former. In the article of justification we are informed, that justification and salvation are to be obtained by human works alone; done, however, according to the commandment of God. There are distinct sects of scholastics, differing from each other, such as Thomists, Scotists, Occamists, &c. This led a Parisian Divine to say, "that the scholastics were so discordant among themselves, that scarcely two could be found of the whole number who held the same opinion."

(3.) The third is the monastic theology, which, in the article on justification, teaches, that salvation is to be sought in Papal indulgences, in works of supererogation, and in will-worship. Hence it inculcates, that images are to be adored, that confidence is to be placed in saints, that pilgrimages to holy places are to be undertaken, monastic orders entered, and that funeral masses are to be bought. They introduce the legends of the saints and feigned miracles into their sermons.

(4.) The fourth is the intermediate theology. When, by the light of the Gospel, these errors became palpable, Romanists began to be more cautious, and either rejected or palliated such absurd dogmas. This system admits that we are justified by faith in Christ, springing from love. It acknowledges that by the merits of Christ alone we can be saved, but declares that good works are necessary to salvation. It concedes that the mass is not a propitiatory sacrifice, but applicatory, by which the merits of Christ are rendered available to us.

(5.) The fifth is the Jesuitical theology, which, in some respects, is opposed to the scholastic, and to the Popish writers of the preceding age. The sum of its doctrine on justification is, that habitual righteousness or justice before God consists in an infused habit, but actual justice in the merit of good works. The Jesuits materially altered the theology of the Church of Rome, as will appear in other parts of this discussion.

The foregoing is only a brief outline of the theological differences in the Church of Rome, the particulars of which would fill volumes.

10. If we view the internal state of this Church, we shall find that, notwithstanding its boasted unity, it is divided by contests and dissensions of various kinds. The Franciscans and Dominicans contend about numerous points of doctrine and discipline. The Scotists and Thomists have invariably been at war. The Bishops dispute and contend with the Pope and congregations which he has instituted to maintain his pretensions. The French and Flemish, with other countries, have openly opposed the Pope on many occasions, and have refused to acknowledge his supremacy. The Jesuits were continually at variance with the Dominicans, Benedictines, and other Orders; which they almost ruined, especially the Benedictines. The theological colleges debate concerning almost all the doctrines of Christianity. It is true, however, that many of these controversies are tempered and managed by the prudence and moderation of the Popes; but to heal entirely these divisions is a work beyond their power, and even contrary to the intentions of the sovereign Pontiffs.

Besides these debates of inferior moment, ever since the time of the Council of Trent, controversies of great importance have arisen, which divided and still divide the Church of Rome. These controversies were commenced by the Jesuits, who formed a party in the Church, and were always the warm supporters of the Pope's supremacy. In opposition to them there is another party, who are in favour of reformation, although a partial one; who, comparing the primitive church with the vulgar system of Popery, think that a purer state of morals should exist than that which prevails. From these opposite ways of thinking the warmest contentions arose between the Jesuits and several other Doctors of the Church of Rome.

["The number of combatants," says Mosheim, "that the Pontiffs brought into the field of controversy during this century was prodigious, and their glaring defects are abundantly known. It may be said, with truth, of the most of them, that, like many warriors of another class, they generally lost sight of all considerations, except those of victory and plunder. The disputants, which the Order of Jesuits sent forth in great number against the adversaries of the Church of Rome, surpassed all the rest in subtilty, impudence, and invective. But their chief leader and champion of the polemic tribe was Robert Bellarmine, a Jesuit, and one of the College of Cardinals, who treated, in several bulky volumes, of all the controversies that subsisted between the Protestants and the Church of Rome, and whose merit as a writer consisted principally in clearness of style, and a certain copiousness of argument, which showed a rich and fruitful imagination. This eminent defender of the Church of Rome arose about the conclusion of this century, and, on his first appearance, all the force and attacks of the most illustrious Protestant Doctors were turned against him alone. His candour and plain dealing exposed him, however, to the censures of several Divines of his own communion; for he collected with diligence the reasons and objections of his adversaries, and proposed them, for the most part, in their full force with integrity and exactness. Had he been less remarkable on account of his fidelity and industry; had he taken care to select the weakest arguments of his antagonists, and to render them still weaker, by proposing them in an imperfect and unfaithful light; his fame would have been much greater among the friends of Rome than it actually is."*]

11. Considerable dissensions exist in the Church of Rome respecting the rule of faith. The true source or foundation of divinity is the word of God alone, as contained in the canonical books of the Old and New Testa-

[* "The Book of Sentences seemed to be at this time in much greater repute than the holy Scriptures, and the compilations of Peter Lombard were preferred to the doctrines and precepts of Jesus Christ. This appears evident from the following remarkable passage in Roger Bacon's Opp. Maj. ad Clementem IV., Pontif. Rom., published in 1733, at London, by Sam. Jebb from the original MSS.:—'Baccalaureus qui legit textum (Scripturæ) succumbit lectori Sententiarum, et ubique in omnibus honoratur et præfertur; nam ille, qui legit Sententias, habet principalem horam legendi secundum suam voluntatem, habet et socium et cameram apud religiosos; sed qui legit Bibliam, caret his, et mendicat horam legendi secundum quod placet lectori Sententiarum; et qui legit Summas, disputat ubique et pro magistro habetur; reliquus qui textum legit, non potest disputare, sicut fuit hoc anno Bononiæ, et in multis aliis locis, quod est absurdum; manifestum est igitur, quod textus illius facultatis (sc. Theologicæ) subjicitur uni summæ magistrali.' Such was now the authority of the scholastic theology, as appears from the words of Bacon, who lived in the following age, and in whose writings there are many things highly worthy of the attention of the curious."—Mosh. Eccles. Hist., cent. xii., part ii., chap. iii., sect. viii., note.]

[* Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., cent. xvi., sect. iii., part i., chap. i., pp. 205, 206. 8vo. edit. London, 1825.]

ments. The Council of Trent* adds Tobias, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, and the two Maccabees. But Cardinal Cajetan follows Jerome, who rejects them from the canon. Arias Montanus, whom Gregory XIII. calls his own son, in his Hebrew Bible, with interlineary translations, approved by the Louvain Doctors, says, concerning the apocryphal books, Ecclesia orthodoxa Hebræum canonem secuta inter apocryphos recenset: "The orthodox Church, following the Hebrew canon, numbers these among the apocryphal books." Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, referring to the sentiment of Jerome, that the apocryphal books were inferior to the canonical, says, "And the same also saith Thomas Aquinas and Nicholaus de Lyra on Tobias, namely, that these are not of so great authority that they can be efficaciously used in argument in those things which concern faith, as the other books of holy Scripture. Hence, probably, they have the same authority as the sayings of holy Doctors which are approved by the Church." †

Not only the canon but also the perfection of Scripture has been warmly contested in the Church of Rome. Our limits, however, will not allow us to enlarge. ‡ The other parts of the Roman Catholic rule, as traditions, decrees of Councils, decisions of Popes, &c., would present such a Babel of confusion, were the sentiments of their authors quoted, as would require a volume to contain them. Those who would examine these discrepancies for themselves must peruse many a folio and quarto of barbarous Latin, and spend wearisome days and nights in the investigation.

12. The unity of the Church of Rome is defective in its head.

The fearful schisms which took place in the Popedom,

* Can. et Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. iv., De Libris Canonicis.

† "Et idem etiam dicit Thomas (2, 2) et Nicholaus de Lyra super Tobiam, scilicet, quod isti non sunt tantæ auctoritatis, quod ex dictis eorum posset efficaciter argumentari in his, quæ sunt fidei, sicut ex aliis libris Scripturæ sacræ. Unde forte habent auctoritatem talem, qualem habent dicta sanctorum Doctorum approbata ab Ecclesia."—Antonin. Archiepisc., pars iii., tit. xviii., cap. vi., sect. ii., p. 1043. Veronæ, 1740.

[‡ "Speciales Pontificiorum et Jesuitarum dissensiones revocari possunt ad hæc duo capita, quod quædam concernant religionis principium, quædam vero articulos fidei reliquos ex principio illo deductos. Principium theologiæ unicum est verbum Dei in canonicis Veteris et Novi Testamenti libris propositum. Sed quinam sint libri vere canonici, nondum convenit inter Pontificios. Concilium Tridentinum, sess. iv., libris canonicis adjungit Tobiam, Judith, Sapientiam, Ecclesiasticum, duos Maccabæorum. Sed Cajetanus Cardinalis Hieronymum e canone illos excludentem sequitur. Benedict. Arias Montanus, quem Papa Gregorius XIII. filium suum appellat, in Bibliis Hebraicis cum interlineari interpretatione excusis et a Theologis Louvaniensibus approbatis, de illis sic judicat, 'Ecclesia orthodoxa Hebræum canonem secuta inter apocryphos recenset.' Idem statuunt Antoninus Archiepisc., pars iii., tit. xviii., cap. v.; Dionys. Carthus., in comm. in Genes.; Franc. Picus de fide et ordine credendi, theor. 5; Erasmus in Symb. Catech. 4, p. 153, et cet. Unde Pererius, præfat. in lib. xvi. comment. in Daniel., p. 742, diserte scribit, 'Multos Catholicos nobiscum censere libros illos controversos esse apocryphos.' Sixtus Senensis, lib. i. Biblioth., Staplet., lib. ix. princ. fidei doctr., cap. vi., alios V. T. libros dicunt Protocanonicos, alios Deuterocanonicos, utique ergo non erunt omnes æqualis auctoritatis. Papa Adrianus, c. Sextam, dist. xvi., canonizavit Synodum Constantinopolitanam sextam, sed in hac Synodo confirmatur Concilium Laodicenum, quod libros illos ex canone removet. Pistorius in prima motiva, apostasias Badensis, p. 34, accusat Lutherum, 'quod duos posteriores Esdræ e Bibliis evulserit.' Genebrardus in Chronol., p. 90, 'quartum librum Esdræ ad canonem pertinere' contendit. Sed Bellarmin., lib. i., de Verbo Dei, cap. xx., 'et tertium et quartum Esdræ apocryphos esse' agnoscit, quinetiam addit, 'contineri in quarto Esdræ quædam fabulosa ac Rabbinorum Thalmudistarum somnia,' quod repetit, lib. ii., de Verbo Dei, cap. i. Sic librum Baruch extra canonem esse agnoscit Joh. Driedo, lib. i. Catalog. script., cap. iv., ad difficult. 11, et Canus, lib. xii. locor., cap. vi., dicit, 'non adeo explorate et firmiter in sacrorum numero ab Ecclesia illum esse repositum;' sed Bellarm., lib. i., de Verbo Dei, cap. viii., contendit esse canonicum. Supplementum Esther Sixtus Senensis, lib. i. Biblioth., sect. iii., secutus Lyranum, e canone rejicit; sed reliqui Pontificii auctoritatem canonicam illi tribuunt. Apocrypha capita Danielis, videlicet Historiam Susannæ, Belis et Draconis, Hieronymum secuti, repudiant Joh. Driedo, lib. i. catal. script., cap. ult., Ludov. Viv. in 18 August., de Civ. Dei, cap. xxxi., Sixtus Senensis, lib. i. Biblioth., sect. viii.; sed reliqui Pontificii pro canonicis ea acceptant. Tertium et quartum Maccabæorum esse extra canonem agnoscunt Pontificii plerique omnes; sed Fr. Turrianus, pro canonibus Apostolorum, lib. i., cap. xi., vehementer suadet 'tertium Maccabæorum in canonem recipi.' Quinimo Bellarminus ipse sibi in quæstione de libris canonicis V. T. fortissime contradicit. Fatetur enim, lib. i., de Verbo Dei, cap. vii., 'Esdram constituisse canonem Hebræum,' quem, lib. ii., de Verbo Dei, cap. ii., annumerat Prophetis. Quicunque igitur, sub anathematis fulmine, pro canonicis libris haberi jubent illos libros, quos Esdras in canonem non recepit, illi Propheticæ auctoritati contradicunt. Patres Concilii Trident. et Bellarminus hoc faciunt; ergo. Ad textum Hebræum in Veteri et ad textum Græcum in Novo Testamento, a vulgata versione Latina provocari posse negant Patres Concilii Tridentini, quos sequuntur Jesuitæ. Sed in jure canonico, cap. ut veterum, dist. ix., expresse illud præcipitur; idipsum multis argumentis comprobant Ludov. Viv., in lib. xiv. Aug. de Civit. Dei, cap. viii., in lib. xv., cap. xiii.; Benedictus Arias Montanus unus ex Patrib. Concilii Trid., in præfat. super opus Biblicum; Erasmus, a Leone X. dilectus filius appellatus, in versione et annot. Novi Testamenti. Maldon. in comment., cap. viii. Matt.: 'Existimo Latinam nostram vulgatam esse in hoc loco ex Græcis corrigendam.' Franc. Lucas, præfat. annot. in Bibl.: 'Ridiculum est hoc quorundam responsum, vulgatam Latinam authenticam esse, nec esse ex Hebræis et Græcis corrigendam.' Fontes Hebræos corruptos esse statuunt Lindan., lib. i., de opt. gen. interpr., cap. ii.; Canus, lib. ii. locor., cap. xiii. Contrarium ostendunt Joh. Isaacus, Benedictus Arias Montanus, Andradius, et seq. Disputat Bellarminus et quidem recte, lib. iii., de Verbo Dei, cap. iii., 'ex solo sensu literali Scripturæ sacræ peti posse argumenta efficacia, cum certum sit, illum sensum qui ex verbis immediate colligitur esse sensum Spiritus Sancti.' Sed Cardinalis Cusanus, epist. ii. et iii., de communione sub una specie ad Bohemos, contendit, 'Scripturas esse ad tempus adaptatas et varie intellectas, ita ut uno tempore secundum currentem universale ritum exponerentur, mutato ritu iterum sententia mutaretur, ac mutato judicio Ecclesiæ mutatum esse et Dei judicium.' Scripturam esse perfectam, hoc est, continere ea omnia, quæ ad fidem et mores pertinent, communiter negant Jesuitæ, sed præter perspicua scholasticorum dicta ex Thoma, Soto, Camerarensi, Durando, Bonaventura, Biele, &c., pro perfectione Scripturæ adducta, ipsimet recentiores Pontificii calculum suum nostræ sententiæ addunt. Cajetanus in 2 Tim. iii., 'Scriptura utilis est ad doctrinam, redargutionem, &c., ut perfectus sit homo Dei, hoc est, integer constans ex omnibus requisitis ad perficiendum hominem Dei.' Costerus in Enchir., p. 48, 'Non inficiamur præcipua illa fidei dogmata ad salutem omnibus necessaria perspicue satis comprehendi in Scripturis.' Bellarminus, lib. iv., de Verbo Dei, cap. xi., 'Dico illa omnia scripta esse ab Apostolis, quæ sunt omnibus necessaria, et quæ ipsi palam omnibus vulgo prædicaverunt.' Jesuitæ, in Colloquio Ratisb., edit. Spir., sect. 216, ad locum Augustini ex libro de Unit. Eccles., cap. xvi., a nostris adductum aperte, annotarunt, 'se paratos esse ex sola Scriptura suam Ecclesiam adversus Lutheranos demonstrare, imo articulos fidei ex sola Scriptura sufficienter defendi posse adversus eos qui Ecclesiæ et Conciliorum auctoritatem non admittunt.' Pari ratione Pistorius jactitat, 'se ex sola Scriptura sacra cum Lutheranis disputare ac errorum eos convincere velle:' sed huic contradicit Eccius, qui coram Wilhelmo Bavariæ Duce in Comitiis Augustanis fassus 'ex Patribus quidem Lutheranam religionem quodammodo refutari posse, sed non ex Scriptura,' ut refertur tom. v., Oper. Germ. Luth., fol. 35; unde etiam Alb. Piggius, lib. i., de Eccles. Hier., cap. iv., certamen illud improbat. 'Si hujus,' inquit, 'doctrinæ (scilicet cum Lutheranis non esse disputandum ex Scripturis) fuissemus memores, meliore sane loco res nostræ essent, sed dum ingenii ostentandi et eruditionis gratia cum Luthero in certamen Scripturarum descenditur, excitatum est hoc, quod, proh dolor, videmus, incendium.' Traditiones tum ad fidem, tum ad mores pertinentes 'pari pietatis affectu et reverentia cum libris scriptis suscipiendas' esse decretum est in Concilio Tridentino, sess. iv., cap. i. Sed Jacobus Nachiantes Fossæ Clodiæ vel Clugiensis Episcopus in ipso Concilio Tridentino dixit, 'verba illa sibi dura videri, nihil enim esse quod cum Evangelio conferri possit.' Verger. Epist. ad Reg. Polon., fol. 119. Ac Stanislaus Hosius Cardinalis disputat, 'primum locum obtinere scriptum Evangelium, proximum vero traditiones.' Scripturarum lectione laicis interdicendum esse plerique Pontificii censent; sed aliter visum est Claudio Espensæo Episcopo, comment. in cap. ii. Tit. et 2 Tim. iii., 'Aliqui' (inquit) 'existimant Scripturas difficiliores esse quam ut debeant laicorum manibus conteri, sed aliter visum est Patribus Veteris et Novi Testamenti.'"—Gerhardi Loci Theo., sect. 241, pp. 1120—1124. Jenæ, 1675.]

the supposed seat of unity, for the space of fifty-one years, namely, from 1378 to 1429, and afterward between Eugenius IV. and the Council of Constance, is proof of the absence of that of which they boast, the want of which they bring as a charge against Protestants.

At the commencement of the reign of Clement V., in 1305, the seat of the Pope was removed to Avignon in France, where it remained for seventy years. At the death of Gregory XI., March 27th, 1378, the citizens of Rome, fearing lest a Frenchman should be chosen, came tumultuously to the conclave, and demanded that an Italian should be made Pope. The Cardinals, terrified by this uproar, chose Urban VI., a Neapolitan. Some of the Cardinals withdrew from Rome to Fondi, where they elected to the pontificate Robert, Count of Geneva, who took the name of Clement VII., and declared the election of Urban unlawful, because they were compelled by violence to the choice. Which of these two was the lawful Pope is to this day doubtful; nor will the records and writings alleged by the contending parties decide the controversy. Urban remained at Rome, and Clement took up his residence at Avignon. Thus the union of the Latin Church under one head was destroyed, and succeeded by that deplorable rupture, known by the name of "the great Western Schism." "Christendom was divided," says Du Pin, the Roman Catholic: "divers kingdoms continued under the obedience of Urban, and others acknowledged Clement. This caused a bloody schism in the Church. Urban joined the spiritual arms to the temporal to subdue them, (the followers of Clement,) and ordered a process to be made against Queen Jane, the Earl of Fondi, the Ursini, and the other favourers of Clement; and declared them to have forfeited their estates, their lands, their goods, and their dignities, and to be incapable to enjoy them. He declared Clement likewise the Antipope, and his Cardinals schismatics, and deprived them of all kinds of dignities and benefices. These reciprocal condemnations caused great disorders through all Christendom, each of the two having their partisans, who made war one upon another, and endeavoured to deprive each other of the benefices and dignities obtained from the Pope whom they acknowledged; insomuch that the benefices were for a booty, and seized by such as found themselves the strongest. The Popes bestowed them on those that sued for them, though undeserving, and being not of age, only to enlarge the number of their creatures; or else they sold them, to supply their wants. Impunity reigned everywhere; there was no such thing as order or obedience, and the Church was in a dreadful confusion. Italy was the part of the world which suffered the most, because this was the place where the partisans of the two Popes had most liberty. Urban, to make himself sole master, and to put in execution the judgment he had given against Queen Jane, gave away her kingdom to Charles, Duke of Duras, a kinsman of the Queen's, and called him out of Hungary, where he then was, to come and take possession. When he had arrived at Rome he crowned him King of Sicily, after he had obliged him to give the duchies of Capua and Melphi to himself, and divers other earldoms to his nephew, Francis Pregnano, surnamed Butillo. But because this Prince wanted money to undertake an enterprise so considerable as was the conquest of the kingdom of Sicily, the Pope pawned the goods of the churches in the city of Rome, and sold the chalices, crosses, and other ornaments, to make up a round sum, which he gave him." *

* Du Pin's Eccles. Hist., vol. ii., pp. 509, 510. Dublin, 1723.

On the death of Urban, in 1389, the Italian Cardinals chose for his successor at Rome Boniface IX. "Boniface augmented the revenues considerably, and the temporal authority of Popes, and heaped together great riches in the time of his papacy. If we may credit Theodoric à Niem, a contemporary author, one of his domestics, he made a public merchandise of benefices at the beginning of his popedom; and afterwards, willing to palliate it, he the first settled the annates, that is to say, the right of receiving the first year's revenues of bishoprics and abbeys which became vacant, and the dates for all sorts of benefices void by death, which he granted to different persons at the same time for money. He revoked all grants of reversions, to make new ones, invented particular clauses of provisions, which annulled all the former. He granted all sorts of dispensations and pardons for money. His court was full of apostate Monks, whom he made his officers, or provided with employments and benefices. For money he gave licence to the Friars-Mendicants to quit their order and convent, and to enjoy benefices. He fully settled the sovereign and immediate dominion of the Popes over the city of Rome." *

On the death of Clement, which happened in the year 1394, Benedict XII. or XIII. was chosen Pope by the French Cardinals. Though before his election he took an oath to vacate the popedom, provided the Cardinals desired it, yet after he was chosen he refused to do so at their request, and thus perjured himself. The Gallican Church, displeased at the proceedings on both sides, withdrew obedience from both Popes in 1397, at a Council held at Paris.

On the death of Boniface, the Roman party, in 1404, chose Innocent VII., who was succeeded in 1406 by Gregory XII.

The Cardinals of Gregory, and eight or nine of those of Benedict, called a Council, to meet at Pisa. The Council excommunicated both these Popes for schism, perjury, and contumacy, and elected Alexander V. But the decrees of the Council were treated with contempt by both the Pontiffs, each of whom performed the functions of the papacy in his respective territory. Thus the Western Church was divided into three great factions by as many contending Popes, who loaded each other with curses, calumnies, and excommunications.

["The Pisan Council, in 1409, unable to ascertain whether Gregory or Benedict was the canonical head of the Church, proceeded by deposition and election. The holy Fathers, incapable of determining the right or title, used, says Maimbourg, 'not their knowledge, but their power;' and having dismissed Gregory and Benedict, appointed Alexander. Gregory and Benedict were summoned to appear; and, on refusal, were, in the third session, convicted of contumacy. The Pisans, representing the universal church, and vested with supreme authority, proceeded without ceremony, in the nineteenth session, to the work of degradation. Their definitive sentence against the French and Italian Viceroys of heaven is a curiosity, and worthy of eternal remembrance.

["The Pisans began with characterizing themselves as holy and general, representing the universal church; and then declared His French and Italian Holiness guilty of schism, heresy, error, perjury, incorrigibleness, contumacy, pertinacity, iniquity, violation of vows, scandalization of the holy universal church of God, and unworthy of all power and dignity. The character of these Plenipotentiaries of heaven, if not very good, is certainly pretty extensive. The sacred Synod then deprived Gregory and Benedict of the papacy; and forbade all Christians, on pain of excommunication, notwithstanding any oath of fidelity, to obey the ex-Pontiffs, or lend them counsel or favour.

* Idem, p. 511.

[" The papacy being vacated by the sentence of deposition, the next step was to elect a supreme Pontiff. This task, the Council, in the nineteenth session, performed by the French and Italian Cardinals, formed into one sacred college. The conclave, with cordial unanimity, elected the Cardinal of Milan, who assumed the appellation of Alexander V. He presided in the ensuing session, and ratified the acts of the Cardinals and General Council.

[" The Pisan Council, however, notwithstanding its alleged universality, did not extinguish the schism. The decision of the Synod, and election of the conclave, only furnished a third claimant for the pontifical chair. The universality and authority of the Pisan assembly were, by many, rejected; and Christendom was divided between Gregory, Benedict, and Alexander. Gregory was obeyed by Germany, Naples, and Hungary; while Benedict was recognised by Scotland, Spain, Armagnac, and Foix. Alexander was acknowledged, as supreme spiritual director, by the other European nations. The schism, therefore, still continued. The Latin communion was divided between three ecclesiastical chiefs, who continued to distract the Western Church. The inefficiency of the Pisan attempt required the convocation of another General Council, whose energy might be better directed and more successful. This remedy was, in 1414, supplied by the assembly of Constance."*]

On the death of Alexander, the Cardinals who followed him chose John XXIII. to be his successor. For the purpose of healing the breach, John, at the instigation of the Emperor, Sigismund, called a Council to meet in Constance, from an expectation that its decrees would be favourable to his interests. The Council "commenced its sittings Nov. 5th, 1414, for the purpose of putting an end to the schism, and reforming the Church in its head and members. They all agreed as to the legality of the Council of Pisa, and yet the greater number were of opinion that John XXIII. should renounce the pontificate, as well as Gregory and Benedict."† This John absolutely refused, although he had sworn to do so, if required. He was therefore deposed by the Council in 1415; and, after having continued with the utmost obstinacy in his opposition, died in 1419, at Florence.

Gregory, in the year 1415, resigned to the Council of Constance. About two years after Benedict was deposed by the Council, and having persisted in his contumacy, and being forsaken by all, died in 1423. He was succeeded, through the choice of the two only Cardinals who remained with him, by Clement VIII., who resigned in 1429. By this means this schism was abolished after it had lasted fifty-one years, and Martin V. was acknowledged sole and only Pope by the entire Western Church.

[" The pontifical succession, it is clear, was, during this schism, interrupted. The links of the chain were lost, or so confused, that human ingenuity can never find their place, nor human penetration discover their arrangement. Their disentanglement may defy all the art of man and all the sophistry of Jesuitism. The election of Urban or Clement must have been uncanonical, and his papacy unlawful: and the successors of the unlawful Pontiff must have shared in his illegality. Clement and Benedict commanded the obedience of nearly the half of western Christendom; while the remainder obeyed Urban, Boniface, Innocent, and Gregory. One division must have recognised the authority of a usurper and an impostor.

[" The Church dispersed could not ascertain the true Vicar-General of Jesus: and hence its divisions. All the erudition of the Parisian University and the Spanish nation was unavailing. The French and Spanish Doctors, in the assemblies of Paris and Medina in 1381, examined the several claims of the competitors with erudition and ability. The question was treated by the canonists and theologians of Spain, France, and Italy, with freedom and impartiality. But Spanish, French, and Italian ingenuity on this subject was useless. The Pisan and Constantian Councils, in all their holiness and infallibility, were, says Daniel, equally nonplused. These, notwithstanding their pretensions to divine direction, could depose, but could not discriminate; and were forced to use, not their information or wisdom, but their power and authority. The inspired Fathers could, in their own opinion, depose all the claimants; but could not ascertain the right or title of any. This conduct was a plain confession of their inability to discover the canonical head of the Church and Vicar-General of God. Moderns, in this part of ecclesiastical history, are at an equal loss with the contemporary authors and Councils.

[" The impracticability of ascertaining the rightful Pontiff has been admitted by the ablest critics and theologians of Romanism; such as Gerson, Antoninus, Bellarmine, Andilly, Maimbourg, Alexander, Mezeray, Daniel, and Moreri. Gerson admits 'the reasonableness of doubt, and the variety of opinions among the most learned and approved Doctors on the several claims of the rival Pontiffs.' Antoninus acknowledges 'the unsettled state of the controversy, notwithstanding each party's shining miracles, and the advocacy of pious men, deeply skilled in sacred writ, and in canon law.' Bellarmine mentions 'the learned patrons which supported the several competitors, and the difficulty of determining the true and lawful Pontiff.' Andilly agrees with Gerson, Antoninus, and Bellarmine. He grants 'the obscurity and difficulty of the question, which has not yet been decided.' Maimbourg, on the Western Schism, states 'the moral impossibility of ascertaining the rightful Pope, and relates the support which each faction received from civilians, theologians, and universities, and even from saints and miracles.' Alexander, after an impartial and profound examination, comes to the same conclusion. He shows the impracticability of ascertaining the true and legitimate Pontiff, notwithstanding the dissertations and books published on the subject, by the most learned men. Each party, in the statement of Mezeray, 'had the advocacy of distinguished personages, saints, revelations, and miracles; and all these could not decide the contest.' Daniel and Moreri confess, on this topic, 'the jarring and contradictory opinion of saints, as well as of Lawyers, theologians, and Doctors, and the unwillingness or inability of the Church, assembled afterwards in the Council of Constance, to discriminate among the several competitors the true Vicar-General of God and ecclesiastical Sovereign of Christendom.'* Similar concessions

[* Edgar's Variations of Popery, pp. 63, 64.]
† Du Pin, Ecc. Hist., vol. iii., p. 9.

[" * 'Est varietas opinionum Doctorum, et inter doctissimos et probatissimos ex utraque parte.'—Gerson, in Alex., 24, 474.

[" 'Peritissimos viros in sacra pagina et jure canonico habuit utraque pars, ac etiam religiosissimos viros, et etiam miraculis ful-have been made by Giannoni, Bruys, Panormitan, Balusius, Zabarella, Surius, Joannes de Turrecremate, and a long train of other Divines and critics."*]

The great end in view by the Councils of Constance and Basil was, the reformation of the Church in its head and members. The Popes were looked upon as the head, and the Bishops, Priests, and Monks as the members, both being exceedingly corrupt. Martin opposed the reformation to the utmost. However, five years after the Council of Constance, in consequence of frequent remonstrances by pious persons, he called a Council to meet at Pavia; it was subsequently removed to Sienna, and thence to Basil. He died about the time at which it assembled. That Synod met July 23d, 1431, and seriously addressed itself to the work of reformation. Eugenius IV. opposed reform in every possible way. For though he at first approved of the Council, he afterward opposed it. This Synod deposed Eugenius, who in 1438 collected another Council at Ferrara, which was afterward transferred to Florence, where, at the second session, the members thundered out an excommunication against the Fathers gathered together at Basil, and afterward sentenced them to hell and damnation, and declared their acts null and their proceedings unlawful. The Basilian Council, in 1439, chose Felix V. Pope, in the place of Eugenius. By this means, that deplorable schism which formerly rent the Church was again revived, with additional aggravations; for the contest was not only between two rival Popes, but also between the contending Councils of Basil and Florence. On the death of Eugenius, in 1447, Nicholas V. was chosen to succeed him. By the exertions of the King of France, Felix resigned the Papal chair, and left Nicholas its undisputed possessor in 1449. Thus this schism, which lasted under two opposing Popes for ten years, was terminated.

["The Basilian and Florentine schism, which was the thirtieth in the Papacy, troubled the spiritual reigns of Eugenius and Felix. This contest presented the edifying spectacle of two Popes clothed in supremacy, and two Councils vested with infallibility, hurling mutual anathemas and excommunications. Martin, who had been chosen by the Constantian Convention, had departed, and was succeeded by Condalmerio, who assumed the name of Eugenius. The Council of Basil deposed Eugenius, and substituted Felix. Eugenius assembled the Council of Florence, and excommunicated Felix and the Council of Basil.

["The Council of Basil met anno 1431. The holy Fathers, in the second session, decreed the superiority of a General Council to a Pope, and the obligation of all, even the Roman Pontiff, under pain of condign punishment, to obey the synodal authority in questions of faith, extirpation of schism, and reformation of the Church.

["The idea of synodal superiority and moral reformation conveyed horror, in general, to all Popes, and in particular to Eugenius. His Holiness, in consequence, issued against the Council two Bulls of dissolution, and annulled all its enactments. The Bulls, however, contained no terror for the Council. The Basilians, supported by the Emperor Sigismond, entreated Eugenius to repeal his proclamations; and threatened, in case of refusal, to pronounce His Holiness guilty of contumacy. The Pontiff, therefore, was under the direful necessity of revoking his Bulls of dissolution, and declaring the legality of the Council; and, at the same time, its title to his approbation, both in its commencement and continuance.

["His Infallibility's approbation, however, which was extorted, was soon recalled. New dissensions arose between the Pope and the Council. The reformation which the Basilians had effected, and which they still contemplated, was, to this head of the Church, altogether intolerable. His Holiness, therefore, in 1438, translated the Council to Ferrara, with the immediate intention to gainsay the Basilian assembly. The Basilians, in return, accused Eugenius of simony, perjury, abuse of authority, wasting the ecclesiastical patrimony, ruining the city of Palestrina, and of hostility to their enactments. The Fathers then annulled the translation of the Council to Ferrara; cited His Holiness to appear at Basil in sixty days; and, on his refusal, pronounced him guilty of contumacy.

["Sentence of contumacy was only a prelude to sentence of deposition. Eugenius proceeded in hostility to the Basilians, who, therefore, by a formal enactment in 1439, deprived him of the Papacy. The sentence against God's Vicar-General by the Church's representatives is a curiosity. The General Council, representing the universal church, in its thirty-fourth session, found this Plenipotentiary of heaven guilty of contumacy, pertinacity, disobedience, simony, incorrigibility, perjury, schism, heresy, and error; and, in consequence, unworthy of all title, rank, honour, and dignity. The sacred Synod then deposed Condalmerio from the Papacy, abrogated all his constitutions and ordinations, absolved the faithful from their obedience, oaths, obligations, and fidelity; and prohibited the obedience of all, even Bishops, Patriarchs, Cardinals, Emperors, and Kings, under privation of all honour and possessions.

["The Basilians, having cashiered one Vice-God, appointed another. The person selected for this dignity was Amadeus, Duke of Savoy. This Prince had governed his hereditary realms for forty years. The ability which, during this revolving period, he had displayed, rendered him the delight of his people and the admiration of the age. He was accounted a Solomon for wisdom, and made arbiter of differences among Kings, who consulted him on the most important affairs. He possessed a philosophical cast of mind, a love of repose, and a contempt for worldly grandeur. Weary of a throne, which, to so many, is the object of ambition, and disgusted probably with the bustle and tumult of life, Amadeus resigned the ducal administration to his sons, and resolved to embrace the seclusion of a hermit. He chose for the place of his retreat, the beautiful Villa of Ripaille, on the banks of the Lake of Geneva. This solitude pos-gentes: nec unquam sic potuit quæstio illa decidi.'—Antonin., cap. ii.; Alex., xxiv., 477.

["'Nec poterit facile prædicari quis eorum verus et legitimus esset Pontifex, cum non de-essent singulis doctissimi patroni.'—Bell., iv., 14.

["'L'affaire étant obscure et difficile d'elle même, n'a point encore été décidée.'—Andilly, 860.

["'Pour cette impossibilité morale, où l'on étoit démêler les vrais Papes d'avec les anti-Papes.'—Maimb, i.; Bruy., iii., 515.

["'Adeo obscura erant et dubia contendentium jura, ut post multas virorum doctissimorum dissertationes plurimosque tractatus editos, cognosci non posset quis esset verus et legitimus Pontifex.'—Alex., xxiv., 444.

["'On n'a jamais pû vuider ce démelé.'—Mez., iii., 235.

["'De très savans hommes et des saints même furent partagés la dessus. L'église assemblée, dans le Concile de Constance, ne voulût point l'examiner.'—Daniel, v., 227.

["'Le droit des deux partis ne fût jamais bien éclairci, et il y a en des deux côtés de très savans jurisconsultes, de célèbres théologiens, et de grands Docteurs.'—Moreri, vii., 172."]

[* Edgar's Variations of Popery, pp. 66, 67.]

sessed the advantage of air, water, wood, meadow, vineyards, and all that could contribute to rural beauty. Amadeus, in this sequestered spot, built a hermitage, and enclosed a park, which he supplied with deer. Accompanied in his retreat by a few domestics, and supporting his aged limbs on a crooked and knotty staff, he spent his days far from the noise and busy scenes of the world, in innocence and piety. A deputation arrived at this retirement, conveying the triple crown, and other trappings of the Papacy. The ducal hermit accepted, with reluctance and tears, and after much entreaty, the insignia of power and authority. Western Christendom, amidst the unity of Romanism, had then two universal Bishops, and two universal Councils. Eugenius and Felix, with the Florentine and Basilian Synods, divided the Latin communion, except a few states which assumed an attitude of neutrality.

[" The two rival Pontiffs and Councils soon began the work of mutual excommunication. Eugenius hailed Felix, on his promotion to the pontifical throne, with imprecation and obloquy. He welcomed his brother, says Poggio, his Secretary, to his new dignity, with the appellations of Mahomet, heretic, schismatic, anti-Pope, Cerberus, the golden calf, the abomination of desolation erected in the temple of God, a monster that had risen to trouble the Church and destroy the faith; and who, willing not merely to overthrow a single state, but unhinge the whole universe, had resigned humanity, assumed the manners of a wild beast, and crowned the iniquity of his past life by the most frightful impiety. His Infallibility, among other accomplishments, discovered, in this salutation, a superior genius for elegance of diction and delicacy of sentiment. Luther, so celebrated for this talent in his answers to Leo and Henry, the Roman Pontiff and the English King, was, in this refinement, when compared with His Holiness, a mere ninny.

[" Eugenius congratulated the Council of Basil with similar compliments and benedictions. This assembly he called blockheads, fools, madmen, barbarians, wild beasts, malignants, wretches, persecutors, miscreants, schismatics, heretics, vagabonds, runagates, apostates, rebels, monsters, criminals, a conspiracy, an innovation, a deformity, a conventicle, distinguished only for its temerity, sacrilege, audacity, machinations, impiety, tyranny, ignorance, irregularity, fury, madness, and the dissemination of falsehood, error, scandal, poison, pestilence, desolation, unrighteousness, and iniquity.

[" Having sketched the character of the holy Fathers, with so much precision, His Infallibility proceeded next, with equal professional skill, to annul their acts, and pronounce their sentence. This duty he performed in fine style in the Council of Florence, and with its full approbation. He condemned the Basilian proposition respecting the superiority of a Council to a Pope, and rescinded all the Basilian declarations and enactments. Their doom, pronounced by the Pontiff in full Council, soon followed. His Infallibility, the Viceroy of heaven, in the discharge of his pastoral duty, and actuated with zeal for God, and to expel a pernicious pestilence, and an accursed impiety, from the Church, despoiled the Basilian Doctors, Bishops, Archbishops, and Cardinals, of all honour, office, benefice, and dignity; excommunicated and anathematized the whole assembly, with their patrons and adherents of every rank and condition, civil and ecclesiastical, and consigned that 'gang of all the devils in the universe, by wholesale, to receive their portion in condign punishment and in eternal judgment with Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.'* The pontifical and synodical denunciations extended to the Basilian magistracy, Consuls, Sheriffs, Governors, officials, and citizens. These, if they failed in thirty days to expel the Council from the city, Eugenius subjected to interdict and confiscation of goods. Their forfeited property might, by pontifical authority, be seized by the faithful, or by any person who could take possession. This edifying sentence, His Infallibility pronounced in the plenitude of apostolic power, and subjected all who should attempt any infringement on his declaration, constitution, condemnation, and reprobation, to the indignation of Almighty God, and of the blessed Apostles, Peter and Paul. This was the act of the General, apostolic, holy, Florentine Council, and issued with due solemnity in a public synodal session.

[" Nicholas V., who succeeded Eugenius, continued, on his accession, to follow his predecessor's footsteps, and confirmed his sentence against Amadeus of Savoy, and the Council of Basil. Nicholas denominated Eugenius the supreme head of the Church, and Vicar-General of Jesus. But Felix, whom he excommunicated with all his adherents, he designated the patron of schism, heresy, and iniquity. The dukedom of Savoy, His Holiness, by apostolic authority, transferred to Charles, the French King, to bring the population back to the sheep-fold. This Plenipotentiary of heaven then proclaimed a crusade against the Duke and his subjects. He admonished the French King to assume the sign of the cross, and to act in this enterprise with energy. He exhorted the faithful to join the French army; and for their encouragement, His Holiness, supported by the mercy of the omnipotent God, and the authority of the blessed Apostles, Peter and Paul, granted the crusading army a full pardon of all their sins, and, at the resurrection of the just, the enjoyment of eternal life.

[" Felix and the Basilians, however, did not take all this kindness for nothing. The holy Fathers, with their Pontiff at their head, returned the Florentine benedictions with spirit and piety. Their spiritual artillery hurled back the imprecations, and repaid their competitor's anathemas. The Basilians, with devout cordiality, nullified the Florentine Council, and rescinded all its acts. The Basilian congress, indeed, cursed, as usual, in a masterly style. But Felix, through some defect of intellect or education, was miserably defective in this pontifical accomplishment. His genius, in the noble art of launching execrations, was far inferior to that of Eugenius and Nicholas, who, from nature or cultivation, possessed splendid talents for the Papal duty of cursing. He did well afterwards to resign the office, for which his inability for clothing imprecations in suitable language, rendered him unfit. The Council were to blame for choosing a head, who, in this capacity, showed such woful inadequacy. Few of these Vice-Gods, however, for the honour of the Holy See, were incompetent in this useful attainment. Felix, in latter days, seems to have been the only one who, in this respect, disgraced his dignity.

[" The schism in the prelacy and Popedom communicated to the nations. These were divided into three fractions, according to their declaration for Eugenius, Felix, or neutrality. The two Popes and Synods, though branded with mutual excommunication, had their several obediences among the people. The majority of the European kingdoms declared for Eugenius. He was patronized by Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Scotland. France and England acknowledged the Council of Basil; and yet, in sheer inconsistency, rejected Felix and adhered to Eugenius. Scotland, except a few Lords, not only declared for Eugenius, but its prelacy, assembled in a national Council, excommunicated Felix. Arragon, through interested motives, declared, in 1441, for Felix, and afterwards, in 1443, veered round to Eugenius.

[" * ' Affirmat totius orbis dæmonia ad latrocinium Basileense confluxisse, ut, ad complendam iniquitatem, abominationem desolationis in Dei ecclesia ponant. Declarat omnes qui Basiliæ remanserint, cum Core, Datan, et Abiron, æterno judicio esse perdendos.'—Labb., xviii. 1384.

["Felix, however, commanded a respectable minority. He was recognised by Switzerland, Hungary, Austria, Bavaria, Strasburgh, Calabria, Piedmont, and Savoy. His authority was acknowledged by many Universities of France, Germany, and Poland; such as those of Paris, Vienna, Erfurt, Colonia, and Cracow. The Carthusians and Franciscans also rallied round the standard of Felix.

["Germany, forming a third party, disclaimed both the competitors, and maintained, amid these dissensions, an armed neutrality. Its suspension of obedience commenced in 1438, and lasted eight years. During this period, its priesthood and people contrived, in some way or other, to do without a Pope. The Germans, on this occasion, anticipated, on the subject of pontifical authority, their revolt under Luther, which ushered in the Reformation.

["This schism, however, which had distracted western Christendom for about ten years, terminated in 1449. This was effected by the resignation of Felix, at the earnest entreaty of Kings, Councils, and people. Amadeus, unlike Urban, Boniface, Innocent, Gregory, Clement, and Benedict, who were rivals in the great western schism, abdicated with promptitude and facility. He accepted the dignity with reluctance, and renounced it without regret.

["Prior to his demission, however, the Popes and the Councils of the two obediences annulled their mutual sentences of condemnation. Nicholas, in the plenitude of apostolic power, and in a Bull which he addressed to all the faithful, rescinded, in due form, all the suspensions, interdicts, privations, and anathemas, which had been issued against Felix and the Council of Basil; while, at the same time, he approved and confirmed all their ordinations, promotions, elections, provisions, collations, confirmations, consecrations, absolutions, and dispensations. He abrogated all that was said or written against Felix and the Basilian convention. This Bull overthrows the Ultramontan system, which maintains the illegitimacy of the Basilian Synod from the deposition of Eugenius. Nicholas confirmed it in the amplest manner. Felix then revoked all the Basilian proceedings against Eugenius, Nicholas, and the Florentine Council; and, though appointed Legate, Vicar, first Cardinal, and second to the Sovereign Pontiff, retired again to his retreat at Ripaille on the banks of the Leman Lake; and there, till his death in 1450, enjoyed a life of ease and piety.

["The Basilian and Florentine schism presented an odd prospect of Papal unity. Two Popes and two Synods exchanged reciprocal anathemas; and afterwards, in a short time, sanctioned all their several acts with the broad seal of mutual approbation and authority. Felix, —whom Eugenius had designated antichrist, Mahomet, Cerberus, a schismatic, a heretic, the golden calf, and the abomination of desolation,—Nicholas, in the friendliest style, and kindest manner, called chief Cardinal, and dearest brother.* The Council of Basil, which Eugenius had represented as an assembly of madmen, barbarians, wild beasts, heretics, miscreants, monsters, and a pandemonium, Nicholas, without any hesitation, and in the amplest manner, approved and confirmed. Two General Councils condemned each other for schism and heresy, and afterwards exchanged mutual compliments and approbation. The French and Italian schools still continue their enmity. The French detest the Florentine convention, and applaud the Basilian assembly; whilst the Italians denounce the conventicle of Basle, and eulogize the Council of Florence.

["The Basilian and Florentine contest displays all the elements of discord, which distinguish the great western schism. Pope, in both, opposed Pope. Two Viceroys of heaven clashed in mutual excommunications. Western Christendom, on both occasions, was rent into contending factions. Nation, severed from nation, refused reciprocal communion, and acknowledged two jarring ecclesiastical Sovereigns.

["But the latter schism contained also a new element of dissension, unknown to the former. An Universal Council, as a specimen of Romish unity, opposed an Universal Council, and both fulminated mutual execrations. Each assembly, in its own and in its party's opinion, and according to many at the present day, represented the whole Church; and, nevertheless, in the bitterest enmity, and in unequivocal language, thundered reciprocal sentences of heresy and reprobation."†]

The calamities of these times are indescribable. The Church had two or three heads at the same period; each forming plots and pronouncing curses upon his competitors and their followers. The Princes of Europe were involved in wars on this account. Many sacrificed their lives and fortunes in the struggle. In most places, all sense of religion was lost; and profligacy of manners prevailed everywhere, both among the Clergy and laity. Serious people, supposing they must be united with the Vicar of Christ, were in great perplexity; while others, concluding that a visible head was unnecessary, committed their salvation to God alone.

All must lament these deplorable schisms, and their ruinous consequences. But while with proper feelings we view the sins and errors of our fellow-creatures, we must not forget to learn the lesson which they are designed to inculcate,—that the unity professed by the Church of Rome is defective in its head; and if the head be disordered, the members cannot be in a healthful condition.

13. The limits and extent of the Pope's power and jurisdiction is also a subject warmly debated in the Church of Rome. That the holy Scriptures are not the sole standard of theology, the Romanists maintain. They say the Church is the supreme authority; but then the authority of the Church resolves itself into that of the Pope. On this point they are much divided.

Bellarmine, their great controvertist, enumerates the four following varieties of opinion among them:—"(1.) That the Pope, even as Pope, although he would define any thing with a General Council, can be heretical in himself, and teach others heresy; and in fact it so happened. (2.) That a Pope, even as Pope, can be heretical and teach heresy, if he would define any thing apart from a General Council; and sometimes it so occurred.

["* 'Carissimum fratrem nostrum Amadeum, primum Cardinalem.'—Alex., xxv., 258; Coss., v., 274."]

[† Edgar's Variations of Popery, pp. 67—73.]

(3.) That the Pope can in no manner be heretical, nor teach heresy publicly, though he should alone define any thing. (4.) That the Pope, whether he can be heretic or not, can in no manner define any thing heretical to be believed by the whole Church."* Our author then expresses the following decision respecting these various opinions:—"The first opinion is heretical; the second is not properly heretical, for as yet those who entertain it are tolerated by the Church, yet it seems to be very erroneous, and bordering on heresy; the third is probable, but not certain; the fourth is most certain, and to be maintained."†

On the temporal power of the Pope much controversy has existed among the Papists. Bellarmine says: "The Pope, as Pope, although he hath no merely temporal power, nevertheless hath, in order to promote spiritual good, the supreme power of disposing the temporal goods of all Christians."‡ But the work of Bellarmine had well nigh been condemned by Sixtus V., for ascribing this indirect power to the Pope. Certainly Sixtus openly condemned the distinction of indirect temporal power, when, in his Bull against Henry III. of France, he says, "that he possessed the supreme power over all Princes and Kings of the whole earth, and all people, nations, and tribes; and that this power was committed to him, not by human, but divine, institution."§

["The abettors of this system, overstepping the bounds of moderation, would exalt the primacy into a despotism. The Popedom, according to these speculators, is a monarchy, unlimited by democracy or aristocracy, by the laity or the Clergy. The Roman Pontiff's power is civil as well as ecclesiastical, extending both to the Church and the State; and legislative as well as executive, comprehending in its measureless range both the making and enforcing of laws. He is clothed with uncontrolled authority over the Church, the Clergy, Councils, and Kings. He has a right, both in a legislative and executive capacity, to govern the universal church, and to ordain, judge, suspend, and depose Bishops, Metropolitans, and Patriarchs through Christendom. These receive their authority from the Pope, as he receives his from God. He possesses a superiority over General Councils, which, for legitimation and validity, require pontifical convocation, presidency, and ratification. He is the supreme judge of controversy, and, in this capacity, receives appeals from the whole Church. He is vested with temporal as well as spiritual authority; and may depose Sovereigns, transfer kingdoms, and absolve subjects from the oath of fealty. His chief prerogative is infallibility. The Roman Pontiff, unlike other frail mortals, is, at least in his ex-cathedra, or official, sentences, exempted from all possibility of error or mistake.*

["Such is the monstrous system of the Italian school on the Papal supremacy. The Transalpine faction, who are the dependent and servile minions of the Roman Court, clothe the Pontiff with all this superhuman power and authority. This party has been supported in these views by Jesuits, Canonists, theologians, Popes, and Councils. The votaries of Jesuitism, dispersed through the world, have advocated the unlimited authority of the Popedom, with their accustomed erudition and sophistry. The Canonists, such as Gratian and Pithou, have, in general, been friends to the plenitude of pontifical jurisdiction and despotism. These have been supported by an host of theologians and Schoolmen; such as Baronius, Bellarmine, Binius, Turrecrema, Sanderus, Perron, Pighius, Caranza, Fabulottus, Lainez, Jacobatius, Arsdekin, Antonius, Canus, Cajetan, Aquinas, Turrianno, Lupus, Campeggio, and Bonaventura.

["The Roman hierarchs, as might be expected, have, in general, maintained the Papal power. Celestine, Gelasius, Leo, Nicholas, Gregory, Urban, Pascal, Boniface, Clement, and Paul supported their overgrown tyranny with peculiar resolution and energy. Gregory VII. subjected, not only the Church, but the State, and monopolized both civil and ecclesiastical power. Boniface VIII. taught the necessity of submission to the Pontiff for the attainment of salvation. Paul IV. seems to have been a model of pontifical ambition, arrogance, haughtiness, and tyranny. His Infallibility contemned the authority of Councils and Kings. The Papal power, he maintained, was unbounded, and above all Synods; and this, he called an article of faith; and the contrary, he denominated a heresy.† His Holiness declared himself the successor of one who had deposed Emperors and Kings, and superior to Princes, whom he would not acknowledge as his companions, but use as his footstool. This vain glory, these empty boasts, His Infallibility enforced with the stamp of his foot, and the thunder of his apostolic voice.

["The Italian system, on the supremacy, was patronized also by the Councils of Florence, Lateran, and Trent. Eugenius, in the Florentine convention, and with its approbation, declared, in the thirteenth session, the superiority of the Pope to a Council, whose enactments he was authorized, by his apostolic prerogative, to change or repeal. The pontifical dissolution or translation of a Council, he declared, is no heresy, notwithstanding the contrary sentence of the Basilian assembly; whose acts, he affirmed, were unjust and foolish, and contrary to the laws of God and man. The Florentines vested His Infallibility with the vicegerency of God, an authority to teach all Christians, and the supremacy over the whole world.‡

* "1. Pontificem etiam ut Pontificem, etiamsi cum Generali Concilio definiret aliquid, posse esse hæreticum in se, et docere alios hæresim, et de facto aliquando ita accidisse.

"2. Pontificem etiam ut Pontificem posse esse hæreticum, et docere hæresim, si absque Generali Concilio definiat, et de facto aliquando accidisse.

"3. Pontificem non posse ullo modo esse hæreticum, nec docere publice hæresim, etiamsi solus rem aliquam definiat.

"4. Pontificem, sive hæreticus esse possit, sive non, non posse ullo modo definire aliquid hæreticum a tota Ecclesia credendum."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i.; De Pontif. Rom., lib. iv., cap. ii., col. 804. B. C. D. Colon., 1620.

† "Prima hæretica; secunda non est proprie hæretica, nam adhuc videmus ab Ecclesia tolerari, qui illam sententiam sequuntur, tamen videtur omnino erronea et hæresi proxima; tertia probabilis est, non tamen certa; quarta certissima est, et asserenda."—Idem. (See also Gerhard., De Eccl., sect. 242.)

‡ "Pontifex, ut Pontifex, etsi non habet ullam mere temporalem potestatem, tamen habet, in ordine ad bonum spirituale, summam potestatem disponendi de temporalibus rebus omnium Christianorum."—Idem, De Pontif. Romano, lib. v., cap. vi., col. 900, C. Colon., 1620.

§ "Se supremam in omnes Reges ac Principes universæ terræ, cunctosque populos, gentes, et nationes, non humana sed divina institutione sibi traditam, potestatem obtinere."—Life of Sixtus V.

["* 'Sub ratione regiminis monarchici.'—Dens, ii., 147.

["'In Papa residet suprema potestas.'—Faber, ii., 384.

["'Ecclesiam Christus instituerit instar regni, in qua unus cæteris imperat.'—Labb., xx., 670.

["'Papa est dominus temporalis totius orbis.'—Barclay, 17.

["† 'C'étoit un article de foi, et que de dire le contraire étoit une hérésie.'—Paulo, ii., 27; Labb., xix., 968.

["‡ 'Constat Synodum Pontifici esse inferiorem.'—Labb., xviii., 1320.

["'Romanum Pontificem in universum orbem tenere primatum,

["The fifth Council of the Lateran clothed Leo with equal power. This convention decreed the superiority of the Roman Pontiff over all Councils, and his full power and right of synodal convocation, translation, and dissolution. This assembly also renewed the Bull of Bouiface, which declared the subjection of all Christians to the Roman Pontiff necessary for salvation."*] †

On this subject we give the following from Mosheim :— "The Jesuits, with their numerous tribe of followers and dependents, all maintain that the Pope is infallible ; that he is the only visible source of that universal and unlimited power which Christ has granted to the Church ; that all Bishops and subordinate rulers derive from him alone the authority and jurisdiction with which they are invested ; that he is not bound by any laws of the Church, nor by any decrees of the Councils which compose it, and that he alone is the supreme lawgiver of that sacred community, a lawgiver whose edicts and commands it is in the highest degree criminal to oppose or disobey. Such are the strange sentiments of the Jesuits ; but they are very far from being universally adopted. For other Doctors of the Church of Rome hold, on the contrary, that the Pope is liable to error ; that his authority is inferior to that of a General Council ; that he is bound to obey the commands of the Church, and its laws, as they are enacted in the Councils that represent it ; that these Councils have a right to depose him from the Papal chair, when he abuses in a flagrant manner the dignity and prerogatives with which he is intrusted ; and that, in consequence of these principles, the Bishops and other inferior rulers and Doctors derive the authority that is annexed to their respective dignities, not from the Roman Pontiff, but from Christ himself." ‡

["The extent and prerogatives of the Church form the second subject of debate. The Jesuits and their adherents stretch out its borders far and wide. They comprehend within its large circuit, not only many who live separate from the communion of Rome, but even extend the inheritance of eternal salvation to nations that have not the least knowledge of the Christian religion, or of its divine Author, and consider as true members of the Church open transgressors who profess its doctrines. But the adversaries of the Jesuits reduce within narrower limits the kingdom of Christ, and not only exclude from all hope of salvation those who are not within the pale of the Church of Rome, but also those who, though they live within its external communion, yet dishonour their profession by a vicious and profligate course of life. The Jesuits, moreover, not to mention other differences of less moment, assert, that the Church can never pronounce an erroneous or unjust decision, either relating to matters of fact, or points of doctrine ; while the adverse party declare, that, in judging of matters of fact, it is not secured against all possibility of erring." §]

15. The Church of Rome has been much divided respecting the doctrines of grace, predestination, human liberty, and original sin.

["Doctrinal, as well as historical and electoral, variations troubled the Papacy. Historians, for a century, differed in their records of the Popedom ; while electors, in many cases, disagreed in their choice of a Sovereign. Several of the Pontiffs also varied from the faith of the majority. All the heads of the Church, who patronized heresy, need not be enumerated. A few of the most distinguished, however, may be mentioned ; such as Victor, Stephen, Zosimus, Honorius, Vigilius, and John.

["Victor, or, according to Bellarmine, Zephyrinus, patronized Montanism. His Infallibility approved the prophecies of Montanus, Priscilla, and Maximilla, admitted these fanatics to his communion, and granted the impostors letters of peace or recommendation to the churches of Asia and Phrygia. The Pontiff, deceived by appearances, gave Montanus, says Godeau, 'pacific letters, which shows that he had admitted the prophet to his communion.' According to Rhenanus, 'His Holiness Montanized.' He sanctioned the blasphemy of these enthusiasts by the seal of his infallibility. Montanism, when countenanced by the Pontiff, had been condemned by the Church. Victor's recommendation of the heresy, therefore, was without excuse. The Pope afterward revoked his letters of peace ; and, in so doing, varied from himself, as he had, in granting them, differed from the Church. 'Praxeas,' says Tertullian, 'remonstrated against the conduct of Victor, who, in consequence, was forced to recant.' The hierarch's approbation and recantation were equal proofs of his infallibility and consistency.

["Stephen erred on the subject of baptism. His Holiness, followed by the Spaniards, French, and Italians, maintained the validity of baptism administered by any heretical denomination. His Infallibility's language, according to Cyprian, Firmilian, and the plain signification of the words, taught the efficacy of the baptismal ceremony in any form, even without the name of the Trinity. The contemporary partisans of heresy, indeed, except the Novatians, who were out of the question, rejected the Deity of the Son and the Spirit ; and, therefore, in this institution, omitted the names of these two divine Persons. Their forms, in the celebration of this sacrament, were, as appears from Irenæus, distinguished for their ridiculousness and absurdity. Persons, however, who had been baptized in any heretical communion did not, according to Stephen's system, need a repetition of the ceremony.

["Cyprian, the Carthaginian Metropolitan, who led the Africans, Numidians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, Galatians, Cilicians, Pontians, and Egyptians, held the opposite opinion. He maintained the invalidity of heretical baptism, and rebaptized all who, renouncing any heresy, assumed the profession of Catholicism. Cyprian's system was supported by tradition and several Councils, and had obtained through Africa and Asia. The decisions of Stephen and Cyprian are in direct opposition ; and both contrary to modern Catholicism.*

["The Pontiff and the saint maintained their respective errors with animosity and sarcasm. The Pontiff called the saint Antichrist, a false apostle, and a deceitful et verum Christi Vicarium, existere.'—Idem, xviii., 526, 1152 ; Gibert, i., 93.

["'Papa est super potestatem ecclesiæ universalis, et Concilii Generalis.'—Cajetan, i., 10.

["'Dissolutionem sive translationem Concilii ad hæresim non pertinere.'—Labb., xviii., 1321.

["*'Solum Romanum Pontificem, tanquam auctoritatem super omnia Concilia habentem, tam Conciliorum dicendorum, transferendorum, dissolvendorum plenum jus et potestatem habere.'—Labb., xix., 967 ; Bruys, iv., 306 ; Du Pin, 430."]

[† Edgar's Variations of Popery, pp. 126—128.]

‡ Ecc. Hist., cent. xvi., chap. i., sect. iii., part i., sect. 32.

[§ Mosheim's Ecc. Hist., vol. iv., cent. xvi., sect. xxxiii., p. 211, 212.]

["*'Les Romains vouloient qu'il fût bon, par quelque hérétique qu'il fût conféré : et les Afriquains soutenoient, qu'il étoit nul s'il étoit conféré hors de l'église, par les hérétiques. Il n'y a rien de plus opposé, que ces deux décrets.'—Maimb., 88, 90, 97 ; Du Pin, 347 ; Cyprian., Epist. lxxiv.

workman. To a deputation sent on this subject from Africa, he refused admission into his presence, or even the rites of common hospitality; and excommunicated both the Africans and Orientals. His inflexibility was returned with interest by Cyprian and Firmilian. Cyprian accused His Holiness of error, apostasy, schism, heresy, pride, impertinence, ignorance, inconsistency, indiscretion, falsehood, obstinacy, presumption, stupidity, senselessness, perversity, obduracy, blasphemy, impatience, perfidy, indocility, and contumacy. Such was a Roman saint's character of a Roman Pontiff, and the Vicar-General of God.

[" Firmilian's portrait of His Infallibility is unflattering as that of Cyprian. The prominent traits in Firmilian's picture of His Holiness are inhumanity, insolence, audacity, dissension, discord, folly, pride, ridiculousness, ignorance, contumacy, error, schism, and heresy. He even represented the head of the Church as an apostate, worse than all heretics, in supporting error and obscuring the light of ecclesiastical truth; who, in attempting to excommunicate others, had separated himself from the whole Christian community. These two moral painters, between them, certainly did great justice to His Infallibility's character, and sketched the features as large as life.

[" Stephen and Cyprian, as well as their several factions, were, after all, both in an error. The validity of baptism, according to the Romish system, depends not on the administrator, but on the matter and form. The administrator may be a heretic or a schismatic, a Clergyman, a layman, or a woman, if the element of water and the name of the Trinity be used. Cyprian and Stephen, the saint and the Pontiff, differed from one another, and, according to the present Popish faith, from the truth. The Church, in the clashing systems of the Carthaginian Metropolitan and the Roman hierarch, varied on this topic from the Church which has been established since their day. Cyprian's opinion, though supported by Athanasius, Cyril, Dionysius, Optatus, and Basil, with the Asiatic and African communions, was, in 314, condemned by the Council of Arles. Stephen's opinion, which supported the efficacy of any baptism, even without the name of the Trinity, was, in 325, condemned, in the nineteenth canon of the General Council of Nice.

[" Liberius, Zosimus, and Honorius patronized Arianism, Pelagianism, and Monothelitism. Liberius excommunicated Athanasius, and signed an Arian confession of faith. Zosimus countenanced Pelagianism. Honorius professed Monothelitism, and was condemned for this heresy in the sixth General Council.

[" Vigilius, the next topic of animadversion, was the Prince of changelings. The celebrated Vicar of Bray seems to have been only a copy, taken from the original —the notorious Bishop of Rome. This pontifical shuttlecock, during his supremacy, shifted his ground no less than six times. His Infallibility, according to Liberatus, began his Popedom by issuing a declaration in favour of Monophysitism. This confession was intended to satisfy the Empress Theodora, who favoured this heresy. His Holiness anathematized the Chalcedonian faith and its patrons, and embraced the Eutychianism of Anthemus, Severus, and Theodosius. This system, however, His Infallibility, in the vicissitudes of inconsistency, soon retracted, and shifted round, like the veering vane, to the definition of Chalcedon. The Pontiff, in 539, in a communication to the Emperor Justinian, and the Patriarch Mennas, disclaimed Eutychianism, and excommunicated all its partisans.

[" His avowal of Jacobitism, indeed, was during the life of his rival Silverius, when, instead of being lawful Pastor, Vigilius, according to Bellarmine, Baronius, and Godeau, was only an illegal intruder, who had obtained the ecclesiastical sovereignty by violence and simony. The usurper, however, even then held the whole administration of the Papacy; and, after the death of his competitor, made four different and jarring confessions of faith on the subject of the three chapters, which contained the writings of Ibas, Theodoret, and Theodorus.

[" Vigilius, in 547, opposed Justinian's edict, which condemned the works of these three authors.* The Emperor, in 545, had issued a constitution, in which he anathematized Ibas, Theodoret, and Theodorus, and condemned their productions, on account of their execrable heresy and blasphemy. The imperial proclamation was subscribed by Mennas, Zoilos, Ephraim, and Peter, Patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, and by the Oriental suffragans, who followed the footsteps of their superiors. His Holiness, however, on his arrival in the imperial city in 547, refused to sign the imperial edict. He declared the condemnation of the three chapters derogatory to the Council of Chalcedon; and, in consequence, excommunicated the Grecian Clergy, and anathematized all who condemned Ibas, Theodoret, and Theodorus.

[" His Infallibility's hostility to the royal manifesto, however, was temporary. His Holiness, in 548, published a Bull, which he called his judgment, and which condemned, in the strongest and most express terms, the works of Ibas, Theodoret, and Theodorus. These productions, according to this decision, contained many things contrary to the right faith, and tending to the establishment of impiety and Nestorianism. Vigilius, therefore, anathematized the publications, the authors, and their abettors. Alexander and Godeau, on this occasion, acknowledged the inconsistency of His Infallibility's judgment with his former decision.† Godeau's observation is worthy of remark. The Pontiff's compliance with the Emperor, says the historian, 'was a prudent accommodation to the malignity of the times.'‡ The badness of the times, in the good Bishop's mind, justified the Pope's discretion and versatility.

[" The Latin Clergy, however, had a different opinion of the pontifical judgment. These, to a man, forsook Vigilius: Dacius, Sebastian, Rusticus, and Facundus, with the Illyrians, Dalmatians, and Africans, viewed the decision as the subversion of the Chalcedonian faith, and the establishment of Eutychianism on the ruins of Catholicism. Facundus openly taxed His Holiness with prevarication and perfidy.

[" His Infallibility, ever changing, issued, in 553, in a Council of sixteen Bishops and three Deacons, a constitution which overthrew his judgment. Vigilius, in this constitution, disapproved of sixty extracts from Theodorus, in the bad acceptation in which they had been taken; but prohibited the condemnation of his person. He could not, he said, by his own sentence, condemn Theodorus, nor allow him to be condemned by any. The Pontiff, at [" * 'Damnationi primum obstitit.'—Alex., xii., 33; Godeau, iv., 229; Theoph., 152.

[" † 'Illa postmodum judicata damnavit.'—Alex., xii., 33; Maim., 67; Labb., vi., 23, 177.

[" 'C'étoit un jugement contraire au premier, qu'il avoit si fortement soutenu contre l'Empereur, et contre les évêques Orientaux.'—Godeau, iv., 233.

[" ‡ 'Prudent accommodement à la malignité du temps.'—Idem, iv., 233.

the same time, declared the Catholicism of the works, and forbade all anathematizing of the persons, of Theodoret and Ibas. His Supremacy ordained and decreed, that nothing should be done or attempted to the injury or detraction of Theodoret, who signed, without hesitation, the Chalcedonian definition, and consented with ready devotion to Leo's letter. He decided and commanded, that the judgment of the Chalcedonian Fathers, who declared the orthodoxy of Ibas, should remain, without addition or diminution. All this was in direct contradiction, as the fifth General Council showed, to his judgment, in which he had condemned the heresy of the three chapters, and anathematized the persons of their authors and advocates. This constitution, however, notwithstanding its inconsistency with his former declaration, the Pontiff sanctioned by his apostolic authority, and interdicted all of every ecclesiastical dignity, from writing, speaking, publishing, or teaching any thing against his pontifical decision.

[" The sixth and last detour of Vigilius was his confirmation of the fifth General Council, which condemned and anathematized Ibas, Theodoret, and Theodorus, and their works, for impiety, wickedness, blasphemy, madness, heresy, and Nestorianism. The following is a specimen of the infallible assembly's condemnation of the three chapters and their authors, which the holy Fathers, as usual, bellowed in loud vociferation. 'Anathema to Theodorus. Satan composed his confession. The Ephesian Council anathematized its author. Theodorus renounced the Gospel. Anathema to all who do not anathematize Theodorus. Theodoret's works contain blasphemy and impiety against the right faith and the Ephesian Council. The epistle of Ibas is, in all things, contrary to the Chalcedonian definition and the true faith. The epistle contains heresy. The whole epistle is blasphemy. Whosoever does not anathematize it, is a heretic. Anathema to Theodorus, Nestorius, and Ibas.' All this, notwithstanding his constitution in behalf of Ibas, Theodoret, and Theodorus, His Infallibility approved and confirmed.

[" His Holiness did not stop with a simple confirmation of the fifth General Council. He, also, like the œcumenical Synod, vented a noisy torrent of obloquy against the departed souls of Ibas, Theodoret, and Theodorus, when their flesh was resolved into dust, and their bones were mouldering in the tomb. He condemned and anathematized Theodoret and Theodorus, whose works, according to His Infallibility, contained impiety and many things against the right faith and the Ephesian Council. A similar sentence he pronounced against Ibas, his works, and all who believed or defended their impiety.

[" The Papacy of Vigilius presents a scene of fluctuation unknown in the annals of Protestantism. The Vicar-General of God, the head of the Church, and the father and teacher of all Christians, shifted his ground six times. He sanctioned Eutychianism, and afterwards retracted. He withstood Justinian's edict, and, in his celebrated judgment, afterwards recanted. The changeling Pontiff, in his constitution, shielded Ibas, Theodoret, and Theodorus, and afterward confirmed the General Council, which condemned these authors for blasphemy and heresy. His Infallibility's condemnation of the three chapters was opposed by the whole Latin communion. The Africans, Illyrians, Dalmatians, and many other churches, withdrew from his communion, and accused him of overthrowing the Council of Chalcedon, and establishing Monophysitism. A General Council of the Grecian prelacy, in the mean time, condemned the Pope's constitution, and the declaration of the Latin Clergy; and this Council's sentence, amid the universal distraction of Christendom, was established by Pope Vigilius, and afterward by Pelagius, Gregory, Nicholas, and Leo.

[" John XXII. was another of these Pontiffs, who was distinguished for patronizing heresy. 'This father and teacher of all Christians' denied the admission of disembodied souls into the beatific vision of God, during their intermediate state between death and the resurrection. The spirits of the just, indeed, he believed, entered at death on the enjoyment of happiness, and the contemplation of the Son's glorified humanity. But the vision of Jehovah, and the perfection of felicity, according to this head of the Church, are deferred till the day of general judgment.

[" This dogma his supremacy taught by sermons, letters, and legations. He preached the heresy in public, according to Balusius, Raynal, and Maimbourg, in three sermons in succession, and caused it to be maintained by Cardinals, Prelates, and Doctors.* He transmitted letters in all directions, especially through the French nation, in support of his theory. He sent two theologians on a mission to the Parisian Faculty, to effect the proselytism of that literary seminary to his system. John, says Adrian VI., quoted by Launoy, 'publicly taught and declared his innovation, and enjoined its belief on all men.'† Nangis has transmitted a similar statement. He endeavoured, in this manner, says Du Pin, 'to spread his error, and disseminate a universal heresy through the whole Church.'‡

[" His Infallibility's speculation, however, soon met decided hostility. The citizens of Avignon, indeed, in which John resided, maintained a profound silence. This in some arose from fear, and in some from favour. A few believed and countenanced the innovation. Many disbelieved; but, at the same time, concealed their disapprobation through terror of the Pontiff's power and tyranny. The King and the Parisian University, however, were not to be affrighted. Philip, in 1333, assembled the Faculty, who canvassed the controversy, and condemned His Infallibility's faith as a falsehood and a heresy. These Doctors defined, that the souls of the faithful come at death, to the naked, clear, beatific, intuitive, and immediate vision of the essence of the divine and blessed Trinity. Many Doctors concurred with the Parisian in opposition to the Pontiff. Gobelin called His Infallibility an old dotard. Alliaco denominated John's theory an error; while Gerson characterized it as a falsehood. Philip, the French Monarch, proclaimed its condemnation by the sound of a trumpet.

[" The statements and reasons of the University and of other Divines were unavailing. His Infallibility was proof against Parisian dialectics. But the French King was an abler logician, and his reasoning, in consequence, possessed more efficiency. The royal argument, on the occasion, was composed of fire. His Most Christian Majesty threatened, if the Pontiff did not retract, to roast [" * 'Il l'enseigna publiquement. Il la prêcha lui-même. Il obligea, par son exemple, les Cardinaux, les Prélats de sa cour, et les Docteurs, à la soutenir.'—Maim., 131.

[" † 'Publice docuit, declaravit, et ab omnibus teneri mandavit.'—Launoy, i., 534.

[" ‡ 'Joannes Papa XXII. errorem de beatitudine animæ, quam ipse diu tenuerat, publice prædicaverat.'—Nangis, Ann. 1334; Dachery, iii., 97.

His Supremacy in the flames.* This tangible and sensible argument, always conclusive and convincing, was calculated for the meridian of His Infallibility's intellect. This luminous application, therefore, soon connected the premises with the conclusion, brightened John's ideas, and convinced him, in a short time, of his error. The clearness of the threatened fire communicated light to His Infallibility's understanding. His Holiness, though enamoured of heresy, was not, it appears, ambitious of martyrdom. He chose to retract, therefore, rather than be burned alive. His Infallibility, accordingly, just before he expired, read his recantation, and declared his orthodoxy, on the subject of the beatific vision, and the enjoyment of the Deity.

[" Bellarmine and Labbe deny John's heterodoxy. These endeavour to excuse the Pontiff, but by different means. Bellarmine grounds his vindication on the silence of the Church on this topic, when John published his opinion. No synodical or authoritative definition, declaring the soul's enjoyment of the beatific vision before the resurrection, preceded the Papal decision, which, therefore, was no heresy: heresy, then, is no heresy, according to the Cardinal, but truth, prior to the sentence of the Church. John's opinion, Bellarmine admits, is now heterodoxy; but, on its original promulgation, was orthodoxy. Truth, it seems, can, by an ecclesiastical definition, be transubstantiated into error, and Catholicism into heresy, even in an unchangeable Church distinguished for its unity. The Popish communion can effect the transubstantiation of doctrinal propositions, as well as of the sacramental elements. 'John's faith,' says Labbe, 'was taught by Irenæus, Lactantius, and other orthodox Fathers.' This is a noble excuse, indeed, and calculated to display, in a strong light, the unity of Romanism. The faith of primitive saints and orthodox Fathers is, it seems, become heresy. Labbe attempts to acquit John by arraigning Irenæus and Lactantius. The legitimate conclusion from the premises is, that Irenæus, Lactantius, and John, were all three infected with error.

[" Moral, as well as historical, electoral, and doctrinal variations diversified and disfigured the Popedom. Sanctity characterized the early Roman Bishops, and degeneracy their successors. Linus, Anacletus, Clemens, and many of a later period, were distinguished by piety, benevolence, holiness, and humility. Some deviations and defects might appear, marking the infirmity and the imperfection of man. The Roman Pastors, however, who, during the earlier days of Christianity, did not, in moral character, aspire to excellence, aimed at decency; and few, for a long series of years, sunk below mediocrity."†]

The Dominicans, Augustinians, and Jansenists, with other Divines, adopt the doctrine of Augustine, or, as some would assert, of Calvin, on these subjects. The Jesuits maintain opposite views, and are the Arminians of the Romish Church, embracing a considerable portion of the creed of Pelagius, especially respecting the depravity of our nature and human liberty. This controversy was carried on with great animosity and fierceness, the settlement of which was committed by Clement VIII., toward the conclusion of the sixteenth century, to a select assembly of learned Divines.

These arbiters, after employing several years in deliberating on this critical subject, intimated to the Pontiff, that the sentiments of the Dominicans were more conformable to Scripture and the ancient Fathers than the opinions of Molina, which were patronized by the Jesuits. The result, however, is not known with certainty; as the death of Clement, which took place in 1605, prevented his pronouncing a decision. The Dominicans assure us, that the Pope, had he lived, would have condemned Molina. The Jesuits, on the contrary, maintain that he would have acquitted him from all charge of heresy and error. It is, however, difficult to determine, as such records are preserved with great secrecy in the Vatican.

The subject was resumed in 1605, by order of Paul V.: the mountain was again in labour, but produced nothing. The controversy, instead of being decided, was only suppressed; and each party was permitted to follow his own opinions: both declared that the Pope and congregation were in their favour. However, had a sentence been pronounced, it is more than probable it would have been one of those ambiguous decisions, for which the oracle of Rome has ever been renowned.

The controversy was renewed, with increased violence, in 1640, and formed a schism in the Church of Rome, which involved it in great perplexity, and which, in many respects, proved injurious. The occasion of it was the publication of a book, entitled Augustinus, written by Jansenius, Bishop of Ypres, and published after his death. He differed but little from Augustine; and even copied him. This book enraged the Jesuits. They not only employed their pens against it, but endeavoured to procure its condemnation at Rome. The Inquisitors forbade the perusal of it in 1641; and in the year following Urban VIII. anathematized it by a Bull.

There were several places, where neither the decision of the Inquisitors nor the Bull of the Pope was respected. The Doctors of Louvain, and the followers of Augustine, who were numerous in the Netherlands, opposed most violently the proceedings of the Jesuits, and the condemnation of Jansenius. There were respectable individuals in France also who were of the party of Jansenius; such as Arnaud, Nicole, Pascal, and Quesnel, with other learned and distinguished men, who are known in the present day under the denomination of the "authors of Port-Royal." This party was increased by many, who viewed the usual practice of piety in the Romish Church, which embraces the frequent use of the sacraments, confession of sin, and the performance of external ceremonies, as being far inferior to that which the Gospel of Christ requires.

It is amusing to take a view of the various arts employed by both parties in this endless controversy; the Jesuits in their mode of attack, and the Jansenists in their plan of defence. The Jesuits came armed with sophistical arguments, odious comparisons, Papal Bulls, royal edicts, the authority of nobles,—with the secular arm aided by the sword of the dragoon. The Jansenists employed sophistry against sophistry, and invective against invective; they evaded the force of Papal Bulls and royal mandates by nice distinctions and refinements; and even had recourse to the interposition of Omnipotence by miracles, to oppose human power. They declared war against the enemies of the Romish Church; formed new plans to ensnare the Protestants; and took extraordinary pains in instructing the youth, &c. But the numerous miracles which were performed exceeded every other means of defence. The cause of the Jesuits, however, was the cause of the Papacy; and the grandeur, stability, and success of the Romish Church depended in a great measure upon the success and principles of their religious maxims. Accordingly, the doctrines of Jansenius, which were included in five propositions, were condemned in a Papal Bull by Innocent X., in 1653.*

[" * 'Rex rogum ipsi intentans ne revocarit errorem.'—Alex., xxii., 461."]

[† Edgar's Variations of Popery, pp. 74—81.]

["It appears," says Mosheim, "from several circumstances, that Urban VIII., and after him Innocent X., were really bent on appeasing these dangerous tumults, in the same manner as the Popes in former times had prudently suppressed the controversies excited by Baius and the Dominicans. But the vivacity, inconstancy, and restless spirit of the French Doctors threw all into confusion, and disconcerted the measures of the Pontiffs. The opposers of the doctrine of Augustine selected five propositions out of the work of Jansenius, already mentioned, which appeared to them the most erroneous in their nature, and the most pernicious in their tendency; and, being set on by the instigation, and seconded by the influence, of the Jesuits, employed their most zealous endeavours, and their most importunate entreaties, at the Court of Rome, to have these propositions condemned. On the other hand, a great part of the Gallican Clergy used their utmost efforts to prevent this condemnation; and, for that purpose, they sent deputies to Rome, to entreat Innocent X. to suspend his final decision, until the true sense of these propositions was deliberately examined, since the ambiguity of style in which they were expressed rendered them susceptible of a false interpretation. But these entreaties were ineffectual: the interest and importunities of the Jesuits prevailed; and the Pontiff, without examining the merits of the cause with a suitable degree of impartiality and attention, condemned, by a public Bull, on the 31st of May, 1653, the propositions of Jansenius. These propositions contained the following doctrines:—

["1. 'That there are divine precepts which good men, notwithstanding their desire to observe them, are, nevertheless, absolutely unable to obey; nor has God given them that measure of grace that is essentially necessary to render them capable of such obedience.

["2. 'That no person, in this corrupt state of nature, can resist the influence of divine grace, when it operates upon the mind.

["3. 'That in order to render human actions meritorious, it is not requisite that they be exempt from necessity, but only that they be free from constraint.†

["(4.) 'That the Semi-Pelagians err grievously in maintaining, that the human will is endowed with the power of either receiving or resisting the aids and influences of preventing grace.

["(5.) 'That whosoever affirms that Jesus Christ made expiation, by his sufferings and death, for the sins of all mankind, is a Semi-Pelagian.'

["Of these propositions the Pontiff declared the first four only heretical; but he pronounced the fifth rash, impious, and injurious to the Supreme Being."‡] §

In the controversy respecting predestination and grace, the Church of Rome has been much agitated. The excellent Pascal, a Roman Catholic, in his Provincial Letters, written in 1656, shortly after the condemnation of the book of Jansenius, exposes the principles of the Jesuits, and in a delicate, yet forcible, manner, represents the perplexities into which the public mind was thrown in consequence of this controversy. Speaking of efficacious and sufficient grace, he remarks: "Where are we now, exclaimed I, and which side am I to take here? If I deny sufficient grace, I am a Jansenist; if I admit it with the Jesuits, in such a sense that there is no necessity for efficacious grace, I am, say you, a heretic; and if I concur with you, I sin against common sense. I am a madman, say the Jesuits. What, then, am I to do in this inevitable necessity of being deemed a madman, a heretic, or a Jansenist? And to what a situation are we reduced, if the Jansenists alone avoid confounding faith and reason, and thus save themselves at once from absurdity and error?"*

"Christians inquire of Divines, What is the real condition of human nature since the fall? St. Augustine and his disciples reply, that it does not possess sufficient grace, unless it pleases God to bestow it. The Jesuits come forward and assert that all do absolutely possess it. Consult the Dominicans upon this contradictory representation, and what is the consequence? They coalesce with the Jesuits. By this artifice their numbers appear so considerable. They divide from those who deny sufficient grace, and declare that all men have it; and who would imagine otherwise than that they sanction the Jesuits? when, lo! they proceed to intimate that this sufficient grace is useless, without the efficacious, which is not bestowed upon all men.

"Shall I present you with a picture of the Church amidst these different sentiments? I consider it like a man, who, leaving his native country to travel abroad, is met by robbers, who wound him so severely, that they leave him half dead. He sends for three Physicians, resident in the neighbourhood. The first, after probing his wounds, pronounces them to be mortal, assuring him that God alone can restore him: the second, wishing to flatter him, declares he has sufficient strength to reach home; and insulting the first for opposing his opinion, threatens to be the ruin of him. The unfortunate patient, in this doubtful condition, as soon as he perceives the approach of the third, stretches out his hands to welcome him who is to decide the dispute. This Physician, upon examining his wounds, and ascertaining the opinions already given, coincides with the second, and these coalesce against the first to turn him out with contempt, and they now form the strongest party. [The patient infers, from this proceeding, that the third Physician agrees with the second; and upon putting the question, he assures him most positively that his strength is sufficient for the proposed journey. The wounded man, however, expatiating upon his weakness, asks upon what he founds his opinion. 'Why, you have still got legs, and legs are the means which, according to the constitution of nature, are sufficient for the purpose of walking.' 'Very true,' replies the wounded traveller; 'but have I all the strength which is requisite for making use of them? for really they seem useless to me in my present languishing condition.' 'Certainly they are,' returns the Physician,

* Mosheim's Ecc. Hist., cent. xvii., chap. i., sect. ii., part i., § xlii.

["† Augustine, Leibnitz, and a considerable number of modern philosophers, who maintain the doctrine of necessity, consider this necessity, in moral actions, as consistent with true liberty, because it is consistent with spontaneity and choice. According to them, constraint alone and external force destroy merit and imputation.

["‡ This Bull is still extant in the Bullarium Romanum, tom. vi., p. 456. It has also been published, together with several other pieces, relating to this controversy, by Du Plessis D'Argentre, in his Collectio Judiciorum de Novis Erroribus, tom. iii., part ii., p. 261."]

[§ Mosheim's Ecc. Hist., vol. v., cent. xvii., sect. ii., part i., pp. 212—214.]

* Blaise Pascal's Provincial Letters, Letter ii., p. 19. 8vo. edit London, 1816.

'and you will never be able to walk, unless God vouchsafes some extraordinary assistance to sustain and guide you.' 'What, then,' says the infirm man, 'have not I sufficient strength in myself to be fully able to walk?' 'O no; far, very far, from it.' 'Then you have a different opinion from your friend respecting my real condition.' 'I candidly admit, I have.'

["What do you suppose the wounded man would say to this? He complains of their strange proceeding, and of the ambiguous language of this third Physician. He censures him for coalescing with the second, when he was, in fact, of a contrary opinion, though they agreed in appearance, and for driving away the first, with whom he really coincided; and then, after trying his strength, and finding by experience the truth of his weakness, he dismisses them both; and recalling the first, puts himself under his care, follows his advice, and prays to God for the strength which he confesses he needs. His petitions are heard, and he ultimately returns home in peace." *]

16. The controversy that existed respecting morals destroys also the pretended unity of the Church of Rome. The Jesuits inculcated doctrines respecting the motives which determine the moral conduct of men, the rule that guides, and the end in view, so as entirely to undermine the foundation of all morality. It would lead into too great prolixity to give a full view of Jesuitical morals. It would show that although they recommend the pious to abstain from sin, yet if any be not disposed to forsake iniquity, he is not left without expedients and a casuistic reason to continue in every kind of flagrant wickedness, and yet be enabled to go to heaven. It is true, some of the principles of the Jesuits have been condemned by the Popes: nevertheless the corruption of their morals has infected the whole Church. Let any one read with ordinary care the Provincial Letters of Blaise Pascal, and he will find proved by a Catholic, and from the most authentic sources, all that we have asserted respecting the doctrine of the Jesuits with regard to morals. The Jansenists, and other pious Doctors of the Church of Rome, have controverted the doctrines of the Jesuits, so as to lead to their condemnation and the suppression of their order. But the principles of this society still remained. They existed in the bosom of the Church, which has given awful proof of its corruption in reviving that association of men, who will not fail to follow the steps of their forefathers in immorality and in crime.

["In the sphere of morals, the Jesuits made still more dreadful and atrocious inroads than in that of religion. Did we affirm that they have perverted and corrupted almost all the various branches and precepts of morality, we should not express sufficiently the pernicious tendency of their maxims. Were we to go still further, and maintain, that they have sapped and destroyed its very foundations, we should maintain no more than what innumerable writers of the Romish Church abundantly testify, and what many of the most illustrious communities of that Church publicly lament. Those who bring this dreadful charge against the sons of Loyola, have taken abundant precautions to vindicate themselves against the reproach of calumny in this matter. They have published several maxims, inconsistent with all regard for virtue, and even decency, which they have drawn from the moral writings of that order, and more especially from the numerous productions of its casuists. They observe, more particularly, that the whole Society adopts and inculcates the following maxims:—

["'That persons truly wicked and void of the love of God, may expect to obtain eternal life in heaven, provided that they be impressed with a fear of the divine anger, and avoid all heinous and enormous crimes through the dread of future punishment.

["'That those persons may transgress with safety, who have a probable reason for transgressing; that is, any plausible argument or authority in favour of the sin they are inclined to commit.*

["'That actions intrinsically evil, and directly contrary to the divine laws, may be innocently performed by those who have no such power over their own minds, as to join, even ideally, a good end to this wicked action, or (to speak in the style of the Jesuits) who are capable of directing their intention aright.†

["'That philosophical sin is of a very light and trivial nature, and does not deserve the pains of hell.' By philosophical sin the Jesuits mean an action contrary to the dictates of nature and right reason, done by a person who is ignorant of the written law of God, or doubtful of its true meaning.‡

["'That the transgressions committed by a person blinded by the seduction of lust, agitated by the impulse of tumultuous passions, and destitute of all sense and impression of religion, however detestable and heinous they may be in themselves, are not imputable to the transgressor before the tribunal of God; and that such transgressions may often be as involuntary as the actions of a madman.

["'That the person who takes an oath, or enters into a contract, may, to elude the force of the one, and the [* Blaise Pascal's Provincial Letters, Letter ii., pp. 20—22. 8vo. edit. London, 1816.]

["* This is one of the most corrupt and most dangerous maxims of the Jesuits. On the one hand, they have among them Doctors of different characters and different principles, that thus they may render their Society recommendable in the eyes of all sorts of persons, the licentious as well as the austere. On the other, they maintain that an opinion or practice, recommended by any one Doctor, becomes thereby probable, as it is not to be supposed that a learned Divine would adopt an opinion, or recommend a practice, in favour of which no considerable reason could be alleged. But here lies the poison: this probable opinion or practice may be followed, say the Jesuits, even when the contrary is still more probable, nay, when it is sure, because, though the man err, he errs under the authority of an eminent Doctor. Thus Escobar affirms, that a Judge may decide in favour of that side of a question that is the least probable, and even against his own opinion, if he be supported by any tolerable authority.—See Lettres Provinciales, Lettre viii.

["† For example: an Ecclesiastic who buys a benefice, in order to direct his intention aright, must, by a powerful act of abstraction, turn away his thoughts from the crime of simony, which he is committing, to some lawful purpose, such as that of acquiring an ample subsistence, or that of doing good by instructing the ignorant. Thus again, a man who runs his neighbour through the body in a duel, on account of a trivial affront, to render his action lawful, has only to turn his thoughts from the principle of vengeance to the more decent principle of honour, and the murder he commits will, by the magic power of Jesuitical morality, be converted into an innocent action. There is no crime, no enormity, to which this abominable maxim may not be extended. A famous Jesuit has declared, that a son may wish for the death of his father, and even rejoice at it when it arrives, provided that this wish does not arise from any personal hatred, but only from a desire of the patrimony which this death will procure him; (see Gaspard Hurtado, De sub. Peccat., Diff. 9, quoted by Diana, p. 5, tr. xiv., R. 99;) and another has had the effrontery to maintain that a Monk, or Ecclesiastic, may lawfully assassinate a calumniator, who threatens laying scandalous crimes to the charge of their community, when there is no other way of hindering him in the execution of his purpose.—See the Works of Father L'Amy, tom. v., disp. xxxvi., n. 118.

["‡ It would be perhaps more accurate to define the philosophical sin of the Jesuits to be 'an action contrary to right reason, which is done by a person who is either absolutely ignorant of God, or does not think of him during the time this action is committed.'

obligation of the other, add to the form of words that express them, certain mental additions, and tacit reservations.'

["These, and other enormities of a like nature,* are said to make an essential part of the system of morality inculcated by the Jesuits. And they were complained of, in the strongest remonstrances, not only by the Dominicans and Jansenists, but also by the most eminent theological doctors of Paris, Poictiers, Louvain, and other academical cities, who expressed their abhorrence of them in such a public and solemn manner, that the Roman Pontiff neither thought it safe nor honourable to keep silence on that head. Accordingly, a part of these moral maxims were condemned, in the year 1659, by Pope Alexander VII. in a public edict; and, in the year 1690, the article relating to philosophical sin met with the same fate, under the pontificate of Alexander VIII.* It was but natural to think, that if the order of Jesuits did not expire, under the terrible blows it received from such a formidable list of adversaries, their system of morals must at least have been suppressed, and their pestilential maxims banished from the schools. This is the least that could have been expected from the complaints and remonstrances of the clerical and monastic orders, and the damnatory Bulls of the Roman Pontiffs. And yet, if we may credit the testimonies of many learned and pious men in the communion of Rome, even this effect was not produced; and the remonstrances of the Monks, the complaints of the Clergy, and the Bulls of the Popes, rather served to restrain, in a certain measure, the enormous licentiousness that had reigned among the writers of this corrupt order, than to purify the seminaries of instruction from the contagion of their dissolute maxims. After what has been observed, in relation to the moral system of the Jesuits, it will not be difficult to assign a reason for the remarkable propensity that is discovered by Kings, Princes, the nobility and gentry of both sexes, and an innumerable multitude of persons, of all ranks and conditions, to commit their consciences to the direction, and their souls to the care, of the brethren of this Society. It is, no doubt, highly convenient for persons who do not pretend to a rigid observance of the duties of religion and morality to have spiritual guides, who diminish the guilt of transgression, disguise the deformity of vice, let loose the reins to all the passions; nay, even nourish them by their dissolute precepts, and render the way to heaven as easy, as agreeable, and smooth as is possible.

["What has here been said concerning the erroneous maxims and corrupt practices of the Jesuits must, however, be understood with certain modifications and restrictions. It must not be imagined that these maxims are adopted, or these practices justified, by all the sons of Loyola, without exception, or that they are publicly taught and inculcated in all their schools and seminaries; for this, in reality, is not the case. As this order has produced men of learning and genius, so also does it possess men of probity and candour; nor would it be a difficult task to compile, from the writings of the Jesuits, a much more just and proper representation of the duties of religion, and the obligations of morality, than that hideous and unseemly exhibition of both, which Pascal and his followers have drawn from the Jesuitical Casuists, Summists, and Moralists. Those who censure the Jesuits in general must, if their censures be well founded, have the following circumstances in view: First, that the rulers of that Society not only suffer several of their members to propagate publicly impious opinions and

["* The books that have been written to expose and refute the corrupt and enormous maxims of the Jesuits would make an ample library, were they collected together. But nothing of this kind is equal to the learned, ingenious, and humorous work of the famous Pascal, entitled, Les Provinciales; ou, Lettres, écrites par Louis de Montalte à un Provincial de ces Amis et aux Jésuits, sur la Morale et la Politique de ces Pères. This exquisite production is accompanied, in some editions of it, with the learned and judicious observations of Nicole, who, under the fictitious name of Guillaume Wendrock, has fully demonstrated the truth of those facts which Pascal had advanced without quoting his authorities, and has placed, in a full and striking light, several interesting circumstances which that great man had treated with perhaps too much brevity. These Letters, which did the Jesuits more real mischief than either the indignation of Sovereign Princes, or any other calamity that had heretofore fallen upon their order, were translated into Latin by Rachelius. On the other hand, the sons of Loyola, sensibly affected and alarmed by this formidable attack upon their reputation, left no means unemployed to defend themselves against such a respectable adversary. They sent forth their ablest champions to defend their cause, or, at least, to cover them from shame; among which champions, the subtle and eloquent Father Daniel, the celebrated author of the History of France, shone forth with a superior lustre; and, as if they thought it unsafe to trust to the powers of argument, and the force of evidence alone, they applied themselves for help to the secular arm, and had credit enough to obtain a sentence against the Provincials, by which they were condemned to be burnt publicly at Paris. See Daniel's Opuscules, vol. i., p. 363. This author, however, acknowledges that the greatest part of the answers which the Jesuits opposed to the performance of Pascal were weak and unsatisfactory. Certain it is, that (whether it was owing to the strength of argument, or to the elegant wit and humour that reigned in them) the Provincial Letters lost not the smallest portion of their credit and reputation by all the answers that were made to them, but continued to pass through a variety of editions which could scarcely be printed off with rapidity sufficient to satisfy the desires of the public.

["Another severe attack was made upon the Jesuits, in a book inferior to Pascal's in point of wit and genteel pleasantry, but superior to it in point of evidence, since it abounds with passages and testimonies, which are drawn from the most applauded writings of the Jesuits, and demonstrate fully the corruption and enormity of the moral rules and maxims inculcated by that famous order. This book, which was published at Mons, in three volumes, 8vo., in the year 1702, bears the following title: La Morale des Jésuites, extraite fidèlement de leurs Livres imprimés avec la Permission et l'Approbation des Supérieurs de leur Compagnie, par un Docteur de Sorbonne. The author was Perrault, (son of Charles Perrault, who began the famous controversy in France concerning the respective merits of the ancients and moderns,) and his book met with the same fate with the Provincials of Pascal; for it was burnt at Paris, in the year 1670, at the request of the Jesuits. See the Opuscules du P. Daniel, tom. i., p. 356. Nor indeed is it at all surprising, that the Jesuits exerted all their zeal against this compilation, which exhibited, in one shocking point of view, all that had been complained of and censured in their maxims and institutions, and unfolded the whole mystery of their iniquity.

["It has been also laid to the charge of the Jesuits, that they reduced their pernicious maxims to practice, especially in the remoter parts of the world. This the famous Arnauld, together with some of his Jansenist brethren, have undertaken to prove in that laborious and celebrated work, entitled, La Morale Pratique des Jésuites. In this important work, which consists of eight volumes in 8vo., and of which a second edition was published at Amsterdam, in the year 1742, there is a multitude of authentic relations, documents, facts, and testimonies, employed to demonstrate the criminal conduct and practices of the Jesuits. For an ample account of the Jesuitical doctrine concerning philosophical sin, and the dissensions and controversies it occasioned, see Jacobi Hyacinthi Serrey (this is a fictitious name; the true name of the author of the Addenda is Augustin le Blanc) Addenda ad Histor. Congregationum de Auxiliis, p. 82; as also his Auctarium, p 289.

["* There is a concise and accurate account of the contests and divisions, to which the morality of the Jesuits gave rise in France, and in other places, in a work, entitled, Catechisme Historique et Dogmatique sur les Contestations qui divisent maintenant l'Eglise, published in the year 1730, see tom. ii., p. 26. It is very remarkable that the two Papal Bulls of Alexander VII. and VIII., against the Jesuits, are not to be found in the Bullarium Pontificum; but the Jansenists and Dominicans, who are careful in perpetuating whatever may tend to the dishonour of the Jesuits, have preserved them industriously from oblivion.

corrupt maxims, but even go so far as to set the seal of their approbation to the books in which these opinions and maxims are contained.* Secondly, that the system of religion and morality that is taught in the greatest part of their seminaries is so loose, vague, and ill-digested, that it not only may be easily perverted to bad purposes and erroneous conclusions, but even seems peculiarly susceptible of such abuse ; and, lastly, that the select few who are initiated into the grand mysteries of the Society, and set apart to transact its affairs, to carry on its projects, to exert their political talents in the closet of the Minister, or in the cabinet of the Prince, commonly make use of the dangerous and pernicious maxims that are complained of, to augment the authority and opulence of their order. The candour and impartiality that become an historian oblige us to acknowledge, at the same time, that, in demonstrating the turpitude and enormity of certain maxims and opinions of the Jesuits, their adversaries have gone too far, and permitted their eloquence and zeal to run into exaggeration. This we might show, with the fullest evidence, by examples deduced from the doctrines of probability and mental reservation, and the imputations that have been made to the Jesuits on these heads ; but this would lead us too far from the thread of our history. We shall only observe, that what happens frequently in every kind of controversy, happened here in a singular manner : I mean that the Jesuits were charged with tenets, which had been drawn consequentially from their doctrine, by their accusers, without their consent ; that their phrases and terms were not always interpreted according to the precise meaning they annexed to them ; and that the tendency of their system was represented in too partial and unequitable a light."†]

17. The administration of the sacraments, especially those of penance and the eucharist, has been a subject of severe controversy in the Church of Rome. The Jesuits and others were of opinion, that the effects of the sacraments are produced by their intrinsic virtue and immediate operation upon the mind at the time they are administered, and, consequently, that no great preparation or inward purity was requisite for receiving them to edification and comfort. And hence, according to this doctrine, the Priests were empowered to give immediate absolution to all who confess their sins, and afterward to admit them to the eucharist. Such sentiments were indignantly, and indeed with justice, rejected by all who had the progress of vital and practical religion at heart; who thought that the Clergy should examine carefully the temper and actions of those who come to the sacraments, since their real benefits could only extend to those who came with proper dispositions. Hence also arose that famous dispute in the Church of Rome concerning 'frequent communion,' which was carried on with such warmth in the fifteenth century between the Jesuits and the Jansenists, with Arnaud at the head of the latter, and was renewed again by the Jesuit Pichan, who thereby incurred the indignation of the greater part of the French Bishops.‡

18. The proper method of instructing Christians in the truths and precepts of religion formed another topic of dispute. One part of the Romish Doctors thought that youth ought to be instructed accurately in the doctrines and duties of religion. Others recommended a devout ignorance, thinking that a Christian is sufficiently instructed when he is taught to yield a blind and unlimited obedience to the orders of the Church. ["The former are of opinion, that nothing can be so profitable and instructive to Christians as the study of the holy Scriptures, and consequently judge it highly expedient that they should be translated into the vulgar tongue of each country. The latter exclude the people from the satisfaction of consulting the sacred oracles of truth, and look upon all vernacular translations of the Bible as dangerous, and even of a pernicious tendency. They accordingly maintain, that it ought only to be published in a learned language, to prevent its instructions from becoming familiar to the multitude. The former compose pious and instructive books to nourish a spirit of devotion in the minds of Christians, to enlighten their ignorance, and dispel their errors ; they illustrate and explain the public prayers and the solemn acts of religion in the language of the people, and exhort all who attend to their instructions to peruse constantly these pious productions, in order to improve their knowledge, purify their affections, and to learn the method of worshipping the Deity in a rational and acceptable manner. All this, however, is highly displeasing to the latter kind of Doctors, who are always apprehensive, that the blind obedience and implicit submission of the people will diminish in proportion as their views are enlarged, and their knowledge increased." *]

19. Other controversies have contributed to the disturbance of the Church of Rome. We mention a few, from many which might be named.

The debate concerning the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary agitated the Papal hierarchy to an alarming extent. In the year 1140 the canons of Lyons celebrated the festival of the conception, which was violently opposed by St. Bernard. The controversy at first was carried on with moderation ; but in after-times it became violent. The Dominicans declared for Bernard, while the Franciscans maintained the new festival, and the doctrine on which it was founded. This controversy gave great trouble and perplexity to the Popes, especially to Paul V., Gregory XV., and Alexander VII. The kingdom of Spain was thrown into complete disorder by this dispute, at the commencement of the seventeenth century ; so that solemn embassies were sent to Rome, both by Philip and his successor, with a view to engage the Pope to decide the question, or to terminate it by a public Bull. The Pope, however, uttered nothing except ambiguous words, and avoided a positive decision. For though he was awed on the one hand by the warm remonstrances of the Spanish Court, which favoured the sentiments of the Franciscans, he was restrained on the other by the credit and influence of the Dominicans ; so that all that could be obtained from him by the Court of Spain, was a declaration to the effect, that the opinion of the Franciscans had a high degree of probability on its side, and that the Dominicans ought not to oppose it publicly. This was accompanied by another, in which the Franciscans were prohibited in their turn from treating as erroneous the doctrine of the Dominicans. Thus the Pope gave slender proofs of his infallibility, when, instead of answering their doubts, he evaded giving an opinion.†

["* This is no doubt true. The Jesuits have Doctors of all sorts and sizes; and this, indeed, is necessary, in order to the establishment of that universal empire at which they aim.—See Lettres Provinciales, Let. v., p. 62, dixième edit. de Cologne, 1698."]

[† Mosheim's Ecc. Hist., vol. v., cent. xvii., sect. i., part ii., pp. 189—197.]

‡ Idem, cent. xvi., chap. i., sect. iii., part i., § 36, vol. iv., pp. 215, 216.

[* Idem, § 37, pp. 217, 218.]

† Idem, cent. xii., part ii., sect. xix., vol. ii., p. 302 ; cent. xvii., part ii., § xlviii., vol. iii., p. 540.

The Bull "Unigenitus" produced much controversy.

["There have been no serious attempts made in latter times to bring about a reconciliation between the Protestant and Romish Churches; for, notwithstanding the pacific projects formed by private persons with a view to this union, it is justly considered as an impracticable scheme. The difficulties that attend its execution were greatly augmented by the famous Bull of Clement XI., entitled 'Unigenitus,' which deprived the peace-makers of the principal expedient they employed for the accomplishment of this union, by putting it out of their power to soften and mitigate the doctrines of Popery that appeared the most shocking to the friends of the Reformation. This expedient had been frequently practised in former times, in order to remove the disgust that the Protestants had conceived against the Church of Rome; but the Bull 'Unigenitus' put an end to all these modifications, and in most of those points that had occasioned our separation from Rome, represented the doctrine of that Church in the very same shocking light in which it had been viewed by the first Reformers. This shows, with the utmost evidence, that all the attempts the Romish Doctors have made, from time to time, to give an air of plausibility to their tenets, and render them palatable, were so many snares insidiously laid to draw the Protestants into their communion; that the specious conditions they proposed as the terms of reconciliation, were perfidious stratagems; and that, consequently, there is no sort of dependence to be placed upon the promises and declarations of such a disingenuous set of men.

["The cause of the Jansenists acquired a peculiar degree of credit and reputation, both in this and the preceding century, by a French translation of the New Testament, made by the learned and pious Paschasius Quesnel, a Priest of the Oratory, and accompanied with practical annotations, adapted to excite lively impressions of religion in the minds of men. The quintessence of Jansenism was blended, in an elegant and artful manner, with these annotations, and was thus presented to the reader under the most pleasing aspect. The Jesuits were alarmed at the success of Quesnel's book, and particularly at the change it had wrought, in many, in favour of the theological doctrines of Jansenius; and to remove out of the way an instrument which proved so advantageous to their adversaries, they engaged that weak Prince Louis XIV. to solicit the condemnation of this production at the Court of Rome. Clement XI. granted the request of the French monarch, because he considered it as the request of the Jesuits; and, in the year 1713, issued out the famous Bull 'Unigenitus,' in which Quesnel's New Testament was condemned, and an hundred and one propositions contained in it pronounced heretical.* This Bull, which is also known by the name of 'The Constitution,' gave a favourable turn to the affairs of the Jesuits; but it was highly detrimental to the interests of the Romish Church, as many of the wiser members of that communion candidly acknowledge. For it not only confirmed the Protestants in their separation, by convincing them that the Church of Rome was resolved to adhere obstinately to its ancient superstitions and corruptions, but also offended many of the Roman Catholics, who had no particular attachment to the doctrines of Jansenius, and were only bent on the pursuit of truth and the advancement of piety.

["The dissensions and tumults excited in France by this edict were violent in the highest degree. A considerable number of Bishops, and a large body composed of persons eminently distinguished by their piety and erudition, both among the Clergy and laity, appealed from the Bull to a General Council. It was more particularly opposed by the Cardinal De Noailles, Archbishop of Paris, who, equally unmoved by the authority of the Pontiff, and by the resentment and indignation of Louis XIV., made a noble stand against the despotic proceeding of the Court of Rome. These defenders of the ancient doctrine and liberties of the Gallican Church were persecuted by the Popes, the French Monarch, and the Jesuits, from whom they received an uninterrupted series of injuries and affronts. Nay, their entire ruin was aimed at by these unrelenting adversaries, and was indeed accomplished in part, since some of them were obliged to fly for refuge to their brethren in Holland; others forced, by the terrors of penal laws, and by various acts of tyranny and violence, to receive the Papal edict; while a considerable number, deprived of their places, and ruined in their fortunes, looked for subsistence and tranquillity at a greater distance from their native country. The issue of this famous contest was favourable to the Bull, which was at length rendered valid by the authority of the Parliament, and was registered among the laws of the state. This contributed, in some measure, to restore the public tranquillity; but it was far from diminishing the number of those who complained of the despotism of the Pontiff; and the kingdom of France is still full of Appellants,* who reject the authority of the Bull, and only wait for a favourable opportunity of reviving a controversy, which is rather suspended than terminated, and of kindling anew a flame that is covered without being extinguished."†

["If a wretched Roman Catholic dare openly to adopt any of the principles condemned in this infamous Bull, that is, if he dare to assert the rights of a rational being, if he dare to assert his privilege of reading the Bible, or any other privilege of civil and religious liberty, in opposition to the tyranny of this antichristian apostasy, immediately he is to be deprived of the sacraments of the Church; that is, the poor wretch is to be shut out from the only means of salvation, and left to perish by the monster that pretends to minister salvation to his soul. This is proved by the law laid down in this eighth vol. of Dens, p. 55, the very book in which this Bull itself is published, and that law is a law of Benedict XIV., 'Ex omnibus Christiani orbis,' &c.

["But this is not all; for, in the sixth vol. of Dens, p. 309, the poor creature is declared to be subjected to an excommunication, reserved in the Bulla Cœnæ to the Pope; that is, the Bull, this Bulla Cœnæ which these

["* To show what a political weathercock the infallibility of the holy Father was upon this occasion, it may not be improper to place here an anecdote which is related by Voltaire, in his Siècle de Louis XIV., vol. ii., under the article 'Jansenism.' The credit of the teller weighs but light in the balance of historical fame: the anecdote, however, is well attested, and is as follows:—'The Abbé Renaudot, a learned Frenchman, happening to be at Rome the first year of the pontificate of Clement XI., went one day to see the Pope, who was fond of men of letters, and was himself a learned man, and found His Holiness reading Father Quesnel's book. On seeing Renaudot enter the apartment, the Pope said, in a kind of rapture, Here is a most excellent book. We have nobody at Rome that is capable of writing in this manner; I wish I could engage the author to reside here! And yet this same book was condemned afterwards by this same Pope.'

["* This was the name that was assumed by those who appealed from the Bull and the Court of Rome to a General Council."

[† Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., cent. xviii., sect. viii., x., xi., vol. vi., pp. 11—15.

Papal Bishops dared in their public evidence, by shameless perjury, to deny as being received, or in force in this country; was, nevertheless, the Bull which they were all the while secretly teaching their Priests, to be the law under which obedience was to be enforced to the Bull 'Unigenitus,' which they acknowledged was received. So that the very truth of their confession, as to the reception of the Bull 'Unigenitus,' illustrates and enhances their perjury in their denial of the Bulla Cœnæ; for a child must see that a law which inflicts a penalty for the violation of another confessed to be in force, must necessarily be not only in force itself, but be even of prior authority to that of which it punishes the violation.

["We now proceed to give some extracts from this Bull 'Unigenitus.'

["EXTRACTS FROM THE HUNDRED AND ONE PROPOSITIONS CONDEMNED BY THE BULL 'UNIGENITUS,' AS TAKEN FROM THE MORAL REFLECTIONS OF QUESNEL ON THE NEW TESTAMENT.

["Prop. 2. 'The grace of Jesus Christ, the efficacious principle of good of whatever kind it be, is necessary to every good work, and without it not only nothing is done, but nothing can be done. (John xv. 5.)

["4. 'So, O Lord, all things are possible to him, to whom you make all things possible, by working the same in him. (Mark ix. 22.)

["5. 'When God does not soften the heart by the internal unction of his grace, exhortations and external graces do not serve, unless to harden it more. (Rom. ix. 18.)

["8. 'We do not pertain to the new covenant, unless in so much as we are partakers of that new grace which works in us that which God commands us. (Heb. viii. 10.)

["14. 'How far remote soever an obstinate sinner may be from safety, when Jesus exhibits himself to his view in the salutary light of his grace, it is fit that he should devote himself, run to him, humble himself, and adore his Saviour. (Mark v. 6.)

["15. 'When God accompanies his command and his external address by the unction of his Spirit, and the internal force of his grace, that works the obedience in the heart which he seeks. (Luke ix. 60.)

["18. 'The seed of the word which the hand of God waters, always brings forth its fruit. (Acts xi. 21.)

["25. 'God illuminates the mind, and heals it equally with the body, by his will alone; he commands, and he is obeyed. (Luke xviii. 42.)

["26. 'No graces are given except through faith. (Luke viii. 48.)

["27. 'Faith is the first grace, and the fountain of all others. (2 Peter i. 3.)

["32. 'Jesus Christ delivered himself to death, to deliver for ever the first-born of his own blood, that is, the elect, from the hand of the exterminating angel. (Gal. iv. 5; v. 4—7.)

"45. 'The love of God not any more reigning in the heart of a sinner, it is necessary, that carnal lust should reign in him, and corrupt all his actions. (Luke xv. 13.)

["52. 'All other means of safety are contained in faith, as in their germ and seed; but this faith is not without love and confidence. (Acts x. 43.)

["58. 'There is neither God nor religion where there is not charity. (1 John iv. 8.)

["77. 'He who does not lead a life worthy of a son of God and a member of Christ, ceases to have God in his heart for his Father, and Christ for his Head. (1 John ii. 22.)

["80. 'The reading of the sacred Scripture is for all. (Acts viii. 28.)

["81. 'The obscurity of the sacred word of God is no reason for laymen to dispense themselves from reading it. (Acts viii. 31.)

["82. 'The Lord's day ought to be sanctified by Christians for reading works of piety, and, above all, of the sacred Scripture. It is damnable to wish to withdraw a Christian from this reading. (Acts xv. 21.)

["83. 'It is an illusion to persuade oneself that a knowledge of the mysteries of religion is not to be communicated to women by the reading of the sacred book. Not from the simplicity of women, but from the proud science of men, has the abuse of the Scriptures arisen, and heresies have been produced. (John iv. 26.)

["84. 'To take away the New Testament from the hands of Christians, or to shut it up from them, by taking from them the means of understanding it, is to close the mouth of Christ to them. (Matt. v. 2.)

["85. 'To interdict from Christians the reading of the sacred Scriptures, particularly of the Gospel, is to interdict the use of the light from the sons of light, and to cause that they should suffer some species of excommunication. (Luke xi. 33.)

["86. 'To take away from the simple people this solace of joining their voice to the voice of the whole church, is a custom contrary to the apostolical practice and the intention of God. (1 Cor. xiv. 16.)

["91. 'The fear of unjust excommunication should never impede us from fulfilling our duty. We are never cut off from the church, even when by the wickedness of men we seem expelled from it, when to God, to Jesus Christ, and to the church itself, through charity, we are still joined. (John ix. 32, 33.)

["92. 'To suffer excommunication in peace, and an unjust anathema, rather than to violate truth, is to imitate the example of St. Paul; let it be only provided that it may not be to erect himself against authority or to break unity. (Rom. ix. 3.)

["'The suffrages of the aforesaid Cardinals and of other theologians, having been heard as well by word of mouth as exhibited to us in writing; and, in the first place, the direction of the divine light being implored, private and public prayers also being appointed for the same end; we declare, condemn, and reprobate respectively, by this our Constitution, perpetually in force for ever, all and singular, the propositions before inserted, as false, captious, ill-sounding, offensive to pious ears, scandalous, pernicious, rash, injurious to the Church and its practice, neither against the Church alone, but also against the secular power, contumacious, seditious, impious, blasphemous, suspected of heresy, and savouring of heresy itself, also favouring heretics and heresies, and even schism, erroneous, approaching to heresy, often condemned, and again even heretical, and manifestly renewing various heresies, and chiefly those which are contained in the famous propositions of Jansenius, and indeed being received in that sense in which they were condemned. Commanding all the faithful in Christ, of either sex, not to presume to think, teach, or preach concerning the said propositions, otherwise than contained in this the same our Constitution, so that whosoever shall teach, defend, publish, or treat even in disputation publicly or privately, unless it may be to impugn them, or any of them, conjointly or separately, shall be subject ipso facto, and without any other declaration, to ecclesiastical censures, and the other punishments decreed by law against the perpetrators of similar things.

[" 'We command also the venerable brothers, the Patriarchs, Archbishops, and Bishops, and other ordinaries of places, also the Inquisitors of heretical pravity, that they may by all means coerce and compel gainsayers, and rebels, whatsoever, by censures, and the aforesaid punishments, and the other remedies of law and fact; the aid even of the secular arm being called in for this purpose, if necessary.'

[" This Bull affords a full and satisfactory answer to the falsehoods which are eternally put forth by the Popish Priests, that they do not shut up the Scriptures from the people, and shows at once the character of their superstition, bearing as it does the stamp of God's denunciation, 'speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron;' for it is plain that all the terms of contempt, abuse, malice, and indignation, which are applied to these propositions, are applied to the reading of the sacred Scriptures; as, for example, to propositions 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, and 85. Here we have the real principles of this mystery of iniquity set forth; for when she condemns such propositions as scandalous, pernicious, heretical, &c., &c., and when she denounces the 91st proposition under these appellations, it is perfectly clear that all the evidence of Dr. Murray and Dr. Doyle on excommunication, which was given before a Committee of the House of Lords, is one tissue of falsehood, both in principle and application.

[" Then as to the persecuting doctrines, what further need is there of any recurrence to Dens's Theology to prove them, while in this Bull, which Dr. Murray admits to be in force, and which by his own evidence is therefore of infallible obligation on his conscience, the very principles of persecution, by the Church calling the secular arm to her aid, are enforced, though he refers Lord Melbourne to the solemnity of his oath, to prove that he does not hold them. These Popish Bishops swear to hold these principles, to obey them, and to enforce them all in their oath of allegiance to their master the Pope; they swear they renounce them all in their oaths before the British empire: when, then, they refer to their veracity in one oath, they but prove their perjury in another." *]

20. But it were endless to enumerate the controversies which distract the Church of Rome: her principles necessarily tend to division.

Their rule of faith contains the essence of schism in itself. The canonical Scriptures, we are told, are not safe in the hands of the people, unless interpreted by the Church; and yet their Church has never acted the part of an interpreter. Then the doubtfulness of the Apocrypha being added to the word of God; and then written and unwritten traditions, and decrees of Councils and decisions of Popes, and the frequently contradictory writings of the ancient Fathers, claiming a unanimous consent; all tend to uncertainty, afterward to controversy, and finally to schism.

The doctrines of the Church of Rome, such as the supremacy of the Pope, adoration of saints and images, transubstantiation, &c., lead directly to division. This statement is confirmed by facts.

The Papacy, by excommunicating unjustly or unnecessarily the Greek and other Churches, became the leading author of schism. In later days, previous to, and even since, the Reformation, the unscriptural terms of communion imposed by Rome, prove her to be highly schismatical. So that even now, and during the last two hundred years, she has persecuted Protestants, refused to reform herself according to the Scriptures, retains her absurd creed, and disregards Gospel discipline to such a degree, that her former allies, who refused to see the light of the Protestant reform, have sunk into infidelity. France has almost forsaken her; Spain and Portugal are tottering; South America is in a very unstable state. Thus Rome, by her divisive doctrines, her uncertain rule of faith, and unchristian conduct, has divided the Christian world, and may be justly styled "chief schismatic" in Christendom.

It is true, there have appeared in the Popish hierarchy eminent men who have called for a reformation, but in vain. In the estimation of the great body of the Clergy, a moral corruption of head and members, and a system which secured and propagated such depravity, were, if we believe them, no small subject of triumph to the enemy of God and man. As long as the authority of Rome was safe, the gates of hell had still the worst of the contest. Let the Pope possess the heads of Christians, and Satan was welcome to their hearts. The absurd notion that the unity of the church of Christ depended on unity with the Bishop of Rome, fettered all who, before the Reformation, wanted either the knowledge or the courage to examine the foundation of that system. The sword and the faggot, too, stood in the way of their approach to that delicate point; else the invectives so carefully restricted to morals would not always have left the doctrines untouched. Submit your understanding to Rome; confess that you cannot hope for salvation out of the Pope's communion; acknowledge that immorality and wickedness do not detract from his supernatural privileges; and on these conditions you are at liberty to oppose the corruptions of the Church.

Invariableness in doctrine they place as the criterion of their oneness; but surely any set of men, who agreed on a system similar to that on which Roman concord depends, might equally boast of invariableness and unity. There cannot be much difference of opinion in a society which excludes every member who does not conform his views to those of the individual placed at its head. The "unity of the Spirit" is preserved by walking worthy of the Christian calling; by lowliness, meekness, long-suffering, forbearance, love, and an endeavour to preserve uniformity by cultivating peace with all men. (Eph. iv. 1—3.) Such are the means of agreement prescribed by the holy Scriptures; but they are overlooked, rejected, and denounced by the Church of Rome.

We refer to the concord which exists among Protestants, observing:—

21. That exact unanimity in all opinions respecting religion should prevail among all men, is not necessary to the salvation of individuals, to the peace and harmony of the church, or to the conversion of the world.

Every one who candidly and fully examines the subject will acknowledge this. Objects of faith, and matters of opinion or speculation, ought always to be distinguished from each other. This is allowed by many unprejudiced members of the Church of Rome, as well as by others. And it is only when their defence of their Church, or their strictures on the Reformation, hurry them beyond the control of sound principle, that they are led to insist so strenuously on a unity which does not exist even among themselves, or among any people in the world.

[* M'Ghee's Laws of the Papacy, pp. 216—221, Dublin, 1841.]

It can be proved that many pious persons, in all ages, have embraced some heretical opinions; or have had but imperfect or incorrect views of many doctrines of the Gospel; and others have had no knowledge of them at all. And though every doctrine of the Gospel is necessary in order to form a complete system, it does not necessarily follow that every person who disbelieves some of the minor articles of the Christian faith, or has incorrect views of others, or embraces some erroneous opinion, is in the way to misery. The natural tendency of his errors may be counteracted by the force of truth, and of the right opinions which he has already formed. It is perverseness and obstinacy in the will, and wickedness in the heart and life, that send men to perdition.

(1.) What shall we say concerning honest Heathens who have no knowledge whatever of Christianity? We certainly cannot consign them to perdition; for the Scripture declares, that "when the Gentiles which have not the law do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves." (Rom. ii. 14.) So that "in every nation, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of him." And if they be accepted of God, they are represented as being washed from their sins in the blood of Christ, from every nation, tongue, and people under heaven; and glorified with Christ, making part of the innumerable multitude which surround the throne of God. (Rev. vii. 9—14.)

(2.) Noah, Enoch, and others, were favoured neither with a church nor with a written revelation; yet they were accepted. It is true God may have supplied the want of both, and no doubt he did, as far as their salvation was concerned; yet it is not presuming too much to say, that those who lived in the age before an organized church was formed, were ignorant of many truths which God revealed to his church and people in future times.

(3.) The Jews, who were once the church of God, were certainly unacquainted with numerous doctrines that were revealed to Christians; yet their salvation was not on that account periled.

(4.) Should it, however, be said that these truths were not clearly revealed, and that these individuals had not the opportunity of knowing them,—be it so. Yet the Apostles and first disciples of Christ were mistaken in many of their opinions, some of whom embraced erroneous doctrines. They looked upon Christ as a temporal deliverer. They also entertained other incorrect views; so that our Lord found it necessary frequently to rectify their mistakes. But these wrong views did not materially injure their souls. Christ insisted on something else of much more importance. He required them to forsake their sins and to obey God. He also taught those who heard and professed to believe in his words, that unless they did that which he commanded them, they were like a man who built his house upon the sand. (Matt. vii. 26.)

(5.) The Apostles, together with many of the first Christians, after the Holy Ghost was given, were deficient in the belief of some articles of the Christian faith, without bringing on themselves any severe censure or guilt. The Apostles refused to preach to the Gentiles, and, of course, they must have had either wrong or very inadequate conceptions concerning an important branch of evangelical truth, the calling of the Gentiles, so often spoken of by the Prophets, and communicated even to themselves by our Saviour in their commission, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." St. Peter himself was convinced only by miracle; and he found it necessary to give a formal detail of this miraculous interference of God in behalf of the Gentiles, to convince and satisfy the Jewish believers.

Nor are we to suppose that this error related to things which had been obscurely revealed. For what is more clearly made known in Scripture than the calling of the Gentiles? The case before us shows how difficult it is to emancipate the mind from preconceived notions so far as to leave it free to follow the truth without bias. This was the case with the Apostles; nevertheless their unbelief on this point did not prevent them from receiving the saving faith of the Gospel, nor did it prevent them from continuing in their attachment to the cause of Christ.

(6.) Neither were the primitive Christians free from error. Many believed that the world would come to an end at the close of the tenth century. Several of the Christian Doctors and early Ministers, while they received the truth so far as was necessary for their own salvation and that of others, did, after all, embrace many erroneous opinions, and even heresies. We select the following sentiments, as held by a few of the Fathers, in proof of our assertions.

Justin Martyr, who lived in the second century, embraced many sentiments contrary to Scripture, several of which are viewed as heresies by the Church of Rome.*

Irenæus, as well as Justin, supposed that souls are immortal only through grace, and that those of the wicked shall cease to be after they shall have been tormented a long time.†

Clement of Alexandria, among many other erroneous views, was a believer in the eternity of matter, and in the transmigration of souls.‡

Tertullian was guilty of several errors of considerable magnitude.§

Minutius Felix thought that the soul died with the body.‖

Origen, with many other foolish notions, conceived that the death of Christ was advantageous, not only to men, devils, and angels, but even to inanimate things. He supposed also that Christ experienced a kind of spiritual death in the other world.¶

St. Hilary imagined that Christ felt no pain in his crucifixion; and that souls are corporeal substances.

Optatus ascribed to free-will the power of beginning a good action, and of advancing in the way of salvation without the grace of God.††

Jerome, when reproached for some of his own mistakes, gives examples of great men who were commendable, on the whole, but who held remarkable errors. "St. Cyprian," says he, "took Tertullian for his tutor, as appears by his writings, and yet did not approve of the dreams of Montanus and Maximilla, as he did. Apollinarius hath written very convincing books against Porphyry; and Eusebius wrote a most useful History of the Church. The former erred concerning the mystery of

* Du Pin, Ecc. Hist., vol. i., p. 67. Folio. Dublin edit., 1723.
† Idem, p. 75. ‡ Idem, p. 81. § Idem, p. 94.
‖ Idem, p. 101. ¶ Idem, p. 111.  Idem, p. 200.
†† Idem, p. 212.

the incarnation, and the latter defended the opinions of Arius." *

St. Augustine taught the same doctrine which modern Calvinists teach concerning predestination, grace, free-will, &c. He also taught that children are infallibly damned, on account of original sin, unless they are regenerated by baptism. †

Will any assert that the above-mentioned sentiments, or even the greater part of them, are agreeable to Scripture? Or will any declare that the persons entertaining such notions were not genuine Christians, who possessed that faith which purifies the heart, and works by love? We think not.

Admitting that Protestants are in error on certain points of doctrine,—although it has frequently been shown that both in doctrine and discipline they approach nearer the primitive church than the Catholics,—still this gives no scriptural reason to exclude them from salvation, nor does it lead to perplexity in pointing out the way of salvation to any serious inquirer. Hence the anathemas of Rome, which condemn all Protestants, form a greater heresy in doctrine, and a more flagrant transgression of morals, than all the errors and sins with which the Protestants may be chargeable.

22. Protestants have much of the unity of the Spirit. They receive and maintain the doctrines which are taught in the holy Scripture. They justly claim for themselves a threefold unity, as it respects the external bond of peace, and the spiritual influences of the grace of God.

The Reformed Churches possess canonical unity, by which they hold to the authorized Scriptures with undeviating firmness: so that the Romanist cannot show that the doctrines of orthodox Protestants materially differ from the sacred canon. They have an ecclesiastical unity; by which is meant, that they agree with the church of God in its purest and best days. This is shown from the writings of the earliest Fathers. They have also a symbolic unity, both with the primitive church and with each other. With the apostolic churches, they adopt the Apostles' Creed, without the unscriptural additions of Pope Pius IV., and the Council of Trent; embracing those of true believers, so far as they agree in all fundamental points: thus they preserve a unity such as Rome cannot boast of; though not altogether such an one as the Scriptures require in every respect.

With this external unity Protestants possess the spiritual fellowship of being of one mind and of one heart, arising from a renewal of nature through the agency of the Holy Spirit.

As it regards the different opinions, or variations, so termed, among Protestants, in reference to doctrine and discipline, it will be proper to remark:—

The Reformed Churches have varied in search of that truth which Rome had buried under metaphysical distinctions and a heap of superstition.

They have differed in consequence of the habits of thinking which they acquired in Roman Catholic schools.

They have likewise varied, because they refused to imitate the trickery and the fictitious miracles by which the Roman Church has endeavoured to give the appearance of unity to her decisions and decrees.

They have differed because they would not claim an infallibility which was not promised in Scripture; the exercise of which, assumed without divine authority, has corrupted the church, impeded the progress of knowledge, and contributed largely to the maintainance of despotism in the earth.

They disagreed, because greater evils arise from a neglect of careful examination, than from the honest, though sometimes misguided, efforts of men in the pursuit of truth.

In Protestant churches, there exists as great agreement, in every important point of doctrine and discipline, as dwelt in the primitive church; and as much as is necessary to salvation and to the acquisition of truth. Their differences are not concerning the essentials, but about those things which are not necessary to the prosperity of Christian truth. They agree in the rule of faith, and in their criterion respecting that rule: they hold communion with one another: respect each other's opinions: have mutual intercourse, and derive reciprocal benefit from the labours and writings of one another. See their unity, therefore, in faith; in circulating the Scriptures throughout the world; in sending the Gospel to every corner of the earth; in deciding what is immoral or sinful; in short, in every important point of Scripture doctrine and practice.

Whatever may be the errors into which Protestants have fallen, they have only imitated the primitive church. They may have been mistaken in some things, while they have maintained incorrupt the faith as it is in Jesus. If they have erred, it has been through zeal for the truth, and in attempting to obey the laws of Christ.

Errors and mistakes will befall even honest men in the pursuit after truth, and in every department of it. But by their united investigations truth itself is more clearly seen, and their errors stand open for detection and correction. The great Locke committed several errors in metaphysics; but who will infer from thence that he did not advance right principles? The same may be said, with greater or less propriety, in reference to others in almost every department of knowledge.

23. The unity among Protestants is preferable to that which prevails in the Church of Rome.

Protestant unity is internal and essential, consisting of the agreement of Christian doctrines, of faith, and pure religion. Roman Catholic unity is external and ritual, depending on a certain conformity of ceremonies, while the most grievous dissensions exist concerning what is vital in Christianity. The former is Christian and free, because no one is compelled by threats or persecutions to embrace their doctrines; but the latter is hypocritical and forced, inasmuch as men are compelled to profess doctrines and a system which they do not believe. The one is fixed on the immovable foundation of God's word, and is, therefore, stable. The other depends on the mutable judgment of the Pope and the sands of tradition, and is, consequently, uncertain.

What shall we say to the great advantages which arise from the labours and example of Protestants? From them we have derived much benefit, in having more distinct views of Scripture doctrine and morals. Science has received, through them, important improvements; which might have been looked for in vain, had they remained under the Papal yoke.

The example of Protestants has been of immense advantage to Rome. It has, in some degree, improved her morals. It has prevented her falling into a state of ignorance, superstition, and profligacy, far below that into which she had already fallen. The conduct of Reformers has not only prevented the Church of Rome from going farther astray, but it has in some degree led to the rejection of that grossness which superstition engenders; nay, her very superstitions have been refined.

* Du Pin, Ecc. Hist., vol. i., p. 350. Folio. Dublin edit., 1723.
† Idem, p. 414.

May we not then ask the question, What are the trifling errors of Protestants, when compared with the fearful enormities of Rome? What are the comparatively slight differences among them, possessing as they do the truth of the Gospel and the writings of able men, with whose sentiments their minds are deeply imbued, when contrasted with the variations of Roman Catholics, not only from the primitive church and Scripture, but from common sense and sound morals? For, after all, the boasted triumphs of Romanists are without foundation. There have existed among them, as we have seen, variations far more serious than those which have been discovered among Protestants. The spirit of controversy, and of division, and of schism, has disunited them to an alarming degree; and this is not the statement of Protestant writers: we have their own narratives and the Bulls of their Popes which fully establish the point.

24. Roman Catholics occasionally urge an objection, in substance as follows:—"That an inquiring Heathen, deist, or infidel, introduced to four Clergymen, one a Wesleyan, one an Episcopalian, the third a Presbyterian, and the fourth a Lutheran, would receive different spiritual instructions from each; by which he would be led to reject Christianity altogether, or to embrace Unitarianism."

How a sincere inquirer may be perplexed in any thing wherein the salvation of his soul is concerned, by being introduced to these four Clergymen, is more than we can discover. Will not all, without hesitation, say the Bible alone is the true standard? What article in the Apostles' Creed is that on which they will differ? Not one. Wherein will any of these vary, in any subject of moment, from the doctrines and standards of the primitive church? In nothing. They agree in every thing essential; though not one of them believes in the Pope's infallibility, or in the efficacy of indulgences, prayers to saints, or for the dead. They will not teach him to believe in the efficacy of masses or purgatory; in auricular confession, as practised at Rome; nor will they direct the inquirer to trust in relics, or to have recourse to empty superstitions or charms, as the means of salvation. They will instruct him to forsake sin, to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ alone, to lead a new life; and then through the grace of God he shall be saved. As far as the eucharist is concerned, they will have no perplexing dispute concerning it, nor on the meaning of the words, "This is my body." They declare that these words do not mean, that the bread and wine are changed into the real body and blood, soul and divinity, of Jesus Christ, as the Roman Catholic would teach. They will not interrupt the way of salvation with transubstantiation, or with any of its absurdities and blasphemies.

It is true, when a theological distinction, or some peculiar mode of worship, or form of discipline, is constituted an essential point, there may arise more or less difficulty. And it must be acknowledged, that, even at the present time, some Protestants may be somewhat tinctured with the dregs of Popish superstition, so as to insist too much on mere forms, rather than on opposing sin, and on pursuing to the utmost those things which tend to holiness of heart and life. Nevertheless, we discover progress in the way of pure truth, and enjoy the prospect of deliverance from every injurious error.

A Unitarian would find much less to favour, or to confirm him in his errors, among Protestants than among Romanists. We cannot, we confess, perceive what affinity exists between his doctrines and those of the Protestants. But we can easily see how a person may be led into error with regard to the doctrine of the Trinity,—which doctrine, as well as that of a supreme, unoriginated, self-existent Being, contains many things above reason,—if he will associate it with the doctrine of transubstantiation, which contains so many absurdities that contradict our very senses. It will be hard for a person who believes in the creed of the Roman Church, to convince a deist, or an atheist. Unitarians, deists, and atheists, can find, and always have found, more in the Church of Rome to establish them in their errors, and impede their conversion, than they ever discovered among orthodox Protestants. The exultation, therefore, manifested by the Romanist, in introducing Unitarians, deists, and atheists, to the confusion of Wesleyans, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and Lutherans, must be very short-lived.

Instead of requiring the deist or atheist to acknowledge mere authority or prescription, Protestants introduce historical facts, and unquestionable historical evidence. Without confounding reason and contradicting the senses with the absurdities of Popery, they present arguments not contradictory to reason; they will, with Bishop Butler, lead him through the analogies that exist between revelation and nature; and by this means conduct him, in the exercise of every faculty of the soul, to the Saviour of men. In the place of entertaining an inquirer with legends of false saints, with pretended miracles, and with the fancied spells of relics, pilgrimages, exorcisms, &c., they adduce argument and well-authenticated documents; they present him with the mass of evidence collected, arranged, and exhibited by Grotius, and Leland; by Bull, Watson, and Paley; by Butler, Clarke, and a host of others,—champions for the common Christian cause, such as Rome cannot boast of, and whose works will stand as irrefragable demonstrations of the truth of Christianity throughout all time. On the doctrine of the Trinity, and of the proper Godhead of Christ, where is there a single author among the Romanists who has met Unitarians and Socinians to equal advantage with Dr. Waterland in his treatises on these subjects?

It is therefore worse than puerile, it is sophistical, to represent an inquirer so perplexed with the answers he receives from the four Protestant Clergymen alluded to above, as to turn with disgust to the Unitarian, and from him to the deist or atheist. Such an inquirer, thus duped, must be wanting not only in information of almost every kind, but grievously deficient in common sense. To such an one the charge of folly by the Psalmist would be truly applicable: "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God."

25. With a few observations we shall bring this discussion of unity to a conclusion.

It was the prayer of our Saviour, in reference to the Apostles and his disciples in all future time, that they might be one. "Neither pray I for these alone, but for those also which shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." Here is inculcated a oneness of mind and heart with the will and love of our heavenly Father. There is an outward and visible, an inward and a spiritual, unity. Both were combined in the primitive church under the first effusion of the Holy Spirit. The visible unity is, however, chiefly material, either as a means in producing, or as a manifestation of, that spiritual unity which the church of Christ inherits from her living Head.

The perfect unity of the primitive church did not long continue. Soon an outward fellowship was witnessed, destitute of that which is perfect and inward. The church at length was leavened with this corruption, and the whole became infected, which speedily produced bondage, will-worship, and idolatry.

At the time of the Reformation, these evils were greater than the benefits. The professing church maintained an external unity, which was lauded at the expense of truth and righteousness. This mere outward agreement, because it did not answer the proper end, was superseded. The great doctrine of the word of truth, salvation by grace through faith unto holiness and obedience, was proclaimed abroad; multitudes, with one heart and mind, glorified the Most High, and yielded themselves to Him under its holy and heavenly influences, filling their hearts with supreme love to God, and unfeigned love to man. Nevertheless, from a variety of causes, much remains to be done, in order to restore fully that unity for which Christ supplicated, which St. Paul described, and which is absolutely necessary to effect the conversion of the world.

CHAPTER II.

THE CHURCH—SUBJECT CONTINUED.

VI. SANCTITY OF THE CHURCH. 1. Is peculiar to such community: 2. Defects of the Church of Rome on this point.—VII. CATHOLIC OR UNIVERSAL. 1. Import of the word "Catholic:" 2. Its use in the Apostles' Creed: 3. Does not belong exclusively to the Church of Rome: 4. Absurdity of applying it to her in the sense of universal: 5. Or of orthodoxy: 6. She is not catholic as to place, time, or faith: 7. Her arrogance in this assumption. VIII. NOTE OF APOSTOLICITY OR SUCCESSION. 1. Roman Catholic views of this. Dens, Bailly, and Liebermann cited. They omit moral character: 2. First, Of succession in general—Three kinds of it, namely, of persons and places, of doctrines, of morals and practice: 3. Mere local or personal succession no mark of the true church: 4. Scripture proof: 5. Ecclesiastical history: 6. The Fathers: 7. Secondly, This succession does not exist exclusively in the Church of Rome. The Apostles were Bishops of no particular city or church: 8. The power of Peter did not descend to the Popes: 9. The Church of Rome defective in apostolic character: 10. Local or personal succession exists not in the Popes. Five arguments on this point: 11. Papal succession has been interrupted. Seven ways instanced in which this was done: 12. The Bishops of Rome not the true successors of the Apostles. Proved by eight arguments: 13. Thirdly, There has been a succession of Christianity independently of the Church of Rome: 14. Scripture has been preserved without it: 15. Also the records of Christianity: 16. The transmission of the ministry: 17. The preservation of doctrines: 18. Morality: 19. And church polity: 20. Christianity independent of Rome: 21. Fourthly, The Protestant succession valid.—IX. ANTIQUITY A NOTE OF THE TRUE CHURCH. 1. True idea of antiquity: 2. No true mark: 3. Bellarmine's traits of novelty and antiquity confuted. Council of Trent's concessions: 4. The circumstances of time, place, and of the Roman errors, can be traced out.—X. PERPETUAL OR UNINTERRUPTED DURATION. 1. This note considered: 2. Objection from Dan. ii. 44, examined: 3. Another objection removed: 4. "Where was your church before Luther?" answered: 5. How the Church was preserved.—XI. NOTE OF AMPLITUDE. 1. The true church small: 2. The number of those in error and sin often exceeds the righteous: 3. Numbers in the Church of Rome.—XII. AGREEMENT WITH THE ANCIENT CHURCH. 1. Doctrine of that community: 2. Agreement in Tertullian's time: 3. Church of Rome at variance with Scripture in doctrine. Divines quoted.—XIII. EFFICACY OF DOCTRINE.—XIV. MIRACLES. 1. Not always a mark of the true church: 2. Must be accompanied with the truth: 3. Many of their miracles are false. Blood of Januarius. Veronica. Dennis: 4. Some are absurd and puerile: 5. Some are brought to support idolatry, superstition, &c.: 6. Some true miracles may have been wrought among them, and why: 7. Want of miracles among Protestants considered: 8. Testimony of Romanists against Popish miracles.—XV. OTHER NOTES OF THE CHURCH CONSIDERED.—XVI. OF THE AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH. 1. Her power in making new articles of religion: 2. This considered: 3. Her power in ceremonies.—XVII. INFALLIBILITY, &c.

VI. Sanctity or holiness of the church.

1. That the church of Christ ought to be holy, is clearly taught by the word of God. "Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify it." (Eph. v. 25, 26.) Hence Christians are called, "a holy nation." (1 Peter ii. 9.) And this is not merely an external sanctity, but an inward purity of heart, producing holiness of life or conduct. (Acts xv. 9; Eph. i. 4.)

["This note forms the eighth in the category of Bellarmine.* If the question be proposed, What is it that the Cardinal here means by 'sanctity of doctrine?' the answer is, that it is the profession of the true religion, both as to doctrine of faith, and doctrine of morals, without any mixture of error; for so he explains it himself: 'The true church is not only catholic, and apostolic, and one, but also holy, according to the Constantinopolitan creed; but it is evident the church is said to be holy, because its profession is holy, containing nothing false as to doctrine of faith, nothing unjust as to doctrine of morals.'† And a little after: 'By this note it is evident that no church but ours is a true church, because there is no sect, either of Pagans, or philosophers, or Jews, or Turks, or heretics, which doth not contain some errors that have been exploded, and are manifestly contrary to right reason.'‡ By which it is evident that he excludes all sorts of errors from that profession of religion which he here sets up as a mark of the true church. And therefore, after he had given a brief enumeration of the errors of all other sects, as well of Pagans, and Jews, and Mahometans, as of Christians, he thus concludes: 'But as for our Catholic Church, it teaches no error, no turpitude, nothing against reason,' (no, not excepting transubstantiation,) 'though many things above reason; therefore she alone is absolutely holy, and to her alone appertains what we say in our creed, I believe the holy Church.'§ In which words he expressly points and directs us to his Catholic Church by this mark or note, that it 'teaches no error,' &c. By this it is evident that sanctity of doctrine, in the Cardinal's sense, consists in an unerring profession of the true religion, without the least intermixture of error. Now, though it is certain that that is the best and purest church which hath the least of error and corruption in its doctrine and discipline, yet it is as certain that that which is the best church is not the only true church; for the only

["* 'Octava nota est sanctitas doctrinæ.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Notis Ecclesiæ, lib. iv., cap. xi., col. 199, A. Colon., 1619.

["† 'Vera enim ecclesia non solum est catholica, apostolica, una, sed etiam sancta, ut habet symbolum Constantinopolitanum: constat autem sanctam dici ecclesiam, quia professio ejus est sancta, nihil continens falsum quoad fidei doctrinam, nihil injustum quoad doctrinam morum.'—Idem.

["‡ 'Ex hac nota evidenter ostenditur nullam esse veram ecclesiam, nisi nostram: nulla enim est secta, vel Paganorum, vel philosophorum, vel Judæorum, vel Turcarum, vel hæreticorum, quæ non contineat aliquos exploratos errores et rectæ rationi manifeste contrarios.'—Idem.

["§ 'At Ecclesia nostra Catholica nullum errorem, nullam turpitudinem, nihil contra rationem docet, etsi multa supra rationem; proinde sola est absolute sancta, eique soli convenit, quod in symbolo dicimus: 'Credo sanctam Ecclesiam.'—Idem."] true church is the catholic church, which consists of a great many particular churches, whereof some are more, and some less, pure from error and corruption, and yet all of them are true churches; for all particular bodies and societies of Christians, that are true parts of the catholic church, are true churches, as being homogeneous parts of the catholic church, and consequently partaking of the same common nature with it. But when we are discoursing of the notes of the true church, that which we mean by them is, such marks and characters by which an honest inquirer may distinguish such societies of Christians as are the true churches of which the true catholic church consists from such as are not; and therefore that can be no true note of the true church, which doth not distinguish it from all false churches, and whose contrary note is consistent with the being of a true church."*

[The Romish Bishop, Dr. Challoner, in his Grounds of the Catholic Doctrine, after asserting that the church of Christ is always holy in her doctrines and terms of communion, and free from all pernicious error, asks, "How prove you this? A. (1.) Because, as we have seen from Matt. xvi. 18, our Lord Jesus Christ, who cannot tell us a lie, has promised that his church should be built upon a rock, proof against all floods and storms, like the house of the wise builder of whom he speaks, Matt. vii. 25, and that the gates of hell, that is, the powers of darkness, shall never prevail against it. Therefore the church of Christ could never cease to be holy in her doctrine, could never fall into idolatry, superstition, or any heretical errors whatsoever.

["(2.) Because Christ, who is 'the way, the truth, and the life,' (John xiv. 6,) has promised, to the Pastors and Teachers of the church, to 'be with them always, even unto the end of the world.' (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.) Therefore they could never go astray by pernicious errors; for how could they go out of the right way of truth and life, who are assured to have always in their company, for their guide, Him who is 'the way, the truth, and the life?'

["(3.) Because our Lord has promised to the same Teachers, 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you FOR EVER, even the SPIRIT OF TRUTH;' (John xiv. 16, 17;) and, verse 26, he assures them that this Spirit of truth shall teach them ALL THINGS; and, chap. xvi. 13, that he shall guide them INTO ALL TRUTH. How, then, could it be possible that the whole body of these Pastors and Teachers of the church, who, by virtue of these promises, were to be for ever guided into all truth by the Spirit of truth, should at any time fall from the truth by errors in faith?

["(4.) Because God has made a solemn covenant, that, after the coming of our Redeemer, his Spirit and his words, that is, the whole doctrine which this Redeemer was to teach, should be for ever maintained by his church through all generations. 'The Redeemer shall come to Zion, &c. This is my covenant with them, saith the Lord: My Spirit which is upon thee, and my words which I have put into thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever.' (Isai. lix. 20, 21.)

["(5.) Because the church of Christ is represented as 'a highway, a way of holiness,' a way so plain, and so secure, that even 'fools should not err therein.' (Isai. xxxv. 8.) How, then, could it ever be possible that the church herself should err?

["(6.) Because pernicious errors in faith and morals must needs be such as to provoke God's indignation. Now, God Almighty has promised to his church, 'As I have sworn that the waters of Noah shall no more go over the earth; so have I sworn that I would not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee.' (Isai. liv. 9, 10.) So that, as we are assured that there shall not be a second flood; so we are that the church of Christ shall never draw upon herself the wrath of God by teaching errors contrary to faith.

["In fine: the church is called by St. Paul, 'the pillar and ground of truth;' (1 Tim. iii. 15;) therefore she cannot uphold pernicious errors. From all which it is manifest, that the church of Christ is infallible in all matters relating to faith; so that she can neither add to nor retrench from what Christ taught." *]

Dens defines sanctity thus: "It imports that not only Christ, the Head and Author of the church, is holy, but also the holiness of men in the church, holiness of doctrines, sacraments, sacrifice, laws, &c., confirmed by miracles; which is nowhere to be found but in the Church of Rome." He also maintains, that the greater number of Romanists are truly holy persons.†

We readily agree that the doctrines of the catholic church, properly so called, are holy: but what has this to do with those of the Church of Rome, which have varied so much from the purity of the apostolical and primitive church? The following list of errors, sins, and paradoxes, shows that purity of doctrines and moral precepts is much contaminated; whilst the lives of the Clergy and laity furnish but very slight manifestations of that holiness which the Scriptures approve, teach, and enforce.

2. We have already exposed many errors of the Romish Church; from which it will appear that she has corrupted the faith of the ancient catholic church of Christ. Almost every article of the Apostles' Creed has been vitiated by the additions or perversions of the Papal hierarchy.

The first article, "I believe in God," is trampled upon when the Church of Rome declares, that "faith is to be placed in the saints;" ‡ when she says, that "the mystery of the Trinity cannot be proved but by human traditions;" when she represents the Trinity in the form of an old man, having three faces, &c.

[* Notes of the Church as laid down by Cardinal Bellarmine Examined and Confuted, pp. 176, 178. 4to. London, 1687.

[* The Grounds of the Catholic Doctrine, as contained in the Profession of Faith published by Pope Pius IV. By the Ven. and R. R. Richard Challoner, D.D., Bishop of Debra, and Vic. Apost. pp. 11—13. Fifteenth edition. London, 1843.]

[† "Quid importat nota ecclesiæ sanctitas?—R. Non tantum importat Christum caput et auctorem ecclesiæ esse sanctum, sed etiam sanctitatem hominum in ecclesia existentium, sanctitatem doctrinæ, sacramentorum, sacrificii, legum, &c., miraculis confirmatam: quæ sanctitas iterum non nisi in Ecclesia nostra reperitur, quæ semper habuit homines sanctitate conspicuos, quos ipsimet Protestantium antesignani ut sanctos agnoverunt, ut videre est in Historia Variationum illustrissimi Bosuetii, lib. iii., num. 50.

["Object. In ecclesia plures sunt mali quam boni; ergo non recte vocatur sancta.—R. Neg. conseq.: nam ecclesia non dicitur sancta, quasi omnes in ea existentes sancti forent, sed quia omnes vocatione et professione sancti sunt, quia multi in ea sancti sunt, qui sunt potior pars, et extra eam sancti esse non possunt."—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 76. De Nota Ecclesiæ, qua dicitur Sancta.]

‡ Concil. Trid., sess. xxv., de Invocatione.

The mediatorship of Christ is impugned by this Church when she describes the saints as mediators, and joins the merits of human works to those of the Redeemer. The prophetic office of the Son of God is invaded when traditions and Papal decrees are added to the canonical Scriptures. The sacrifice of the mass is also highly derogatory to the sacerdotal office of the Lord Jesus.

It were easy to show, that almost every doctrine of the Gospel has either been depreciated by the glosses and additions of the Papacy; or rendered null and void by their traditions.

3. The morality taught by the Church of Rome is awfully favourable to the commission of sin.

Against the first commandment, secret atheism, idolatry, apostasy from the faith, and heresies reign in that community to an alarming extent.

The second commandment is vitiated by the use of images.

The third is contemned by the abuses of the Divine Name in various exercises and adjurations; in perjuries, both by precept and example; and in transferring the honour which is due to the Deity to a fallible creature.

The fourth is violated by the habitual and systematic profanation of the Sabbath, the multitude of holy days, and other observances, by which the divinely-appointed day of rest and worship is either abrogated or rendered of none effect.

The fifth commandment is encroached upon by the contempt of parents, which is encouraged by children set apart to celibacy or to certain monastic orders, either without, or contrary to, the consent of their natural guardians; contempt of the Magistrate, by exempting Clergy from their jurisdiction, who claim certain religious privileges to the prejudice of the civil authorities; sedition against the Magistrate, by depriving Kings of their territories, absolving subjects, &c.*

The sixth commandment is broken by the persecutions of the Church of Rome, the warlike character of that hierarchy, and the utter disregard of the principles and spirit of peace.

The seventh commandment is transgressed by the encouragement which the Popes have given to houses of public prostitution. The concubinage of the Clergy is known to all, and has not been denied by any.† Marriage contracts have often been violated and dissolved, without Scripture authority.

The eighth commandment is practically disregarded by their encouragement of frauds and thefts.*

The ninth commandment is broken, (1.) By public and notorious falsehoods, such as the grant of Constantine, and the legends of saints. (2.) The introduction of spurious writings in place of the genuine. (3.) The corruption of the ancient records. (4.) Slandering those whom they call heretics, as Luther and others.†

The sin of concupiscence, which is an offence against the tenth commandment, is considered but venial.

4. The state of morals in the Church of Rome proves that sanctity belongs to her in a very partial and limited degree.

Many of her Popes were men of most abandoned lives. Some were magicians; others were noted for sedition, war, and slaughter, for profligacy of manners, for avarice and simony.‡ The Cardinals were distinguished by pride, luxury, avarice, and other crimes.§ The morals of the Bishops, Priests, and other Clergy, were equally depraved.‖ Such is the account as given by Roman

* Gerhardi Loc. Theolog., de Ecclesia, sect. 251.

[† "In Papatu, 1. Permittuntur lupanaria contra expressum Dei mandatum, Deuteron. xxiii. vers. 17; quinimo Pontifex, 'census annuum a meretricibus' exigit, Schleidanus, lib. xii., Comm. Dum Tridenti Concilium celebrabatur, conscripta sunt Romæ viginti quatuor millia scortorum. 2. Clericis potius concubinatum quam conjugium permittunt. Campegius ad Argentinenses Legatus in Comit. Augustanis dixit, 'scire se Episcoporum hunc esse morem, ut accepta pecunia scortationem suis permittant. Quod vero Sacerdotes fiant mariti, multo esse gravius peccatum, quam si plurimas domi meretrices alant.' Quam sceleratam vocem repetunt Eccius, Piggius, Hosius, et Costerus. Claud. Espens. in Com. cap. i., titul. 'Turpissimum est, quod officiales permittunt Clericos cum concubinis meretricibus et pellicibus cohabitare, liberos procreare sinunt, accepto ab iis certo quotannis censu, atque adeo alibi a continentibus, nam habeat, aiunt, si velit.' De eadem injuria graviter conqueritur Cassander in Consult. articul. 23. 'Fatendum est, graviter a posteris peccatum esse, qui cælibatus legem pro tempore utilem, multis in laqueum verterunt; cum juvenes nondum sibi exploratos temere ad ministerium ecclesiasticum admiserunt, et cum illi castitatis onus sibi impar esse sentirent, illi potius impuros quosdam concubitus dissimularunt et quodammodo probarunt, quam ut sincrent humanam constitutionem eorum gratia mutari, qui eam sine offensione divinæ legis observare non poterant. Quare nimis rigida hujus constitutionis exactione abominanda in Ecclesia scandala extitisse videmus,' &c. 3. Laqueis votorum multis datur occasio immunditiæ, mollitiei, et aliorum nefandorum delictorum. Carolstadius in præfat. libri de Cælib. et Monach. Witeberg. anno 21, editi. 'Utinam demissa vox in aurem quædam tibi loqui posset, horreres certe illa, quæ auditores et judices peccatorum, quos nunc confessores vocant, a confitentibus didicerunt et me docuerunt, dedocenda magis quam docenda.'"—Gerhardi Loc. Theolog., De Ecclesia, sect. 251.]

[* "In Papatu, 1. Furta et fraudes excusantur. Maldonatus in sum., q. viii., art. 3. 'Pauperes non faciunt furtum, cum pressi extrema necessitate rem alienam capiunt, quia res tum proprie non est aliena, sed communis vitæ periclitantis; nec necessitas extrema est, quæ jam fere non potest admittere remedium, ut cum pauper exhalat animam, sed cum vix alia ratione potest subveniri.' Molanus, tractat. ii., cap. vii., conclus. i., prop. 6, statuit, 'furtum in re minima non committi.' Toletus, Instruct. Sacerdotal. tract. de Septem Peccat., cap. xlix. 'Is qui justo precio non potest vendere vinum, vel propter iniquitatem judicis, vel propter emptorum malitiam, qui conveniunt inter se, ut pauci emant, ad precium remittendum; tunc possit minuere mensuram aut paululum aquæ miscere ac vendere pro puro et completa mensura justo exigendo precio, dummodo non dicat mendacium: quod si dicat, non erit mortale peccatum.' 2. Pontifex maximam imperii partem ad se rapuit, supremum in omnia regna imperium et jus ab uno ad alium ea transferendi sibi vendicat, Episcopatus et Abbatias eo modo sibi appropriavit, ut pallium investituræ signum administratores eorum magna pecuniæ vi emere cogantur, indulgentias magno ære vendit, et multis modis Simoniam exercet. 3. Clerici Papales in avaritia fictis verbis de populo negotiantur, 2 Petri ii. versu 2, vendendo missas, vigilias, indulgentias, &c., deliciantur et luxuriantur de eleemosynis Ecclesiæ, neque quicquam officio ecclesiastico dignum agunt. Monachi pigri ventres pauperum sudores absumunt. 4. Sacrilegium ἀποτηριοκλεψιας e sacra cœna propugnatur, vigent furta spiritualia. Clerici enim abstulerunt clavem scientiæ, Luc. ii. vers. 52. Laicis consolationem et instructionem ex Scripturæ lectione et meditatione expectandam eripuerunt."—Idem.]

[† "Contra octavum præceptum in Papatu, 1. Publica et notoria mendacia defenduntur. Donatio Constantini merum est figmentum, quod jam olim explosum a Cardinale Cusano, Antonino Archiepiscopo, Ænea Sylvio Pontifice, &c. Legenda sanctorum scatent fabulis ac mendaciis, unde Ludovic. Vives auctorem eorum dicit fuisse 'hominem ferrei oris et plumbei cordis.' Reliquiæ sanctorum maxima ex parte sunt fictæ et commentitiæ; unde Erasmus scribit, 'tantum ligni crucis diversis in locis ostentari, ut vel oneraria navis illius pondus ferre nequeat.' De eadem fraude, quæ in reliquiis committitur, graviter etiam conqueritur Cassander in Consult. Miracula pleraque sunt conficta et constant imposturis. Vide Centurias mendaciorum Papisticorum apud Rauscherum et Flacium contra invectivam Bruni. 2. Scripta supposititia et spuria pro genuinis venditantur, utpote Liturgia Jacobi, Canones Apostolorum, Decretales, Epistolæ Pontificum, libri Dionysii Areopagitæ, Hippolyti, Abdiæ Babilonii, &c. 3. Genuina veterum scripta depravantur, quibusdam additis, quibusdam subtractis, ut constet ex Indicibus Expurgatoriis. Canones Concilii Niceni falsarunt, ut primatum suum stabilirent, uti constat ex actis Concilii Carthaginensis. 4. Convitia et calumniæ mendacissimæ in Evangelii Confessores projiciuntur. Luth. in præfat. art. Schmalc."—Idem.]

‡ Idem, sect. 263.

§ Idem, sect. 264.

‖ Idem, sect. 265.

Catholic historians, and not the representations of Protestants merely.

["But the Roman hierarchs of the middle and succeeding ages," says Edgar, "exhibited a melancholy change. Their lives displayed all the variations of impiety, malevolence, inhumanity, ambition, debauchery, gluttony, sensuality, deism, and atheism. Gregory the Great seems to have led the way in the career of villany. This celebrated Pontiff has been characterized as worse than his predecessors, and better than his successors, or, in other terms, as the last good and the first bad Pope. The flood-gates of moral pollution appear, in the tenth century, to have been set wide open, and inundations of all impurity poured on the Christian world through the channel of the Roman hierarchy. Awful and melancholy indeed is the picture of the Popedom at this era, drawn, as it has been, by its warmest friends; such as Platina, Petavius, Luitprand, Genebrard, Baronius, Hermann, Barclay, Binius, Giannone, Vignier, Labbe, and Du Pin. Platina calls these Pontiffs 'monsters.' 'Fifty Popes,' says Genebrard, 'in one hundred and fifty years, from John VIII. till Leo IX., entirely degenerated from the sanctity of their ancestors, and were apostatical rather than apostolical.'* Thirty Pontiffs reigned in the tenth century; and the successor, in each instance, seemed demoralized even beyond his predecessor. Baronius, in his Annals of the Tenth Century, seems to labour for language to express the base degeneracy of the Popes, and the frightful deformity of the Popedom. Many shocking monsters, says the annalist, intruded into the pontifical chair, who were guilty of robbery, assassination, simony, dissipation, tyranny, sacrilege, perjury, and all kinds of miscreancy. Candidates, destitute of every requisite qualification, were promoted to the Papal chair; while all the canons and traditions of antiquity were contemned and outraged. The Church, says Giannone, was then in a shocking disorder, in a chaos of iniquity. Some, says Barclay, crept into the Popedom; while others broke in by violence, and defiled the holy chair with the filthiest immorality.†

["The electors and the elected, during this period, appear, as might be expected, to have been kindred spirits. The electors were neither the Clergy nor people, but two courtezans, Theodora and Marozia, mother and daughter, women distinguished by their beauty, and at the same time, though of senatorial family, notorious for their prostitution. These polluted patrons of licentiousness, according to their pleasure, passion, whim, or caprice, elected Popes, collated Bishops, disposed of diocesses, and indeed assumed, in a great measure, the whole administration of the Church. The Roman See, become the prey of avarice and ambition, was given to the highest bidder.‡

["These vile harlots, according to folly or fancy, obtruded their filthy gallants or spurious offspring on the pontifical throne. Theodora, having conceived a violent but base passion for John X., raised her gallant to the Papacy. The Pontiff, like his patron, was an example of sensuality; and was afterwards, in 924, at the instigation of Marozia, deposed, and, in all probability, strangled by Wido, Marquis of Tuscany. Marozia was mistress to Sergius III., who treated the dead body of Formosus with such indignity. She brought her pontifical paramour a son; and this hopeful scion of illegitimacy and the Popedom was, by his precious mother, promoted to the vicegerency of heaven. His conduct was worthy of his genealogy. He was thrown, however, into prison by Alberic, Marozia's son by Adelbert, where he died of grief, or, some say, by assassination.* The person who can believe in the validity of such elections, and the authority of such Pontiffs, must possess an extraordinary supply of faith, or rather of credulity.

["A person, desirous of painting scenes of atrocity and filth, might, in the history of the Popedom, find ample materials of gratification. A mass of moral impurity might be collected from the Roman hierarchy, sufficient to crowd the pages of folios, and glut all the demons of pollution and malevolence. But delineations of this kind afford no pleasing task. The facts, therefore, on this topic shall be supplied with a sparing hand. A few specimens, however, are necessary, and shall be selected from the biography of John, Boniface, Gregory, Sixtus, Alexander, Julius, and Leo.

["John XII. ascended the Papal throne in 955, in the eighteenth year of his age. His youthful days were characterized by barbarity and pollution. He surpassed all his predecessors, says Platina, in debauchery. His Holiness, in a Roman Synod before Otho the Great, was found guilty of blasphemy, perjury, profanation, impiety, simony, sacrilege, adultery, incest, constupration, and murder. He swore allegiance to Otho, and afterwards revolted to his enemy. Ordination, which he often bartered for money, he conferred on a Deacon in a stable, and on a boy ten years old, by constituting him a Bishop. He killed John, a Sub-Deacon, by emasculation; Benedict, by putting out his eyes; and, in the wantonness of cruelty, amputated the nose of one Cardinal, and the hand of another. He drank a health to the devil, invoked Jupiter and Venus, lived in public adultery with the Roman matrons, and committed incest with Stephania, his father's concubine. The Lateran palace, formerly the habitation of purity, he converted into a sink of infamy and prostitution. Fear of violation from Peter's successor deterred female pilgrims, maids, matrons, and widows, from visiting Peter's tomb. His Infallibility, when summoned to attend the Synod to answer for these charges, refused; but excommunicated the Council in the name of Almighty God. The Clergy and laity, however, declared his guilt, and prayed, if the accusations were unfounded, that they might be accursed and placed on the left hand at the day of judgment. The pontifical villain was deposed by the Roman Council. But he afterward regained the Holy See; and, being caught in adultery, was killed, says Luitprand, by the devil, or, more probably, by the injured husband. 'John,' says Bellarmine, 'was nearly the wickedest of the Popes.'†

["* 'Per annos fere 150, Pontifices circiter quinquaginta a Ioanne scilicet VIII., usque ad Leonem IX., virtute majorum prorsus defecerint, apostatici potius quam apostolici.'—Geneb., iv.; Platina, 128; Du Pin, ii., 156; Bruy., ii., 208.

["† 'Plurima horrenda in eam monstra intruserunt.'—Spon., 900, I., et 908, III.

["'L'église etoit plongée dans un chaos d'impiétés.'—An. Eccl., 344; Giannon., vii., 5.

["'Sanctissimam cathedram moribus inquinatissimis fœdavisse.'—Barclay, 36, c. 4.

["'On ne voyoit alors les Papes, mais des monstres.'—An. Eccl., 345; Giannon., vii., 5.

["‡ 'Le siége de Rome étoit donné au plus offrant.'—Idem.

["* 'L'infame Theodora fit élire pour Pape le plus declaré de ses amans, qui fut appellé Jean X. Baronius écrit, qu'alors Rome étoit sans Pape.'—An. Eccl., 345; Giannon., vii., 5.

["† 'Ordinationes Episcoporum faceret pretio. Benedictum lumine privasse, et mox mortuum esse. Joannem virilibus amputatis occidisse.'

["'Viduam Rœnarii et Stephanum patris concubinam et Annam

Some of the Vice-gods, therefore, the Cardinal suggests, surpassed His Holiness in miscreancy.

["Boniface VII., who seized the Papal chair in 974, murdered his predecessor and successor. Historians represent him as the basest and wickedest of mankind. Baronius calls him a thief, a miscreant, and a murderer, who is to be reckoned, not among the Roman Pontiffs, but among the notorious robbers of the age. Gerbert and Vignier characterize this Vice-god as a monster, who surpassed all mankind in crime.* Prompted by Boniface, Crescentius strangled Benedict VI., Boniface's predecessor, and placed him on the Papal chair. But the Roman citizens, provoked with the Pontiff's atrocity, deposed him from his dignity, and expelled him from the city. The exiled Pontiff, however, was not, it appears, ambitious of travelling in the train of poverty. The treasury of the Vatican was rifled by this apostolical robber, and its sacred ornaments and vessels conveyed by his holy hands to Constantinople. Benedict VII. was, by universal suffrage, substituted in his stead. He held the Papacy nine years, in opposition to Boniface, and was succeeded by John XIV. Boniface, in the mean time, having sold the spoils of the Vatican, and amassed a vast sum of money, returned to Rome. This treasure he expended in the bribery of his partisans, who, by main violence, replaced the ruffian, in 985, on the pontifical throne. John, who had succeeded during his absence, he imprisoned in the castle of Angelo, where, in four months after, he died of starvation and misery. But even the death of his rival could not satiate the vengeance of Boniface. John's cold, pale, stiffened, emaciated corpse was placed at the door of the castle, and there, in all its ghastly and haggard frightfulness, exposed to the public gaze. But the murderer did not long survive this insult on the dead. He died suddenly, and his naked carcass, mangled and lacerated by his former partisans, to whom he had become odious, was, with the utmost indignity, dragged through the streets.

["Gregory VII., who obtained the Papacy in 1073, was another pontifical patron of iniquity. He was elected on the day of his predecessor's funeral, by the populace and soldiery, through force and bribery, without the concurrence of the Emperor or the Clergy. Desiderius, Abbot of Monte Cassino, on this head, accused Hildebrand to his face of precipitation. He obtained the supremacy, in the general opinion, by gross simony. He had the hypocrisy or hardihood, nevertheless, to pretend that the dignity was obtruded on him against his will.

["The Council of Brescia in 1078 portrayed His Supremacy with freedom. This assembly, composed of thirty Bishops, and many Princes from Italy, France, and Germany, called Gregory a fornicator, an impostor, an assassin, a violater of the canons, a disseminator of discord, a disturber of the Christian commonwealth, and a pestilential patron of all madness, who had sown scandal among friends, dissension among the peaceful, and separation among the married. The Brescian Fathers then declared His Holiness guilty of bribery, usurpation, simony, sacrilege, ferocity, vain-glory, ambition, impiety, obstinacy, perverseness, sorcery, divination, necromancy, schism, heresy, Berengarianism, infidelity, assassination, and perjury. The sacred Synod having, in this manner, done justice to his character, deposed Gregory from his dignity.

["Sixtus IV., who was elected in 1471, walked in the footsteps of his predecessors, Gregory, Boniface, and John. This Pontiff has, with reason, been accused of murder and debauchery. He conspired for the assassination of Julian and Laurentius, two of the Medicean family. He engaged Pazzi, who was chief of the faction, which, in Florence, was hostile to the Medici, in the stratagem. Pazzi was supported in the diabolical attempt by Riario, Montesecco, Salvian, and Poggio. The conspirators, who were many, attacked Julian and Laurentius during mass on Sunday. Julian was killed. Laurentius fled wounded to the vestry, where he was saved from the fury of the assassins. The Medicean faction, in the mean time, mustered and assailed the conspirators, on whom they took an ample and summary vengeance.

["Sixtus patronized debauchery as well as murder. His Holiness, for this worthy purpose, established brothels extraordinary in Rome. His Infallibility, in consequence, became head, not only of the Church, but also of the stews. He presided with ability and applause in two important departments, and was the Vicar-General of God and of Venus. These seminaries of pollution, it seems, brought a great accession to the ecclesiastical revenue. The goddesses who were worshipped in these temples paid a weekly tax from the wages of iniquity to the Viceroy of heaven. The sacred treasury, by this means, received from this shameful tribute an annual augmentation of twenty thousand ducats. His Supremacy himself was, it seems, a regular and steady customer in his new commercial establishments. He nightly worshipped, with great zeal and devotion, in these pontifical fanes, which he had erected to the Cytherean goddess. Part of the tribute, therefore, from these schools of the Grecian divinity, His Holiness expended on the premises.

["Alexander VI., in the common opinion, surpassed all his predecessors in atrocity. This monster, whom humanity disowns, seems to have excelled all his rivals in the arena of villany, and outstripped every competitor on the stadium of wickedness. Sannazarius compared Alexander to Nero, Caligula, and Heliogabalus; and Pope, in his celebrated Essay on Man, likened Borgia, which was the family name, to Catiline. This Pontiff, according to contemporary historians, was actuated, to measureless excess, with vanity, ambition, cruelty, covetousness, rapacity, and sensuality, and void of all faith, honour, sincerity, truth, fidelity, decency, religion, shame, modesty, and compunction. 'His debauchery, perfidy, ambition, malice, inhumanity, and irreligion,' says Daniel, 'made him the execration of all Europe.' Rome, under his administration, and by his example, became the sink of filthiness, the head-quarters of atrocity, and the hot-bed of prostitution, murder, and robbery.*

["Depravity lurked under many specious displays; and broke out in secret, in sensuality and incest. He formed an illicit connexion with a widow who resided at Rome, and with her two daughters. His passions, irre-

viduam cum nepte sua abusum esse: et sanctum palatium lupanar et prostibulum fecisse.'—Labb., xi., 881.

["'A diabolo est percussus.'—Idem, ii., 873; Platina, 132; Bellarmine, ii., 20.

["* 'Sacrilegus prædo sedem apostolicam invasit Bonifacius, annumerandus inter famosos latrones.'—Spon., 974, I., et 985; Bruy., ii., 265, 271.

["'Boniface, monstre horrible, surmontant tous les humains en mechancetés.'—Vignier, ii., 608.

["* 'Sannazarius illum cum Caligulis confert, cum Neronibus, et Heliogabalis.'—Sann., ii.; Montfaucon, Monum., iv., 85.

["'Les débordemens publics, les perfidies, l'ambition démesurée, l'avarice insatiable, la cruauté, l'irréligion en avoient fait l'objet de l'exécration de toute l'Europe.'—Daniel, vii., 84.

gular and brutal, could find gratification only in enormity. His licentiousness, after the widow's death, drove him to the incestuous enjoyment of her daughter, the notorious and infamous Vannoza. She became his mistress, after her mother's decease. His Holiness, in the pursuit of variety, and the perpetration of atrocity, afterward formed a criminal connexion with his own daughter, the witty, the learned, the gay, and the abandoned, Lucretia. She was mistress to her own father and brother. Pontanus, in consequence, represented Lucretia as Alexander's daughter, wife, and daughter-in-law.* Peter's palace, in this manner, became a scene of debauchery and abomination.

["Simony and assassination were as prominent in Alexander's character as incest and debauchery. He purchased the Papacy, and afterward, for remuneration, and to glut his rapacity, he sold its offices and preferments. He first bought, it has been said, and then sold, the keys, the altar, and the Saviour. He murdered the majority of the Cardinals who raised him to the popedom, and seized their estates. He had a family of spurious sons and daughters; and for the aggrandizement of these children of illegitimacy, he exposed to sale all things sacred and profane, and violated and outraged all the laws of God and man.

["His death was the consequence of an attempt to poison the rich Cardinals for the sake of their possessions. Alexander and Borgia, father and son, actuated with this design, invited the Sacred College to a sumptuous banquet, near the fountain in the delightful garden of Belvidera. Poisoned wine was prepared for the unsuspecting guests. But the fatal cup was, by mistake, handed to the father and son, who drank without knowing their danger. Borgia's constitution, for a time, overcame the virulence of the poison. But Alexander soon died by the stratagem he had prepared for the murder of his friends.

["Julius II. succeeded Alexander in the Papacy and in iniquity. His Holiness was guilty of simony, chicanery, perjury, thievery, empoisonment, assassination, drunkenness, impudicity, and sodomy. He bribed the Cardinals to raise him to the popedom; and employed, on the occasion, all kinds of falsehood and trickery. He swore to convoke a General Council, and violated his oath.

["His Infallibility's drunkenness was proverbial. He was 'mighty to drink wine.' He practised incontinency as well as inebriation; and the effects of this crime shattered his constitution. One of his historians represents His Holiness as all corroded with the disease which, in the judgment of God, often attends this kind of pollution. The atrocity for which Sodom was consumed with fire from heaven is also reckoned among his deeds of pollution and excess.†

["His ingratitude and enmity to the French nation formed one dark feature in his character. The French King protected him against Alexander, who sought his ruin. The French nation was his asylum in the time of danger, and in the day of distress. This friendship he afterwards repaid with detestation, because Lewis patronized the convocation of a General Council. Julius offered rewards to any person who would kill a Frenchman. One of these rewards was of an extraordinary, or rather among the Popes of an ordinary, kind. He granted a pardon of all sins to any person, who would murder only an individual of the French nation. The Vicegerent of heaven conferred the forgiveness of all sin, as a compensation for perpetrating the shocking crime of assassination.

["Leo X., in 1513, succeeded Julius in the popedom and in enormity. This Pontiff has been accused of atheism, and of calling the Gospel, in the presence of Cardinal Bembo, a fable. Mirandula, who mentions a Pope that denied God, is, by some, supposed to have referred to Leo. His Holiness, says Jovius, was reckoned guilty of sodomy with his Chamberlains. These reports, however, are uncertain. But Leo, beyond all question, was addicted to pleasure, luxury, idleness, ambition, unchastity, and sensuality; and spent whole days in the company of musicians and buffoons."*] †

The Monks receded not only from the rule of Christ's word, but also from those of their respective fraternities, as Roman Catholic authors testify.‡

["When the light of the Reformation exhibited the atrocities of the Romish Church, and her late votaries protested against them throughout all Europe, the Pope (Paul III.) sought to recruit the number of his followers among the Pagans; and for this purpose gave every encouragement to an ignorant fanatical Spanish soldier, of the name of Inigo de Guipuscoa, more generally known as Ignatius Loyola, who, A.D. 1540, founded a society, impiously distinguished as the 'Order of Jesus.' This man, ignorant as he was, was of an enterprising and fer-["* 'Alexandri filia, nupta, nurus.'—Pontanus in Bruy., iv., 280.

["† 'Tout rongé de vérole.'—Bruy., iv., 371; Zuing., 140.

["'Duobus nobilissimi generis adolescentibus stuprum intulerit.'—Wolf., ii., 21.

["* 'Non caruit etiam infamia, quod parum honeste nonnullos e cubiculariis adamare.'—Jov., 192; Bruy., iv., 417; Guiccia., xiv."]

[† Edgar's Variations of Popery, pp. 81—85, 89—92.]

["‡ Monachos ac Moniales ab ordinum suorum regulis, maxime vero a pietatis regula a Christo præscripta, longissime recessisse ipsimet Pontificii conqueruntur. Johan. Gerson., in tract. Declaratio Defect. Ecclesiæ scribit: 'Claustra Monialium esse prostibula meretricum.' In libro cui titulus, 'Onus Ecclesiæ,' sic legitur: 'Sunt nonnulla Monialium monasteria adeo propatula, ut ipsa loca Veneris prostibulo sint similiora, quam Dei sacrario; hinc procacitas, stuprum, incestus mulierum sacrarum, hinc quoque verenda scandala et offendicula oriuntur quanplurima.' Petrus de Aliaco, in lib. de reform. Ecclesiæ, 'Monachi suis immunditiis Ecclesiam commaculârunt.' Brigitta, in revel., fratres istos, 'gentem pomposam, vanam, superbam' vocat. Erasmus, in Enchir. Mil. Christ., p. 31: 'Videmus passim monasteria ad mores plusquam profanos degenerasse. Olim secessus erat vita Monachorum; nunc illi vocantur Monachi, qui toti in meditullio mundanorum negotiorum versantur, plane tyrranidem quandam in rebus humanis exercentes. Et tamen ii ob cultum, ob titulum, nescio quem tantum arrogant sanctimoniæ sibi, ut ceteros præ se non habeant pro Christianis.' Idem, in Meth. Theol., p. 189. 'Non aliter sunt extra mundum, quam renes extra corpus animantis.' P. 139. 'Ipsis mundi visceribus immixti Monachos se vocant et regium luxum affectantes mendicitatem prætexunt.' De hoc Monachorum luxu extat proverbium Friderici Imperatoris: 'Vise monasterium, si vis cognoscere luxum.' Hermannus in Chronico, quod inscribitur, 'Flores Temporum de Cœnobio Erestheim,' sic scribit: 'Proh dolor! tanta moderno tempore in eodem Cœnobio facta est mutatio non dextræ Excelsi, sed potius sinistræ Diaboli maledicti, in tantum quod potius dici possit prostibulum lascivæ carnalis quam monasterium continentiæ regularis.' Idem: 'Falluntur nostræ ætatis militares et ordinis equestris viri, existimantes cœnobia esse filiorum suorum xenodochia, &c., taceo de collegiis pro fœmineo sexu institutis. Utinam sexus ille Deo dicatus, qui de Christi patrimonio delicate pascitur, seipsum non aliquando de stupro et adulterio prolisque partu suspectum redderet atque infamem. Utinam non herbis, non quarundam incisione venarum, non luridis potionibus, non lotionibus pedum exquisitis vel abortum procuraret vel fœtum præfocaret,' &c. Joh. Keisersberg. Argent. Concionator propter corruptissimum Monastices statum animo in Monaches erat valde infenso, ideo eos qui 'nigræ camisiæ ordinem assumserant,' appellabat 'diabolos;' qui vero 'album induerant cucullum,' hos 'diaboli matrem' esse dicebat; qui 'medii coloris erant et cinericia toga incedebant, istos progeniem illorum superiorum ac sobolem esse dicebat.'"—Gerhardi Loci Theo., sect. 266, pp 1205, 1206. Jenæ, 1617.]

tile genius, and had sufficient prudence to listen to the advice of others who were wiser than himself in establishing his Order after he had arrived in Rome. This soldier-saint, (the ghostly honour was manufactured for him by Urban VIII., A. D. 1623,) when he first sought the confirmation of his Order from Pope Paul, was opposed by Cardinal Guidiccioni; but Loyola, by 'a solemn vow of unlimited submission and obedience to the Roman Pontiff,' carried his point, such an Order being exactly what was required by the fallen interests of the Papal Church. Hence the zeal of the Jesuits in supporting the power of the Church of Rome, and hence the zeal of the 'Church' in screening or vindicating Jesuitical enormities. 'The professed members are men of prudence and learning, deeply skilled in the affairs of the world, and dexterous in transacting all kinds of business, from long experience, added to their natural penetration and sagacity. In a word, they are the true and perfect Jesuits.' The above account of these designing men is taken from Drs. Mosheim and Maclaine. The following is from a sermon preached by Bishop Brown, in Christ's Church, Dublin, A. D. 1551.* By some learned men it is spoken of as a prophecy. 'But there is a new fraternity of late sprung up, who call themselves Jesuits, which will deceive many, who are much after the Scribes' and Pharisees' manner amongst the Jews. They shall strive to abolish the truth, and shall come very near to do it. For these sorts will turn themselves into several forms: with the Heathen a Heathenist, with the atheists an atheist, with the Jews a Jew, with the Reformers a Reformade, purposely to know your intentions, your minds, your hearts, and your inclinations, and thereby bring you at last to be like the fool that said in his heart, There is no God. These shall spread over the whole world, shall be admitted into the councils of Princes, and they never the wiser; charming of them, yea, making your Princes reveal their hearts and the secrets therein, and yet they not perceive it; which will happen from falling from the law of God, by neglect of fulfilling the law of God, and by winking at their sins; yet, in the end, God, to justify his law, shall suddenly cut off this Society, even by the hands of those who have most succoured them and made use of them; so that, at the end, they shall become odious to all nations. They shall be worse than Jews, having no resting-place upon earth; and then shall a Jew have more favour than a Jesuit!' By the suppression of this Order in France, in the year 1764, and, notwithstanding their efforts, again suppressed in that kingdom in 1828, and by the detestation in which they are held by the rest of mankind generally, the above faithful summary of their character may be said almost to amount to a prediction." †]

The Jesuits' morality may be seen from their own Catechism by a Romanist, from the celebrated Provincial Letters of Blaise Pascal, and from their writings. ‡

[A few examples only can be given. On the subject of blasphemy, Casnedi says, "Do what your conscience tells you to be good and commanded: if through invincible error you believe lying or blasphemy to be commanded by God,—blaspheme." § "There is an implied law, which is this: 'Obey an invincibly erroneous dictate of conscience. As often as you believe invincibly that a lie is commanded,—lie." * With regard to homicide, Henriquez declares, that "if an adulterer, even although he should be an Ecclesiastic, reflecting upon the danger has entered the house of an adulteress, and being attacked by her husband, kills his aggressor in the necessary defence of his life or limbs, he is not considered irregular." † "If you are preparing," says Valerius Reginald, "to give false evidence against me, by which I should receive sentence of death, and I have no other means of escape, it is lawful for me to kill you, since I should otherwise be killed myself: for it would be immaterial in such a case whether you killed me with your own or by another man's sword; as for instance, by that of the executioner." ‡ Stephen Fagundez asserts, that "if a Judge had been unjust, and had proceeded (in trial) without adhering to the course of the law, then certainly the accused might defend himself by assaulting and even by killing the Judge; because in that case he cannot be called a Judge, but an unjust aggressor and a tyrant." § Airault proposes the following question:—"If you endeavour to ruin my reputation, by false impeachment before a Prince, a Judge, or men of distinguished rank, and I cannot by any means avert this injury of character, unless I kill you secretly; may I lawfully do it?" The following solution is subjoined:—"Bannez asserts that I may.....The right of defence extends itself to every thing which is necessary for insuring protection from every injury. Still the calumniator should first be warned that he desist from his slander; and if he will not, he should be killed, not openly, on account of the scandal, but secretly." ‖ George Gobat, in his work on Morals, (!) observes, "Father Fagundez thus expresses himself: 'It is lawful for a son to rejoice at the murder of his parent, committed by himself in a state of drunkenness, on account of the great riches thence acquired by inheritance.'" ¶ "He deduces this doctrine," says Gobat, "from a principle which is true, and of which many are persuaded, namely, that when any benefit results to us from an action which is in itself forbidden, but rendered blameless through a deficiency of deliberation, we may lawfully rejoice at it, not only for the benefit which is in itself clear, but also for the forbidden action; not indeed

["* See Harleian Miscellany, referred to by Dr. Maclaine, vol. v., p. 566."]

[† Christianity, Protestantism, and Popery, compared and contrasted, p. 9, note. London, 1829.]

‡ See also Gerhardi Loci Theo., sect. 267, p. 1207.

[§ "Fac quod conscientia dictat esse bonum et præceptum: si putas mendacium, aut blasphemiam, ex invincibili errore, esse a Deo præceptam, blasphema."—Crisis Theologica, tom. i., disput. vi., sect. ii., § i., n. 59. Ulyssip., 1711.

[* "Lex.....reflexa vere existens in Deo est hæc: Obedi dictamini invincibiliter erroneo. Quoties invincibiliter putas mendacium esse præceptum, mentire."—Idem, § ii., n. 78.

[† "Si adulter, etiam Clericus, advertens periculum, intravit domum adulteræ, et invasus a marito illius, occidat invasorem pro necessaria vitæ aut membrorum defensione: non videtur irregularis."—Henriquez, Summæ Theolog. Moral., tom. i., lib. xiv., De Irregularitate, cap. x., sect. iii. Venet., 1600. (Ed. Coll. Sion.)

[‡ Reginald. Praxis Fori Pœnitentialis, tom. ii., lib. xxi., cap. v., n. 57. Lugd., 1620.

[§ "Si Judex iniquus esset, et processisset juris ordine non servato, tunc omnino posset reus se defendere, cum Judicis etiam læsione, imo et occisione, quia.....nec tunc Judex dici potest, sed injustus invasor et tyrannus."—Fagundez, in Præcepta Decalogi, tom. ii., lib. viii., cap. xxxii., n. 5. Lugd., 1640. (Ed. Coll. Sion.)

[‖ "Jus defensionis extendit se ad omne id quod necessarium est, ut se quis ab omni injuria servet immunem. Monendus tamen prius esset detractor, ut desisteret; ET SI NOLLET, RATIONE SCANDALI NON ESSET APERTE OCCIDENDUS, SED CLAM."—Propositions dictées au Collége de Clermont à Paris, par N. Airault, de la Société de ceux qui se disent Jésuites. Collation fait à la requête de l'Université de Paris, 1643, 1644 cens., pp. 319, 320. Paris, 1720.

[¶ "Pater Fagundez (in Decal., lib. ix.) sic loquitur: Licitum est filio gaudere de parricidio parentis a se in ebrietate perpetrato, propter ingentes divitias inde ex hæreditate consecutas."—Oper. Moralium, tom. ii., pars ii., tract. v., cap. ix., sect. viii., n. 54. Duaci, 1700.

because it is forbidden, but inasmuch as it is the cause or occasion of a happy event."*

["Since, then," he proceeds, "it is supposed on the one hand that the parricide was blameless, as well from deficiency of deliberation caused by drunkenness, as through the absence of premeditation; and, on the other, that very great riches would result from this parricide, an effect which is either good, or certainly not bad; it follows that the doctrine of Father Fagundez, which may seem a paradox, is true in theory, although it may be dangerous in practice."†

["He would be mistaken," he proceeds, "who should infer from what has been said, that for the sake of such results it would be lawful to desire voluntary drunkenness, or to rejoice in it. He would more rightly infer, that it is sometimes lawful to desire a blameless drunkenness, by which the great benefit would be produced. See Caramuel in Theologia Regulari."‡

[The gross and unblushing licentiousness which characterizes the writings of the Jesuit Canonists has been the bane of Christendom, and has ministered to that obscenity, which stigmatizes with infamy the writings of Peter Dens, and other theological authorities of the Church of Rome. From such abomination our pages must be kept free; but containing as they profess a "Delineation of Romanism," we shall mention the writers to whom we refer, in justification of our assertion: Emmanuel Sa,§ Cornelius a Lapide,‖ Gaspar Hurtado,¶ James Gordon, John De Dicastille,†† Anthony Escobar,‡‡ Simon de Lessau,§§ Thomas Tamburin,‖‖ James Tirinus,¶¶ N. Charli, John Baptist Taberna,††† Thomas Sanchez,* Francis Xavier Fegeli,† Busembaum et Lacroix,‡ Trachala,§ Peter Dens,‖ the Maynooth Class-Book,¶ cum multis aliis.

[What will our readers think of the following choice specimens of Jesuit morality from the writings of Francis Tolet and Valerius Reginald, on the subject of theft and compensation? The former observes: "A man cannot sell his wine at a fair price, either on account of the injustice of the Judge, or through fraud of the purchasers, who have agreed among themselves to be few in number in order to lower the price: then he may diminish his measure, or mix a little water with his wine, and sell it for pure wine of full measure, demanding the full price, provided only that he does not tell a lie; which if he does, it will neither be a dangerous nor a mortal sin, neither will it oblige him to make restitution."

[Reginald declares, that "servants may not take the property of their masters secretly and by way of compensation, in pretence that their wages are not equitable, unless it should in reality appear to be the case in the opinion of an experienced man."††

[Again: "Servants are excused both from sin and restitution, if they only take in equitable compensation; that is, when they are not furnished with such things necessary for food and clothing as are usual in other houses, and which ought to be provided for similar servants, they may take so much of their master's property as will compensate for such an injustice, and no more. Among the conditions of a lawful compensation this is the chief, that the debt cannot be obtained by any other means."‡‡

[On the subject of high treason and regicide, the Canonists of the Society of Jesus promulgate sentiments utterly destructive to the well-being of all civil society, and which, a few years ago, led to the banishment of the fraternity from several of the nations on the Continent, both by regal and pontifical authority. §§ Emmanuel Sa

[* Gobat. Oper. Moralium tom. ii., pars ii., tract. v., cap. ix., sect. viii., n. 54. Duaci, 1700.

[† "Cum igitur ex una parte supponatur, illud parricidium fuisse inculpabile, ob defectum tam deliberationis impeditæ per ebrietatem, quam prævisionis non antegressæ; ex altera autem parte, amplæ opes sint hujus parricidii effectus vel bonus, vel certe non malus; fit ut illa P. Fagundez doctrina, quæ paradoxa videri possit, veritatem habeat speculativam, etsi practice periculosam."—Idem, n. 55.

[‡ "Erraret is, qui ex dictis inferret, fas esse ob istos eventus, optare ebrietatem voluntariam, vel de illa gaudere. Rectius inferret, licere optare quandoque inculpatam ebrietatem, ex qua orietur grande bonum. Vide Caramuelem, in Theologia Regulari."—Idem, n. 57.

[§ Aphorismi Confessariorum. Verbis Luxuria, n. 16, et Debitum Conjugale, n. 6. Colon., 1615. (Ed. Coll. Sion.)

[‖ Comment. in Daniel. Prophetam, cap. xiii., v. 22, 23. Antwerp, 1625. (Ed. Coll. Sion.)

[¶ De Sacramentis et Censuris, disp. x., De Matrimonio, diff. iii., n. 8. Antwerp, 1633.

[ Theologia Moralis Universa, tom. i., lib. v., quæst. v., cap. vi., n. 3. Paris, 1634. (Ed. Bibl. Acad. Cant.)

[†† De Justitia et Jure cæterisque Virtutibus cardinalibus, lib. i., disp. iii., dub. 17, de Temperantia, n. 276, 277, 279. Antverpiæ, 1641.

[‡‡ Universæ Theologicæ Moralis receptiores absque lite Sententiæ, necnon problematicæ Disquisitiones, tom. i., lib. iv., sect. ii., probl. xxviii., n. 238, et seq.; tom. iv., lib. xxxiii., sect. iii. De Prescrip. vi. et ix., probl. xxxix., n. 222, et seq.; probl. xl., n. 225; probl. xli., n. 227, 228; probl. xliv., n. 237; probl. li., n. 258, 259. Lugduni, 1652. (Ed. Bibl. Acad. Cant.)

[§§ Propositions dictées dans le Collége des Jésuites d'Amiens, par Simon de Lessau. 1605, 1606.

[‖‖ Theologia Moralis, Explicatio Decal., lib. vii., cap. v., sect. iii., n. 23—25. Lugduni, 1659.

[¶¶ In S. Scripturam Commentarius, in Danielem, cap. xiii., 22. Antverpiæ, 1668. (Dilingæ Francof., 1704. Ed. Coll. Sion.)

[ Propositions dictées au Collége de Rhodes, par N. Charli, Jésuite, Professeur de Théologie, rapportées dans l'Ordonnance de l'Evêque Comte de Rhodes, du 19 Octobre, 1722, et censurées par la dite Ordonnance, après le refus du dit Charli d'en faire une rétractation claire, nette, et précise. Prop. xii., Cens. Episc., p. 11. 1722.

[††† Synopsis Theologiæ Practicæ, tom. i., pars i., tract. i., cap. iii., sect. i. Coloniæ, 1736.

[* De Sancto Matrimonii Sacramento Disputationum posterior editio, tom. i., lib. ii., disp. xxi., quæst. ii., n. 10, 11; tom. iii., lib. ix., disp. xvii., n. 1—4, 8. Lugduni, 1739. (Antverpiæ, 1626. Ed. Coll. Sion.)

[† Quæstiones Practicæ de Munere Confessarii, pars iv., cap. viii., n. 127. Augustæ et Herbipoli, 1750.

[‡ Theologia Moralis, nunc pluribus partibus aucta a R. P. Claudio Lacroix, Societatis Jesu, tom. ii., lib. iii., pars i., tract. iv., cap. ii., dub. ii., quæst. 199. Coloniæ, 1757. (Coloniæ Agrippinæ, 1733. Ed. Mus. Brit.)

[§ Lavacrum Conscientiæ, pp. 96—99. Bambergæ, 1759.

[‖ Theologia Moralis et Dogmatica, tom. vi., De Confessione, No. 92, De Interrogationibus circa Peccata singulorum Statuum. No. 168, De Usu Scientiæ ex Confessione haustæ. No. 170, De Usu licito Scientiæ Confessionis. No. 215, De Absolutione Complicis. No. 216, De Confessario sollicitante ad inhonesta et turpia. No. 217, De Modo denuntiandi sollicitantem præfatum. No. 127, De Occasione proxima peccandi. No. 171, Casus concernentes Sigillum Confessionis. Tom. vii., De Matrimonio, No. 46, De Debito conjugali, &c., &c.

[¶ Tractatus de Sacramento Pœnitentiæ, Tractatus de Sacramento Matrimonii. Dublinii, 1825.

[ Instructio Sacerdotum, ac de Septem Peccatis Mortalibus, cap. xlix., n. 5. Romæ, 1601. (Antverpiæ, 1603. Ed. Coll. Sion.)

[†† Praxis Fori Pœnitentialis, tom. i., lib. x., cap. xviii., n. 258. Lugduni, 1620. (Coloniæ, 1622. Ed. Coll. Sion.)

[‡‡ 'Excusari autem famulos et a peccato, et a restitutione, si capiant in compensationem justam; nempe, qua, cum non administrentur ipsis ad victum et vestitum necessaria, qualia in aliis domibus communiter solent ac debent similibus famulis subministrari; tantum de bonis dominorum accipiant, quantum ad compensationem talis injuriæ requiritur, neque plus.....Inter conditiones licitæ compensationis, illa una est; quod res debita nequeat aliter quam per eam obtineri."—Idem, tom. ii., lib. xxv., cap. xliv., n. 555.

[§§ They were expelled from England by James I. in 1605, from Venice in 1606, from Savoy in 1729, from Portugal in 1759, from France in 1764, from Spain and Sicily in 1767, from Malta and Parma in 1768, and they were totally suppressed by Pope Clement asserted, that "the rebellion of an Ecclesiastic against a King is not a crime of high treason, because he is not subject to the King." * Andrew Philopater remarks, that "the whole school of theologians and ecclesiastical lawyers maintain, (and it is a thing both certain and matter of faith,) that every Christian Prince, if he has manifestly departed from the Catholic religion, and has wished to turn others from it, is immediately divested of all power and dignity, whether of divine or human right, and that, too, even before the sentence pronounced against him by the Supreme Pastor and Judge; and that all his subjects are free from every obligation of the oath of allegiance which they had sworn to him as their lawful Prince, and that they may and must (if they have the power) drive such a man from the sovereignty of Christian men,† as an apostate, a heretic, and a deserter of Christ the Lord, and as an alien and an enemy to his country, lest he corrupt others, and turn them from the faith by his example or his command." ‡

[Cardinal Bellarmine is equally intelligible in the treasonable principles which he zealously inculcates. "The spiritual power," says he, "does not blend itself with temporal affairs, but it suffers all things to proceed as they did before they were united, provided they are not opposed to any spiritual object, or are not necessary to obtain it. But if any such thing should occur, the spiritual power may and must restrain the temporal power, by every mean and expedient which may be considered necessary..... ..It may change kingdoms, and take them from one to transfer them to another, as a spiritual Prince, if it should be necessary for the salvation of souls." §

[The Cardinal further observes: "Christians may not tolerate an infidel or heretic (Protestant) King, if he endeavour to draw his subjects to his heresy or infidelity. But it is the province of the sovereign Pontiff, to whom the care of religion has been intrusted, to decide whether the King draw them to heresy or not. It is therefore for the Pontiff to determine, whether the King must be deposed or not." ‖

[Sentiments, equally immoral and treasonable, are inculcated in the writings of Alphonso Salmeron,* Francis Tolet,† John Mariana, ‡ John Ozorius, § Sebastian Heissius,‖ Andrew Eudæmon John,¶ James Keller, Nicholas Serrarius,†† John of Salas, ‡‡ with others, too numerous to mention.]

The morals of the people correspond also with those of the Clergy. This is not marvellous, seeing that they are deprived of the Scriptures, are not instructed in the principles of the word of God, and are the dupes of ignorance and superstition. §§

XIV. in 1773. From 1555 to 1773, they suffered thirty-seven expulsions from various states.

[* "Clerici rebellio in Regem, non est crimen læsæ majestatis, quia non est subditus Regi."—Aphorismi Confessariorum. Verbo, Clericus. Coloniæ, 1615. (Ed. Coll. Sion.)

[† "The better to procure Queen Elizabeth's ruin, there was a little book composed and called 'A Treatise of Schism,' which, amongst other things, exhorted the women at Court to act the same against the Queen as Judith had done with commendation against Holofernes. The author of this pernicious pamphlet was one Gregory Martin, formerly of St. John's College, Oxford, and contemporary with Campian."—Foulis's History of Romish Treasons, &c., book vii., chap. iv., p. 437. London, 1671.

[‡ "Elizabethæ Angliæ Reginæ, Hæresim Calvinianam propugnantis, sævissimum in Catholicos sui Regni Edictum, quod in alios quoque Reipublicæ Christianæ Principes Contumelias continet indignissimas. Per Andream Philopatrem. Responsio ad Edictum, sect. ii., n. 157. Lugduni, 1593.

[A marginal note in the Extraits des Assertions, (vol. iv., p. 94,) ascribes the work of Andreas Philopater to Robert Persons, the associate of Campian. Persons wrote under the feigned name of Doleman; that of Philopater was assumed by the Jesuit Cresswell. See Les Jésuites Criminels de Lèze-Majesté, 1759, pp. 174, 175.

[§ "Spiritualis (potestas) non se miscet temporalibus negotiis, sed sinit omnia procedere sicut antequam essent conjunctæ, dummodo non obsint fini spirituali, aut non sint necessaria ad eum consequendum. Si autem tale quid accidat, spiritualis potestas potest et debet coercere temporalem omni ratione ac via, quæ ad id necessaria videbitur.....Potest mutare regna, et uni auferre, atque alteri conferre, tanquam Princeps spiritualis, si id necessarium sit ad animarum salutem."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i., De Romano Pontifice, lib. v., cap. vi., col. 901, C. Colon., 1620.

[‖ "Non licet Christianis tolerare Regem infidelem aut hæreticum, si ille conetur pertrahere subditos ad suum hæresim vel infidelitatem. At judicare an Rex pertrahet ad hæresim necne, pertinet ad Pontificem, cui est commissa cura religionis. Ergo Pontificis est judicare, Regem esse deponendum, vel non deponendum."—Idem, cap. vii., col. 904, A.

[* Commentarii in Evangelicam Historiam, et in Acta Apostolorum, tom. iv., pars iii., tract. iv., p. 410. Colon., 1602.

[† Commentarii et Annotationes in Epist. B. Pauli Apost. ad Romanos, annot. ii. in cap. xiii. Mogunt., 1603. (Ed. Coll. Sion.)

[‡ De Rege et Regis Institutione, Libri Tres, lib. i., cap. vi., p. 61; cap. vii., pp. 64, 67. Mogunt., 1605. (Ed. Mus. Brit.)

[§ Concionum Joannis Ozorii, Societatis Jesu de Sanctis, tom. iii., Conc. in Cathedra S. Petri, pp. 64, 70. Paris, 1607.

[‖ Ad Aphorismos Doctrinæ Jesuitarum aliorumque Pontificiorum, Declaratio Apologetica, cap. iii., aphor. i., n. 97. Ingolstadii, 1609.

[¶ Apologia pro Henrico Garneto, cap. x., art. ii., p. 274, et seq; cap. xii., art. i., p. 319. Coloniæ Agrip., 1610.

[ Tyrannicidium, seu Scitum Catholicorum de Tyranni Internecione, quæst. ii., p. 20, et seq. Monachii, 1611. (Ed. Mus. Brit.)

[†† Commentarii in Sacros Bibliorum Libros, in Lib. Judicum, cap. iii., quæst. i., p. 92. Paris, 1611. (Ed. Coll. Sion.)

[‡‡ Tractatus de Legibus in primam secundæ S. Thomæ, quæst. xcv., tract. xiv., disp. vii., sect. ii., n. 17. Lugd., 1611. (Ed. Mus. Brit.)]

[§§ "Quod ad promiscuum vulgus in regno Papali attinet, illud cum a Scripturæ sacræ lectione arceatur, in concionibus vero, quæ plerisque in locis rarissimæ habentur, fabulas, superstitiones, et traditiones loco verbi cœlestis audiat, inde mirum non est, pro pietate superstitionem, pro notitia veri Dei crassam ignorantiam, pro vero Dei cultu εθελοθρησκειας ubique dominari. Episcopus Bidontinus in oratione coram Tridentini Concilii Patribus habita inter cætera sic loquitur: 'Quibus turpitudinum monstris, qua sordium colluvie, qua peste non sunt fœdati, non corrupti in Ecclesia Dei sancta et populus et Sacerdos? &c. Quid mirum si inde (propter negligentiam et impietatem Pastorum) et dispersæ sunt oves et errarunt in cunctis montibus et agris, et potentiores quidem ab auctoritate in dominium, a dominio in tyrannidem, a jure in injuriam, a sceptro in virgam ferream, a Dei cultu ad impietatem, a tutela Ecclesiæ ad internecionem, a modo ad libidinem, a ratione ad nutum, a tributis ad importabilia onera, a pace ad bella crudelia, a simplicitate ad dolos, a prudentia ad malitiam, a liberalitate ad luxum, a parsimonia ad avaritiam, ab ornatu ad pompam, ab obædientia ad apertam rebellionem conversæ sunt? Utinam non a religione ad superstitionem, a fide ad infidelitatem, a Christo ad antichristum, quin a Deo ad Epicurum vel ad Pythagoram, velut prorsus inanimes declinassent, dicentes in corde impio et in ore impudico, Non est Deus,' &c. Claud. Espensæus in comment. 1 Tim., p. 374, ex Bernhardo, hanc repetit querelam: 'Væ, væ generationi huic! totum corpus Ecclesiæ laborat, quo latius eo desperatius serpit hodie putida tabes hypocriseos per totum corpus Ecclesiæ; nunc impletur illud Esaiæ: Ecce in pace amaritudo mea amarissima.' Franciscus Lambertus, in præfat. libri de Conjugio: 'Ego in inclyta Galliarum Avenione natus, et in palatio ejus sæpe versatus, quod genitor meus legationis ejus, quæ apud eandem civitatem est et palatii, ut vocant, Apostolici Secretarius esset, novi sanctitatem regni ejus, id est, impietates et horrendissima simul atque nefandissima scelera, tametsi ab eorum multitudine fateor victum, quod tam multa atque enormia sint, ut vix unquam ea recitare possim.' Forte v. major Sanctitas in Italia ob vicinam Romani Præsulis sedem? imo vero contrarium testatur Machiavellus, lib. i. comment., cap. xvii.: 'Quanquam (inquit) Italia omnium Christiani nominis provinciarum Ecclesiæ Romanæ maxime finitima sit, nulla tamen est, quæ minus religionis habeat, quoniam sanctissima illa Romana Curia perpetuas ibi factiones et discordias serit.' Bodinus de Dæmonoman. refert: 'Trescalem insignem Magum sibi dixisse, in uno quodam regno Ecclesiæ Romanæ addicto esse supra centum millia Magorum.' Sed quid camarinam hanc diutius movemus? Dies Domini revelabit quanta flagitia quantasve impuritates vel unica illa lex Papalis de perpetuo cœlibatu a Sacerdotibus, Monachis, et Monialibus servando in Ecclesiam Romanam introduxerit."—Gerhardi Loci Theo., sect. 268, pp. 1213, 1214. Jenæ. 1675.]

The Church of Rome, we must therefore conclude, in holiness is awfully defective, whether in her doctrines, moral rules, or the actions of her members, Clergy or laity. She teaches and practises, as we have shown, that the commission of notorious and scandalous sins cannot deprive the Clergy of a single particle of their authority, or render their ministrations less effectual or valid; and though her private members may be deformed by every sort of vice, they are still good Catholics; belong to the company of the faithful; and cannot lose their membership, though they may live and die in the practice and love of every species of iniquity. Such then is her sanctity. Whether it is that which purifies the heart, and reforms the life, let our readers judge.

VII. The title "Catholic" as a note of the true church.

1. The word "catholic," if we regard its Greek etymology, signifies "universal," or "general." It is taken in a good or bad sense, according to the subject to which it may be applied. We read of catholicons, or catholic remedies, for such as are valuable, against all or the greater number of the diseases to which flesh is heir. So we read of catholic, or epidemic, diseases, which spread through large tracts of country.

The sense of the word, as attributed to the church, is double. (1.) It signifies "universal" or "œcumenical;" thus it is used in the Creed, and is opposed to the synagogue of the Jews, which was confined to certain times, persons, and places; whereas the church of Christ is illimitable, admitting into it believers of every grade, in all places, and at all times. The Christian church consists of "every kindred, tongue, and people." (Rev. v. 9.) The catholic church is that which is spread over the world; and the catholic faith is the universal faith; that form of doctrine which the Apostles delivered to the whole church. (Rom. vi. 17.) Hence the church is termed "catholic." (2.) The word also means "orthodox," in every important point, because it preserves the true faith, which is found in the New Testament. Every church or society of Christians that preserves this catholic or universal faith, accompanied with true charity, and other of its fruits, is a part of that which is catholic or universal. And because the parts are of the same nature with the whole, so it has been usual to designate each, thus qualified, a catholic church. In this sense, therefore, churches that differ widely in several opinions and customs, may, nevertheless, be truly catholic.

The word "catholic," as applied to the church, is used by the Fathers, for the most part, in reference to the orthodoxy of the church. Cyril adviseth: ["And if ever thou art sojourning in any city, inquire not simply where the Lord's house is, (for the sects of the profane also make an attempt to call their own dens, houses of the Lord,) not merely where the church is, but where is 'the catholic church.' For this is the peculiar name of this holy body, the mother of us all, which is the spouse of our Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, (for it is written, 'As Christ also loved the church and gave himself for it, that he might,' &c.,) and is a figure and copy of Jerusalem 'above, which is free, and the mother of us all,' which before was barren, but now has many children." "Now it is called 'catholic,' because it is throughout the world, from one end of the earth to the other; and because it teaches universally and completely one and all the doctrines which ought to come to men's knowledge, concerning things both visible and invisible, heavenly and earthly; and because it subjugates in order to godliness every class of men, governors and governed, learned and unlearned; and because it universally treats and heals every sort of sins, which are committed by soul or body, and possesses in itself every form of virtue which is named, both in deeds and words, and in every kind of spiritual gifts."*] Pacianus says, "Christian is my name, and Catholic my surname: by the one I am known from infidels; by the other from heretics and schismatics."† Augustine says, "Although every heresy would seem to be, and affecteth to be, called the catholic church, yet, when heretics are asked by pagans, 'Where is the place where Catholics meet?' none of them dares point to his own house or church."‡ And again: "The very title of the Catholic Church holdeth me, which name among so many heresies, she alone holdeth." Theodosius, the Emperor, made a decree, that that church alone should be called catholic, which equally worshipped and glorified the three Persons in the blessed Trinity.§

2. The name "catholic" is first found in the Apostles' Creed, as follows: "I believe in one holy, catholic, and apostolic church." Some, however, doubt, whether the appellation "catholic" was adopted by the Apostles and inserted by them in the Creed, even allowing that the Creed was composed by them, which is very doubtful at best. The doubt increases when we learn that the word "catholic" is not in the Scriptures applied to the church. Irenæus‖ and Tertullian,¶ when reciting the Creed, make no use of the word "catholic."

It is, however, allowed, that the word used in the sense of universality, may be employed to mean the same thing which the Scripture expresses by other words; for the Gospel was to be preached in "the whole world, to every creature," &c. In this import of the term, the sense of Scripture will justify its use, as applied to all Christians of orthodox character.

[Dr. Pearson, Bishop of Chester, in his Exposition of the Creed, thus remarks: "The most obvious and most general notion of this catholicism consisteth in the diffusiveness of the church, grounded upon the commission given to the builders of it, 'Go, teach all nations;' whereby they and their successors were authorized and empowered to gather congregations of believers, and so to extend the borders of the church unto the utmost parts of the earth. The synagogue of the Jews especially consisted of one nation, and the public worship of God was confined to one country: 'In Judah was God known, and his name was great in Israel; in Salem was his tabernacle, and his dwelling-place in Sion.' (Psalm lxxvi. 1, 2.) 'He showed his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel; he hath not dealt so with any nation.' (Psalm cxlvii. 19.) The temple was the only place in which the sacrifices could be offered, in which the Priests could perform their offices of ministration; and so under the law there was an enclosure divided from all the world besides. But God said unto his Son, 'I will give thee the Heathen for thine inheritance, and the utmost parts of the earth for thy possession.' (Psalm ii. 8.) And Christ commanded the Apostles, saying, 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature:' (Mark xvi. 15:) 'that repentance and remis-

* Cyril. Oper., Catech. xviii.

† S. Paciani Episc. ad Sympron. Novat., epist. i., De Catholico Nomine, Biblioth. Patrum, tom. vii., p. 258. Venet., 1770.

‡ Epist. contra Fundam., cap. iv.

§ Sozomen. Hist. Eccles., lib. vii., cap. iv.

‖ Lib. i., cap. ii., p. 34; lib. iii., cap. vi., p. 172.

¶ De Præscrip. adv. Hæret., cap. xiii., et Lib. de Velan. Virg.

sion of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem.' (Luke xxiv. 47.) Thus the church of Christ, in its primary institution, was made to be of a diffusive nature, to spread and extend itself from the city of Jerusalem, where it was first established, to all the parts and corners of the earth. From whence we find them in the Revelation crying to the Lamb, 'Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation.' (Rev. v. 9.) This reason did the ancient Fathers render why the church was called 'catholic;'* and the nature of the church is so described in the Scriptures.

["Secondly, They call the church of Christ the 'catholic' church, because it teacheth all things which are necessary for a Christian to know, whether they be things in heaven or things in earth, whether they concern the condition of man in this life, or in the life to come. As the Holy Ghost did lead the Apostles 'into all truth,' so did the Apostles lead all truth into the church, which teaching all the same, may be well called 'catholic,' from the universality of necessary and saving truths retained in it.†

["Thirdly, The church hath been thought fit to be called catholic in reference to the universal obedience which it prescribeth; both in respect of the persons, obliging men of all conditions;‡ and in relation to the precepts, requiring the performance of all the evangelical commands.§

["* Arius and Euzoius, naming the Catholic Church in their Creed, give the following interpretation of it: 'Εις μιαν καθολικην εκκλησιαν του Θεου, την απο περατων εως περατων.' St. Cyril of Jerusalem gives this as the first importance of the word: 'Καθολικη μεν ουν καλειται δια το κατα πασης ειναι της οικουμενης απο περατων γης εως περατων.'—Catech., 18.

["'Ubi ergo erit proprietas catholici nominis, cum inde dicta sit catholica, quod sit rationalis et ubique diffusa?'—Optatus, lib. ii.

["'Ipsa est enim ecclesia catholica: unde καθολικη Græce appellatur, quod per totum orbem diffunditur.'—S. Aug., Epist. 170.

["'Ecclesia illa est quam modo dixi unicam suam; hæc est unica catholica quæ toto orbe copiose diffunditur, quæ usque ad ultimas gentes crescendo porrigitur.'—Idem, Epist. 30.

["'Si autem dubitas quod ecclesiam, quæ per omnes gentes numerositate copiosa dilatatur, S. Scriptura commendat, multis et manifestissimis testimoniis ex eadem auctoritate prolatis onerabo.'—Idem, contra Crescon, lib. i., cap. 33.

["'Sancta ecclesia ideo dicitur catholica, pro eo quod universaliter per omnem mundum sit diffusa.'—Isidorus de Summo Bono, lib. i., cap. 9.

["† This is the second interpretation delivered by St. Cyril: 'Και δια το διδασκειν καθολικως και ανελλειπως απαντα τα εις γνωσιν ανθρωπων ελθειν οφειλοντα δογματα περι τε δρατων και αορατων πραγματων, επουρανιων τε και επιγειων.'—Catech., 18.

["'Ecclesia Græcum nomen est, quod in Latinum vertitur convocatio, propterea quod ad se omnes vocet. Catholica (id est, universalis) ideo dicitur, quia per universum mundum est constituta, vel quoniam catholica, hoc est, generalis, in eadem doctrina est ad instructionem.'—In Decret. Ivo., lib. i.

["‡ This is the third interpretation of St. Cyril: 'Και δια το παν γενος ανθρωπων εις ευσεβειαν υποτασσειν αρχοντων τε και αρχομενων, λογιων τε και ιδιωτων.'—Cat., 18.

["§ 'Si reddenda catholici vocabuli ratio est, et exprimenda de Græco interpretatione Latina, catholicus ubique unum, vel (ut doctiores putant) obedientia omnium nuncupatur, mandatorum scilicet Dei. Unde Apostolus, Si in omnibus obedientes estis; et iterum, Sicut enim per inobedientiam unius peccatores constituti sunt multi, sic per dicto-audientiam unius justi constituentur multi. Ergo qui catholicus, idem justi obediens.'—Pacianus, Epist. i., ad Sympron.

["'Acutum aliquid videris dicere, cum catholicæ nomen non ex orbis totius communione interpretaris, sed ex observatione præceptorum omnium divinorum atque omnium sacramentorum: quasi nos etiam, si forte hinc sit appellata catholica, quod totum veraciter teneat, cujus veritatis nonnullæ particulæ etiam in diversis inveniuntur hæresibus, hujus nominis testimonio nitamur ad demonstrandam ecclesiam in omnibus gentibus, et non promissis Dei et tam multis tamque manifestis oraculis ipsius veritatis. Sed nempe hoc est totum, quod nobis persuadere conaris, solos remansisse Rogatistas, qui catholici recte appellandi sunt ex observatione præceptorum omnium divinorum atque omnium sacramentorum.'—S. Aug., Vincentio, Epist. 48.

["Fourthly, The church hath been yet farther called or reputed catholic,* by reason all graces are given in it, whereby all diseases of the soul are healed, and spiritual virtues are disseminated, all the works, and words, and thoughts, of men are regulated, till we become perfect men in Christ Jesus.

["In all these four acceptations did some of the ancient Fathers understand the church of Christ to be catholic, and every one of them doth certainly belong unto it. Wherefore I conclude that this catholicism, or second affection of the church, consisteth generally in universality, as embracing all sorts of persons, as to be disseminated through all nations, as comprehending all ages, as containing all necessary and saving truths, as obliging all conditions of men to all kind of obedience, as curing all diseases, and planting all graces in the souls of men."†]

In progress of time, when heresies began to show themselves in the church, the word "catholic" was adopted to signify consent in doctrine; that is, in that confession of faith which the Apostles preached by word of mouth, but which afterward, by the will of God, was left by them in the holy Scriptures. When heretics, on account of the multitude of their followers, appropriated the term "catholic" to their congregations, the word was explained by the term "apostolic." Thus, in the Nicene Creed, in the year 325, the article concerning the church was expounded by the words, "I believe one holy, catholic, and apostolic church;" that it might be understood that that was the true church which was established in every part of the globe, on the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, and which truly and faithfully held the doctrines which they taught. In the Council of Ephesus, in 434, the words "catholic and apostolic" are joined together, the one explaining the other: "This is the catholic and apostolic faith, which all the orthodox Bishops of the East and the West approve." "The holy and apostolic Church anathematize those who determine otherwise."‡ In the last sentence the appellation "catholic" is omitted, as being sufficiently explained by the word "apostolic."

The following reasons will show that the appellation "catholic" does not apply properly to the Church of Rome, in the sense in which she affects to use it:—

["No argument can be drawn from the bare name of catholic, to prove a church to be catholic.

["This is so clear and evident in itself, that it neither needs, nor is scarce capable of, a proof: the Church of

["* This is the fourth and last explication given by St. Cyril: 'Το δια καθολικως ιατρευειν μεν και θεραπευειν, απαν το των αμαρτιων ειδος των δια ψυχης και σωματος επιτελουμενων, κεκτησθαι τε εν αυτη πασαν ιδεαν ονομαζομενης αρετης, εν εργοις τε και λογοις και πνευματικοις παντοιοις χαρισμασι.'—Catech., 18."]

[† Pearson's Exposition of the Creed, vol. ii., art. ix., pp. 252—254. London, 1821.]

‡ "Hæc est catholica et apostolica fides, quam probant omnes tam orientis quam occidentis Episcopi orthodoxi.....Item. Qui contrarium statuunt, eos anathematizat sancta et apostolica ecclesia."—Conc. Ephesin. Conc. Labb., tom. iii., p. 671, fol. Lutet. Paris, 1671.

Rome is called catholic, therefore she is catholic: the Papists are called Catholics, therefore they are Catholics. This is such a way of reasoning as every man must be ashamed to own, except those who have the confidence to say any thing, when they are not able to say any thing to the purpose. For,

["(1.) The Christian church was not known by the name of 'catholic' at the beginning; and therefore the name can be no essential note of it. We find no mention of this name in the writings of the New Testament: we read, that the disciples were called Christians at Antioch; but as to the name 'catholic,' principally respecting the diffusive nature of the church, the church could not properly be so called, till the Christian faith had been more generally and universally preached in the world. Therefore Pacianus, in the fore-quoted place, confesses that the name 'catholic' was not used in the church in the days of the Apostles; and from thence some have concluded, that the Creed which goes under the Apostles' name, having this denomination of the church inserted in it, 'catholic church,' was not composed by them, but by some holy Bishops of a later standing in the church: yet must it be confessed, that the name is very ancient, and of an early date, it being found in the oriental Creeds, particularly those of Jerusalem and Alexandria, and in the inscriptions of St. James, St. Peter, St. John, and St. Jude's Epistles, which are all styled 'general or catholic Epistles.'

["(2.) Names are oftentimes arbitrarily, and at random, and falsely, imposed on things; and therefore, nothing can be concluded from them: the church of Sardis had a name to 'live,' but was 'dead;' the church of Laodicea gloried that she was 'rich,' but was 'poor;' many on earth are called gods, who are but mortal men; Simon Magus was called the great power of God, but was a child of the devil; Mahomet, a great prophet, but was an impostor; Diana, the great goddess of the Ephesians, but was an idol; our blessed Saviour foretold that many should come in his name, each saying, 'I am Christ,' but were deceivers. Thus, you see, things and persons are not always as they are called; nor do I believe the Papists are willing that their Church should be thought in reality to be according to the signification of some names that are too liberally bestowed upon her: the Bishop of Rome calls himself Christ's Vicar, but others, antichrist; the Church of Rome styles herself the Catholic Church, but others, the whore of Babylon. I do as little justify the fastening such odious names upon them, as approve their arrogating to themselves the other glorious titles; yet this I am pretty well assured of, that a man of ordinary abilities may say as much to prove the Pope antichrist, and the Romish Church an harlot, as the whole College can to justify the pretence of the one to be 'Christ's Vicar,' or of the other to be his 'undefiled spouse.'

["(3.) Names are oftentimes imposed on things, and so used, as marks of distinction only, without any farther design of representing their natures and qualities by them. Thus we call the Romanists, Catholics: not that we think they are truly so, but in compliment, or irony, in compliance with common use, or by way of discrimination from other Christians: and in the same respects, it may be supposed, that they call us the Reformed; and if they think this is a good argument to prove them Catholics, we have the same, and it will hold as strong, to prove us reformed. 'They call us reformed, therefore we are reformed,' is as good an argument as, 'We call them Catholics, therefore they are Catholics.' In this sense are those words of St. Austin, cited by Bellarmine, to be understood: 'That should a stranger happen in any city to inquire even of a heretic, where he might go to a Catholic church, the heretic would not dare to send him to his own house or oratory.'* Not that that heretic did believe, that those that were there called Catholics did hold the true Catholic doctrine, for then he could not have believed his own; but looking upon it as a bare name of distinction, he directed him to that assembly of Christians that were so called. St. Austin seems here to suppose a case, as if a traveller entering into a city, where both Popish and Reformed churches were allowed, should chance to meet a Protestant, and of him inquire the way to a Catholic church, and he direct him to a Popish one; or a Papist, and of him inquire the way to a Reformed church, and he direct him to a Protestant one. It would not, therefore, follow, that either the one or the other did believe either church to answer and correspond with its name, that the Popish was Catholic, or the Protestant Reformed; but that they were words of common use, whereby the churches might be known from one another, but not the true church known from the false.

["(4.) It does not follow, that because the name of Catholic in that time, when it was for the most part in conjunction with the catholic faith, was a sure note of a true church, it must always be so, even when the name and thing are parted. It was not long before the Christian church became miserably torn and rent asunder, divided into many and very great bodies, all pretending to catholicism. By what mark now is the catholic church to be known? Not by the name, surely, when all parties laid claim to it, and the grossest heretics, such as the Manichæans themselves, as St. Austin tells us, who had the least to show for it, coveted and gloried in it. Have never any heretics or schismatics been styled catholics? nor ever any orthodox styled heretics? The Greek Church is called catholic, and yet the Church of Rome will have her an heretical one: the Donatists appropriated to themselves that ample title; and yet St. Austin thought them no better than schismatics: the Arians called themselves catholics, and the orthodox, Homousians and Athanasians; but neither the one was the more, nor the other the less, catholic for what they were called. Truth is always the same; and the nature of things remains unalterable, let men fix on them what names they please. By this rule, then, is the true church to be known, not because it bears the name of catholic,—for that a church may do, and yet be guilty of schism and heresy,—but because it professes the true faith; and then, though it be in name heretic, it is in reality catholic. This is Lactantius's rule, to discern the true church by the true religion: 'That church alone,' says he, 'is catholic, that retains the true worship of God.'† St. Austin, in his disputes with the Donatists, where the true church was, appeals to the Scripture, as the only infallible judge. Amongst many others to this purpose, he hath these words: 'Let us not hear, I say this, and thou sayest that; but let us hear, Thus saith the Lord.'‡

["* Cont. Epist. Fundam., cap. 4.

["† 'Sola catholica ecclesia est, quæ verum cultum retinet.'—Lactantii Opera, Divin. Instit., lib. iv., cap. xxx., p. 129. Vesont. 1838.

["‡ 'Non audiamus, Hæc dico, hæc dicis; sed audiamus, Hæc dicit Dominus, &c. Ibi quæramus ecclesiam.'—August. Opera, tom. ii., Epist. 166; De Unit. Eccl., cap. 2. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1680."]

[" (5.) Again: does it follow, that, because the being called after the names of particular men in that age, when all so called were, for the most part, corrupt in the faith, was a sure brand of schismatics and heretics, it must ever be so? May not names and titles be unjustly and maliciously imposed? If the Churches of the Reformed must go for heretics and schismatics, merely because they are distinguished by the names of those men that were the first and most eminent instruments in that blessed work, as of Lutherans, Calvinists, Zuinglians, and the like; is there not the same reason, that the several orders in the Church of Rome, that go under the names of their particular founders, as the Benedictines, Franciscans, Dominicans, Jansenists, Molinists, and others, be esteemed so too? If there be any difference, the advantage of reason is on our side; since the reformed assume not those names to themselves; and though they deservedly honour the memories of those men, and with thankful hearts embrace the Reformation God was pleased, by their ministry, to make in the church, yet they by no means affect to be called after their names. They own no name but Christian or catholic, when it signifies persons adhering to the true catholic faith: the others are nick-names, fastened on them by their adversaries out of scorn or malice, to represent them to the world, as far as they are able, as so many schismatics from the Catholic Church, and as having other leaders than Christ and his Apostles. But those in the Church of Rome that are denominated from their particular founders give themselves those appellations, and seem to prefer them before that truly catholic one of Christian, which while with some neglect they leave to the common people, they glory and pride themselves in the other; so that if this note of an heretic is valid, it turns with great force against themselves, who are really guilty of it, and not against us, whom they will make guilty of it, but are not."*]

3. From the name alone, therefore, no firm argument can be deduced why the Church of Rome is the true orthodox church of Christ.

This is easily learned from Scripture. The Jews called themselves "the sons of God," and "the seed of Abraham," (John viii. 33,) yet they were not the spiritual seed of Abraham, nor the true sons of God. False teachers called themselves prophets and ministers of Christ; they were nevertheless false prophets and false Christs. (Matt. vii. 15; xxiv. 24.) False apostles styled themselves ministers of righteousness, and transformed themselves into the Apostles of Christ, when at the same time they did not possess the true character of Ministers or Apostles. (2 Cor. i. 4, 12.) Of the church of Smyrna it is said, "I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan." (Rev. ii. 9.) Of the church in Sardis it is declared, "I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead." (Rev. iii. 1.) The Apostle says there are many who are called gods, but that there was only one true God. (1 Cor. viii. 5.) Simon Magus was designated "the great power of God," (Acts viii. 10,) and Diana was called a "great goddess;" (Acts xix. 27;) yet the one was a shameless impostor, and the other a detestable image of idolatry.

From the sayings of the Fathers we have proof that they considered the name of Christian the smallest part of his true character. Justin Martyr says, "The addition of a name decides nothing to be good or bad, apart from those deeds which are connected with the name."* Augustine says, "How do you glory that you are a Christian? You have the name, but you have not the character. The name should follow the act. If any one should call you a Pagan, show by your deeds that you are a Christian: for if you do not show by your acts that you are a Christian, though all may call you a Christian, what will it profit you unless the thing itself is connected with the name?"† He farther says, "How many are called Physicians who cannot heal! How many are called vigilant who sleep during the night!"‡

Between the name and the thing there is no certain connexion. Names are not always given with an unprejudiced judgment. Things sometimes retain names by which they were formerly called, although that very thing on account of which they received the name has perished. Thus the Jews, by reason of their connexion with the father of the faithful, called themselves the "seed of Abraham:" though they were then destitute of that which would justify the assumption of such a title. In the primitive church certain heretics called themselves "apostolic," "angelic," "cathari," "Encratites," "Gnostics," &c.; which appellations possessed an equal, if not greater, popularity than even the name of catholic.§

[* Bellarmine's Notes of the Church, examined and confuted, pp. 29—34. 4to. London, 1687.]

* "Ονοματος προσωνυμια ουτε αγαθον ουτε κακον κρινεται ανευ των ὑποπιπτουσων τῳ ονοματι πραξεων."—Just. Mart., Apol. i., sect. 4.

† "Quomodo gloriaris te esse Christianum? Nomen habes, et facta non habes. Si autem nomen, secutum fuerit opus. Dicat te quisquam Paganum, tu factis ostende te Christianum. Nam si factis non ostendis te Christianum, omnes te Christianum vocent, quid tibi prodest nomen ubi res non invenitur?"—August. Opera, tom. iv.; Tract. 5, in Epist. Johan., col. 862, D. Edit. Bened. Paris, 1680.

‡ "Quam multi vocantur Medici, qui curare non norunt! Quam multi vocantur vigiles, qui tota nocte dormiunt!"—Idem, Tract. 4, in Johan.

[§ "Quodcunque nomen hæretici sibi arrogant, illud non est genuina et propria veræ ecclesiæ nota. Atqui nomen Catholicum et Christianum etiam hæretici sibi arrogant. Ergo nomen Catholicum et Christianum non est genuina et propria veræ ecclesiæ nota. Majorem Bellarm. non potest negare, quia superius, cap. ii., sect. v., disputat, sinceram verbi prædicationem non esse notam ecclesiæ, cum sit communissima omnibus sectis saltem opinione ipsarum. Minor ex inductione exemplorum est manifesta. Cyprian., Epist. 73 de Novatianis, scribit: 'Volunt simiarum more, quæ cum homines non sint, homines tamen imitantur, Ecclesiæ Catholicæ auctoritatem et veritatem sibi vindicare.' Tertull., lib. iv., adv. Marcion. 'Faciunt favos et vespæ, faciunt Ecclesias et Marcionitæ.' Lactant., lib. iv. Institutionum, cap. 30. 'Singuli quique hæreticorum cœtus se potissimum Christianos et suam esse catholicam ecclesiam putant.' Quod dictum allegat Bellarminus, lib. iii., de Eccl., cap 1. Ariani olim se catholicos vocabant, alios vero Homousianos et Athanasianos, teste Sixto Senensi, lib. iv., Biblioth. Posnan. Jesuitæ, thesis 4. 'Ariani orthodoxos Homousianos per contumeliam dixerunt, et Donatistæ etiam eos vocabant traditores.' Augustinus contra Epistolam Fundamenti, cap. 4. 'Omnes hæretici se catholicos dici volunt.' Epist. 48, memorat Donatistas sic inscripsisse libellum suum Imperatori missum adversus Cæcilianum. 'Libellus Ecclesiæ Catholicæ criminum Cæciliani traditus Imperatori a parte majori.' Ex collatione tertii diei cum Donatistis apparet, quod contenderint Donatistæ se potius catholicos appellari debere, quam adversarios suos, quibus responsum a judice datum, 'Ut quanto magis se catholicos dicerent, tanto magis causam suam agerent, ut eo modo probare possent, se esse catholicos' (id quod et nos Pontificiis hodie respondemus). Verba Augustini in breviculo collationum cum Donatistis, collatione diei tertii, cap. 2, sic habent: 'Inter hæc etiam de catholico nomine apud quos potius esset, pauca ab utraque parte (orthodoxorum et Donatistarum) invicem dicta et objecta sunt, et jussum est, principali causæ potius reservari. Et post aliquanta identidem cum catholici nominis facta mentione dicerent Donatistæ, apud se potius esse catholicam,' &c. Pelagiani adversarios suos vocabant hæreticos, ut nomen catholicum sibi vindicare possent, teste August., serm. 14, de verb. Apost. Idem testatur, lib. i., contra duas Epist. Pelag., cap. 2, et contra Julian., lib. ii., quod cum gratiam contra Pelagianos defenderet, objectum sibi sit nomen Mani

4. The Church of Rome cannot, without absurdity or impiety, be called the Catholic Church; because she is no more the universal church than the Roman empire embraces the whole world. Nevertheless, this hierarchy, which is one of the most corrupt sections of the catholic church, presumes to call herself the catholic or universal church; a claim to which she has no more right than one enfeebled limb has to be the whole body of the man. By attempting to exclude others from the pale of the church, they take the most direct way to exclude themselves, unless God impute their uncharitable mode of thinking or acting to excusable ignorance or mistake. The Roman Church is at best but one great branch, such an one as we can prove is fearfully withered; and St. Paul teaches, that "it may be cut off: if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he spare not thee. Behold, therefore, the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity: but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness; otherwise thou shalt be cut off." (Rom. xi. 21, 22.)

5. The Church of Rome cannot be termed catholic on the ground of orthodoxy: for although heretics were so termed, holding as they did some error or other against the catholic or orthodox faith, the Church of Rome contains many errors, some of which are most grievous and pernicious. If any Protestant, therefore, term the Church of Rome catholic, it can only be by way of irony or sarcasm; like that of the Lacedæmonians, when they styled Alexander a god: Quia vult Alexander esse deus, sit deus, "Because Alexander is resolved to be a god, let him be a god;" or the declaration of St. Bernard, when he styles those heretics "apostolics," who arrogated to themselves that title. "These indeed call themselves apostolics; and yet they are not able to show any sign or token of their apostleship."* So Papists call themselves Catholics, and yet they cannot show any of the true notes of catholic or orthodox faith. Their grave and numerous errors deprive them of the legitimate use of the term catholic.

6. The Church of Rome, with regard to place, time, or faith, cannot properly be called catholic. (1.) The catholic church embraces the whole number of those who are and will be saved, (Eph. iii. 15,) of whom some are in heaven, and others on the earth. All these were not in communion with the Roman Church; many of them lived and died in happy ignorance of the idolatry and superstition of the Popedom. (2.) The true catholic church holds the faith of the Gospel, agreeing with the doctrines of Prophets and Apostles. (Eph. ii. 20.) But the Roman hierarchy has departed from that faith in many weighty points. (3.) The term "Roman," affixed to that of Catholic, shows that the Popish Church was properly, and at first, confined to the city of Rome, and afterward to the Roman States; it cannot, therefore, strictly be called "catholic," because a particular is not a universal, a species is not a genus, a member is not the body. (4.) Their right name is properly "Papists," because they adhere to the Pope.* They derive their fit name from him who sitteth in, or rather usurps, the throne of God. (5.) A variety of sectarian names and titles are common among them; such as Franciscans, from Francis; Augustines, from Augustine, &c.

7. Consummate arrogance is manifest in the Church of Rome confining the name "catholic" to themselves; and there is also culpable inconsistency among Protestants in conceding it to them, unless by properly qualifying the term. No Protestant can suppose that the catholic church, in which he expresses his belief, when reciting the Creed, is any other than the universal church of Christ. And if, in the ordinary course of life, Protestants speak of the Catholic chapel, the Catholic question, &c., they use that term, not in reference to its ecclesiastical sense, but as a cognomen for the Papal community. The advantage, however, which Popish writers take of this manifest indifference, is an additional claim to exclusive catholicity which they affect to establish on that ground, or by perverting the common and usual sense of it. Protestants, therefore, should never use the word but with a corresponding and sufficient explanatory accompaniment. Papist is the correct generic term; and the use made of the word "catholic," in order to pervert unwary Protestants, is a reason why precision should always be observed in the use of it. With the uninformed and unsuspecting Protestant, for instance, it is argued, "You believe in the holy catholic church, according to your own Creed; now ours is the Catholic Church, as both you and we call it; you, therefore, believe in ours, as the true holy Catholic Church: in order, therefore, that your practice might be consistent with your faith, you should forthwith leave the Protestant community, and come over to that Church, in which you profess to believe." This artifice is often used, and it has staggered some: the design is evidently to confound, ensnare, and lead captive. Protestants may, therefore, without any cause of offence, with propriety use the words "Popery," "Papal," and "Papist," because the term "catholic," without any qualifying appellative, is too vague, and tends to deceive. Till this practice, therefore, is relinquished, and the word "catholic" repudiated as pertaining to the Church of Rome, Protestants ought to call those who adhere to Rome Papists, their system Popery, and their doctrines and acts, Papal or Popish. This is chæum. Hieron. in Epistola ad Marcum. 'Si ab Arianis vocor hæreticus, merito.' Græca Ecclesia appellat se catholicam, quam tamen Pontificii vocant schismaticam et hæreticam. Patriarchæ sedis Constantinopolitanæ vocant se universales et œcumenicos, quo nomine ipsorum antecessores jam olim fuerunt honorati, lib. vii., C. de summ. Trinit. Novella, 3, 5, 7, 16, 42. Roffensis adv. Luth., art. 3. Et 'Marcionitæ et Valentiniani se catholicos et orthodoxos dici voluerunt, ceteros hæreticos appellabant. Novatiani se puros vocabant, ceteros omnes impuros.' Lindan. in præfat. Panopl. sect. Quod inquiunt. 'Priscis seculis catholicæ fidei, propugnatores Basilium, Nazianzenum, Ambrosium, Hieronymum, Augustinum, hæretici hæreticos, Manichæos, Homousianistas, Sabellianos, Basilianistas appellabant.' Lubricum igitur ex nomine ducitur argumentum, antiquum enim falsorum Doctorum et falsæ ecclesiæ est artificium, ut specioso nominis velamine turpitudinem dogmatum suorum tegant. Iren., lib. i., cap. 30. 'Christi quidem Jesu nomen tanquam irritamentum præferentes, Simonis autem impietatem varie introducentes, mortificant multos per nomen bonum sententiam suam male dispergentes, et per dulcedinem et decorem nominis amarum et malignum principis apostasiæ serpentis venenum porrigentes eis.' Pro Simonis nomine substitue nomen Antichristi, videbis aptissime Lugdunensis illius Doctoris pronunciatum Jesuitis nostris convenire. Quod si obvertant Arianos, Donatistas, et Græcos a scipsis tantum, non autem ab aliis, vocatos fuisse catholicos, se vero ab aliis imo a nobis ipsis ita appellari, respondemus, id fieri eo nomine ac sensu, quo illi nos vocant evangelicos, non quod vere illos catholicos esse statuamus, ut postea apparebit."—Gerhardi Loci Theo., sect. 154, pp. 880—882. Jenæ. 1617.]

[* "Nempe jactant se esse successores Apostolorum, et apostolicos nominant, nullum tamen apostolatus sui signum valentes ostendere."—Bernardi Opera, tom. iii.; In Cant. Serm. lxvi., fol. Lugd., 1687.]

[* Baronius declares that the word "Papist" ought to be regarded by the Romanists as a title of honour. "Sint igitur nobis viventibus hæc semper præconia laudum, et post mortem tituli sepulchrales, ut Romani sic semper dicamur atque Papistæ." He discusses the point at great length in his Martyrologium Romanum, Octobris 16, p. 459, col. i. Antverpiæ. Fol. 1689.]

a clear and proper distinction, on account of its derivation from their spiritual father, the Pope of Rome, and because it is not a name which Protestants have invented, but one which is taught and recommended by Romanists themselves.

VIII. Concerning the note of the church called "apostolicity."

1. The apostolic mark of the true church is thus defined by Dens: "The Church is called apostolical, (1.) On account of the doctrine received from the Apostles, which the Church of Rome hath always retained, and will retain the same, so that from the time of the Apostles to the present, it cannot in any one thing be found when, where, and by whom, any thing was changed, in reference to doctrine. (2.) Because it was propagated by the Apostles. (3.) Because it hath a legitimate and uninterrupted succession of Bishops, especially in the very seat of Peter. (4.) Because it hath indivulsively adhered to the chair of Peter, or to the Roman seat founded by Peter."*

Bailly defines the apostolicity of the Church thus:—"The church is called apostolical in a twofold sense; on account of the doctrine, and on account of the ministry. The society is apostolical on account of doctrine, which hath preserved the faith delivered by the Apostles, polluted by no error. It is apostolical on account of the ministry, whose pastoral order, commenced by the Apostles, hath succeeded to our time without intermission."† "That the Church shall be called apostolical," says Liebermann, "it is required that she should have the succession of doctrine and authority from the Apostles."‡ Romanists contend that by an uninterrupted line of succession from the Apostles, their Bishops have derived their authority, and consequently their ministrations alone are valid, to the exclusion of all who cannot trace their origin without interruption to a similar source. They confine their succession to doctrines and to the ministry; studiously avoiding moral character, which they do not seem disposed to meddle with. They overlook, also, those ministerial qualifications which are spoken of by St. Paul, in his Epistles to Timothy and Titus. What we have to say on this point, we present under the following heads; namely,—

First. An examination of succession in general, and whether it is a mark of the true church.

Secondly. Whether this succession is exclusively in the Church of Rome.

Thirdly. Whether there has been a succession of true Christianity independently of the Church of Rome; and, Fourthly. Whether Protestants possess this succession.

2. We shall first examine into succession in general, and whether that claimed by the Church of Rome can be considered a note of the true church.

Succession is threefold; namely, one of persons and places, another of doctrine, and a third of morals and practice. That of persons and places may be called external, that of doctrine internal, and that of morals and practice mixed, or internal and external combined. The succession of places and persons is an external and mutable accident of the church, and is not of any avail without the succession of doctrine, and the observance of the moral precepts of the Gospel.

The Church of Rome without hesitation acknowledges that the doctrines taught by the Apostles form a necessary element of the succession: in this Protestants and Papists agree; but they differ inasmuch as Protestants maintain that the Church of Rome is not apostolical in doctrine; while the Romanists, on the other hand, assert that they only teach the doctrines which were taught by the Apostles. This is now briefly stated; but it will be considered more fully in its place, and made use of in argument.

3. That local or mere personal succession is not a mark of the true church, may be proved from the consideration that this was not, and never was, a mark of the true church. Such did not exist before there were any successors in the time of Christ and his Apostles. Whom did Christ succeed? Whom did the Apostles succeed? The Epistle to the Hebrews teaches that Christ succeeded Melchizedec, though there was no formal succession of persons and places connecting them. Stephen, when accused of false doctrine, referred to a succession of doctrine not at all applying to that of Rome. The Apostles were the true successors of Aaron and the Prophets, because they preserved their doctrines and faith, though they did not immediately or locally succeed them. The Jews boasted that they had a succession from Abraham and Moses; yet they were not in possession of pure doctrines, inasmuch as they were corrupted by the association of tradition in reference to the rule; and, in regard of their practice, they were very far from being disciples of Abraham and Moses.

4. The Scripture assures us that there may be a succession of persons and place where there does not exist an apostolical succession. There are many predictions which assert this. St. Paul addresses the Presbyters or Bishops of the Ephesian church thus: "For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them." (Acts xx. 29, 30.) Here it is manifestly predicted that false prophets and the vilest seducers should succeed the orthodox Pastors. In his First Epistle to Timothy, St. Paul says, "In the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats." (1 Tim. iv. 1—3.) So also St. Peter: "There were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you," &c. (2 Peter ii. 1.) In like manner antichrist is predicted as "sitting in the temple of God." (2 Thess. ii. 4.)

[* "Qua ratione Ecclesia dicitur apostolica?—R. 1. Ratione doctrinæ ab Apostolis acceptæ, quam eandem semper retinuit et retinebit Ecclesia nostra, sic ut ab Apostolorum tempore usque nunc ostendi non possit, qua in re, quando, ubi, et a quo, aliquid circa doctrinam sit immutatum. 2. Dicitur apostolica, quia ab Apostolis propagata fuit. 3. Apostolica dicitur, quia habet successionem legitimam et non interruptam Episcoporum præsertim in ipsa sede Petri, de qua S. August. dicit: 'Tenet me in Ecclesia ab ipsa sede Petri Apostoli, cui pascendas oves suas Dominus commendavit, usque ad præsentem episcopatum successio Sacerdotum.' 4. Vocatur apostolica, quia cathedræ Petri, sive sedi Romanæ a Petro fundatæ, indivulse adhæret: unde et Papistica ab adversariis appellatur glorioso sane improperio.'—Dens Theol., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, No. 78, De Nota Ecclesiæ, qua dicitur Apostolica.]

[† "Ecclesia duplici titulo dicitur apostolica, ratione doctrinæ et ratione ministerii. Societas est apostolica ratione doctrinæ, quæ fidem ab Apostolis traditam servavit nullo errore fœdatam. Ea autem est apostolica ratione ministerii, cujus pastoralis ordo ab Apostolis inchoatus ad nostra usque tempora sine intermissione sibi successit."—Bailly, Theolog., tom. ii., De Ecclesia, cap. v., art. 2, De Apostolicitate Ecclesiæ.]

‡ "Ut Ecclesia possit dici apostolica, requiritur, ut doctrinæ et cathedræ successionem ab Apostolis habeat."—Liebermann., Instit. Theol., tom. ii., De vera Christi Ecclesia, cap. ii., art. iv., sect. iv., De Nota Apostolicitatis.

5. Ecclesiastical history abounds with examples confirming the same doctrine. In the church of Antioch, which was planted by the Apostles, Paul of Samosata, the heresiarch, succeeded orthodox Bishops: so also did Peter Gnaphæus the Eutychean, Macarius the Monothelite, and others. Georgius and Lucius, Arians; Dioscorus, a Eutychean; Cyrus, a Monothelite; were Bishops of the church of Alexandria, planted by the Apostles. In the church of Constantinople, Macedonius, Nestorius, and Eutyches were Bishops. In the church of the city of Rome many heretics occupied the chair of St. Peter.

6. The ancient Fathers placed no stress on a mere local and personal succession, apart from the succession of pure doctrines, and correct moral principles and conduct.

The following quotations amply sustain the Protestant view of this question:—

Irenæus declares: "It is proper to submit to those Presbyters in the church who have the succession from the Apostles, as we have shown; who, with the succession of the episcopate, have received the undoubted gift of truth, according to the good pleasure of the Father. But others who are separate from the principal succession are every where to be held as suspected, either as heretics and of bad principles; or as schismatic, and proud, and pleasing themselves; or as hypocrites, who act on account of gain or vain-glory. But all these depart from the truth. And indeed heretics, who offer on the altar of God strange fire, that is, strange doctrines, will be burned with celestial fire, like Nadab and Abihu."* Here Irenæus acknowledges those only as the successors of the Apostles who, with the succession of the Ephesian presbyterate or episcopate, possessed the undoubted gift of truth; and he teaches, that those had departed from the principal succession, who introduced new or strange doctrines, as Nadab and Abihu, though the successors of Aaron, met with condign punishment from heaven because they offered strange fire to the Lord.

He furthermore says: "It is necessary to adhere to those who preserve the doctrine of the Apostles, and with the order of Presbyters, maintain sound speech and perseverance therein, without offence."†

Tertullian observes: "But even though they" (the heretics) "invent it, they will advance never a step; for their doctrine, when compared with that of the Apostles, will of itself declare that, by the difference and contrariety between them, it had neither an Apostle for its author, nor any apostolic man; because as the Apostles would not have taught things differing from each other, so neither would apostolic men have set forth things contrary to the Apostles, except such men as, having departed from the Apostles, preached another doctrine."‡ He then concludes thus: "There also the adulteration of Scripture and of interpretation is found, where diversity of doctrine exists."* We say the same things concerning the dogmas of the Church of Rome, that a comparison of them with the doctrines of the Apostles will show that they originated neither with Apostles nor apostolic men. Tertullian utters the following sentiments on the same subject:—"Immediately, therefore, the Apostles, (whom this title intendeth to denote as 'sent,') having chosen by lot a twelfth, Matthias, into the room of Judas, on the authority of a prophecy, which is in a psalm of David, having obtained the promised power of the Holy Spirit, for the working of miracles, and for utterance, first having, throughout Judea, borne witness to the faith in Jesus Christ, and established churches, next went forth into the world, and preached the same doctrine of the same faith to the nations, and forthwith founded churches in every city, from whence the other churches thenceforward borrowed the tradition of the faith, and the seeds of doctrine, and are daily borrowing them, that they may become churches. And for this cause they are themselves also accounted apostolical, as being the offspring of apostolical churches. The whole kind must needs be classed under their original. Wherefore these churches, so many and so great, are but that one primitive church from the Apostles, whence they all spring. Thus all are the primitive, and all apostolical, while all are one. The communication of peace, the title of brotherhood, and the token of hospitality, prove this unity; which rights no other principle directeth than the unity of the tradition of the same mystery."† "If a Bishop, if a Deacon, if a widow, if a virgin, if a Doctor, if even a martyr, shall have fallen from the right rule, shall heresies on that account be thought to have truth on their side? Do we test the creed by the persons, or the persons by the creed?"‡ Romanists prove their faith from persons; that is, from the personal succession of their Prelates; but Protestants, with Tertullian, maintain that the persons are to be approved only according to their faith.

Eusebius, after enumerating the succession of Roman Bishops, observes, "that they retained the power of apostolic preaching, and the same preaching of divine faith, whole and unmixed, which the Apostles delivered."§

Jerome affirms: "It is not easy to stand in the place of Peter and Paul, and to occupy the chair of those who

* "Eis, qui in Ecclesia sunt, Presbyteris obaudire oportet his, qui successionem habent ab Apostolis, sicut ostendimus, qui cum episcopatus successione charisma veritatis certum secundum placitum Patris acceperunt. Reliquos vero, qui absistunt a principali successione, et quocumque loco colliguntur, suspectos habere, vel quasi hæreticos et malæ sententiæ, vel quasi scindentes et elatos et sibi placentes, aut rursus ut hypocritas, quæstus gratia et vanæ gloriæ hoc operantes. Omnes autem hi decidunt a veritate. Et hæretici quidem alienum ignem afferentes ad altare Dei, id est, alienas doctrinas, a cœlesti igne comburentur, quemadmodum Nadab et Abihu."—Irenæus, Adv. Hæres, lib. iv., cap. 43. Fol. Basil, 1570.

† "Adhærere oportet his, qui et Apostolorum doctrinam custodiunt, et cum Presbyterii ordine sermonem sanum et conservationem sine offensa præstant."—Idem, lib. iv., cap. 44.

‡ "Sed etsi confinxerint, nihil promovebunt, ipsa enim doctrina eorum cum apostolica comparata ex diversitate et contrarietate sua pronunciabit, neque Apostoli alicujus auctoris esse neque apostolici; quia sicut Apostoli non diversa inter se docuissent, ita et apostolici non contraria Apostolis edidissent, nisi illi, qui ab Apostolis desciverunt, et aliter prædicaverunt."—Tertul. De Præscrip. Hæreticorum. Vide supra, p. 444.

* "Illic et Scripturarum et expositionum adulteratio deputanda est, ubi diversitas invenitur doctrinæ."—Idem.

[† "Statim igitur Apostoli, quos hæc appellatio Missos interpretatur, assumpto per sortem duodecimo Matthia in locum Judæ, ex auctoritate prophetiæ quæ est in psalmo David, consecuti promissam vim Spiritus sancti ad virtutes et eloquium; primo per Judæam contestata fide in Jesum Christum, ecclesiis institutis, dehinc in orbem profecti, eandem doctrinam ejusdem fidei nationibus promulgaverunt. Et proinde ecclesias apud unamquamque civitatem condiderunt; a quibus traducem fidei et semina doctrinæ cæteræ exinde ecclesiæ mutuatæ sint, et quotidie mutuantur, ut ecclesiæ fiant. Ac per hoc et ipsæ apostolicæ deputabuntur, ut soboles apostolicarum ecclesiarum. Omne genus ad originem suam censeatur necesse est. Itaque tot ac tantæ ecclesiæ, una est illa ab Apostolis prima, ex qua omnes. Sic omnes primæ, et omnes apostolicæ, dum una; omnes probant unitatem, communicatio pacis, et appellatio fraternitatis, et contesseratio hospitalitatis: quæ jura non alia ratio regit, quam ejusdem sacramenti una traditio."—Idem, cap. xx.]

‡ "Si Episcopus, si Diaconus, si vidua, si virgo, si Doctor, si etiam martyr lapsus a regula fuerit, ideo hæreses veritatem videbuntur obtinere? Ex personis probamus fidem, an ex fide personas?"—Idem, cap. iii.

§ Eccles. Hist., lib. v., cap. vi.

governed with Christ; because it is said, 'They are not the children of saints who occupy the places of the saints, but those who do the same acts.'"*

Augustine says: "Those who dissent from the Scriptures are not the church, although they are found in every place in which the church exists."† Again: "We do not prove our church either from the succession of Bishops, or from the authority of Councils, or from the frequency of miracles, or from visions or dreams. Whatever exist in the catholic church are to be thus proved; not that they prove her to be true because they exist in her. When our Lord Jesus Christ himself arose, he sends his disciples to the Scriptures of the law and the Prophets."‡ Furthermore, he says, "Those who sit in the seat are to be heard; for, in sitting in that seat, they teach the law of God; therefore, by them God teaches. But if they teach their own doctrines, you are neither to obey nor hear them."§

Ambrose has the following remarkable declaration:—"They do not possess the inheritance of Peter, who do not possess the faith of Peter."‖

Romanists refer us to the Fathers as using this argument of succession as a true mark of the church. To their allegation on this subject we premise the following:—(1.) The point must be settled by the canonical Scriptures alone; and nothing can be proved by the Fathers beyond probability. (2.) The Fathers attach a succession of faith, doctrine, and good moral character, to a personal and local succession; which they consider of no avail in itself, as we have already shown. (3.) When they make mention of succession, they adduce it, not as a firm and undeniable argument, but rather as an illustration of one. They convince heretics from Scripture, in the first place, and establish their position; and, finally, they produce the succession of Bishops, because the Bishops received their doctrine from the Apostles, and propagated it by a continued series of successors. (4.) The state of those churches, for which the Fathers challenged this succession, was very different from their present state. Formerly they preserved the faith and doctrines of the Gospel; but now they have departed from them, as a comparison of their doctrines with the apostolic Scriptures proves. (5.) The Fathers use this argument against those heretics who denied or adulterated the Scriptures. It was, therefore, necessary to have recourse to the succession of those Bishops in the churches planted by the Apostles, in order to demonstrate, against the position of the heretics, what Scriptures the Apostles delivered to the churches, what faith and doctrine they committed to their successors, &c. (6.) The Fathers did not claim for the Church of Rome a succession of Bishops, as though they would acknowledge her alone to have been planted by the Apostles; or that she only had preserved the apostolic doctrines; or had a monarchical supremacy over other churches. It was because this Church was notable on account of the dignity and pre-eminence of the city, as the seat of the Roman empire; on account of the number of its martyrs, and the virtues and constancy of its Bishops. When, in the East, heresies sprang up, and disturbed the flourishing churches of Alexandria, Constantinople, Antioch, &c., the Roman community was more peaceful and more constant in preserving the orthodox faith. Let modern Romanists demonstrate that they possess the same doctrines which the ancient Bishops of Rome held, and then their argument from succession will have weight.*

Secondly. We shall now particularly inquire whether this succession exists in the Church of Rome in the exclusive sense for which she contends. On this point the following arguments are advanced:—

7. The power of binding and loosing was not bestowed on the Apostles as Bishops of any particular church. The whole world was their field of labour. The principal distinction at that time was between Jews and Gentiles, and this was only of short duration; and though some, for a limited period, devoted themselves to the service of a particular church, they do not appear to have considered themselves as the Bishops of any special locality.

It is said, that James, an Apostle, was the first Bishop of Jerusalem. This is uncertain. It is agreed that the first Bishop of Jerusalem was James, and that he was surnamed the Just; but it is not certain that this was James the Apostle. Eusebius, Hegesippus, Epiphanius, Jerome, Gregory of Nyssa, and Chrysostom, have been numbered among those who believed that this James was one of the seventy disciples. To imagine that an Apostle, who, with his associates in the apostolate, was bound, by his Lord's commission, "to go into all the world, and teach all nations," should be confined to the charge of a particular flock, is to suppose him voluntarily resigning his apostleship, or being deprived of it, and thus undergoing a real degradation. For, besides the difference in respect to extent between these two missions, the department of an Apostle was chiefly among infidels, whom he was commanded μαθητευειν, "to disciple," or to convert to the Christian faith: the office of a primitive Bishop was among believers, whom he was appointed διδασκειν, "to teach" or "instruct."

There was no power bestowed on Peter, that was not equally granted to the other Apostles. For admitting that Christ has built his church on that individual, this is no more than what pertains to the others. Is it not written, that "we are built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone?" (Eph. ii. 20.) Is it not also declared, that "the wall" of the New Jerusalem "had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve Apostles of the Lamb?" (Rev. xxi. 14.) Besides, the power of binding and loosing was alike intrusted to them all. (Matt. xviii. 18; John xx. 21—23.)

8. The prerogatives peculiarly bestowed on Peter cannot be proved to belong to those who pretend to be his successors. The powers granted to him were not promised to the Bishops of Rome; nor is mention made

* "Non est facile stare in loco Petri et Pauli, et tenere cathedram regnantium cum Christo, quia hinc dicitur, 'Non sanctorum filii sunt, qui tenent locos sanctorum, sed qui exercent opera suorum.'"—Hieron., epist. i., ad Heliod.

† "Quicunque a Scripturis sanctis dissentiunt, etiamsi in omnibus locis inveniantur, in quibus ecclesia designata est, non sunt in ecclesia."—Aug. Opera, tom. ix., Contra Donatistas Epistola, vulg. de Unitate Eccles., lib. i., cap. iv. Paris, 1694.

‡ "Nolumus nos ecclesiam nostram probare vel ex successione Episcoporum, vel ex auctoritate Conciliorum, vel ex miraculorum frequentia, vel ex visis et somniis. Quæcunque talia in Catholica fiunt, ideo probanda, quia in ea fiunt, non itaque eam probant Ipse Dominus Jesus cum resurrexisset, suos discipulos ad Scripturas remittit legis et Prophetarum."—Idem.

§ "Qui sedent in cathedra, audiendi sunt; nam sedendo in cathedra, legem Dei docent. Ergo per illos Deus docet. Si vero sua illi doceant, tum nolite audire, nolite facere."—Idem, tom. iv., De Unitate Eccles., tract. 46 in Joh.

‖ "Non habent Petri hæreditatem, qui Petri fidem non habent."—Ambros. Opera, tom. iv., De Pœnit., lib. i., cap. vi., col. 391, H. Paris, 1661.

* The curious reader will find a number of quotations on the Roman side quoted and considered by Gerhard, De Eccles., sect. 195 p. 989. 4to. Jenæ, 1617.

in any place of Scripture, that they were to descend to his successors in the bishopric of a church which had not then an existence. That the Popes of Rome are the legitimate successors of St. Peter, is founded on no Scripture warrant, but entirely on unauthorized assumption.

Indeed, these powers were such as to be incapable of descending to any who might follow. No person can succeed Peter in the exercise of the keys; that is, in opening the door of faith, or first preaching the Gospel to the Jews, and afterward to the Gentiles. The nature of this work precludes the possibility of a successor. The same may be said of his apostleship; for as to his being a Bishop, he never sustained that office, either in Rome, Antioch, or any other place.

9. The Church of Rome is defective in apostolic character, because she does not hold the doctrines of the Apostles. She is not the true successor of those gifted men, because she repudiates the truths which they taught, and introduces new doctrines, utterly unknown to them; such as tradition, the merit of works, indulgences, the mass, &c.

10. With regard to personal and local succession, we are prepared to show that it does not scripturally exist, either in the Popes or Bishops of Rome.

A regular uninterrupted series of Pontiffs cannot be traced in the Paparchy. Both the origin and progress of this succession are alike doubtful and uncertain. The truth of this statement will appear, if we consider that of other churches; for instance, that of Alexandria and Antioch, as well as that of Rome.

(1.) The advocates of such an order have assigned to the Apostles fixed dioceses, without any authority either from Scripture or antiquity. Our Lord did not act the part of Metropolitan-General, by assigning to each his diocess. This has been already shown. Nor do the Scriptures give us information of any diocesan division, properly so called, among the Apostles themselves. Eusebius, who collects and furnishes the history of the first ages of the church, refers us to the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles of St. Paul and St. Peter, as the principal sources of information on this subject. He informs us that they went throughout the world publishing the Christian faith. He does not tell us particularly where they preached, nor the methods which they adopted to establish the various churches which they planted, except by referring us to the writings of the New Testament. The strong presumption is, that the Apostles were far from being uniform in their plans of operation, and that they varied their methods according to the manners and circumstances of the people. The account of the immediate successors of the Apostles is equally defective. Respecting these Eusebius says, "Which of these were judged suitable to feed the churches established by these Apostles, it is not easy to say, any farther than may be gathered from the writings of Paul."* Let us examine the succession of some of the prominent churches.

(2.) The church of Alexandria has been represented as founded by St. Mark; and yet Eusebius speaks of it in no strong terms, using the words, "they also say," in reference to that fact. Others subsequently have affirmed that he was there. Yet among these there is not perfect agreement. Some contend, that he was there with Peter; others, that he was there alone, having been sent by St. Peter; some, that he was there only once; and a few, that he returned shortly after his third visit. As it regards the time of his arrival, the period of his ministry, and the year in which this church was founded, records are silent: even Clement of Alexandria throws no light on this subject. Of the immediate successors of St. Mark the accounts are equally defective. This shows that the doctrine of apostolic succession, as contended for in modern times, was not even thought of by early Christian writers.

(3.) The line of succession in Antioch is involved in equal difficulties. Eusebius, Chrysostom, Jerome, Pope Leo, Innocent, Gelasius, and Gregory the Great, say, this church was founded by St. Peter. But we learn from superior authority, that "they which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen, travelled as far as Antioch, preaching the word to none, but unto the Jews only." (Acts xi. 19.) Here the foundation of the church was laid. Then the church of Jerusalem sent Barnabas, and not Peter, to Antioch. Next, Barnabas obtained the assistance of Paul; for he "departed to Tarsus to seek Saul; and when he had found him, he brought him unto Antioch. And it came to pass, that a whole year they assembled themselves with the church, and taught much people. And the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch." (Acts xi. 25, 26.) The church at Antioch was not therefore founded by any Apostle, much less by St. Peter. The Gospel was introduced by private Christians, as is clear from the history of the transactions concerning it in the Acts of the Apostles.

If we turn from the Apostles to their successors in this church, we shall find but little ground on which to build the Romish doctrine of succession. Baronius tells us, that the Apostles left two Bishops in the church, one for the Jews, and the other for the Gentiles. These were Ignatius and Euodias. Eusebius says, that Euodias was the first Bishop of Antioch, and that Ignatius succeeded him. But Chrysostom, Theodoret, and the author of the Constitutions, declare, that both Peter and Paul laid their hands on Ignatius. It appears, however, that Peter, in all probability, was dead before Ignatius was appointed Bishop of the church in Antioch.

(4.) The succession of the church in Rome is involved in still greater confusion than that of Alexandria or of Antioch. According to some, this church was founded by St. Peter; others say, by St. Paul; some say, by both; and others that it was neither. Of the latter opinion was the learned Salmasius, which is supported by higher authority than any other. (i.) Had St. Peter first preached the Gospel at Rome, it is not probable that such an event would have been unnoticed in the Acts of the Apostles, where the labours of St. Peter are particularly detailed, together with those of St. Paul. (ii.) It is unlikely that both founded the church at Rome; for St. Paul wrote his epistle to that community about A. D. 58, which was five years before his first visit to that city. (iii.) It is most probable, that no Apostle, properly so called, founded the Church at Rome, but that the Gospel was introduced there by some of those who were converted at Jerusalem, on the day of Pentecost; for there were at that time in Jerusalem, not only "devout men," proselytes to the Jewish religion, "from every nation under heaven," but there were also "strangers of Rome." (Acts ii. 5, 10.) These, on their return, like the "dispersed" who preached at Antioch, would declare the wonders they had witnessed, and proclaim that truth by which they had received salvation, as was the general custom in the days of the Apostles. It is therefore more than probable, that by these Christianity found an entrance into the capital of the Roman empire.

* Euseb. Eccles. Hist., book iii., chap. iv.

That St. Peter erected his throne in Rome, and presided there twenty-five years, is altogether fabulous. It is much more probable, according to Origen and Eusebius, that St. Peter came to Rome, if indeed he visited that city at all, at the close of his life. If he were there, St. Paul was there also; and it will be difficult to say which of them was Bishop, even on the supposition that any of the Apostles were Bishops, the contrary of which is capable of considerable proof. Paul was there first; but this does not determine the question of the episcopate. To accommodate this, some have made both Bishops, which at once destroys the unity of the order.

The continuation of this succession is attended with still greater perplexity. Tertullian places Clement after Peter. Jerome does the same; and this opinion is supported by the canon law. But Optatus puts Linus after Peter, making Clement third. Augustine follows this example. Irenæus reckons Linus after Peter, then Cletus, and in the fourth place, Clement. Others arrange them differently.

[" Eusebius has been appealed to with confidence. He had the fairest opportunity for giving certainty to this subject up to his day, could certainty have been had. He wrote about A. D. 320. He had read every thing which remained by any or all the Fathers before him. The Emperor Constantine the Great was his friend, so that he could not want facilities and means of information. One great end at which Eusebius aimed, was 'to preserve from oblivion the successions, although not of all, yet of the most famous Apostles of our Saviour in those churches which then were eminent and are still renowned.'*

[" Now let us hear his own account of the certainty he possessed on such subjects. He tells us, in this very chapter, that he had 'to tread a solitary and untrodden way—and can no where find so much as the bare steps of any men who have passed the same path before; excepting only some shows and tokens divers here and there have left us, particularly declaring of the times they lived in, holding forth torches as it were afar off, and lifting up their voices from on high, and calling as out of a watch-tower what way we ought to go, and how without error or danger to order our discourse.' This is not a very luminous, certain path! Then speaking of Paul and Peter, and the churches founded by them, he says, 'Now how many and what sincere followers of them have been approved as sufficient to take charge of those churches by them founded, it is not easy to say, except such and so many as may be collected from the words of St. Paul.' This is honest: but it shows the folly of building our Christianity upon such an uncertain foundation. He then proceeds to say, 'Timothy is reported to have been the first that was chosen to the bishopric of the Ephesian church; as also Titus, of the churches in Crete.' This is evidently guess-work in its origin, upon the foundation of St. Paul having mentioned their names in connexion with these two places; for Whitby acknowledges he 'can find nothing of this matter, as to Timothy and Titus being Bishops at Ephesus and Crete, in any writer of the first three centuries.'† The thing refutes itself in Eusebius, as to Titus, by saying that he was Bishop of the 'churches,' εκκλησιων, in the plural, in Crete. No such thing occurs in the earliest Christian writers, as that of any man being Bishop of more than one church, one parish. This was seldom, if ever, more than a single congregation. Timothy, the New Testament says, was an Evangelist: most probably Titus was so too. No place of residence is mentioned as to either of them: it is likely they had none, but travelled any where under the direction of the Apostles, to set in order in new churches the things that remained to be settled. All beyond this is doubtful; all contrary to it is false. As to the Bishops of Rome, we shall immediately see that Eusebius is contradicted by others. There is no certainty.

[" 'There is a πρωτον ψευδος in this case lying at the bottom, it being generally taken for granted, that St. Peter was in a proper sense Bishop of Rome, which yet I believe can never be made good.'* It is a question never yet settled whether Peter ever was at Rome; but all the authority there is for Linus, Cletus, and Clemens, as links in the chain, make them to have derived it from Peter, and not from Paul. Now Archbishop Cranmer says, 'It is not even certain that Peter ever was at Rome.'† The very learned Flaccius Illyricus declares himself doubtful whether Peter ever was at Rome.‡ The learned Zanchius, another eminent Reformer, has shown enough to make any candid person stand in doubt on the same subject. §

[" However, suppose we grant this, and even reckon Peter the first Bishop of Rome: then who succeeded Peter? No man on earth can tell. One mentions one person, another says it was another, and these the very witnesses who are cited to prove the point. 'The Fathers,' says Dr. Dwight, 'however sincere, and however satisfactory their testimony, concerning facts which passed under their own eyes, yet received traditionary accounts loosely; and both believed and recorded much of what took place before their time without truth or evidence.' Bishop Taylor himself says, 'The Fathers were infinitely deceived in their account and enumeration of traditions.'‖ Now Tertullian, Rufinus, and Epiphanius say Clement succeeded Peter. Jerome declares, that 'most of the Latin authors supposed the order to be Clement the successor of Peter.' But Irenæus, Eusebius, Jerome, and Augustine, contradict the above authorities, and say Linus succeeded Peter; Chrysostom seems to go the same way. Bishop Pearson has proved that Linus died before Peter; and therefore, on the supposition that Peter was first Bishop of Rome, Linus could not succeed him. Cabassute, the learned Popish historian of the Councils, says, 'It is a very doubtful question, concerning Linus, Cletus, and Clemens, as to which of them succeeded Peter.' Dr. Comber, a very learned Divine of the Church of England, says, 'Upon the whole matter, there is no certainty who was Bishop of Rome, next to the Apostles; and therefore the Romanists build upon an ill bottom, when they lay so great weight on their personal succession.'¶

[" But who was the third Bishop of Rome? for of the second there is no certainty. Here the confusion is greater still. The Roman Catalogues must have somebody; so they put in Cletus. Hear Dr. Comber again:

[" * Eccles. Hist., book i., chap. i., English translation. Cambridge, 1683.

[" † Whitby's Preface to the Epistle to Titus.

[" * Dr. Cave, on the Government of the Ancient Church, pp. 9, 10, ed. 1683. 12mo. Lond.

[" † Burnet's Ref., book ii., A. D. 1534.

[" ‡ Catalog. Test. Ver., v. 1, pp. 484, 485, edit. secund.

[" § Zanchius de Ecclesia, cap. 9.

[" ‖ Liberty of Prophesying, sect. v. Works, vol. viii. 8vo edit.

[" ¶ Dr. Comber on Roman Forgeries in Councils, part i., chap. i

'The like blunder there is about the next Pope: the fabulous Pontifical makes Cletus succeed Linus, and gives us several lives of Cletus, and Anacletus, making them of several nations, and to have been Popes at different times, putting Clement between them. Yet the aforesaid learned Bishop of Chester proves these were only two names of the same person; but the notes' (of the Popish editors of the Councils) 'attempt to justify the forged Pontifical, by impudently affirming that Ignatius, (Anacletus's contemporary,) Irenæus, Eusebius, St. Augustine, and Optatus, were all mistaken, or all wronged by their transcribers, who leave out Cletus. But every candid reader will rather believe the mistake to be in the Pontifical, and in the Roman Martyrology and Missal, which blindly followed it, than in those ancient and eminent Fathers. And every one may see the folly of the Romish Church which venerates two several saints on two several days, one of which never had a real being; for Cletus is but the abbreviation of Anacletus's name.' *

["Then who was fourth Bishop of Rome? The Papists say Clement. Now we have heard that Tertullian, Rufinus, Epiphanius, and, according to Jerome, 'most of the Latin authors,' say he was second Bishop, and succeeded next to Peter. Platina, the Popish biographer of the Popes, a high authority, says, that just before Peter's martyrdom he appointed Clement to be Bishop of Rome; and all this while he gives twenty-three years to the presidency of Linus and Cletus, as preceding Clement in that bishopric. St. Peter had been dead twenty years when Clement is said to become Bishop, and yet they say that Apostle made him Bishop of Rome. Cabassute says, 'The whole question is very doubtful.' Prideaux, a staunch and learned Churchman, says, 'No certainty is to be had.' Howel, a thorough Churchman, and learned writer, after going at length into what he calls the stupidity and fables of the Romanists on this point, concludes: 'Here it is evident how very doubtful and uncertain is the personal succession of the Roman Bishops.' Dr. Comber concludes this point by remarking, that the stupidity and fable here are 'a sufficient proof there is neither truth nor certainty in the pretended personal succession of the first Popes.'" +]

(5.) If the successors of the Apostles, according to the confession of Eusebius, be so difficult to be discovered, what becomes of those large diagrams made of the apostolical churches, with the name of every Bishop inscribed in its proper order, as though the inventor were interpreter to the Apostles? Placing these tables in their most favourable light, Eusebius is the principal author on whom their credit depends; and his account appears to have been compiled chiefly from reports or traditions collected at a distance of three hundred years from the time of the Apostles. His veracity cannot be questioned, so far as he was able to procure information. Of his fidelity he has given proof, by leaving vacancies in his conjectural list, when he had no light to guide him. Others, however, as Nicephorus, Callistus, and Simon the Metaphrast, and certain historical empirics, have taken special care to fill up all the vacancies which were left by Eusebius.

II. Papal succession, according to the interpretation of the Romanists, has been frequently interrupted.

(1.) On the principle of the Popish doctrine of intention, it is impossible to ascertain who are truly ordained, and who are not. Is it possible then, according to this system, to trace a succession with any degree of certainty, liable as it is to so many contingencies which would prove fatal to the very act of consecration or appointment?

(2.) The succession of Popes has been interrupted by repeated vacations. According to the Roman Catholic historian, Platina, St. Peter's chair, after John III., was vacant ten months and three days; after Pelagius II., six months and twenty-eight days; after Gregory, five months and nineteen days; after Fabian, eleven months and twenty-six days; after Boniface II., six months and twenty-five days; after Severinus, four months and twenty-nine days; after Martin I., fourteen months; after Vitalianus, four months and fifteen days; after Paul, one year and one month; after Nicholas I., eight years, seven months, and nine days, &c., &c.

(3.) The continuity of the popedom has been broken by various schisms among the Pontiffs themselves. Some have enumerated not fewer than twenty-eight, which took place in the Roman See alone; the twenty-seventh, which was the greatest, lasted thirty years. There have been, at the same time, Popes at Rome and in France, who excommunicated and cursed each other most fearfully. During this period there was either no true Pope, or, which amounts to the same, no certain one. To trace succession through these Popes and Antipopes, through poison, excommunication, &c., would, indeed, be a task. The Council of Basil pronounced Eugenius a schismatic: he, nevertheless, obtained the popedom, and from him there descended other Popes, who to this day are his successors, and consequently, according to their own canons, have no right to exercise any pontifical prerogative.

(4.) It has frequently occurred that Popes have been heretics. Zepherinus was a Montanist; Marcellinus, an idolater; Liberius was an Arian; Anastasius was a Nestorian; Vigilius, an Eutychian; Honorius was a Monothelite; Sylvester was a Magian; John XXII. taught that the souls of the pious, when freed from the body, would not see God before the day of judgment; John XXIII. believed that the soul died with the body, as the Council of Constance says respecting him. Now, according to the doctrine of a Romanist, a heretic cannot properly transmit episcopal or priestly power to another; and therefore, the succession contended for must as frequently have ceased as heretical Pontiffs have existed.

(5.) Decrees of Councils render all those ordinations null and void, where any simoniacal contract has been made. This renders it impossible to say, whether there are at present any lawful successors of the Apostles, according to the principles of the Papal Church. It is undeniable, that the popedom itself has, again and again, been obtained by bribery and other unfair means; consequently, such a succession as that which is contended for must have been frequently interrupted.

(6.) Individuals of the most infamous moral character, guilty of almost every mortal sin, might be adduced, who have filled St. Peter's chair. Is it credible, can it be possible, that such monsters of wickedness could transmit the sacred truths of God with fidelity, or that the Most High would choose them to be his Ministers in holy things? Their ministry cannot profit man and is not, therefore, valid in the sight of God.

[The second part of the Homily for Whit-Sunday observes, "As the lion is known by his claws, so let us learn to know these men (the Popes) by their deeds.

["* Dr. Comber, ut supra.

[† Powell on Apostolical Succession, sect. x., pp. 106—109. London, 1838.]

What shall we think of him that made the noble King Dandalus to be tied by the neck with a chain, and to lie flat down before his table, there to gnaw bones like a dog? Shall we think that he had God's Holy Spirit within him, and not rather the spirit of the devil? Such a tyrant was Pope Clement VI. What shall we say of him that proudly and contemptuously trode Frederic the Emperor under his feet, applying the verse of the Psalm unto himself: 'Thou shalt go upon the lion and the adder, the young lion and the dragon thou shalt tread under thy foot?' Shall we say that he had God's Holy Spirit within him, and not rather the spirit of the devil? Such a tyrant was Pope Alexander III. What shall we say of him that armed and animated the son against the father, causing him to be taken and to be cruelly famished to death, contrary to the law both of God, and also of nature? Shall we say that he had God's Holy Spirit in him, and not rather the spirit of the devil? Such a tyrant was Pope Paschal II. What shall we say of him that came into his popedom like a fox, that reigned like a lion, and died like a dog? Shall we say that he had God's Holy Spirit within him, and not rather the spirit of the devil? Such a tyrant was Boniface VIII. What shall we say of him that made Henry the Emperor, with his wife and his young child, to stand at the gates of the city in the rough winter, barefooted, and bare-legged, only clothed in linsey-woolsey, eating nothing from morning to night, and that for the space of three days? Shall we say that he had God's Holy Spirit in him, and not rather the spirit of the devil? Such a tyrant was Pope Hildebrand, most worthy to be called a 'fire-brand,' if we shall term him as he hath best deserved. Many other examples might here be alleged; as of Pope Joan,* the harlot, that was delivered of a child in the high-street, going solemnly in procession; of Pope Julius II., that wilfully cast St. Peter's keys into the river Tyber; of Pope Urban VI., that caused five Cardinals to be put in sacks, and cruelly drowned; of Pope John XIV. of that name, who, having his enemy delivered into his hands, caused him to be stripped stark naked, his beard to be shaven, and to be hanged up a whole day by the hair, then to be set upon an ass, with his face backward, toward the tail, to be carried round about the city in despite, to be miserably beaten with rods; last of all, to be thrust out of his country, and to be banished for ever. But to conclude and make an end, ye shall briefly take this short lesson,—Wheresoever ye find the spirit of arrogance and pride, the spirit of envy, hatred, contention, cruelty, murder, extortion, &c., assure yourselves that there is the spirit of the devil, and not of God, albeit they pretend outwardly to the world never so much holiness." *]

(7.) The succession has been broken by illegitimate occupancy. The most unrighteous means have been used to ascend the Papal throne: murder, incest, bribery, force, fraud, magic arts, have been in requisition for that purpose. Can any one suppose that the Almighty would sanction such nefarious proceedings in promoting his cause among men? Does he need the services of such, or will he recognise them as instruments in saving a ruined world?

From the foregoing we cannot fail to perceive, that the succession contended for has frequently been interrupted in the persons of the Popes of Rome.

12. The Bishops of that Church are not the true successors of the Apostles, any more than the Popes themselves.

(1.) Because they propagate doctrines which were unknown to the apostolic and primitive church. The authority of the Council of Trent among them is held most sacred, by which antichristian tenets have been established.

(2.) Because they confess that they receive all their power, jurisdiction, and dignity from the Pope, whom they acknowledge to be universal Bishop and supreme head of the Church.

(3.) They are unlawfully appointed, not being chosen by the body of Presbyters, and without the consent or approbation of the people.

(4.) Persons utterly unqualified have been placed in the Bishop's office; and they themselves have ordained Presbyters and others who were altogether unfit for the ministerial character and work.†

(5.) Bishops generally perform but a very small part of the episcopal functions. Few of them preach, or engage in those spiritual duties which eminently belonged to the primitive episcopate.

(6.) Popish Bishops, for the most part, have been employed in political and secular affairs: they have left the service of the sanctuary for attendance at the court, and have engaged in pursuits which ought to belong exclusively to laymen.

(7.) Many of these mitred heads lived profane lives, practised an impure celibacy, and were infamous for public and scandalous sins. The orator of the Duke of Bavaria, in the Council of Trent, did not hesitate to declare, that the Bishops were addicted to gluttony and whoredom. The character of many who were present at that Synod is well known to have been destitute of moral purity. Men of bad and licentious morals cannot be true successors of the Apostles of the Lord Christ.

(8.) Romish Bishops bind themselves by a wicked and unlawful oath to submit to the Pope, so that they are prohibited from speaking the truth, or acting according to the rule of right, if doing so would be prejudicial to the interests of the papacy. This is manifest, from the oath which they take to the Pope on their ordination as Bishops. The Prelate promises to be faithful and obedient to the Pontiff and to his successors,—not to advise or consent, or do any thing by which an injury should be offered to them on any pretence whatever,—to preserve, defend, increase, and advance the rights, honours, privileges, and authority of the Pope,—to persecute and oppose to his utmost all Protestants, &c. The Apostles certainly swore no such oath of fealty to Peter; but, on the contrary, when occasion required, freely admonished him. The Bishops of the Church of Rome, therefore, are not the true followers of the Apostles.

[* "It is evident that the Salique law is unnecessary to preserve Popish infallibility, or lady-Popes are no interruption to this 'direct lineage;' and as great ability has been evinced under the Papal and petticoat government of Pope Joan, when the tiara graced her fair brow, it shows a great want of gallantry in her successors, that she was not sainted pro forma. Leo IV. dying A. D. 855, Joan, a learned lady, (admitted on all sides to have possessed much genius and dexterity,) made her best courtesy from the Papal chair, in which she contrived to sit unmolested for two years, (a much longer period than many others have kept it,) when Benedict III. became the luminary of the 'direct lineage.' The ecclesiastical writers of the five succeeding ages never dreamed of denying the fact, so notorious in itself; and which could not in any wise derogate from the dignity or credibility of an infallible Church. Thus the fact was handed down to posterity by the same pens that recorded other pontificates, and was undisputed until the commencement of the Lutheran Reformation. Then it was that the Popish writers first determined to insist upon it, that all their predecessors who had written of Pope Joan were all wrong; that Joan was not a woman, or if she was a woman she could not have reigned; whilst others thought it best to insist that (notwithstanding the account is transmitted to us by their own infallible guides) there never was such a person at all. Those who would peruse the authorities (readily believed by Papists themselves on other points) in proof of the correctness of the above statement, are referred to the Exercitatio de Papa Fœmina, tom. ii. of Spanheim, in which they are collected; or L'Enfant's translation of it into French."—Christianity, Protestantism, and Popery, compared and contrasted, &c., p. 53, note.]

[* Sermons or Homilies, appointed to be read in Churches, in the Time of Queen Elizabeth, of famous Memory, pp. 512, 513. 12mo. London, 1839.]

† See various pertinent quotations from Roman Catholic authors on this point in Gerhard, de Eccles., sect. cxcviii., pp. 1005—1010.

13. We ask, finally, what claims can the Church of Rome challenge to herself that may not with equal propriety be demanded for the churches of Jerusalem, Antioch, Constantinople, Alexandria, and Syria?

Thirdly. There has been, independent of the Church of Rome, a succession or transmission of Christianity through a more holy channel, and in a purer state, than that of which she boasts. We adduce the following proofs:—

14. First. The records of Scripture have been preserved, and therefore the truth of Christianity, without the instrumentality of the Church of Rome, or that dependence upon her which she asserts. The original and ancient versions have come down to us independently of the aid of that hierarchy: in regard to modern translations, others have acted with more fidelity, and to a greater extent, than she has done. In circulating the Scriptures the paparchy is left entirely behind; and certainly this is one important mode of transmitting pure religion to posterity.

15. Secondly. In sending down purer records of the truth, we can only ascribe to the Romish priesthood the preservation of but a small part of the history of the Church. We cannot allow the Church of Rome any credit in preserving or producing the writings of the Greek Fathers, except in a very limited degree. We, without hesitation, deprive her of most of the writings of the Latin Fathers of the first six centuries: we cannot allow her any except the writings of those who filled the Roman See, together with those who were immediately under that authority; namely, the city of Rome and its suburban territories. Now if, in addition to the whole of the Greek Fathers, and several of the Latin, we subtract from her just meed of praise, what arises from the discredit that the truth of ancient documents has received from her forgeries, mutilations, giving credit to false decretals, &c., we shall find that her boasting ought to be much chastened, and her claims less arrogant. The decisions of the first six General Councils, of which the Church of Rome formed comparatively a small part, prove what little reason she has to assume to herself the credit of preserving and transmitting the records of our common Christianity.

16. Thirdly. However much the Romish hierarchy may boast of having preserved the succession in the Gospel ministry, or, as she terms it, in the priesthood, we are able to trace a far more regular and pure succession of Ministers than that of which she boasts. Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that a regular line of succession from the Apostles is necessary; even then this is preserved more directly through the oriental churches, (to say nothing of the Syrian which Dr. Claudius Buchanan found in the East,) than through the medium of the Church of Rome.

17. Fourthly. Let us come to doctrine. As far as the doctrines of Christianity have been preserved apart from the Scriptures, we can find them without journeying to Rome. Instance in the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Athanasian Creeds, to say nothing of various other symbols and documents, for the preservation of which we are but slightly indebted to Rome.

18. Fifthly. In regard of morality. Whether we refer to the theory or practice, we find not only its precepts, but all kinds of examples of it, in churches and individuals who never acknowledged subjection to the Pope.

19. Sixthly. In reference to church polity or government, the papacy is more faulty than any other church in the world. If, therefore, we are to look for a pure, a primitive, and scriptural form of church government, we may find it in other churches, which are much nearer the inspired standard than that which Rome has adopted.

20. Finally. Were the records of the Romish Church blotted out of being, and her entire priesthood annihilated, the truth of Christianity, and the authority of an evangelical ministry, would be supported on the same broad and firm basis as that on which they are now founded and promulgated.

["The only true and essential succession to the existence of a Christian church, then, is the succession of faith, truth of doctrine, and holiness of life. Some testimonies on this point we insert, and then conclude the subject.

["IRENÆUS.—'By this order and succession, that which was delivered by the Apostles to the church, the preaching of the truth, has come down to us. And thus it is most evident that one and the same living faith was delivered to the church by the Apostles, and has been preserved and transmitted down uncorrupted to the present time.'*

["CYPRIAN,—Referring to Stephen, Bishop of Rome, pleading tradition for what Cyprian believed to be a great error, answers, 'What does he mean by tradition? Does he mean the authority of Christ in the Gospels, and of the Apostles in their Epistles?.....Let this tradition be sacred.....For if we return to this head and original of divine tradition, human error will cease.....If the channel of the water of life, at first coming down in large and copious flow, should suddenly fail, should we not return to the Fountain? .....If the channel become corrupted and leaky, so that the water does not flow constantly and regularly, it must be repaired, in order to the supply of water coming down from the Fountain to the citizens. This ought the Ministers of God now to do, observing as their rule the divine precepts, that if any thing has tottered and shaken from the truth, it should be restored to the authority of Christ, the Evangelists, and the Apostles; and all our proceedings are to take their rise there, whence all order and divine authority proceed.....For custom without truth is only antiquated error. Therefore, forsaking error, let us follow the truth, knowing that, as in the opinion of Esdras, truth is victorious, so it is written, Truth remains and prevails for ever, it lives and reigns through endless ages.....Neither is there with truth any distinction or respect of persons, but only that which is just it ratifies; neither is there in the jurisdiction of truth any iniquity, but the strength, and dominion, and the majesty and power of all generations. Blessed be the God of truth! This truth Christ shows in the Gospel, saying, I am the truth. Therefore, if we be in Christ and Christ in us; if we remain in the truth, and the truth abide in us; let us hold those things which are of the truth.'†

["* Irenæus adv. Hæres., lib. iii., cap. 3.
["† Cyprian, Epist. 74, ed. Pamel., 1589.

[" GREGORY NAZIANZEN, in his Oration in praise of Athanasius, speaking of his election, as Bishop of Alexandria, to the chair of St. Mark the Evangelist, who is supposed to have founded that church, says that Athanasius was 'not less the successor of St. Mark's piety, than he was of his pre-eminence. For if,' says he, 'you consider Athanasius only as one in the number of the Bishops of Alexandria, he was the most remote from St. Mark: but if you regard his piety, you find him the very next to him. This succession of piety ought to be esteemed the true succession. For he who maintains the same doctrine of faith is partner in the same chair; but he who defends a contrary doctrine ought, though in the chair of St. Mark, to be esteemed an adversary to it. This man, indeed, may have a nominal succession; but the other has the very thing itself, the succession in deed and in truth. Neither is he who usurps the chair by violent means to be esteemed in the succession; but he who is pressed into the office: not he who violates all law in his election, but he who is elected in a manner consistent with the laws of the case: not he who holds doctrines opposed to what St. Mark taught, but he who is endued with the same faith as St. Mark. Except, indeed, you intend to maintain such a succession as that of sickness succeeding to health; light succeeding to darkness; a storm to a calm; and madness succeeding to soundness of mind! It was not with Athanasius as it is sometimes with tyrants, who, being suddenly raised to the throne, break out into acts of violence and excess: such conduct as this is the mark of adulterate and spurious Bishops, and who are unworthy of the dignity to which they are raised. These having no previous qualifications for their office, never having borne the trials of virtue, commence disciples and masters at the same time, and attempt to consecrate others whilst unholy themselves. Yesterday they were guilty of sacrilege; to-day they are made Ministers of the sanctuary: yesterday they were ungodly; to-day they are made reverend fathers in God: old in sin, ignorant of piety, and having proceeded by violence in all the rest, (as not being influenced by divine but human motives,) they crown the whole by exercising their tyranny upon piety itself.'*

["MELANCTHON.—'The church is not bound to an ordinary succession, as they call it, of Bishops, but to the Gospel. When Bishops do not teach the truth, an ordinary succession avails nothing to the church: they ought of necessity to be forsaken.'†

["PETER MARTYR.—'It is a most trifling thing which they' (the Papists) 'object against us,' (the Reformers,) 'that we want the true succession. It is quite enough for us, that we have succeeded to the faith which the Apostles taught, and which was maintained by the holy Fathers in the best ages of the church.'‡

["BISHOP JEWEL.—'The grace of God is promised to pious souls, and to those who fear God, and is not affixed to Bishops' chairs, and (personal) succession.'§ 'For that ye tell so many fair tales about St. Peter's succession, we demand of you wherein the Pope succeedeth him. You answer, He succeeded him in his chair; as if St. Peter had been some time installed in Rome, and had solemnly sat all day with his triple crown, in his pontificalibus, and in a chair of gold. And thus having lost both religion and doctrine, ye think it sufficient, at last, to hold by the chair, as if a soldier that had lost his sword would play the man with his scabbard. But so Caiaphas succeeded Aaron; so wicked Manasses succeeded David; so may antichrist easily sit in Peter's chair.'*

["THE REV. J. WESLEY.—'I deny that the Romish Bishops came down by uninterrupted succession from the Apostles. I never could see it proved; and I am persuaded I never shall. But unless this is proved, your own Pastors, on your principles, are no Pastors at all.'

["'But farther: It is a doctrine of your Church (of Rome) that the intention of the administrator is essential to the validity of the sacraments which are administered by him. Now, are you assured of the intention of every Priest from whom you have received the host? If not, you do not know but what you received as the sacrament of the altar was no sacrament at all. Are you assured of the intention of the Priest who baptized you? If not, perhaps you are not baptized at all. To come close to the point in hand: if you pass for a Priest, are you assured of the intention of the Bishop that ordained you? If not, you may happen to be no Priest, and so all your ministry is nothing worth: nay, by the same rule, he may happen to be no Bishop. And who can tell how often this has been the case? But if there has been only one instance in a thousand years, what becomes of your uninterrupted succession?'

["'This ad hominem (that is, according to your own principles). But I have a word more, ad rem (that is, on the true merits of the case). Can a man teach what he does not know? Is it possible a man should teach others what he does not know himself? Certainly it is not. Can a Priest, then, teach his hearers the way to heaven, marked out in our Lord's Sermon on the Mount, if he does not know or understand the way himself? Nothing is more impossible. But how many of your Priests know nothing about it? What avails, then, their commission to teach what they cannot teach, because they know it not? Did God, then, send these men on a fool's errand? send them to do what they cannot do? O say not so! And what will be the event of their attempting to teach they know not what? Why, if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch.'"†]‡

21. Fourthly. Are the Ministers of Protestant churches the successors of the Apostles? On this a few remarks only will be given here, as its complete discussion will be reserved for the chapter on the validity of the mission of Protestants. That the Reformed churches hold the true doctrines of Scripture, we have abundant proof. If, however, a local succession from the Apostles is insisted upon, we answer,

First. Succession may be said to be ordinary or extraordinary. Ordinary succession is when Ministers succeed in the place of their predecessors, whether they teach orthodox truth, or heretical dogmas. (Acts xx. 29, 30.) God, in governing his church, does not always make use of the ordinary succession, but sometimes, in an extraordinary manner, he raises up Teachers, by whose instrumentality he reforms the corrupt state of the church, and admonishes the regular instructors. Thus when Eli and his sons shamefully departed from God, the ordinary succession of Priests was interrupted, and the priesthood was transferred to another family. (1 Sam. ii. 30.) When, in the time

["* Athanasii Op., vol. ii. Append. Edit. Paris, 1627.
["† Loci Com. de Signis monst. Eccles.
["‡ Loci Com., Class., b. c.
["§ Apology
["* Defence of Apology, p. 634. Edit. 1609.
["† Wesley's Works, vol. iii., pp. 44, 45, edit. 1829."]
[‡ Powell on Apostolical Succession, pp. 149—152.]

of Ahaz, the temple was polluted, and its doors shut, and the High Priest Urias propagated an idolatrous worship, God raised up Prophets by whom he restored the divine service to its ancient purity. (2 Chron. xxviii. 24.) The same took place at other times among the people of Israel, so that the Levitical Priests, to whom the ordinary succession belonged, were corrected by Prophets extraordinarily called and sent, and the true doctrine was purged through their means from the contagion of idolatry. Thus Amos was divinely called to be a Prophet. And the Lord threatens the Priests of Israel, that, on account of their idolatry, he would deprive them of their office, and put others in their place. (Ezek. xliv. 12; Hosea iv. 6.)

Nor can it be maintained, as is alleged by the Church of Rome, that "under the Jewish dispensation, the ordinary succession might be interrupted, not having purity of doctrine perpetually joined thereto; but that the case was different in the Christian economy, which has promises of perpetual succession attached to the Popes of Rome." The Scriptures amply testify against this doctrine. There are extant mournful predictions concerning a very general apostasy; (2 Thess. ii. 3;) of a great number of false prophets; (Matt. xxiv. 5;) of wolves succeeding the Apostles; (Acts xx. 29;) of the church fleeing to the wilderness. (Rev. xii. 6.) In the Christian church it is foretold that God will raise up "two witnesses;" (Rev. xi. 3;) that is, a few faithful Teachers who shall restore the primitive doctrines and worship, so that the gates of hell shall not destroy the church. Just as under the Old Testament, God raised up Prophets extraordinarily sent, when those who were in the ordinary succession neglected their office, and permitted idolatry to advance; so, also, in the Christian dispensation, by John the Baptist and the Apostles, God restored the church to the standard of truth by the rejection of errors and superstition, when the Scribes and Pharisees, who sat in Moses's seat, neglected their duty, and corrupted the worship of God. In like manner, by the ministry of Luther and his associates, God restored the true doctrines and worship of the church.

["But as there are some persons," says Archbishop Whately, "who are too ready to separate from any religious community on slight grounds, or, even through mere caprice, to 'heap up to themselves teachers, having itching ears,' it has been thought, or at least maintained, that the only way of affording complete satisfaction and repose to the scrupulous, and of repressing schism, is to uphold, under the title of 'church-principles,' the doctrine that no one is a member of Christ's church, and an heir of the covenanted Gospel-promises, who is not under a ministry ordained by Bishops descended in an unbroken chain from the Apostles.

["Now, what is the degree of satisfactory assurance that is thus afforded to the scrupulous consciences of any members of an Episcopal Church? If a man consider it as highly probable that the particular Minister, at whose hands he receives the sacred ordinances, is really thus apostolically descended, this is the very utmost point to which he can, with any semblance of reason, attain: and the more he reflects and inquires, the more cause for hesitation he will find. There is not a Minister in all Christendom who is able to trace up, with any approach to certainty, his own spiritual pedigree. The sacramental virtue (for such it is, that is implied, whether the term be used or not, in the principle I have been speaking of) dependent on the imposition of hands, with a due observance of apostolical usages, by a Bishop, himself duly consecrated, after having been, in like manner, baptized into the Church, and ordained Deacon and Priest; this sacramental virtue, if a single link of the chain be faulty, must, on the above principles, be utterly nullified ever after, in respect of all the links that hang on that one. For if a Bishop has not been duly consecrated, or had not been, previously, rightly ordained, his ordinations are null; and so are the ministrations of those ordained by him; and their ordination of others; (supposing any of the persons ordained by him to attain to the Episcopal office;) and so on, without end. The poisonous taint of informality, if it once creep in undetected, will spread the infection of nullity to an indefinite and irremediable extent.

["And who can undertake to pronounce, that, during that long period usually designated as the dark ages, no such taint ever was introduced? Irregularities could not have been wholly excluded without a perpetual miracle; and that no such miraculous interference existed, we have even historical proof. Amidst the numerous corruptions of doctrine, and of practice, and gross superstitions, that crept in, during those ages, we find recorded descriptions, not only of the profound ignorance and profligacy of life of many of the Clergy, but also of the grossest irregularities in respect of discipline and form. We read of Bishops consecrated when mere children; of men officiating who barely knew their letters; of Prelates expelled, and others put into their places, by violence; of illiterate and profligate laymen, and habitual drunkards, admitted to holy orders; and, in short, of the prevalence of every kind of disorder, and reckless disregard of the decency which the Apostle enjoins. It is inconceivable that any one, even moderately acquainted with history, can feel a certainty, or any approach to certainty, that, amidst all this confusion and corruption, every requisite form was, in every instance, strictly adhered to by men, many of them openly profane and secular, unrestrained by public opinion, through the gross ignorance of the population among which they lived; and that no one, not duly consecrated or ordained, was admitted to sacred offices.

["Even in later and more civilized and enlightened times, the probability of an irregularity, though very greatly diminished, is yet diminished only, and not absolutely destroyed. Even in the memory of persons living, there existed a Bishop, concerning whom there was so much mystery and uncertainty prevailing as to when, where, and by whom, he had been ordained, that doubts existed in the mind of some persons whether he had ever been ordained at all. I do not say that there was good ground for the suspicion; but the existence, actual or even possible, of such a suspicion, the actual or even conceivable concurrence of circumstances such as to manifest the possibility of such an irregularity, is sufficient with a view to the present argument.

["Now, let any one proceed on the hypothesis that there are, suppose, but a hundred links connecting any particular Minister with the Apostles; and let him even suppose that not above half of this number pass through such periods as admit of any possible irregularity; and then, placing at the lowest estimate the probability of defectiveness in respect of each of the remaining fifty, taken separately, let him consider what amount of probability will result from the multiplying of the whole together.* The ulti-

["* Supposing it to be one hundred to one, in each separate case, in favour of the legitimacy and regularity of the transmission, and the links to amount to fifty, (or any other number,) the probability of the unbroken continuity of the whole chain must be com-

mate consequence must be, that any one who sincerely believes that his claim to the benefits of the Gospel covenant depends on his own Minister's claim to the supposed sacramental virtue of true ordination, and this, again, no perfect apostolical succession, as above described, must be involved, in proportion as he reads, and inquires, and reflects, and reasons, on the subject, in the most distressing doubt and perplexity.

["It is no wonder, therefore, that the advocates of this theory studiously disparage reasoning, deprecate all exercise of the mind in reflection, decry appeals to evidence, and lament that even the power of reading should be imparted to the people. It is not without cause that they dread and lament 'an age of too much light,' and wish to involve religion in a 'solemn and awful gloom.'* It is not without cause that, having removed the Christian's confidence from a rock, to base it on sand, they forbid all prying curiosity to examine their foundation.

["The fallacy, indeed, by which, according to the above principles, the Christian is taught to rest his own personal hopes of salvation, on the individual claims to 'apostolical succession' of the particular Minister he is placed under, is one so gross, that few are thoughtless enough to be deceived by it in any case where religion is not concerned; where, in short, a man has not been taught to make a virtue of uninquiring, unthinking acquiescence. For the fallacy consists in confounding together the unbroken apostolical succession of a Christian ministry generally, and the same succession, in an unbroken line, of this or that individual Minister. The existence of such an order of men as Christian Ministers, continuously from the time of the Apostles to this day, is perhaps as complete a moral certainty, as any historical fact can be; because (independently of the various incidental notices by historians, of such a class of persons) it is plain that if, at the present day, or a century ago, or ten centuries ago, a number of men had appeared in the world, professing (as our Clergy do now) to hold a recognised office in a Christian church, to which they had been regularly appointed as successors to others, whose predecessors, in like manner, had held the same, and so on, from the times of the Apostles,—if, I say, such a pretence had been put forth by a set of men assuming an office which no one had ever heard of before, it is plain that they would at once have been refuted and exposed. And as this will apply equally to each successive generation of Christian Ministers till we come up to the time when the institution was confessedly new, that is, to the time when Christian Ministers were appointed by the Apostles, who professed themselves eye-witnesses of the resurrection, we have, as Leslie has remarked,† a standing monument, in the Christian ministry, of the fact of that event as having been proclaimed immediately after the time when it was said to have occurred. This, therefore, is fairly brought forward as an evidence of its truth.

["But if each man's Christian hope is made to rest on his receiving the Christian ordinances at the hands of a Minister to whom the sacramental virtue that gives efficacy to those ordinances, has been transmitted in unbroken succession from hand to hand, every thing must depend on that particular Minister; and his claim is by no means established from our merely establishing the uninterrupted existence of such a class of men as Christian Ministers. 'You teach me,' a man might say, 'that my salvation depends on the possession by you, the particular Pastor under whom I am placed, of a certain qualification; and when I ask for the proof that you possess it, you prove to me that it is possessed generally by a certain class of persons of whom you are one, and probably by a large majority of them!' How ridiculous it would be thought, if a man laying claim to the throne of some country should attempt to establish it without producing and proving his own pedigree, merely by showing that that country had always been under hereditary regal government!"*]

We have reviewed those notes of the true church which are chiefly insisted upon; namely, unity, holiness, catholicity, and apostolicity. Roman Catholic Divines generally content themselves with discussing these in form, and incidentally introducing others, such as antiquity, power of working miracles, &c. We proceed to their examination.

IX. ANTIQUITY, as a note of the church.

Romanists say their Church is the most ancient, and on that account it has special claims of being the true church.

1. By divine precept we are commanded to examine, when antiquity is quoted as a mark of the true church, whether it is that true and prime antiquity which has its origin in divine revelation. The following text will show that the bad example of ancestors is not to be followed, though it has the plea of antiquity:—"But I said unto their children in the wilderness, Walk ye not in the statutes of your fathers, neither observe their judgments, nor defile yourselves with their idols: I am the Lord your God; walk in my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them." (Ezek. xx. 18, 19.) The Jews object to the doctrines of Christ on account of their novelty: "What new doctrine is this?" (Mark i. 27.) The Athenians said to Paul, "May we know what this new doctrine, whereof thou speakest, is?" (Acts xvii. 19.) The novelty alluded to was only apparent, and not real: it was new only to those who were nurtured in ancient errors. The Pharisees, on the question concerning divorce, appealed to antiquity, because, for many ages, bills of divorcement were customary among the Jews; Christ referred them to the true and prime antiquity as described in the Scriptures, in the words following: "From the beginning it was not so." Hence we learn that no support is derived from long-settled custom, or apparent antiquity, or prescription, for the purpose of establishing any thing in religion; as the Scriptures alone form the proper and authenticated standard.

["1. The Samaritans claimed it against the Jews, as appears from the woman's discourse with our Saviour: 'Our fathers worshipped in this mountain,' &c. (John iv. 20.) They had done so many ages before they worshipped in Jerusalem. It was here God appeared unto Abraham, who also in this place built an altar when he first came out of Chaldea. (Gen. xii. 6—8.) Here Jacob likewise built an altar when he emigrated from Mesopotamia. (Gen. xxxiii. 20.) Here there was a sanctuary puted as $\frac{99}{100}$ of $\frac{99}{100}$ of $\frac{99}{100}$, &c., to the end of the whole fifty. Of course, if different data are assumed, or a different system adopted of computing the rate at which the uncertainty increases at each step, the ultimate result will be different as to the degree of uncertainty; but when once it is made apparent that a considerable and continually-increasing uncertainty does exist, and that the result must be, in respect of any individual case, a matter of chance, it can be of no great consequence to ascertain precisely what the chances are on each side.

["* 'Κλεπτη δε τε νυκτος αμειναω.'

["† Short Method with Deists."]

[* Whately on the Kingdom of Christ, pp. 216—224.]

in the days of Joshua, who gave his last charge to Israel, and made a covenant with them in this place. (Joshua xxiv. 25, 26.) Here the patriarchs were buried. (Verse 32.) Nay, hereabouts was Shiloh, (Judges xxi. 19,) where, by the order of Joshua, the tabernacle, and the ark of God, were settled, long before they were brought to Jerusalem, (Joshua xviii. 1, 2,) which was all this time in the hands of the Jebusites. To which plea the Jews could not make an answer, but by maintaining this principle: 'That not the antiquity of place, but the authority of God's precept, was to be their direction in this case.' And God, it appeared by the holy books, had chosen Jerusalem to place his name there.

["2. Thus the Jews themselves argued against Christ, that he did not follow the tradition of the Elders, which had been derived to them from ancient times; (Mark vii. 1, &c.;) and against Christians, whom they call the sect of the Nazarenes; (Acts xxiv. 5;) as much as to say heretics newly sprung up from Jesus of Nazareth.

["3. And thus the Pagans argued against them both; particularly against the Christians, saying to St. Paul at Athens, 'May we know what this new doctrine, whereof thou speakest, is?' (Acts xvii. 19.) And in after-times calling it, a novel religion, a novel name; and disputing that their religion was the truer, because they were strengthened and defended by the authority of antiquity.

["So we read in Arnobius,* and in Symmachus,† and Prudentius,‡ and many others whom I omit; contenting myself with St. Austin alone, because he gives a most pertinent answer to this poor pretence; which will as well serve us against the Papists, as it did him against the Pagans, who contended that what they held was true, because of its antiquity. 'As if,' saith he, 'antiquity, or ancient custom, should carry it against the truth. Thus murderers, adulterers, and all wicked men, may defend their crimes; for they are ancient practices, and began at the beginning of the world. Though from hence they ought rather to understand their error; because that which is reprehensible and filthy, is thereby proved to have been ill begun, &c.; nor can it be made honest and unreprovable, by having been done long ago.'

["But this is a part of the devil's craft and subtilty, as he excellently observes in the same place, 'who, as he invented those false worships, and sprinkled some juggling tricks to draw men into them, so he took such course, that in process of time the fallacy was commended, and the filthy invention was excused, by being derived from antiquity: for by long custom that began not to seem filthy, which was so in itself. The irrational vulgar began to worship demons, or dead men, who appeared to them as if they had been gods; which worship being drawn down into custom of long continuance, thinks thereby to be defended, as if it were the truth of reason. Whereas the reason of truth is not from custom, (which is from antiquity,) but from God; who is proved to be God, not by long continuance, (or antiquity,) but by eternity.' §

["Let this be applied to our present business, and it is sufficient to show, that bare antiquity cannot be a note of truth; for there are very ancient errors. Which is so evident, that it is a wonder that such a man as Bellarmine was, should let this pass the muster among the notes he reckons up of the truth of his Church; which he could intend for no more than to make a show, and not for any substantial service, of which this is a demonstration, that he had no sooner named 'antiquity,' as the second note of the church, but, discerning it would stand him in no stead, he immediately sets it aside, and cunningly slides to another thing, with which he endeavours to blend and confound it; for thus he argues: 'Without doubt the true church is ancienter than the false; as God was before the devil; and consequently we read the good seed was sown first before the tares.'*

["But who doth not see that these two things are widely different, the one from the other,—antiquity and priority; that which is ancient, and that which is first? Whatsoever is first, as applied here to the church of Christ, is undoubtedly true; but whatsoever is ancient, is not always so; unless it be of such antiquity that it be also first. There is a double antiquity therefore, one in respect of us, the other absolute and in itself. This last sort of antiquity is the same with what is first; to which we are desirous to go, to which we are willing to stand, and by which we would be judged. By the rule which Tertullian lays down in several of his books,† we would bring our cause and church to be tried: 'That is truest which was first; that first, which was from the beginning; that from the beginning, which was from the Apostles; and in like manner, that from the Apostles, which in the churches of the Apostles was most sacred, namely, that which they read in their holy writings. This is our antiquity,' as he speaks in his famous Apology, 'præstructa divinæ literaturæ:‡ built before upon the divine learning. This is the rule of faith which came from Christ, transmitted to us by his companions; to whom all those who speak otherways, will be found to be of later date.'

["But to this they of the Church of Rome will by no means agree: they do not like to be tried only by the holy Scriptures, which is the true antiquity; that is, undoubtedly first, before all other traditions. A very bad sign this; an infallible note, all is not right among them, that they dare not abide by the Scriptures, but cry up other traditions; that is, boast of what is later, not what is first. And what is after the first, though it could be proved to be of great antiquity, cannot certainly be relied on; because there are errors and heresies so ancient, that they sprung up presently after the first truth.

["Mere antiquity, therefore, is not a good proof. For though the devil be not first, yet he is of great antiquity; being the old ὁ αρχαιος, that ancient serpent; who was a liar, as well as a murderer, from the beginning; and was so crafty, as in process of time to make use of this argument, to prove he was the Ancient of days, that is, God. And if there had not been something else, whereby he might have been discovered to be a serpent, who could have contradicted him, or confuted his doctrine and worship, if they had been to be tried by bare antiquity? Which is a proof so insufficient, that God himself, as ye heard before out of St. Austin, is not proved to be God by antiquity, but by eternity.

["Truth and error were born so near together, that after a long tract of time, they could not be distinguished

["* Lib. ii

["† Ad Valentin., Theodos., et Arcad.

["‡ In Agone Romani Martyris, 404, 409.

["§ Quæst. ex Vet. et Novo Testamento, quæst. cxiv

[* "Nam sine dubio vera ecclesia antiquior est, quam falsa, quemadmodum Deus ante fuit, quam esset diabolus. Quocirca Matt. xiii. prius seminatum legimus fuisse bonum semen, quam zizania."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Notis Ecclesiæ, lib. iv., cap. v., col. 169. B. Colon. 1619.

["† Contra Marcion., lib. iv., cap. v.; Adv. Praxeam, cap. ii.; De Præscript., cap. xxx.

["‡ Apologia, cap. xlvii.

merely by their age. No sooner was man created, but this serpent, by his subtlety, beguiled Eve. And immediately after our redemption, he attempted again to 'corrupt men's minds from the simplicity that is in Christ.' (2 Cor. xi. 3; 1 Thess. iii. 5.) And accordingly, as there was a church of Christ, so there was, together therewith, a 'synagogue of Satan.' (Rev. iii. 9.) There were 'depths of Satan also,' and a 'mystery of iniquity,' (which wrought even in the Apostles' days,) as well as a 'mystery of godliness,' and the 'deep things of God;' which wicked doctrines running down to posterity, made use, at length, of the plea of antiquity to give them countenance and support. Nor could it be denied, though it was proved to be a mere deceit; for it was refuted by the Fathers in such remarkable words as these, which give a deadly blow to the like plea of the present Roman Church: 'Custom without truth is but the antiquity of error. And there is a short way for religious and simple minds to find out what is truth; for if we return to the beginning and original of divine tradition, human error ceases. Thither let us return to our Lord's original, the evangelical beginning, the apostolical tradition; and hence let the reason of our act arise, from whence order and the beginning arose.

["'If, therefore, Christ alone is to be heard, we ought not to regard what another before us thought fit to be done, but what Christ, who is before all, first did. For we ought not to follow the custom of man, but the truth of God; since God himself speaks thus by the Prophet Isaiah: In vain do they worship me, teaching the commandments and doctrines of men. Which very words our Lord again repeats in the Gospel: Ye reject the commandments of God, that ye may establish your own tradition.' Thus St. Cyprian.*

["With whom Tertullian, whom he was wont to call his master, agrees, in many memorable sayings. 'Nobody can prescribe against the truth; neither space of times, nor the patronages of persons, nor the privilege of countries. From which things, indeed, custom having gotten a beginning, by ignorance or simplicity, and being grown strong by succession, pleads against truth. But our Lord Christ calls himself the Truth, not Custom. Nor doth novelty so much confute heresy, as truth. Whatsoever is against truth, that will be heresy, even old custom. †

["'Truth doth not stand in need of old custom to make it be believed, nor doth heresy fear the charge of novelty. That which is plainly false, is made generous by antiquity. For why should I not call that false, whose proof is false? Why should I believe Pythagoras, who tells lies that he may be believed?' ‡

["I omit all the rest; having said enough to show, that if antiquity itself be to be credited, we ought not to depend upon antiquity alone, but seek for ancient truth." *]

2. What does not apply to the church in all ages, cannot be a certain mark of the true church. But there was a time when the church was not ancient; therefore antiquity must be submitted to some test by which we may ascertain its value. The church of the Old Testament commenced with Adam; that of the New originated with Christ and his Apostles. Therefore the time was when the church was new, and might be, and actually was, charged with being a novelty. The Jesuits in modern times boast that they have founded many new churches in places where Christianity was before unknown. These are not ancient, but new churches: will it then be said that they are therefore false churches? If they say that on account of their agreement with the ancient catholic church, the Papal hierarchy is ancient, we say, that Protestant churches also agree with the ancient catholic and apostolic church, and have an equal claim to antiquity. Let them therefore cease to charge us with novelty. We inquire further. On what points do the true, but newly-formed, churches agree with the ancient catholic church? Certainly not in respect of time, but in agreement of doctrine and true scriptural character. Hence it follows, that the truth of doctrine, and not antiquity merely, is an infallible mark of the true church.

3. Bellarmine argues, that the Church of Rome is that which Christ instituted, because, "in every notable change in religion these six things can be discerned:—(1.) Its author. (2.) Some new doctrine. (3.) The time in which it began. (4.) Who opposed it. (5.) The place. (6.) Who were the persons who promoted the change." † The following observations are offered as a general answer:—

(1.) It is not true, that unless the above are forthcoming, no change can take place in the church. When Josiah reformed the Jewish hierarchy, the Priests of Baal might have said to him, had they been instructed by the Jesuits, that he had no authority to become reformer, because the six points, mentioned by Bellarmine, could not be discovered with certainty. In the time of John the Baptist and of Christ, that church was much changed from its primitive purity; nevertheless, there was no mention of those marks of mutation alluded to as necessary, before any permanent and effectual reformation could take place. The churches of Galatia and Corinth had deviated; yet we do not find the Cardinal's marks demanded before their errors could be corrected. The modern Grecian has departed much from the faith and morals of the ancient churches which were founded by the Apostles; yet who can trace those marks of change which Bellarmine declares to be so necessary?

(2.) Roman Catholics themselves have been compelled to acknowledge that many serious deviations from primitive purity have taken place. The Council of Trent, in the session on Reformation, says, "Ecclesiastical discipline was well nigh ruined, morals among the Clergy and Christian people were corrupt, the carelessness of the times and of men almost drove the ancient canons into desue-["* Epist. lxii. ad Cæcilium Fratrem, et lxxiv. ad Pompeium. Ed. Oxon.

[† "Hoc exigere veritatem, cui nemo præscribere potest, non spatium temporum, non patrocinia personarum, non privilegium regionum. Ex his enim fere consuetudo initium ab aliqua ignorantia vel simplicitate sortita, in usum per successionem corroboratur, et ita adversus veritatem vindicatur. Sed Dominus noster Christus veritatem se, non consuetudinem, cognominavit. Hæreses non tam novitas quam veritas revincit. Quodcumque adversus veritatem sapit, hoc erit hæresis, etiam vetus consuetudo."—Tertull. Opera, tom. ii., De Virginibus Velandis, lib. i., 8vo., p. 95. Wirceb., 1781.

[‡ "Neque veritas desiderat vetustatem, neque mendacium devitat novellitatem. Teneo plane falsum antiquitate generosum; quidni falsum, cujus testimonium quoque ex falso est? Quomodo credam non mentiri Pythagoram, qui mentitur ut credam?"—Tertull. Opera, tom. ii., De Anima, lib. xxviii. 8vo. Wirceb., 1781.]

[* Bellarmine's Notes refuted, pp. 42—48. 4to. London, 1687.]

[† "In omni insigni mutatione religionis semper ista sex demonstrari possunt: 1. Auctor ejus. 2. Dogma aliquod novum. 3. Tempus, quo cœpit. 4. Locus, ubi cœpit. 5. Quis eam oppugnaverit. 6. Exiguus aliquis cœtus, qui paulatim aliis accedentibus crescere cœperit."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Notis Ecclesiæ, lib. iv., cap v., col. 179, C. Fol. Coloniæ, 1619.]

tude."* The Council further asserted, "That in the celebration of mass, whether through the viciousness of the times, or the wickedness and negligence of men, many things, which are foreign to the dignity of such a sacrifice, appear to have crept in; which either avarice, the service of idols, or irreverence, which can scarcely be separated from impiety, or superstition, the false imitator of true piety, has induced."† Again, the Council, in its last session on Indulgences, says, "Anxious moreover to correct and amend the abuses that have crept in, and by reason of which this honourable name of indulgences is blasphemed by the heretics, the Council determines generally, by this present decree, that all wicked gains accruing from them, which have been the principal source of these abuses, shall be wholly abolished. But with regard to other abuses, proceeding from superstition, ignorance, irreverence, or any other cause whatever; seeing that they cannot be severally prohibited, on account of the great variety of evils existing in so many places and provinces, the Council commands each Bishop to procure a careful account of the abuses existing within his own jurisdiction, and lay the same before the first provincial Synod."‡ The president of the Synod, in proroguing the eleventh session, says, that innumerable abuses had crept into the administration of the sacraments. Adrian VI., although chiefly intent upon crushing Luther and his doctrine, was, for the attainment of that object, willing to make great sacrifices, and, in order to these, very humble confessions. In one of his instructions to his Legate, he commissions him to say: "We acknowledge that in this Holy See, there have for some years been many abominations, abuses in spirituals, excesses in mandates,—all things, in fine, perverted. Nor is it to be wondered, if the sickness of the head should descend to the members, that of the chief Pontiffs to the other inferior Prelates. We have all (Prelates and Ecclesiastics) declined to our own ways; and it has been long that there was none who did good, no, not one. Wherefore," &c. § The Cardinals, chosen by Paul III., in a Council concerning the reformation of the Church, whose proceedings were afterwards published by Vergerius, declare as follows:—"That the church of God was afflicted with abuses as with contagious or deadly maladies, especially the Court of Rome, by which it comes to pass, that by the gradual increase of these disorders, the church is threatened with ruin." Other authors might be quoted to the same purpose. Well did Alphonsus de Castro say, respecting the Agnoetæ, "Who was the author of this heresy, or when it began, no one can say."*

(3.) Christ, in the parable of the good seed and the tares, informs us, that the bad seed was sown by an enemy while the husbandmen slept. In like manner, the seeds of error sprung up in the church, so that neither the time nor authors can be clearly ascertained. This happened in the Church of Rome; for when the Bishops involved themselves in secular affairs, lived at ease, and became careless of their flocks, a great harvest of tares was produced.

Indeed, according to the well-known process of corruption, it is frequently difficult to fix upon persons and places. Livy and Sallust thus represent the progress of corruption in the Roman state.

(4.) We reply to the Papists, that it is useless to dispute about the time, or manner, or by whom, error originated: the inquiry should rather be, In what manner can these corruptions be removed, and a proper and efficacious remedy applied? That Physician would act absurdly who refused to administer the proper medicine, because he could not trace accurately the disease through all the stages of its progress, to its origin. Equally inconsistent it is for the church to deny that she is in error, because every advance in deviating from the truth cannot be directly followed.

(5.) It can be shown, by indisputable authority, that the Church of Rome is in error, and therefore her plea respecting the difficulties or circumstances alluded to by Bellarmine is of little moment. She has erred both from Scripture and the primitive church, as we have, in many instances, proved.

From the foregoing it is plain that though the authors, the time, place, and other circumstances of error, may not be accurately traced, nevertheless it may exist to a very great extent. We will next show,—

4. That in the case of the Church of Rome the points for consideration, as stated by the Cardinal, can be exhibited in most of the erroneous doctrines of her system. The Doctors of the Church have vehemently denied that any of the six can be shown to exist in their community. We shall examine.

(1.) They say, "Protestants cannot object to the author of our sect, nor call us after the name of any particular man." We answer, that St. Paul refers to the author of the Papal apostasy: "Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders." (2 Thess. ii. 9.) "In the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils." (1 Tim. iv. 1.) Here, the moving cause of the errors and sins which the Apostle foresaw would infest the church, was Satan. The secondary authors of this fearful apostasy were the Roman Popes, who degenerated from Bishops, and became Popes, and designated themselves Universal Bishops, and demanded so to be termed. To these secondary authors of this apostasy, may be added the numerous heretics from whom the Romanists received many of their errors, especially the Pelagians.

(2.) As to the origin of the alleged errors, this can be certified with considerable distinctness. The seeds of [* "Collapsam admodum ecclesiasticam disciplinam depravatosque in Clero et populo Christiano mores, antiquos canones, qui temporum atque hominum incuria pene in desuetudinem abierunt."—Canon. et Decret. Conc. Trid., sess. vi., Decret. de Reformatione, cap. i.]

† "Multa in missæ celebratione, sive temporum vitio, sive hominum incuria et improbitate, irrepsisse videantur, quæ a tanti sacrificii dignitate aliena sunt, quæ vel avaritia, idolorum servitus, vel irreverentia, quæ ab impietate vix sejuncta esse potest, vel superstitio, veræ pietatis falsa imitatrix, induxit."—Idem, sess. xxii., Decretum de Observ. et Evit. in Celebr. Missæ.

[‡ "Abusus vero, qui in his irrepserunt, et quorum occasione insigne hoc indulgentiarum nomen ab hæreticis blasphematur, emendatos et correctos cupiens, præsenti decreto generaliter statuit, pravos quæstus omnes pro his consequendis, unde plurima in Christiano-populo abusuum causa fluxit, omnino abolendos esse. Cæteros vero, qui ex superstitione, ignorantia, irreverentia, aut aliunde quomodocumque provenerunt, cum ob multiplices locorum et provinciarum, apud quas hi committuntur, corruptelas commode nequeant specialiter prohiberi; mandat omnibus Episcopis, ut diligenter quisque hujusmodi abusus Ecclesiæ suæ colligat, eosque in prima Synodo provinciali referat."—Idem, sess. xxiv., Decret. de Indulgentiis.] many, such as the merit of works, satisfaction, &c., are to be found among the ancient Fathers, who brought them from different religious systems which they individually maintained, previous to their conversion to Christianity. These were only occasionally introduced, and held no important place in their writings. Those who have carefully examined the events of history, will have learned that many things, unheard of by the Apostles, were introduced and even disputed by some of the Fathers; and in process of time, what was at first considered as merely probable, was received as certain by the Canonists and Schoolmen. What in the beginning was doubtful, was afterward received as an opinion; opinions became errors; and errors established became heresies.* Zosimus, about 420, claimed a certain prerogative over others. Hyginus instituted chrism. Innocent III. introduced transubstantiation, &c.

§ "Scimus in hac sancta sede aliquot jam annis multa abominanda fuisse, abusus in spiritualibus, excessus in mandatis, et omnia denique in perversum mutata. Nec mirum, si ægritudo a capite in membra, a summis Pontificibus in alios inferiores Prelatos descenderet. Omnes nos," &c.—Adrian VI., in Instruct. Legat. ad Comitia Norimb.

* "Agnoetæ Deo ignorantiam tribuebant: quis fuerit ejus hæresis auctor, aut quando cœperit, apud neminem reperire potui."—Alphon. de Castro, lib. v., advers. Hæres.

(3.) Romanists say, that we cannot mention the time of their defection, and consequently no such defection has taken place. To this it is answered, that a comparison of the apostolic and Papal doctrines will show that an alarming apostasy has befallen them; an apostasy which was not confined to one point, or to one particular time, but which advanced by degrees. And though we may not be able to specify the precise period in which every error of their Church was established, we can point out the time when it did not exist, and when it did. And on those topics which are most controverted, we can declare the time when they originated, and how long they were in progress, previous to their complete establishment.

(4.) The place of defection is sufficiently defined by designating the persons who were the chief actors in the affair.

(5.) We can further show that many of the errors of the Papal Church met with warm opponents when they were introduced. Irenæus reprehended and opposed Victor in claiming authority over other churches.† Augustine ‡ objected to the multitude of ceremonies. The sixth Council of Carthage resisted the assumed primacy of the Pope. The Waldenses condemned many doctrines of the Church of Rome, &c.

(6.) Objection. "It cannot be shown that the Church of Rome separated herself from a majority of the church, so that those who adhered to the Roman See were fewest in number, and that other Christians were the most numerous." Answer. The Church of Rome, by the reception of Papal dogmas, separated herself from the catholic church, which is by far the greater number, because it comprehends the faithful of every age, and in every place.

X. Of PERPETUAL or UNINTERRUPTED DURATION, as a note of the church.

1. That the church of Christ has continued without interruption, and will continue in existence to the end of the world, is without controversy. But that a church is the true church of Christ, merely because it has preserved an ecclesiastical organization, and a profession of religion, from the time of the Apostles, is not to be credited.

The synagogue of Satan may challenge to itself an uninterrupted duration from the origin of sin, and will continue to the end of the world. In the oriental churches the Nestorians, Eutychians, Arians, and others, boast of their continuance from the Apostles. The followers of Ebion and Cerinthus trace their origin also to that period. The Photinians, Mohammedans, and Gentiles can claim a pedigree up to the apostolic times, notwithstanding their heresies, blasphemies, and idolatries.

The Saviour declared, that the church shall endure for ever. But this promise does not refer to any particular church, but only to the catholic or universal church of the pious, which is built on the Apostles, and against which the gates of hell, that is, error and sin, shall not prevail. The Scripture says, that the church shall be eternal; but it does not say that it shall be confined to any particular place. Many churches, as those of Antioch, Alexandria, and Constantinople, suffered numerous and great interruptions; but they did not cease to be true churches of Christ. In that of Constantinople, Gregory and Nectarius, who were orthodox Bishops, succeeded Macedonius the heretic. In the church of Alexandria, Flavianus, and other exemplary Prelates, succeeded Nestorius the heretic. The ancient Roman Church, contiguous to the times of the Apostles, underwent a variety of vicissitudes, as well from the Gentiles as the heretics. The first Bishops were obliged to fly to the desert; but in after-times Marcellinus sacrificed to idols, Liberius became an Arian, Honorius a Monothelite, &c.

2. Bellarmine employs several arguments to prove the perpetuity of the Romish hierarchy. He says, "The Church is called 'catholic,' because it always was, and always will be, according to Dan. ii. 44: 'My kingdom shall stand for ever.'"* We answer, that the true catholic church shall remain for ever; but it cannot be inferred that the Roman is the true church, to which the promises of perpetual duration are made, because it is a particular church, and therefore may fail, though the true church shall remain. And although the latter will continue for ever, we cannot infer that every assembly which has existed without interruption is the true catholic church, because the synagogue of Satan has also been of long continuance. The tares are to be mixed with the good seed unto the end of the world: we concede, therefore, that the catholic church shall perpetually endure; but we deny that such promise was made concerning any particular church, as the Roman.

3. Bellarmine adduces the following argument to show that the Church of Rome alone was the true one:—"Before the time of Luther there were in the world only these religions: Paganism, Judaism, Mohammedanism, the religion of the Greeks, Nestorianism, the heresy of the Hussites, and the Roman Church. But it is certain that the true church of Christ was found in none of these: therefore it was in the Roman Church; otherwise true reli-

* See Exam. Conc. Trid. D. Chemnit., cap. de Origine et Progressu Erroris in singulis controversis Articulis. Fol. Francofurti., 1596.

[† "Quorum verba, utpote Victorem acrius et acerbius coarguentium, scriptis prodita adhuc extant. Inter quos Irenæus, quanquam per literas scriptas ex persona fratrum in Gallia, quibus præerat, tradit mysterium resurrectionis Domini solo die Dominico recolendum quidem esse: Victorem tamen de hoc, videlicet, ne tam multas ecclesias omnino propter traditionis ex antiqua consuetudine inter illas usurpatæ observationem, a corpore universæ Christi ecclesiæ penitus amputet, cum pleraque alia, tum ista quæ sequuntur, apposite et convenienter admonet his fere verbis."—Euseb., Hist. Eccles., lib. v., cap. xxiv. Fol. Paris, 1581.]

‡ August. Opera, tom. ii., Ad Inquisitiones Januarii, seu, Epist. liv. Paris, 1679.

[* "Tertia nota est duratio diuturna, nec unquam interrupta. Ecclesia enim dicitur catholica, non solum quia semper fuit, sed etiam semper erit, juxta illud, Dan. ii.: 'Regnum quod in æternum non dissipabitur.' Et Act. v.: 'Si est ex hominibus consilium hoc, aut opus, dissolvetur: si vero ex Deo est, non poteritis dissolvere.'"—Bellarm., Opera, tom. ii., De Notis Ecclesiæ, lib. iv., cap. vi., col. 174, A. Coloniæ, 1619.]

gion perished from the earth, which cannot be."* We answer: (1.) In the same manner the Pharisees and Jewish Priests might have argued against Christ and his Apostles; for before their time there was no religion in the world except that of Paganism and Judaism. But it is certain the church did not exist in Paganism; therefore the Jewish Church was the true church, and it was wrong in Christ and his Apostles to separate from it; which is absurd. (2.) It is allowed that the true church, during the ascendency of the Papacy, was not so visible and free from error as it has been since the Gospel was proclaimed by Protestants; nevertheless it cannot be inferred that the church of God, even in the dark ages, perished from the earth. It was hid in the wilderness, where God prepared a place for it. (Rev. xii. 6.)

4. The question has been proposed, "Where was your religion before Luther, who commenced his career in the year 1517?" We reply, that the doctrines of Protestants are truly apostolical, because they accord with those of the Scriptures. But if the inquiry is made concerning the continuation of these doctrines through the successive ages of Christianity, from the time of the Apostles to the Reformation, we answer, that it is not necessary to show how each doctrine has been preserved, but that each is evangelical and orthodox, and agrees with Scripture. We prove this as follows:—

(1.) By the example of the Israelitish church in the days of Elias. When the worshippers of Baal exercised the ministerial functions of the church, that Prophet judged there was no true worshipper of God remaining but himself. Yet the divine answer declared there were seven thousand. Now, though the regular ministry and the professors of religion had deviated from the true faith, God did not leave himself without witness, because there were seven thousand true worshippers of him, though they were not formally associated in visible church-fellowship.

(2.) By the example of the same church in the time of Christ and of his Apostles. The Jewish Priests, with the Pharisees, could, with the Jesuits of the present day, reason thus: "Before the time of Christ and his Apostles there were only two religions, the Pagan and the Jewish. The Pagan is confessedly false. If the Jewish were corrupt or degenerated in any degree, the consequence would be, either that the true faith had perished, or that the place should be specified where it was preserved." All that Romanists, therefore, can urge against us might be brought against Christ and his Apostles; and whatever can be pleaded in their favour, the same can be urged in behalf of Protestants.

(3.) As, therefore, in the Israelitish Church, notwithstanding their corrupted public ministry, sons and daughters were born to God, though it might not be universally or generally known who they were; in like manner, under Popery, a true church was providentially preserved, although its members remained in a state of comparative obscurity. Accordingly, the church is represented as having fled into the wilderness, where a place was prepared for her reception and safety.

[* "Deinde nostram ecclesiam esse veram ecclesiam probari potest etiam hoc argumento; nam ante Lutheri tempora non erant in mundo nisi hæ religiones, Paganismus, Judaismus, Mahometismus, Græcismus, Nestorianismus, Hussitarum hæresis, et Romana Ecclesia; sed certum est, non fuisse veram ecclesiam Christi apud ullam ex prædictis sectis, ut etiam Lutherani fatentur; ergo fuit apud Romanam Ecclesiam, aut certe periit de mundo omnis vera et visibilis ecclesia; quod non posse fieri, supra docuimus. At vero sectæ omnes hæreticæ brevi defecerunt, præter eas, quæ nunc exortæ sunt."—Idem, col. 174, D. Coloniæ, 1619.]

(4.) It is predicted that Antichrist should sit in the temple of the Most High, implying that he should exercise dominion in the church of God. Therefore Antichrist and the temple of Jehovah, that is, the Papacy and the church, were to exist at the same time: the Papacy occupied the church, and the church was in subjection to the Papacy. If the church had failed, Antichrist could not have sat in the temple of God. Thus the true church existed under the Papacy, though its glory was obscured. If, however, it cannot be shown accurately where and among whom the true church was preserved during the reign of Popery, that might argue a defect in the historical narrative, though it could not prejudice the truth of the divine oracles.

5. We shall now show how and among whom vital godliness, and consequently the true church, were preserved during the reign of Popery.

(1.) It is certain, that in the midst of Popish darkness, by the singular beneficence of God, the holy Scriptures were preserved, so that portions of them were publicly read and expounded to the people, and entire books of the inspired volume were perused in the schools. As often, therefore, as the word was read and expounded, so frequently was the confession of the true church publicly proclaimed; because the true church embraces the doctrines contained in Scripture; nor can it be doubted but God, through this medium, and according to his infallible promise, (Isai. lv. 10, 11,) rendered it efficacious to the conversion of men. Although false expositions, contrary to the word of God, were mingled with such preaching, yet the text itself was preserved, which the members of the church received as the rule of faith and morals, inasmuch as the ears of the auditory were more faithful than the lips of the teachers. So Christ commanded his hearers to observe and do what the Scribes and Pharisees, who sat in the seat of Moses, taught; while he warned them against the leaven of the Pharisees, or their false doctrine, which he declared to be hypocrisy. (Matt. xxiii. 2; Luke xii. 1.) The people were, therefore, bound to hear what they heard from the acknowledged authorities of the Jewish Church, as determined by the ministry of Moses; but the additions and perversions of the Scribes and Pharisees were to be universally rejected. Those were the authorized public teachers of religion, who sat in the seat of Moses; from which place they read to the people the writings of that important personage and the Prophets. "For Moses, of old time, hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath-day." (Acts xv. 21.) The faithful were required to receive all that was read from Moses and the Prophets. But they were equally bound to reject the leaven of the Pharisees, or, in other words, the traditions of men.

Precisely the same state of things existed under the Papacy. The Scriptures were publicly read, and from them those truths were proclaimed which led to the preservation of the church, and exhibited the way to eternal life. If, therefore, the Jesuits inquire, "Where was your religion before Luther?" we reply, that the doctrines of the Gospel were preserved in the holy Scriptures, and inculcated by reading them. The Protestant Churches embrace them, and none other; therefore the faith of Protestants was asserted when and wherever the word of God was read or published.

(2.) The acknowledged and public symbols of Christian doctrine, precisely as the Protestants receive them, were preserved during the reign of the Papacy; we allude to the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments.

The Apostles' Creed, which is an epitome of the principal and fundamental articles of Christianity, has been preserved from ancient time to the present, and it contains a summary of those doctrines which are inculcated and received by Protestants, in common with the primitive church.

The Decalogue, or the principles of morals, has been received and adopted by the Reformers with much more exactness and fidelity than by the Church of Rome.

The Lord's Prayer has been delivered down and received without any of those additions and uses which it obtained in the days of Popery.

(3.) In the midst of the Roman tyranny a remnant of faithful individuals existed. Many preserved true religion and undefiled in the midst of surrounding and general corruption; many testified with boldness and fidelity against the corruptions of the Papacy, and in favour of the doctrines and institutions of Protestantism.

(4.) We have also examples of entire churches which witnessed against the errors of Popery. We omit the African Church, with many others, and quote two which strenuously resisted the Papal supremacy.

The Church of the Waldenses, during the dark ages of Christendom, bore an undaunted testimony against the corruptions of Rome, and maintained inviolate the leading and characteristic doctrines of the Gospel.*

The Greek Church invariably, and with considerable success, opposed the pride and oppression of the Roman See.

(5.) Another class of opposers to the Church of Rome was found in those Emperors and Kings who resisted its authority, and complained of its corruptions. The history of Europe furnishes sad and degrading spectacles of the contentions of Kings and Popes for numerous centuries anterior to the Reformation.†

(6.) A long line of Confessors and of Martyrs have also given evidence against the Church of Rome, and in favour of those principles which the Protestants have diligently promulgated.

When, therefore, the Papists bring against the Reformed Churches the charge of novelty, heresy, schism, and secession from the church, we answer, that we have neither departed from the catholic faith nor from the catholic church, but from those errors, idolatries, and superstitions which were brought into it by the Papacy. We have not deviated from the true catholic community, nor even from the Church of Rome, so far as she agrees with the ancient apostolical church. We acknowledge, and glory in the fact, that we have rejected certain heretical tenets of the Romish Church; a departure which so far from being a defection from the ancient catholic faith, is in reality a strenuous adherence to it.

[Rome, therefore, cannot put in any just claim to duration; for, as Bishop Williams observes, "When we would know whether a church has this note of duration belonging to it, we must consider what there is in a church that is capable of being tried by this character, and that is either as to place, persons, order, or doctrine; for by these it is that the church doth exist, and is made visible; and so the church that puts in a claim to duration, must be able to show some evidence for it from hence, as far as she admits them for instances of that duration she pleads for.

["1. As to place. When we hear so much of the Church of Rome, it is to be supposed, that Rome is the principal seat of that Church, as well as the Pope of Rome is the head of it. But here they cannot pretend to duration; for if we look backward, we find not only the city of Rome frequently sacked and destroyed, and wholly depopulated, as it was by Alaricus, Gensericus, and Totylas, but even deserted by the Popes themselves, who, with their whole Court, resided at Avignon for seventy years together, as is acknowledged.* If we look forward, all that Bellarmine dares to offer upon the point, that the chair of St. Peter shall not be separated from Rome, is, that it is a pious and the most probable opinion.† But if we consult others, they say positively, that Rome shall depart from the faith, and shall be an habitation of devils, by reason of its wickedness and idolatry, and be the seat of Antichrist.‡

["2. If we proceed to duration, as it respects persons, where shall we expect that to be entire and uninterrupted, if not in the Popes? And yet, if we may judge of Popes as Bellarmine doth of a church,§ and that heresy doth nullify their elections and successions, as it doth the verity of a church, there is nothing more shattered. For if we look into the catalogue of them, we shall find Zepherinus a Montanist, Marcellinus sacrificing to idols, Liberius and Felix Arians, Anastasius a Nestorian, Honorius a Monothelite, John XXIII. denying a future life, with many others. Let us go on, and where shall we find more or greater schisms? one Pope cursing another, and undoing what his predecessor had done; as was the case of Formosus, Romanus, Stephanus, and Sergius; often two Popes together contesting for the chair, (as it was for above forty years at once,) and at one time three Popes had such pretences to the papacy, that each had learned men for their patrons, and it could not be easily judged which of them was the true and lawful Pope, as Bellarmine himself acknowledges.‖

* Gerhardi Locorum Theologicorum de Ecclesia sect. clxxix., p. 939, et seq.

† Idem.

[* "Deinde rursum occasio fuit transferendæ sedis tempore Gothorum; nam in primis, tempore Innocentii I., Alaricus Romam cepit, spoliavit, incendit, ut Hieronymus refert in Epistola ad Principiam de obitu Marcellæ. Deinde, tempore Leonis I., Gensericus rursum Romam cepit, ac spoliavit, ut scribit Blondus libro quarto decadis primæ, quo tempore sine ullo habitatore ad aliquod spacium temporis Roma permansit. Rursum, tempore Papæ Vigilii, Totilas Romam penitus evertit, mœnibus magna ex parte dejectis, et domibus fere omnibus incensis, adeoque eam desolavit, ut nullus neque vir neque mulier in ea remanserit, ut scribit idem Blondus libro sexto decadis primæ. Denique, toto tempore Longobardorum, Romani Pontifices in summis miseriis fuerunt, ut ex multis beati Gregorii Epistolis perspicuum est. Nec tamen unquam Romani Pontifices de mutando episcopatu Romano cogitaverunt."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. i.; De Romæn. Pontif., lib. iv., cap. iv., col. 813, B. Colon., 1620

[† "At secundum posteriorem sensum, Ecclesiam Romanam non posse deficere, est quidem pia et probabilissima sententia, non tamen adeo certa, ut contraria dici possit hæretica, vel manifeste erronea, ut recte docet Joan. Driedo, lib. iv., cap. iii., pars iii. de Ecclesiasticis Dogmat. et Scripturis."—Idem, 812, D.

["‡ Vega Jesuita in Apoc. 18, com. vii., sect. 4; Rhem. Annot. in Apoc., p. 17, 5.

[§ "Dico secundo, argumentum a successione legitima adferri a nobis præcipue ad probandum non esse ecclesiam, ubi non est hæc successio, quod quidem evidens est: ex quo tamen non colligitur necessario ibi esse ecclesiam, ubi est successio."—Idem, tom ii.; De Notis Ecclesiæ, lib. iv., cap. viii., col. 183, D. Coloniæ, 1619.

[‖ "Tricesimus septimus est Joannes XXIII., qui in Concilio Constantiensi, sess. ii., accusatur hæresis perniciosissimæ; dicitur enim negasse vitam futuram, et carnis resurrectionem. Respondeo, Joannem XXIII. non fuisse Pontificem omnino certum, et indubitatum, proinde non necessario esse defendendum: erant enim eo tempore tres, qui Pontifices haberi volebant: Greg. XII., Benedictus XIII., et Joannes XXIII.; nec poterat facile judicari, quis eorum verus ac legitimus esset Pontifex, cum non deessent singulis doctissimi patroni. Addo præterea, probabile vehementer, ac fere certum esse, eum errorem falso tributum fuisse Joanni Papæ Nam in pri

["3. If we proceed to order, either in worship or discipline, the case is so notorious as to the several formularies used heretofore in that Church, that it needs not to be insisted upon, and it is impossible for them to deny it.

["4. Therefore I shall proceed to doctrine, which indeed is the great character by which a church is to be discovered and tried. I shall compare the Church of Rome with itself: and if I can therein prove that it is not now what it hath been in many main points, it will follow that it has no pretence to this note of duration; for upon this point of alteration doth Bellarmine put the issue.*

["What the Church of Rome doth hold."	["What the Church of Rome hath held."
[SUPREMACY OF ROME.
["1. The Church of Rome is the mother and mistress of all churches, and to believe her so to be, is necessary to salvation.*	["1. Before the time of the Nicene Council, little regard was had to the Church of Rome.† And the Church of Rome called others apostolical and sister churches.
["2. The Pope of Rome is Christ's Vicar, and hath the supreme power over the whole church; and without subjection to him, as such, there is no salvation.†	["2. For one Bishop to set himself over the rest, and to have them in subjection to him, is the pride of Lucifer, and the forerunner of Antichrist.‡
["APOCRYPHA.
["3. The apocryphal Books are canonical, and Tobit and Judith, &c., are as much the holy Scriptures as Genesis, &c.; and whosoever rejects these as not canonical, is accursed.‡	["3. St. Jerome (who was a member of the Latin Church) saith, that though Tobias, Judith, and Maccabees, &c., were read, yet they were not received as canonical Scriptures.§ And Pope Gregory I., quoting the Maccabees, excuses himself for producing a testimony out of a book not canonical. 'We do not amiss,' &c ‖
["SCRIPTURE AND TRADITION.
["4. Scripture alone is not a rule of faith without tradition; and traditions are to be received with the like regard and veneration as the Scriptures.§	["4. Gregory I. saith, that 'all things which edify and instruct are contained in the Scriptures;' and that, 'from thence the teachers may presently teach whatsoever is needful.'¶
["SCRIPTURE IN UNKNOWN TONGUES.
["5. The Scriptures are not to be read in the vulgar tongue without licence, because more prejudice than profit will redound from it.‖	["5. Pope Gregory IX., anno 1237, declared, 'The not knowing the Scriptures, by the testimony of truth itself, is the occasion of errors; and therefore it is expedient for all men to read or hear them.'
["MERIT.
["6. Good works do truly deserve eternal life; and whosoever holds the contrary, is accursed.¶	["6. Gregory I. saith, that 'the best of men will find no merit in their best actions:' and that 'if he should attain to the highest virtue, he should obtain eternal life, not by merits, but by pardon.'†† And elsewhere he saith, 'I pray to be saved, not trusting to my merits, but presuming to obtain that by thy mercy alone, which I hope not for by my merit.'‡‡
["INDULGENCES.
["7. By indulgences granted by the Popes and Prelates of the Church, persons are discharged from temporal punishments here, and in purgatory.	["7. Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, in the time of Henry VIII., saith, 'The use of indulgences seems to be late in the Church:' and upon the recital of this testimony, Polydore Virgil adds, 'Which being things of so great moment, you might expect them more certainly from the mouth of God.'§§ Cardinal Cajetan saith, 'There is no

["* Quamvis autem hæretici hujus temporis non concedant nostram Ecclesiam 1577 annos durasse, concedunt tamen durasse sine ulla interruptione a Gregorio I. hucusque, id est, annos fere mille, quod tempus etiamsi solum esset, adhuc esset longius, quam fuerit ætas ullius hæresis: sed tamen falsum est non diutius durasse; ipsi enim non possunt ostendere per ullam historiam, aut veterum scripta, factam esse mutationem religionis in Ecclesia Romana tempore S. Gregorii."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Notis Ecclesiæ, lib. iv., cap. vi., col. 174, D. Coloniæ, 1619.

mis cum in ea sessione Concilii enumerentur articuli, qui objiciebantur Joanni Papæ, primum collocantur articuli liii., qui omnes ad mores pertinent, et hi omnes suis certis testibus confirmantur. Deinde adferuntur alii quidam sine certis testibus, et horum penultimus est is, de quo nunc agimus."—Idem, tom. i.; De Rom. Pontif., lib. iv., cap. xiv., col. 855, C. Coloniæ, 1620.

["* Conc. Trid., sess. vii.; De Bapt., can. iii.; et Bulla Pii IV.

["† Idem, sess. vi.; Decret. de Reform., cap. i.; et Bulla Pii IV.

["‡ Idem, sess. 4.

["§ Idem.

["‖ Reg. Ind. Libr. Prohib., R. 4.

["¶ Trid., sess. vi., cap. xvi., et can. 32.

[" Trid., sess. 25; Bulla Pii IV.

["† So Pope Pius, 2 Epist. p. 802.

["‡ Papa Gregor., 1 Epist. 36.

["§ Prolog. Prov.

["‖ Moral. in Job, lib. xix., cap. 13.

["¶ In Ezek. Hom., lib. i., cap. 8; De Cur. Past., lib. ii., cap. 11.

[" Epist. ad Germ. Archiep. Const. apud M. Paris. Hen. III.

["†† Moral., lib. ix., cap. 11.

["‡‡ In 1 Psal. Pœnit.

["§§ De Invent., lib. viii., cap. 1.

[" What the Church of Rome doth hold.	[" What the Church of Rome hath held.
	authority of Scripture, or ancient Fathers, Greek or Latin, that brings them (indulgences) to our knowledge.' *
[" PURGATORY.
[" 8. There is a purgatory after this life, where the souls of those that are not purged, nor have satisfied for their sins here, are there to be purged and to give satisfaction, unless their time be shortened by the prayers, alms, and masses of the living.*	[" 8. Bishop Fisher saith, 'There is none, or very rare, mention of purgatory in the ancient Fathers.'† And Pope Gregory I. saith, 'that at the time of death, either the good or evil spirit seizeth upon the soul, and keeps it for ever, without any change.'‡
[" SERVICE IN AN UNKNOWN TONGUE.
[" 9. It is required that divine service be performed in the Latin tongue; and whosoever saith it ought to be administered in a vulgar tongue, is accursed.	[" 9. Bellarmine acknowledges, that, long after the Apostles, both in the Eastern and Western Churches, the people were wont to answer in divine offices.§
[" INVOCATION OF SAINTS.
[" 10. In the Church of Rome they pray to saints and angels as their intercessors.†	[" 10. Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons, saith, 'Throughout the whole world, the Church doth nothing by invocations of angels;.....but directeth her prayers to God, who hath made all, and calls upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.' [" And it seems not to have been an article of faith in the times of Lombard and Scotus, (as it is now,) the one of whom saith, 'It is not incredible the saints do hear what we say;' and the latter, 'It is probable God hath revealed our prayers.'‖
[" IMAGES.
[" 11. Images are not only to be placed in temples, but also to be worshipped; as if the persons represented thereby were present.‡	[" 11. Pope Gregory I., after he hath allowed images in temples, for information of the ignorant, doth professedly forbid the worship of them.¶
[" SACRAMENTS.
[" 12. There are seven sacraments, truly and properly so; and whosoever saith there are more or fewer instituted by Christ, is accursed.§	[" 12. Cassander, a member of the Church of Rome, saith, 'We shall not likely find any before Pet. Lombard (who lived about 1130) that did define the number of the sacraments.' And particularly Alexander Hales, the famous Schoolman, saith, 'That confirmation was ordained to be a sacrament by the Meldensian Council.'††
[" TRANSUBSTANTIATION.
[" 13. Bread and wine, after consecration, are turned into the substance of Christ's body and blood, without changing the species.‖	[" 13. Pope Gelasius saith, that, 'in the sacrament the substance or nature of bread ceaseth not, or perisheth not.'‡‡ [" Gregory I. saith, that 'our bodies as well as our souls are nourished by the eucharist.'§§
[" COMMUNION IN ONE KIND.
[" 14. The people are forbidden to receive the sacrament in both kinds.¶	[" 14. Pope Gelasius declares, 'Either let them receive the whole sacrament, or let them be driven from the whole; for the dividing of one and the same sacrament, cannot be done without great sacrilege.'‖ [" And Pope Gregory I. affirms it to be the constant practice for the people to receive it in both kinds.¶¶

[" * Opusc. 15, cap. 1.
[" † Roff. contra Luther., art. 18.
[" ‡ Moral. in Job, lib. viii., cap. 8. Vide Vindication of the Answer to some late Papers.
[" § De Verb., lib. ii., cap. 16, sect. Sed neque. Vide Discourse concerning Celebration of Divine Service in an unknown Tongue, pp. 46—48.
[" ‖ Lomb. Sent., lib. iv., dist. 45; Scot. in 5 dist., q. 45.
[" ¶ Lib. vii., Epist. 109, ad Serenum, et Reg. Epist., lib. ix., Epist. 9, &c.
["  Art. 13, sect. de Num. Sacr.
[" †† Par. iv., q. 9, m. 1.
[" ‡‡ Gelas. cont. Eutych.
[" §§ Sacram. 16, Kal. Mar., and in 6 Psal. Pœnit.
[" ‖‖ De Consecr., dist. 2, Comperimus.
[" ¶¶ Sacram. in Quadrag., tr. 3. Vide Vindication of the Answer to some Papers.

[" * Trid., sess. xxv., xxii., can. 3.
[" † Trid., sess. xxv.; Catech. Rom., par. iv., cap. 9.
[" ‡ Trid., sess. xxv., Catech. Rom., par. iv., chap. vi., n. 4.
[" § Idem, sess. vii., can. 1.
[" ‖ Idem
[" ¶ Idem, sess. xxi., cap. 1.

[" What the Church of Rome doth hold.	[" What the Church of Rome hath held.
[" SOLITARY MASSES.
[" 15. Solitary masses, wherein the Priest communicates alone, are approved and commended; and whosoever saith they are unlawful, and to be abrogated, is accursed.*	[" 15. Anacletus, Bishop of Rome, did decree, tha 'all present should communicate, or else should be turned out of the church-; for so the Apostles did order, and the holy Church of Rome observeth.'* [" Gregory I. forbids the Priest to celebrate the eucharist alone.†
[" AURICULAR CONFESSION.
[" 16. Without particular confession of sins to a Priest, there is neither forgiveness nor salvation to be obtained.†	[" 16. This was neither in the time of Pope Gelasius, nor Pope Gregory I.‡
[" EXTREME UNCTION.
[" 17. Extreme unction is a sacrament, and to be administered when persons are in imminent danger; and last of all to be applied.‡	[" 17. In the time of Gregory I., it was used in order to recovery, and the eucharist was to be given after it.§
[" PRIESTS' MARRIAGE.
[" 18. Those that are in orders must not marry, and those that are married must not be admitted to orders.§	[" 18. To marry was a privilege belonging to the Clergy as well as others.‖†

[" By this parallel, thus far drawn between the ancient and present doctrine of the Church of Rome, we may be able to judge of the immutability and duration of the Church; which can no more be consistent with it, than one part of a contradiction can be reconciled to another; or than infallibility can be consistent with the having actually erred. To find fallible churches mistaken, and at some times to vary from themselves, is consistent with their nature, and for all which (if the errors are not fundamental) they are churches still; but to find errors and contradictions in an infallible church, is to confound the nature of things, to give the infallible church no advantage over the fallible, and to expose the persons that betake themselves to that shelter, to all the disquietudes, uncertainties, and disappointments of ignorance and error. For what is the usual reason given for forsaking other churches, but because they are fallible? What is the reason why they go over to the Church of Rome, but because she is (as they are made to believe) infallible? But if with her infallibility she has mistaken; if with her certainty she contradicts herself; if she was one thing in one age, and another in another; then there is the same reason to quit the Church of Rome, as there was to embrace it; and such persons must either be contented with a church that is fallible, or be of none."‖]

XI. Of AMPLITUDE, or the MULTITUDE AND VARIETY OF BELIEVERS, as a mark of the true church.

This mark of the church, claimed by that of Rome, has been anticipated in some degree under the note of catholicity. There are, nevertheless, some points referred to which require farther attention. Bellarmine claims amplitude, or the variety and extent of members, as a peculiar characteristic of the true church, and which he says properly belongs to that of Rome, and to none other.¶ In answer to this, we observe:—

1. There was a time when the number of the true church was very small. The flock of Christ was said at one time to be "a little flock."

2. The number of those in error and sin often exceeded those who were godly. In the days of Noah, he alone was found righteous. The greater part of the world always has been, and is now, on the side of iniquity. In the church, Arianism and other heresies were embraced occasionally by the majority of Christians. And though it is prophetically declared that the true religion will extend over the whole world, this does not imply that the spread of religion will consist in the number of its professors, but in this, that the knowledge of God and of righteousness shall cover the earth, as the waters the sea.

3. Moreover, as the Roman Church is wanting in true catholic faith, so also is she far from possessing that amplitude of which she boasts. Several classes of Christians, even whole nations, never belonged to the hierarchy of Rome, nor acknowledged her authority.

First. In arriving at a conclusion respecting the number of the members of the Church of Rome, we should deduct those who avowed infidelity, and who treated Popery with ridicule. The number of these will probably amount to not less than one-fourth of those who are reputed to be Romanists.

Secondly. We must subtract from the professed adherents to the Romish Church those churches which never heard of the Pope, or, if they did, it was to reject his authority. To this class belong various communities in Asia, Cilicia, Armenia, Ethiopia, Persia, the Nestorians, the Syrian churches, &c.

Thirdly. Others have invariably resisted the claims of the Papacy; as the Greek Church, the Waldenses, and the primitive churches in England, Wales, and Ireland, which were in a state of considerable purity before the emissaries of Rome overran the soil.

[" * Idem, sess. xxii., can. 8.
[" † Idem, sess. xiv., cap. v., can. 6, 7.
[" ‡ Idem, sess. xiv., cap. 13.
[" § Conc. Later. 1, can. 21, et Later. 2, can. 6.
[‖ Notes of the Church, examined and confuted, pp. 63—72. 4to. London, 1687.]

[¶ " Quarta nota est amplitudo, sive multitudo et varietas credentium. Ecclesia enim vere Catholica non solum debet amplecti omnia tempora, sed etiam omnia loca, omnes nationes, omnia hominum genera. Sic enim explicat, quid sit esse Catholicum, Vincentius Lyrinensis in suo Commonitorio, ubi dicit eos proprie esse Catholicos, qui tenent id, quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus creditum est."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Notis Ecclesiæ, lib. iv., cap. vii., col. 176, B. Coloniæ, 1620.]

[" * Par. iii., dist. 1, Episcop., et 2, Peracta.
[" † Greg., lib. Capitul., cap. vii., apud Cassand. Liturg., cap. 33.
[" ‡ Vide Vindication of the Answer.
[" § Sacram., p. 253. Vide Vindication of the Answer.
[" ‖ Geo. Cassand. Consult. Art. 23, et Polyd. Virg. Invent., lib. v., cap. 4."]

Fourthly. A considerable portion of the Christian world is also Protestant. Therefore, though the Church of Rome may possess amplitude in the number and variety of her members, yet, compared with the Christian world, she falls into the minority.

It is in vain that we are told that Christianity made great progress in the world from the days of the Apostles, and that in modern times the Romish religion extended to America and the Indies; inasmuch as the extension of religion in primitive times was not the growth of Popery, but of a purer system of Christianity; the progress of Romanism in South America and other countries, is the spread of a corrupted form of religion, the effects of which were not to elevate, but to degrade the morals and debase the mind, as is evident from the ignorance and viciousness which prevail among the great mass of converts to the Romish faith.

[Bishop Fowler observes, that "Cardinal Bellarmine pretends to bring this note of his out of the Bible, and merely to be beholden to Vincentius Lyrinensis for it, whom he first cites in its favour, though little to his purpose, as will be seen anon. The texts he produces are four; two in the Old Testament, and two in the New. Those in the Old Testament are, Psalm ii. 8, where God the Father promiseth his Son, 'that he will give him the Heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession;' and Psalm lxxii. 8, where it is prophesied, that Christ 'shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.' Those in the New Testament are, Luke xxiv. 47, where our Lord declareth 'that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem;' and Acts i. 8, where he tells his Apostles, 'that they shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon them, and they shall be witnesses unto him, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth.' And it cannot be doubted but that these texts do prove, that the members of Christ's church shall be a very vast multitude, and that its amplitude should even extend over all the world. But, nevertheless,

["1. It doth not from hence follow, that the conjunction of amplitude and multitude doth make a note, or distinguishing character, of Christ's true church. It is one thing to say, it belongs thereto as an attribute; and another, that it is appropriated to it as a note. That may be even essential to a thing which yet is not a note of distinction, or peculiar property, whereby it may be known from all other things. The power of sensation is essential to a man; yet for all that, he is not distinguishable thereby from a beast. But it is evident, from what hath been discoursed, that the true church is not to be distinguished from the kingdom of Satan, nor of antichrist, nor from erroneous sects, by amplitude and multitude; and that these together, or apart, are not so much as essential to the church of Christ, since there was a time when, as hath been said, it was without them both.

["2. This is so far from being a note of the church, that it is no more than a variable state and condition thereof; since it hath had, from time to time, its ebbs and flows, and hath had sometimes larger, and at other times straiter and narrower, bounds. This the Cardinal was aware of, and therefore, among other things which he would have to be observed for the right understanding of this his note, he saith: 'That, although the church ought not necessarily to be in all places at the same time, yet now it ought necessarily to be, or to have been, in the greater part of the world; for it is acknowledged by all, even the heretics themselves,' (meaning the Protestants,) 'that the church is now in her old age, and therefore must be past growing.' By the way, though all his heretics, no doubt, do believe, that the church hath daily grown elder and elder; yet I know not how many he hath found asserting, that she is now arrived at old age. But it will by no means be granted him, that the church is yet grown so old, as to be past growing; or to have a period put to its time of increasing. And therefore I add,

["3. That we have great assurance that the church hitherto hath not deserved to be compared with what it shall be before the end of the world, both in respect of its amplitude, and the number of believers. For there are very many plain prophecies from whence this may certainly be concluded; which all who without prejudice consider them must needs be satisfied, have not hitherto been accomplished; namely, those which have reference to the 'calling of the Jews,' and the 'bringing in of the fulness of the Gentiles,' and 'the most plentiful effusion of the Spirit,' and 'perfect rest from persecution,' and 'universal peace,' with the most wonderful outward prosperity of the church. There are, I say, abundance of the plainest predictions and promises of this nature, which the church hath not as yet experimented the performance of; and they are expressed in such words as that it may reasonably be believed, that those great things which God hath heretofore done for his church, either Jewish or Christian, are no better than types and emblems of what he intends to do, in his appointed time. Among those predictions and promises, the reader may consult these following, which are but a few in comparison of the whole number; namely, in the Old Testament, Psalm xxii. 27—31; Isai. ii. 1—6; chap. xi. throughout; Jer. xxxii. 37—43; chap. xxxiii. 7 to the end; Dan. vii. 13, 14. And in the New Testament, Matt. xxiv. 14; Rom. xi. 12, 25—33; 2 Cor. iii. 15, 16; Rev. xx. 1—7. Though the fulfilling of these scriptures hath been deferred for so many ages, yet 'He is faithful that hath promised' so glorious an increase of his church, with the other unspeakable blessings now mentioned, and will fulfil them when the time is come, which his infinite wisdom knows to be the fittest for that purpose. And thus much may suffice to be said, in reference to the Cardinal's proving this note by Scripture.

["As to those words, in the next place, of Vincentius Lirinensis, in his Commonitorium, which he produces for the confirming thereof, namely, Eos proprie esse catholicos, qui tenent id quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus creditum est: 'Those are properly catholics, who hold that which hath been always, every where, and by all believed:' I answer,

["(1.) That Vincentius doth not pretend to give us, in these words, a note of the catholic church, but of such a Christian. This is evident at first sight; and so is this,

["(2.) Whereas he makes it the character of a true catholic, to hold what had been believed, semper, ubique, et ab omnibus, it cannot be hence inferred, that he believed amplitude, or a multitude of believers, to be so much as an attribute of the catholic church; and therefore much less a note.

["(3.) If these words lay down a true note of a catholic Christian, then no body of Christians can be more evidently proved to be no true catholics, than those of the Roman communion, in all those articles of faith which are peculiar to themselves. For, as to points of mere belief, how much more than the Apostles' Creed can they show us to have been received, always, every where, and by all Christians? But as for that large addition of Tridentine articles, annexed to that Creed by Pope Pius IV., no unbiassed person can believe, they have ever done any thing like proving, that any of them have been received always, and much less every where, and by all those whom they themselves own for catholic Christians.

["(4.) By this note of a catholic church, no society of believers can bid so fair for catholicism, as the Reformed churches; whose avowed principle it is, 'to receive nothing as an article of faith but what is contained in the holy Scriptures, or may be proved thereby.'* Nor do they embrace any one doctrine as an article of faith, but what is clearly expressed in those books, of whose canonicity there never was the least dispute in the primitive church.

["I proceed to show, that if we should acknowledge this to be a true note of the catholic church, instead of enabling the Church of Rome to make good her pretension of so being, it will destroy it; and instead of doing disservice to the Reformed churches, it will do them excellent service, and be a certain argument of their being true parts of the catholic church. And,

["I will show that it will not at all advantage the Church of Rome, as to that her pretension, and therefore can do us no prejudice. The Cardinal proves,

["1. 'That his Church began to fructify throughout the world in the days of the Apostles,' from these words of St. Paul: 'The truth of the Gospel is come unto you, as it is in all the world; and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you,' &c. (Col. i. 6.) But what is this to his Church? Is the Gospel's bringing forth fruit in all the world the same thing with the Church of Rome's so doing?

["2. He adds the authority of several Fathers for this Church being spread in their time all over the then known world, but gives us none of their sayings except St. Prosper's. The first Father he cites is St. Irenæus; but he only saith, 'That this faith,' which he sums up immediately before, and is but the chief part of the Apostles' Creed, 'the church disseminated throughout the world diligently preserves, as if it were confined but to one house.' But how doth this concern the Church of Rome? which is not once mentioned with others here particularly named; except we could be made to believe, that wheresoever the word 'church' is found, that Church is still to be understood. Next he cites Tertullian, adversus Judæos: and having searched that book, I imagine these, or none other, are the words he means, namely, 'Those words of David are to be understood of the Apostles, Their sound is gone forth in all the earth, and their words unto the end of the world: for in whom have all nations believed, but in Christ, who is now come? The Parthians, Medes, Elamites, and those that inhabit Mesopotamia, Armenia, Phrygia, Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, and Pamphylia, Egypt, Africa, and beyond Cyrene, the Romans and Jews now in Jerusalem, and other nations; as now of the Getuli and Moors, all Spain, divers countries of the Gauls, and those of the Britains, which the Romans could never conquer, are subject to Christ,' &c. But I again ask, What is all this to the Church of Rome, more than to any other particular church belonging to any one of the many nations, of which that of the Romans is one, and two whole quarters of the world, here mentioned? His third Father is St. Cyprian, in his book De Unitate Ecclesiæ. But here there is nothing he could fancy to be for his purpose, except these words: 'The church is one, which by its fruitfulness is extended into a multitude; as there are many rays of the sun, and but one light, &c., so the church of our Lord, which being filled with light, sends forth her beams through the whole world, is but one light, which is diffused every where.' But though this be said of the catholic church, is there here the least intimation that the Church of Rome is this catholic church? After St. Cyprian follow several of the later Fathers, their books being only mentioned. But the narrow room to which I am confined will not permit me to examine them; nor need we look any farther to be satisfied, how this greatest man of the Roman Church condescended to the most shameful impertinence, in citing Scripture and Fathers for doing her service. But we must not overlook St. Prosper's verses, in his book, De Ingratis; namely,—

> 'Sedes Roma Petri, quæ pastoralis honoris
> Facta caput mundo, quicquid non possidet armis, > Religione tenet.'

'Rome, the seat of Peter, being made the head of pastoral honour in the world, whatsoever country she possesseth not by arms, she holds by her religion.'

["But, considering how early this Father, Prosper, lived, namely, about the beginning of the fifth century, he could mean no more than this, that the Church of Rome, the most honourable of all other, by means of that city being the ancient seat of the Emperors, still keeps possession of those places by the religion they received from her, over which she hath lost her old dominion. And what is this but another plain instance of most idle quoting of ancient authors? not to reflect upon adducing arguments from poetical flourishes.

["But not to stand to consider how ample the Roman Church was in the times of those Fathers, nothing is more evident than that that part of Christendom she took up, was but a small spot of ground compared with the space those churches filled, which, though they held communion with her, were distinct churches from her, and owned no subjection to her. And it was about, or above, an hundred years after the youngest of those Fathers, that the Pope was invested by that execrable wretch Phocas (a blessed title in the mean time) with the primacy over all churches. And Gregory the Great, who died in the beginning of the sixth century, not only sharply inveighed against John, Patriarch of Constantinople, and his successor Cyriacus, for assuming to themselves the title of Universal Bishops, (though there was no appearance of their designing any thing more thereby than an addition of honour, not of power, to that patriarchate,) but also called those who should affect such a haughty title, the 'forerunners of Antichrist.'* And as these Bishops taking this title was a demonstration that they acknowledged not the least subjection to the Bishops of Rome; so Pope Gregory's calling those Bishops who should so do, without exception, 'forerunners of Antichrist,' is as plain a proof that the Bishops of Rome, to his time, did not look on themselves as having a primacy over all churches. And it is manifest, that in the time of the Council of Nice, the Church of Rome was not thought to include the catholic church, or to be any more than one part thereof; this, I say, is ["* Article vi.

["* Greg., epist. xxxvii. et lxx., lib. xi., et epist. xxx., lib. iv."]

manifest from the sixth canon of that Council, namely, 'Let the ancient customs be preserved, for the Bishop of Alexandria to have jurisdiction over Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis; because the Bishop of Rome hath a like custom,' &c. Which is as much as to say, that the Bishop of Alexandria had then the same uncontrollable power in his large jurisdiction that the Bishop of Rome had in his. And therefore that Council knew nothing of this Bishop's having any power over the Alexandrian, and much less over the whole catholic church. Nor is any thing more certain, than that the mere superiority of honour, which the Roman Church had, was founded on no divine right, but only on that city being the seat of the empire. For, as the second General Council, namely, that of Constantinople, decreed in its third canon, that the Bishop of Constantinople should have the privilege of honour next to the Bishop of Rome, upon the account of its being the imperial city, and therefore called New Rome; so in the twenty-eighth canon of the fourth General Council, namely, that of Chalcedon, it was ordained, that for the same reason, the Bishop of Constantinople should have equal privileges with the Bishop of Rome. So that it is a plain case, that whosoever shall undertake to prove from any sayings of the ancients, for the first five hundred years at least, that the Church of Rome and the catholic church were reputed to be the same, and consequently, that whatsoever they said of the amplitude of this is to be understood of that Church, must necessarily make as sad work of it, as Bellarmine hath here done. And therefore it is apparent too, that no service can be done to the Church of Rome by this note, as to her pretension of being the true catholic church; from whence it will likewise follow, that no prejudice can from thence accrue to the Reformed churches."*]

XII. Of AGREEMENT WITH THE ANCIENT CHURCH IN DOCTRINE, as a note of the true church.†

1. If by the ancient church and doctrine Romanists mean the doctrine and church of the Apostles, we acknowledge that agreement with them is a mark of the true church. What that doctrine was which the ancient apostolical church embraced, cannot, and indeed ought not to, be sought in the writings of the Fathers who lived in succeeding ages, but in those of the Evangelists and Apostles.

If by the ancient doctrine and the primitive church are understood those which flourished subsequent to the times of the Apostles, we must be permitted to refuse to designate them apostolic. And though, as Hegesippus observes, "they called the church a virgin, for she was not yet corrupted by vain discourses;"‡ nevertheless there was no corruption of doctrines during the first five centuries such as those which sprung up under the Papacy. We notice four states of the church. The first was pure, as in the time of the Apostles, and in the age immediately following. The second existed in the time of the ante-Nicene Fathers who followed, when the doctrines of the Gospel began to be mingled with the inventions of men. The third was under the Papacy, when it was disfigured by anti-scriptural additions to, and perversions of, the truth. The fourth embraces the period when the ancient doctrines of Christianity were restored by the Protestant Reformation.

Here we are again led to that test of doctrine, the canonical Scriptures. The writings of Roman Catholics, and the decisions of the Papal Church, cannot for a moment be considered the rule of faith. Nor can the writings of the Fathers be viewed as such, though their claims might be greater than those of Rome. Because, (1.) This character belongs to the Scriptures alone. (2.) The Fathers themselves refer to them as such. (3.) Romanists do not always acknowledge the authority of those venerable men. (4.) The Fathers sometimes disagree among themselves in the interpretation of Scripture and in doctrine. (5.) Many of their writings have perished. (6.) Others which remain have been corrupted; and, (7.) Error and truth have been mixed in documents which are still extant.

2. Bellarmine makes use of the following argument:— "(1.) The true church is called apostolic, on the testimony of Tertullian, in his Prescriptions, not only on account of the succession of Bishops from the Apostles, but also on account of consanguinity of doctrine, because she retains that which the Apostles delivered; but it is certain that the ancient church, for the first five hundred years, was the true church, and therefore held the apostolical doctrine. (2.) Theodosius, the Emperor, is praised by Sozomen, because he said to the heretics of his time: 'Let us examine your doctrines by Scripture; and if they agree thereto, let us retain them; if not, let us reject them.'"* Answer: (1.) Agreement in doctrine, in the time of Tertullian and Theodosius, is in no other sense a mark of the true church than as their doctrines agreed with those of the Apostles. (2.) The standard by which to try such doctrines is the word of God, as contained in the canonical Scriptures. (3.) Tertullian makes his assertion depend not so much on the personal and local succession, as on account of agreement in doctrine; inasmuch as local succession and agreement of doctrine are not inseparable; many churches in which this local succession existed are deplorably deficient in purity of doctrine; and it is notorious that the Church of Rome is one of the number. (4.) It is confessed that the ancient church, for the first five hundred years, was the true church, and that it held the true apostolic doctrines: nevertheless, it is not denied, that she associated with these the chaff of human opinions; as may be shown from the writings of the Fathers themselves.

3. The Church of Rome embraces many doctrines not contained in Scripture, nor held by the early Fathers. This has been shown already under the several heads of controversy. A brief survey will not be unacceptable here.

With regard to the holy Scriptures, the ancient church rejected the Apocrypha from the canon. The Greek and [* Bellarmine's Notes refuted, pp. 77—85. London, 1687.]

[† "Sexta nota est conspiratio in doctrina cum ecclesia antiqua."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Notis Eccles., lib. iv., cap. ix, col. 184, C. Colon., 1619.]

[‡ "Et ecclesiam quidem hactenus virginem vocabant, propterea quod vanis sermonibus nondum corrupta fuerat."—Eusebii Eccles. Hist., lib. iv., cap. xxii. Cantab., 1720.]

[* "Vera enim ecclesia dicitur Apostolica, teste Tertulliano, lib. de Præscript., non solum propter successionem Episcoporum ab Apostolis, sed etiam propter doctrinæ consanguinitatem, ut ipse loquitur, quia videlicet doctrinam retinet, quam Apostoli tradiderunt; certum autem est, antiquam ecclesiam primis quingentis annis veram ecclesiam fuisse, et proinde apostolicam doctrinam retinuisse. Quare laudatur Theodosius Imperator a Sozomeno, lib. vii. Hist., capite xii., quod hac arte compescuerit hæreticos sui temporis. Jussit principes sectarum convenire, deinde petiit, an existimarent, antiquos Patres, qui ecclesiam rexerant ante dissidium illud, quod tunc de religione ortum fuerat, recte consensisse, et vere sanctos et apostolicos fuisse; quod cum illi concessissent, subjunxit: 'Examinemus ergo doctrinam vestram ad illorum scripta, et si cum illis consenserit, retineatur, sin minus, abjiciatur.'"—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Notis Eccles., lib. iv., cap. ix., col. 184, C, D. Colon., 1619.]

Hebrew originals were the standards; and the general perusal of the Scripture was an established point in the primitive church.

In the article concerning original sin, there was nothing taught in early days to justify the opinion that the Virgin Mary was not born in that state. This is acknowledged by many distinguished Romanists. Melchior Canus declares, that the dogma which holds "that the blessed Virgin was free from original sin is nowhere delivered in the Scriptures, according to their proper sense; nay, that the general law which is delivered in them embraces all who were descended from Adam, without any exception. Nor can it be said, that in the time of the Apostles this doctrine (of the Virgin being without sin) was received in the church; for it is manifest that the ancient writers did not obtain it from their ancestors; nay, all the saints who have made mention of it, assert with one voice that the blessed Virgin was conceived in original sin."* He asserts that Chrysostom, Eusebius, Remigius, Ambrose, Augustine, Bernard, Bede, Anselm, Bonaventure, Aquinas, &c., entertained the opinion, that the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary is not to be found in Scripture.

Suarez, another Roman Catholic Divine, observes, that "the ancient Fathers have said but few things concerning that special privilege of the blessed Virgin, because it came into the Church by degrees, and because they were taken up with explaining more weighty mysteries. Afterward, before the termination of five hundred years, this truth began to be taught more clearly; so that faith in it advanced, and by degrees pervaded the minds of believers; and now it is cordially received by the confession of all, especially as almost all ecclesiastical writers, Bishops, all religions and academies, have subscribed there to for two hundred years."†

Salmeron, in his comment on Romans, holds language similar to the following:—In reference to the opinions of the Fathers, which are adduced against the privilege of the immaculate conception of the blessed Virgin, (for some adduce two hundred Fathers; others, as Bandell, almost three hundred; Cajetan, fifteen, and these, as he affirms, irrefragable,) I answer, that we oppose one multitude to another multitude of Doctors, just as one nail may resist another.....But the more recent Doctors being more clear on this point, are to be preferred to the ancients.*

["Was any such thing as their pretended supremacy then allowed of, when, in the first General Council at Nice, there was a limited power assigned to the Bishop of Rome, as there was to the other Metropolitans of Alexandria and Antioch, who were to keep their bounds set them by ancient custom?† Which is utterly inconsistent with an universal supremacy over the whole church, by a divine right, as is since pretended and claimed, contrary to all antiquity; for the next General Council appoints the Bishop of Constantinople to have prerogatives of honour next to the Bishop of Rome, because that was New Rome;‡ so that it was the imperial city of Rome which gave the honour of being the first Bishop in the Church, and not a divine institution, or a succession from St. Peter; and when Constantinople, by the Emperor's removing thither, became the next great city, the Bishop partook of the honour of the city; and in the fourth General Council at Chalcedon had, for that reason, equal privileges conferred upon him with the Bishop of Old Rome,§ as the Fathers expressly declare. To which I shall add the famous case of Appeals, which was challenged about the year 418, by Pope Zosimus, over the African Church, not by divine right, but by a pretended ecclesiastical canon, which was found afterwards to be forged, and the power of the Church of Rome to receive Appeals, or to judge the causes of other churches, was fully disowned and disclaimed;‖ and this, with the ex-

[* "Beatam Virginem a peccato originali fuisse penitus liberam, e libris sacris juxta germanum literæ sensum nusquam habetur. Quinimo lex generalis in eis traditur, quæ universos filios Adam, carnali scilicet propagatione creatos, sine ulla exceptione complectitur. Nec vero dici potest, per traditionem Apostolorum id in ecclesiam descendisse; cum hujusmodi traditiones non per alios, quam per Episcopos illos antiquos et sanctos auctores Apostolis succedentes, ad nos usque pervenerint. At constat, priscos illos scriptores non id a majoribus accepisse."—Melch. Cani, De Locis Theol., lib. vii., cap. iii., p. 432. Lovanii, 1569. (Ed. Coll. Sion.)

["Sancti namque omnes, qui in ejus rei mentionem incidere, uno ore asseverarunt, Beatam Virginem in peccato originali conceptam."—Idem, cap. i., p. 422.]

[† "Secundum fundamentum ex Ecclesiæ auctoritate sumendum est, et primum omnium magni ponderis est totius Ecclesiæ fere universalis consensus, in quo consideratione dignum est antiquos Patres pauca de hoc Virginis privilegio esse locutos. Quod mirum esse non debet, tum quia Spiritus Sanctus paulatim suam ecclesiam docet, (ut Gregor. dicit, Homil. xxvi. in Ezechiel,) tum etiam quia aliis fidei mysteriis gravioribus magisque necessariis explicandis ac defendendis distinebantur. Postquam vero ante quingentos annos veritas hæc clarius cœpit doceri; ita insedit fidelium animis, crevitque paulatim ejus fides, ut jam fere omnium consensione recepta sit. Et præsertim abhinc ducentis annis ferme omnes ecclesiastici scriptores, Episcopi, universæ fere religiones et academiæ, subscripserunt."—Comment. ac Disput. in tertiam partem Divi Thomæ. auct. P. Francisco Suarez, e Societate Jesu, tom. ii., quæst. xxvii., art. ii., sect. v., p. 23, E. Fol. Mogunt., 1616. (Ed. Coll. Sion.)]

[* "Deinde illi multitudini Doctorum, opponimus aliam multitudinem, ut clavus clavo trudatur. Tertio, rationum efficaciam, quæ omni auctoritate præstare dignoscitur, in contrarium objicimus. Quarto, universæ pene Ecclesiæ consensum opponimus, et universitatum omnium concordem sententiam, præsertim ejus quæ primaria est. Nam in celeberrima Parisiorum academia nullus Magistri in Theologia titulo dignus habetur, qui primus etiam jurisjurandi religione non se adstrinxerit ad hoc Virginis privilegium tuendum, et propugnandum. Quare si auctorum numero decertare velint, proculdubio absorbebuntur. Nam ex quo ista quæstio discuti cœpit, pene omnes in Theologia Magistri, omnes verbi Dei præcones, omnes Reges, et Principes, omnes Respublicæ, cunctique populi, omnes Pontifices, et pastores, et religiosi, una et illa quidem ex parte, tantum excepta religione, in hanc sententiam convenerunt, quam et cultu divino celebrant, ut dicere possimus: 'Plures nobiscum sunt, quam cum illis.' Et certe, ut prudens quidam pastor dixit: 'Pauperis est numerare pecus.' Quinam enim illorum computant ducentos Patres, alii, ut Bandellus, adferunt trecentos. Cajetanus vero quindecim, et illos quidem, ut ait, irrefragabiles."—Alfons. Salmeron., Comment. in Rom. v., disput. 51, p. 467, tom. xiii. Fol. Coloniæ, 1604.

["Tertio, argumenta petunt a Doctorum antiquitate, cui semper major honor est habitus, quam novitatibus. Respondetur, quamlibet ætatem antiquitati semper detulisse: et quilibet senex, ut quidam poeta dixit, laudator temporis acti. Sed illud asserimus: quo juniores, eo perspicaciores esse Doctores: ita ut Aristoteles dixerit, per incrementa temporum perfectiores esse artes, et disciplinas: et apud Danielem: 'Tu autem Daniel, claude sermones, et signa librum usque ad tempus statutum: plurimi pertransibunt, et multiplex erit scientia.'"—Idem, p. 468.]

["† 'Τα αρχαια εθη κρατειτω, τα εν Αιγυπτῳ και Λιβυῃ και Πενταπολει, ὡστε τον Αλεξανδρειας Επισκοπον παντων τουτων εχειν την εξουσιαν, επειδη και τῳ εν τῃ Ῥωμῃ Επισκοπῳ τουτο συνηθες εστιν· ὁμοιως δε και κατα την Αντιοχειαν και εν ταις αλλαις επαρχιαις τα πρεσβεια σωζεσθαι ταις εκκλησιαις.'—Concil. Nicen., can. 6; Conc. Labb., tom. ii.

["‡ 'Τον μεντοι Κωνσταντινου πολεως Επισκοπον εχειν τα πρεσβεια της τιμης μετα τον της Ῥωμης Επισκοπον, δια το ειναι αυτην νεαν Ῥωμην.'—Concil. Constantinop., can. 3; Idem, tom. v.

["§ 'Και γαρ τῳ θρονῳ της πρεσβυτερας Ῥωμης, δια το βασιλευειν την πολιν εκεινην, οἱ Πατερες εικοτως αποδεδωκασι τα πρεσβεια· και τῳ αυτῳ σκοπῳ κινουμενοι οἱ ἑκατον πεντηκοντα θεοφιλεστατοι Επισκοποι, τα ισα πρεσβεια απενειμαν τῳ της νεας Ῥωμης ἁγιωτατῳ θρονῳ.'—Concil. Chalced., can. 28; Conc. Labb., tom. iv., col. 1691, D. Venet.

["‖ Concil. Carthag., can. 6.

emption of the churches of Milan, Ravenna, and Aquileia, from the jurisdiction of the Church of Rome, though they were so near neighbours to it, even in Italy itself, is enough to give full satisfaction to any reasonable man, what a different opinion the primitive church had of the Church of Rome, from what it now has of itself, concerning an universal supremacy, and of its being the mother and mistress of all churches.

["The next most peculiar doctrine of Popery, is transubstantiation; which, as it was formerly owned by Valentia,* Cusanus,† and a great many of the Schoolmen, Scotus, Durandus, and others,‡ not to have been the doctrine of the primitive church; so it has been lately proved at large by one of their own communion;§ though if for that reason it may be thrown out from being an article of faith by the members of the Roman Church, they will leave but very few proper to themselves, according to the principle, to wit, the making not the present, but the primitive, church, a rule of their faith; which if they will universally follow, it will lead them quite out of the Roman Church, as well as out of that single error of it. We have had such excellent treatises of late about this,‖ which prove it, beyond all exception, and beyond all answer, to be no doctrine of the primitive church, that I shall add nothing about it, but only these two observations.

["First. That it appears, not by any Liturgy or eucharistic form, that was ever used by the church; no, not by the Roman canon itself, which is much more ancient than this doctrine, and therefore not so conformed to it; that the church ever used any prayer to this purpose at the eucharist, that the substance of the sacramental elements should be changed or done away, and the flesh and blood of Christ substituted instead of them, under the species or accidents; but only that they might be made the body and blood of Christ by the Spirit's coming down upon them; so that it was only a spiritual and sacramental, not a substantial, change of them, that was ever prayed for, or ever believed; for if the church had always had this faith, it would surely have sometimes prayed in it.

["Secondly. I observe, that in those times when this doctrine came first into the Church, which was a little before Berengarius, it was so new and raw, that it was not fully digested, nor perfectly understood, even by those who then held it; as appears by that blundering recantation which was drawn up for him, after the examination of no less than three Popes and five Synods, wherein he is made to say, that 'after consecration the true body and blood of Christ is not only sacramentally, but sensibly and truly, handled and broke by the hands of the Priests, and ground by the teeth of the faithful.'¶ This sensible and true handling, and breaking, and grinding, Christ's body is so strange and dreadful a thing, that the Glossater observes this upon it, that, 'unless you do understand these words of Berengarius in a sound sense,' that is, contrary to what the words signify and mean, 'you will fall into a greater heresy than that of Berengarius himself;'*by which it appears that this 'monster of transubstantiation,' as a great man † of their own afterwards calls it, was so unformed and mis-shapen a thing at that time, that it was a sign it was then but new come into the world, and had need of being farther licked into a better shape.

["If transubstantiation were then but new, those other doctrines which have issued from it, and are its proper production, could not be old; such as adoration of the sacrament, communion in one kind, solitary masses, and the proper and propitiatory sacrifice of the mass; and therefore I shall not say any thing of them, since their date will be owned to be as late as that of transubstantiation; and though they may not follow from it, yet they cannot be maintained or believed without it; so that what has been said against the one, takes away the very foundation of the other.

["As to the number of the sacraments: though the Council of Trent has declared this to be exactly seven, and made it an article of faith to believe so, yet no man will have the confidence to say that this number was determined by the primitive church, when they can bring no author who makes any mention of such a number till eleven hundred years after Christ; and Bellarmine thinks it unreasonable we should require them to show this either in the Scriptures or the Fathers;‡ though if it be an article of faith which must be believed upon pain of damnation, there ought to be something to show for it, one would think, out of one of them.

["Was the necessity of auricular confession a doctrine of the primitive church, when, in the time of Peter Lombard, he tells us, that learned men were found to have different sentiments about it, and that the Doctors delivered themselves variously and differently upon it? and therefore it could not then be the doctrine of the church.

["Was the Roman purgatory a doctrine of the primitive church, of which Alphonsus a Castro confesses, 'There is almost no mention of it in any of the ancient writers?'§ Bishop Fisher‖ is of the same mind with him; and that old Christian custom of celebrating the day of their friends' death as a festival and day of rejoicing, because they were then released from all pain and sorrow,¶ is to me a plain argument they did not in the least believe any such thing." **]

We accuse Papal indulgences of novelty. This cannot be denied. Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, a distinguished Roman Prelate, in his Body of Divinity, says: "We have nothing concerning indulgences expressly from Scripture;.....nor even from the sayings of the ancient Doctors, but of the moderns."†† Fisher, Bishop of Ro-["* De Transub., lib. ii., cap. 7.

["† Exercit., lib. vi., Ser. 40.

["‡ Vid. Præf. ad Johan. Major.

["§ A treatise written by an author of the Church of Rome touching transubstantiation.

["‖ See Discourse of Transubstant'ation; Transubstantiation no Doctrine of the Primitive Fathers; The Doctrine of the Trinity and Transubstantiation compared, par. 1.

["¶ 'Post consecrationem verum corpus et sanguinem Christi sensualiter, non solum sacramento, sed veritate manibus Sacerdotum tractari, frangi, et fidelium dentibus atteri.'—Grat. de Consec., dist. ii.

["* 'Nisi sane intelligas verba Berengarii, in majorem incides hæresin quam ipse habuit.'—Glos., ibid.

["† Perrone. See the excellent Preface to a Discourse on the Holy Eucharist, in two great points.

["‡ 'Non debere adversarios petere ut ostendamus in Scripturis aut Patribus nomen septenarii numeri sacramentorum.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. iii.; De Effect Sacram., lib. ii., cap. 24, col. 195. Colon., 1619.

["§ 'De purgatorio fere nulla in antiquis Scriptoribus mentio'—Alphons. a Castro, Opera, lib. viii., Advers. Hæres., sect. Indulgent., col. 578, E. Fol. Paris, 1571.

["‖ Roffens. contra Luther., art. 18.

["¶ 'Nos non nativitatis diem celebramus, cum sit dolorum atque tentationum introitus, sed mortis diem celebramus, utpote omnium dolorum depositionem.'—Comment. in Job apud Origen., lib. iii.]

[ Notes of the Church examined and confuted, pp. 124—128]

†† "De indulgentiis nil expresse habemus in Scriptura sacra,.... nec etiam ex dictis antiquorum Doctorum, sed modernorum."—Anton. Archiep. Florent., Summa Theol., tom. i., pars i., tit. 10, cap. iii., in initio. Fol. Lugd., 1506.

chester, in his Answer to Luther, says: "Who can wonder, that in the beginning of the rising church there was no need of indulgences?"* Gregory of Valence mentions certain Catholics anterior to the time of Luther, whose sentiments Aquinas recites, who said, that indulgences were pious frauds.† Alphonsus a Castro writes thus: "Among those things on which we treat in this work, there is none concerning which the Scriptures express themselves less openly, and of which ancient writers speak less, than indulgences."‡

["What shall we think then of indulgences as they relate to purgatory? Had the ancient church any such notion of them, but merely as abatements of canonical penance? and purgatory, I suppose, is no part of that. Does not Alphonsus a Castro own, 'that they were received very late into the Church?'§ And Cajetan says, 'There is no authority of Scriptures, or of any Fathers, Greek or Latin, that brings them to our knowledge.'‖

["'Prayers and oblations for the dead,' I confess, are a very ancient practice; but I know no doctrine the primitive church had concerning them, but of the communion of saints, which was both in the church militant and triumphant; and they are so far from bordering upon the Roman doctrine of purgatory, that they utterly destroy it; for they were offered for those who were owned to be in happiness, and could never be supposed to go to purgatory, to wit, for saints, and martyrs, and Apostles, and even for the Virgin Mary herself, as appears by the ancient liturgies.¶

["As to 'prayers in an unknown tongue,' this cannot, I hope, be said to be the practice of the primitive church; and if the language of Rome had been as unalterable as she pretends her faith is, her prayers had been in a known tongue now; but I doubt they are both equally changeable.

["As to the 'worship of saints and angels,' and the offering up prayers to them and to the blessed Virgin, I shall adduce but one observation out of antiquity, which does for ever destroy all manner of worship, of what degree soever, to any but the true God; and that is the charge of idolatry, which was laid by all the orthodox Fathers against the Arians, for worshipping and praying to Christ, when they believed him not to be the true God, but only a creature, though of the most exalted nature. This does so fully show the sense of the church against all worship, be it of what kind it will, to any creature,—for it was not the highest and most sovereign worship which the Arians were supposed or charged to give to Christ,—that it is the plainest thing in the world, that there could be no manner of worship then to saints or angels, or to the blessed Virgin, as there is now in the Roman Church. But he that will see the clearest account of antiquity in this matter, let him consult a most excellent discourse, 'Concerning the Worship of the Blessed Virgin and the Saints, with an Account of the Beginnings and Rise of it among Christians,' against Monsieur de Meaux.

["As to the 'worship of images,' it is too well known at what time, and with what opposition, that was brought into the western church, and how great a part of it did then declare against them; so that it was impossible that should have been the doctrine of the primitive church, which was with so great a struggle and violence brought into the Roman, at the latter end of the seventh century. As to the first ages, it is plain from the instance of Epiphanius, and the Council of Eliberis, that they would not suffer images and pictures in their churches, and at first hardly thought the very making of them to be lawful, as appears from Clemens Alexandrinus.

["But I must not insist on particulars: I offer only some few undeniable breviates of antiquity, by which it cannot but evidently appear to any ingenuous man, that these doctrines of the Roman Church which distinguish it from the Reformed, were not the doctrines of the primitive church, but are plainly and notoriously contrary to the best antiquity; though they are very apt to brag of that upon all occasions, yet how little they esteem it, and how conscious they are to themselves, that it is not for their purpose, and that it is truly against them, I shall by some general remarks unquestionably demonstrate, and make them, if they have any shame, confess it themselves. And,

["1. What mean their 'Expurgatory Indices,' whereby they have corrected so many Fathers, and blotted out and expunged so many sentences out of the writings of the most ancient Doctors of the Church, and, by new additions, made them speak contrary to themselves in so many places of their works, if they were not sensible that those ancient authors, who bring down to us the doctrine of the primitive church, were in many things witnesses against them, and bore evident testimony against their new opinions? This is so plain a confession, that antiquity is against them, and renders them so much self-condemned, that they intended to have kept these Indices very private; and it was only by chance that we came to the first knowledge of them. The learned Mr. Thomas James has acquainted the world with the mystery of them, as he calls it; but it is so plain a mystery of iniquity, that it needs nothing to discover the fraud and villany of it. To rase ancient records, is a crime of the highest nature; and they who are guilty of it, as the Church of Rome is in the greatest degree, by thus purging and correcting the Fathers, by an inquisition the most cruel of any other, and that appointed by the Council of Trent, needs no other proof to convict them that that cause which requires such arts, is not to be defended without them; and this is such a note of a Church, that it brands and stigmatizes it with another mark than that of antiquity.

["2. Besides the correcting, or rather corrupting, so many Fathers, which were genuine monuments of antiquity, the counterfeiting so many false ones, and obtruding so many spurious authors upon the world, is a plain evidence of the want of true antiquity. This is like

* "Quis jam mirari potest, quod in principio nascentis ecclesiæ nullus fuit indulgentiarum usus?"—Assertionis Lutheranæ Confutatio, juxta verum ac originalem archetypum diligentissime recognita, et vitiis omnibus expurgata, per Reverendum Patrem Johannem Roffensem Episcopum, Academiæ Cantabrigiensis Cancellarium, art. xviii. Fol. Coloniæ, 1524.

[† "Una est, quam refert Albertus in quarta distinctione vigesima, articulo decimo septimo, et D. Thom. hic in supplem., tertiæ partis quæstione vigesima quinta, articulo secundo, quorumdam, qui dixerunt, Indulgentiam Ecclesiasticam nullam pœnam remittere per se, nec in foro Ecclesiæ, neque in foro Dei, sed esse piam quandam fraudem, qua Ecclesia per illam remissionis pollicitationem homines alliciat ad exequendum devote ea opera pia, quæ in indulgentiæ forma exiguntur; ut pro ratione ejus devotionis, et valore eorum operum, Deo satisfiat, non autem per vim ipsius indulgentiæ."—Gregorii de Valentia, e Societate Jesu, Comment. Theolog., tom. iv., disp. vii., quæst. xx., De Indulgentiis, punct. i., col. 1784, A. Lutet. Paris., 1609.]

‡ "Inter omnes res, de quibus in hoc opere disputamus, nulla est quam minus aperte sacræ literæ prodiderint, et de qua minus vetusti Scriptores dixerint."—Alphonsi a Castro Opera Adversus Omnes Hæreses, lib. viii., sect. Indulg., col. 578. Fol. Paris, 1571.

["§ 'Earum usus in Ecclesia videatur sero receptus.'—Alphonsus a Castro, lib. viii., Idem.

["‖ Cajet. Opusc., cap. xv.

["¶ Liturg. Ægyptiac., Liturg. Chrysost.

suborning of witnesses, which is enough to make all the world suspect that what they are brought for, and what they depose, is not true: it is no other than forging of old writings and instruments to help out the known weakness of a cracked title. Thus the decretal epistles were counterfeited, to prop up the Pope's spiritual power, and Constantine's donation to establish his temporal. The cheat of the first was so evident from the style, being so sordid and so unlike those ages, and yet being so like itself in all parts, as showed it to have throughout but one author, that though they were formerly made use of, and did great service, yet they are now laid by, as too gross to be owned by most of the learned men of that Church; and the other, though it be still defended by some of them, yet has such marks of forgery as make most of them confess it. But great numbers are there of forged and spurious authors, whose testimonies are still produced by these writers for those doctrines and opinions which are destitute of true antiquity, a collection of which is given us by Mr. James in his 'Bastardy of the False Fathers;' and all those critics, who have written censures upon the Fathers' works, cannot but own it. I cannot charge this upon any public act of the church, as that of purging and correcting the Fathers, but most of their writers who bring such large and false musters of the Fathers are guilty of it, and particularly some of their late books amongst us.* We have a very great and early instance of this notorious way of forgery in the very head and governors of that Church; and that was in falsifying the Nicene canons, and thrusting in a canon of a particular Synod among those of a General Council, thereby to claim a power of appeals to themselves; which was such an imposture as shows what some men will do to gain power and authority over other churches, and what an unfaithful preserver a church may be, that pretends to be infallible, not only of oral tradition, but even of writings too, for they had copies without question of the Council of Nice; and if the other great churches of Constantinople, Antioch, and Alexandria, had not had authentic and agreeing copies to the contrary, the churches of Africa had been run down by one of the most palpable forgeries in the world, and the Church of Rome would no doubt have made a great deal more use of it afterwards than upon that particular occasion. But,

["3. Though antiquity is to be sometimes suppressed and stifled, that it may say nothing against them, and sometimes suborned and counterfeited, that it may bear false witness for them; and though they generally make a fair show and a great noise with the pretence of it; yet they cannot but often betray the little esteem and regard which they have of it. Thus, to give an instance or two: in the famous question of the Virgin's immaculate conception, though the Fathers are acknowledged to be generally against it, and their own Bishop Canus† reckons up St. Ambrose, St. Austin, St. Chrysostom, and a great many more, who expressly assert her being conceived in original sin, and says, 'that this is the unanimous opinion of all the Fathers who happen to make mention of it;'‡ yet he declares 'this to be a very weak and infirm argument which is drawn from the authority of all the Fathers, and that, notwithstanding the contrary opinion is piously and probably maintained and defended in the Church.'* And Bellarmine says, 'They are not to be reckoned among Catholics,'† who are of another opinion, though it be contrary, it seems, to all antiquity. Thus at other times Bellarmine shifts off the authority of St. Cyprian, when he plainly opposes that of the Pope, and says, 'that he mortally erred and offended in so doing;'‡ and concerning Justin Martyr, Irenæus, and others, 'their opinion,' he says, 'cannot be defended from great error,'§ when it is against his own. Thus also of St. Hierom: 'He was of that opinion; but it is false, and it shall be refuted.'‖ And to mention no more, though they stick not upon all occasions to slight and contemn antiquity when it will not support them, Baronius, one of their greatest searchers into antiquity, but as great a corrupter of it, who had taken that oath, I suppose, prescribed by Pope Pius IV., not to receive or expound Scripture but according to the uniform consent of the Fathers, yet doth unwarily, but ingenuously, confess, 'that the holy Fathers, whom for their great learning we justly call the Doctors of the Church, yet the Catholic (that is, Roman) Church doth not always follow, nor in all things, their interpretation of Scripture.'¶ They can go off, it seems, from their oath, and from the Fathers too, when they think fit; and they are not always bound to keep so close to antiquity, as they give out at other times, and pretend they do." **]

We might proceed, and go through other heads of controversy between them and us, and show that the voice both of Scripture and early antiquity was not for them, and that, too, by the concession of their own writers;†† but enough has been adduced.

XIII. EFFICACY OF DOCTRINE, as a mark of the church.‡‡

Efficacy of doctrine may be taken in a twofold sense; namely, either as persuading men, and in its being received by them; or in its converting men from error to truth, and from sin to righteousness. It is no test of a true church that many receive their doctrines, or adopt their system. The great mark of truth is to turn men from sin to holiness.

Romanists inform us, that the Gentile nations were converted to God through the ministry of the Apostles. This is readily allowed; but then this is nothing in favour of the Church of Rome, which hath deviated from the doctrines, and lost that holiness by means of which conversions were effected in the days of the Apostles.

In the second place, they mention the change produced ["* Consensus Veterum, Nubes Testium.

["† Cani Melch. Opera, De Sanctorum Auctoritate, Loc. Theolog., lib. vii., cap. i. Colon., 1605.

["‡ 'Sancti namque omnes, qui in ejus rei mentionem incidere, uno ore asseverarunt, beatam Virginem in peccato originali conceptam, hoc vid. Ambros., hoc August., hoc Chrysost.,' &c.—Ib.

["* 'Infirmum tamen ex omnium auctoritate argumentum ducitur, quin potius contraria sententia et probabiliter et pie in Ecclesia defenditur.'—Ib.

["† 'Inter Catholicos non sunt numerandi.'—Bellarm. Opera, tom. iv., De Amis. Grat., lib. iv., cap. xv., col. 291, B. Colon., 1619.

["‡ 'Videtur mortaliter peccasse.'—Idem, tom. ii, De Rom. Pont., lib. iv., cap. vii., col. 817, C. Colon., 1620.

["§ 'Eorum sententiam non video quo pacto ab errore possumus defendere.'—Idem, tom. ii.; De Sanct. Beat., lib. i., cap. vi., col. 716, C. Colon., 1619.

["‖ 'Videtur Hieronymus in ea sententia fuisse, sed falsa est et suo loco refellenda.'—Idem, tom. i., De Pontif. Rom., lib. i., cap. viii., col. 529, C. Colon., 1620.

["¶ 'Nam sanctissimos patres, quos Doctores Ecclesiæ ob illorum sublimem eruditionem merito nominamus, in interpretatione Scripturarum non semper ac in omnibus Catholica Ecclesia sequitur.'—Baron. Annal. Eccles., an. 34, n. 213, p. 238. Colon."

[ Bellarmine's Notes of the Church, examined and confuted, pp. 128—134. 4to. London, 1687.]

†† See very pertinent quotations on the point in hand by Gerhard, de Ecclesia, sect. ccvi., pp. 1029—1037.

[‡‡ "Nona nota est efficacia doctrinæ."—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii., De Notis Ecclesiæ, lib. iv., cap. 6.]

in Pagans by Gregory, Boniface, Vincentius, &c., as proofs of the efficacy of their system. These conversions, which took place after the sixth century, are to be distinguished from those which were made previously to that period by the Apostles and apostolic men. Besides, the greater number of Roman Catholic converts are not distinguished for their good morals or knowledge.*

["By efficacy of doctrine," says Dr. Linford, "must be meant, either that power which the word of God has in the minds of particular men to dispose them to believe aright, and to live well; or else that success which it has in drawing multitudes outwardly to profess and embrace it. The former of these is too inward a thing to be the note of a true church, no man being able to know what the word of God has done in another's heart, but, instead of that, apt rather to be deceived in what it has done in his own.

["The second (which must be that the Cardinal means) can as little be a note, by reason of its uncertainty; and if we cannot be sure of the note, we shall be less so of that which we are to find out by it. If, indeed, there were nothing which could or did move men to relinquish Heathenism, Judaism, or Turcism, for our religion, but the pure efficacy of the Christian doctrine, it would be a very good note of the excellence of the doctrine itself; but, according to the Cardinal's own principles, it could be no note that that were the true church which preached it, since he will not allow the sincere preaching of truth to signify any thing. And we shall have much less reason to rely on this note, if we consider how many other things there are, besides the efficacy of the Christian doctrine, which have converted, and may convert, whole nations to it.

["Let us, therefore, at present grant, in general, the matter of fact to be true, that such conversions as the Cardinal speaks of were made by the Church of Rome; yet how shall we know that they were made purely by the efficacy of its doctrine, and that no other means, such as force, &c., were used? Is it enough that he tells us so? The Bishop of Meaux informs us, that in the late great conversion in France, not one of the persons converted suffered violence, either in his person or goods; that they were so far from enduring torments, that they had not so much as heard them mentioned; and that he heard other Bishops affirm the same.† Now, if those reverend Prelates were out (as most people think they were) in a matter of fact, of which they might be eye-witnesses, why may not the learned Cardinal be so too, in his relation of conversions made so many hundred years since? If he be out, his note falls to the ground; and if it cannot be made plainly to appear to us that he was not out, his note, as far as it is founded upon those histories which he produces, wants that certainty which should give us satisfaction. Historians, who wrote in those obscure times, and were perhaps themselves converters, being most of them Monks, might vain-gloriously ascribe much to the efficacy of their own doctrine; and the Centuriators themselves, whom he so often quotes, might not be very curious to search, or accurate to relate, the chief motives of their conversions, because they wrote before the Cardinal had made 'efficacy of doctrine' a note of the true church, and little dreamed what odd use some men would make of their history. But notwithstanding these neglects and disadvantages, I do not doubt but that, if we looked back into the writers of those times, nay, even into the Centuriators themselves, we should find some other things beside 'efficacy of doctrine,' concurring to the conversions which were then wrought; an instance whereof (to pass by at present the particular examination of those mentioned by the Cardinal) we have, in those conversions effected by Charles the Great, to whose victorious arms they were more to be ascribed than to any thing else. For (not to mention that the Clergy were not then in any great capacity of doing much by the efficacy of their doctrine, the Bishops being so ignorant that they were commanded to understand the Lord's Prayer, and could hardly be brought to make some few exhortations to the people, but instead of that turned soldiers, to show that they were willing to do somewhat towards the propagating their religion) such was the zeal of that Prince 'rather to defend and increase the kingdom of Jesus Christ, than to enlarge his own empire;'* that peace could never be obtained of him upon other terms, than that those who were conquered by him, having left their idol-worship, should embrace the true, sincere, and eternal religion of Christ.† And to engage them to continue firm to it, he sometimes took hostages of them; and finding them begin to apostatize, (which they as often did as they thought themselves able to make head against their conquerors,) he was forced to set up a kind of inquisition to keep them in awe, which, Mezeray tells us, lasted in Westphalia till the fifteenth century. Now, when the swords of victorious Princes, as it happened in this case, had made way for the preaching of the Gospel, when the receiving of it was often made one of the terms to which they who were conquered must necessarily submit, the Monks had very easy work: whatever dogmas they had preached might have been efficacious under such circumstances; so that when there is with the Christian doctrine a concurrence of many other things which have so strong an influence upon human nature, it is hard, nay, impossible, for us to know which of them does the work. When different medicines, proper for the same distemper, are administered at the same time, it is not easy to say which of them works the cure.

["There is, indeed, a wonderful efficacy in the Christian doctrine; but we can never be sure that the conversion of a nation is effected by that, when hopes, and fears, outward force, and necessity, are in conjunction with it.

["All which is so far from detracting from the honour of our religion, and the conversions it made in the primitive times, that it sets it in a better light, and makes it shine the brighter. Men were converted then, not to a conquering, but persecuted, church. The secular power was against them that preached this holy doctrine; much might be lost, and nothing in this world gained, by it. There were no rewards to encourage men to receive it; but a thousand difficulties and dangers to deter them from it. And then, indeed, the efficacy of the Christian doctrine was in its greatest lustre; it wrought all alone, and had

[* "Denique hoc nostro seculo in novo orbe multa millia Gentilium Catholici converterunt: Judæorum quoque singulis annis convertuntur et baptizantur Romæ aliqui a Catholicis Pontifici Romano addictis, nec desunt etiam Turcæ, qui, tum Romæ tum alibi, a Catholicis convertantur: Lutherani vero vix unum aut alterum converterunt, cum tamen comparent se cum Apostolis et Evangelistis, et habeant in Germania plurimos Judæos, et in Polonia et Hungaria vicinissimos Turcas. Rectissime igitur B. August., lib. xiii., contra Faustum, cap. xii., comparat hæreticos cum perdicibus, quæ congregant pullos, quos non pepererunt, cum e contrario Ecclesia fit columba fœcundissima, quæ quotidie parit novos pullos."—Idem, lib. iv., cap. xii., col. 203, C. Coloniæ, 1619.]

[† Pastoral Letter, pp. 3, 4.

[* Mezeray, in the Life of Charles the Great.

[† Crantsius, Præf. ad Metrop. Fol. Basil, 1768.

nothing to put in with it for a share in the conquests it made; the simplicity of its Preachers cleared them from all suspicion of fraud. The little or no interest they had in the government, makes it plain that they could not use force; and every thing concurred to demonstrate that it was purely the efficacy of their doctrine by which they prevailed.

["As for what Bellarmine saith, in the second place, concerning the prevalency of the Christian doctrine in the beginning of the church, we allow it all to be true; but we do not think the Church of Rome to be more concerned in it than any other Christian church whatsoever. What then happened does very much confirm the Christian doctrine in the general, but does not at all prove any particular party of Christians to be better than another, much less the Church of Rome; whose doctrine, although it was once the same with the doctrine of the primitive church, yet, what it was in the Cardinal's days, and what it is now, is quite another thing. The primitive Christians converted the Heathens from their idolatry to worship the true God; but the great design of the Catholic Missionaries is to render their proselytes entirely submissive to the Pope of Rome in all things.

["I might here conclude, did not the Cardinal much insist upon the particular conversions wrought by the Church of Rome; upon some of which, in the third place, I shall make a few brief reflections.

["Now, as to the conversion of the English, by Augustine the Monk, it may be replied:—

["(1.) That the Centurists (out of whom he quotes this and the other instances) do expressly say, that Augustine *eas ecclesias magis deformavit quam recte instituit.

["(2.) That this was not such a general conversion as seems to be pretended; for, as has been lately cleared by a very learned man,† the faith was here planted during the Apostles' times, and in all probability by St. Paul, rather than by St. Peter, or any one else. Besides, Bede‡ gives us an account of Germanus, Lupus, and Severus, coming over hither to reclaim the Britons from the heresy of Pelagius, several years before the arrival of Augustine, and that, at his coming over, several British Bishops met him at Augustine's Ac, (Oak,) and stoutly refused all submission, either to the Church of Rome, or to him.§ Lastly, although he might be very instrumental towards the conversion of the Saxons in Kent, yet was he, even in that affair, mightily assisted by the authority of a Christian Queen, named Bertha,‖ and a Christian Bishop, named Luidhardus.

["(3.) That the doctrine which Augustine taught,¶ being the doctrine of Gregory the Great, is vastly different from what has been since taught in the Church of Rome.

["(4.) That Augustine's proud carriage towards the British Bishops, and the death of one thousand two hundred Monks at Bangor, (Iscoed,) occasioned by their denial of subjection unto him, do sufficiently show of what temper he was, and that he thought it lawful to make use of other means, besides the efficacy of his doctrine, to promote what he was sent hither by the Pope about.*

["The next mission which the Cardinal makes mention of, is that of Kilianus, by Pope Conon, who converted the people of Franconia, whose chief city was Herbipolis, or Wirtzburg. Now, the account that the Centuriators give of this Kilianus, and which makes him not to have had that success in the conversion of people as is pretended, is this; namely, that being a Monk, and by nation a Scottish man, and not being able to do any good amongst his own countrymen with his preaching up of new rites and ceremonies, he passed over into Germany, to see what he could do there; and finding that at Wirtzburg, the Governor, Gosbertus, gave him but little encouragement, he being one who, as those historians relate, 'did abhor those Popish ceremonies' which Kilianus taught, he went to Rome, and got the Pope to make him Bishop of that city, hoping that, at his return thither with greater authority, he should be better received; but was soon slain by his own auditors.†

["The third instance is, the conversion of a great part of Germany, by Vinofrid, otherwise called Boniface, who seemed a little to mistrust the efficacy of his doctrine, when he thus wrote: that 'without the command and awe of the Prince of the Franks, he could not be able to hinder the Pagan rites and idol-sacrileges in Germany:'‡ and as the Centuriators tell us,§ entered the country of the Thuringi with an army, forcing them to take refuge in a fortified place; and, when upon no other terms they were willing to turn Christians but upon their being freed from paying tenths for the future to the King of Hungary, gratified them therein.

["Of the conversion of the Vandals, which he ascribes to the Monks of Corbie, hear the account that Albertus Krantsius gives. 'The Vandals,' says he, 'were a nation singularly given to the superstitious worship of their idols, till by the arms of the King of Denmark, by sea, by those of the Pomeranian on the east, and those of other Christian Princes on the south, they were forced to become Christian.'‖ As to the conversion of the Danes,¶ we are told, that Harold, being beaten by Regner, and having no other hopes, fled for help to Ludovicus, the Emperor, then at Mentz, who refused to assist him upon any other condition, than that of his turning Christian, which he and his people accordingly did. And as for the Bulgarians, Sclavonians, &c., besides that they were converted by their neighbour Greeks, as well as Italians, especially the Bulgarians, (whose disturbance from some western Missionaries Photius passionately laments,) it is not a sign that they were made so subject to the Popes of Rome, as is pretended; since, as the Centuriators tell us, when Pope Nicholas would have obliged the Sclavonians and Polonians,†† (whom Cyrillus and Methodius, who converted them, had taught to have their public service in their own tongue,) to have it in Latin, they stoutly resisted him. So that the Pope, that he might keep up his usurped authority, was forced to pre-["* Cent. vi., cap. ii., p. 37.

["† Stillingfleet, Origin. Britan., cap. i., pp. 38—45. Fol. London, 1685.
["‡ Bede, Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. 17 et 21. Fol. Cantab., 1722.
["§ Idem, lib. ii., cap. ii. Origin. Britan., cap. v., p. 357.
["‖ Bede, Hist. Eccles., lib. i., cap. 25. Fol. Cantab., 1722.
["¶ Vindication of the Answer of some late Papers, p. 72, &c.
[" Bede, Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., cap. 2. Fol. Cantab., 1722.

["* Galfridus, Monument. Hist. Brit., lib. xi., cap. 12 et 13.
["† Centur. Magdeb., cent. vii., p. 516.
["‡ Bonif. Ep. 3.
["§ Cent. viii., pp. 21, 22.
["‖ Alberti Crantzii Eccles. Hist. sive Metrop., lib. i., Procem., p. 2. Fol. Basil., 1568.
["¶ Saxo-Gram. Hist. Dan., lib. ix., p. 158. Alb. Crantzii Metrop., lib. i., cap. 19.
[" Ep. ii.
["†† Cent. ix., cap. ii., col. 18.

tend that he gave them leave to have it in their own language.

["But amongst all his instances, the Cardinal had least reason to have mentioned the conversion of the Indians and Jews. For, as for the Indians, the unheard-of cruelties which even the Popish historians relate to have been used towards them, and their gross ignorance after their conversion, are a sufficient evidence how little they were beholden for it to the doctrine which was taught them. One would wonder how it were possible for mankind to be guilty of such inhuman barbarities, as Bartolomæus Casas, who was a Bishop, and lived in India, relates the Spaniards to have committed. In abhorrence whereof, Acosta has a discourse on purpose to show the unreasonableness of making war against the barbarians upon the account of religion.* He afterwards discourses of the capacities of the Indians, asserting that they ought to have better instructors sent them; that those which they then had, had been of such little use to them, that, after the space of forty years, there were scarce any found amongst so great a number of converts, who understood two articles of the Creed,† or had any apprehension what Christ, eternal life, or the eucharist, meant.

["As for the manner of converting the Jews, I shall only make mention of one instance, which happened in the time of Heraclius, the Emperor, who wrote to Dagobert, the King of France, that 'he would command all the Jews in his dominions to turn Christians, and either to banish or slay those who would not; who accordingly did so, banishing as many as would not be baptized.'‡ Since Erasmus, who knew these matters well enough, has so freely declared, that although their conversion be a thing much to be wished for, yet that such courses were taken by some to effect it, that 'of a wicked Jew it often happened there was made a Christian much more wicked than he was before his conversion.'" §] ||

XIV. MIRACLES, as a mark of the true church.

[Bellarmine observes: "1. 'That miracles are necessary to evince any new faith, or extraordinary mission.

["2. 'That miracles are efficacious and sufficient. By the former,' he tells us, 'may be deduced that the church is not to be found amongst us Protestants; by the latter, that it is most assuredly amongst them.'

["(1.) As to the necessity of miracles he quotes Moses, St. Matthew, and St. John. (Exod. iv., Matt. x., John xv.) He further proves it by a similitude of one necessarily showing his orders received from his Diocesan, by which he is authorized to preach; and by a quotation from St. Austin, and the Concession of Melancthon, one of the Reformed persuasion; all which was needless, and the similitude too weak and inconclusive.¶

["(2.) As to the efficacy and sufficiency of miracles, he proves this, partly as they are the seals and testimonials God useth, without whose immediate power they could not be performed, and who will by no means bear witness to a lie. And therefore, where either Turks, or Pagans, Jews, heretics, or false prophets, have pretended to any extraordinary feats or accomplishment of this kind, either they have appeared the mere tricks and delusions of the devil: or else, in the attempts they have made, they have been publicly disgraced and disappointed; so the prophets of Baal, Simon Magus, several of the Donatists, Luther, and Calvin. In the application of the whole, for the proof of his Church, and the utter exclusion of ours from all title to the denomination and benefits of a church, he gives a summary of miracles in every distinct age, by which the Church of Rome, and no other, (for that is the whole drift of his argument,) hath been all along signalized as the true catholic church. In the first age, he mentions the miracles of the holy Jesus and his Apostles. In the second, those of the Christian soldiers under Antoninus the Emperor. In the third, those of Gregory Thaumaturgus. In the fourth, those of Anthony, Hilarion, and others. In the fifth, several mentioned by St. Austin, as done in his time. In the sixth, some wonders done by Popes; namely, John and Agapetus. In the seventh, miracles wrought in England by Austin the Monk and his company. In the eighth, St. Cuthbert, and St. John in England. In the ninth, those of Tharasius, and great numbers by Sebastian the martyr. In the tenth, St. Rombold, St. Dunstan, and a certain King of Poland; with others. In the eleventh, St. Edward, St. Anselm, and, to make up the number, honest Hildebrand, or Pope Gregory VII. In the twelfth, St. Malachy and St. Bernard. In the thirteenth, St. Francis and Bonaventure, St. Dominic, and others. In the fourteenth, St. Bernardinus, and Catherine of Sienna. In the fifteenth, Vincentius, St. Anthonine, and others. And, lastly, in the Cardinal's own age, Franciscus de Paula, and the Holy Xavier among the Indians." *]

Bishop Milner maintains that "the Catholic Church being always the beloved spouse of Christ, and continuing at all times to bring forth children of heroical sanctity, God fails not in this, any more than in past ages, to illustrate her and them by unquestionable miracles." †

[Charles Butler, Esq., observes, that "Roman Catholics, relying with entire confidence on the promises of Christ, believe that the power of working miracles was given by Christ to his church, and that it never has been, and never will be, withdrawn from her. Through the Prophet Joel, God announced to the Jews, that 'in the last days he would pour out his Spirit on all flesh;' that 'their sons and their daughters should prophesy;' that 'their young men should see visions, and their old men dream dreams.' (Joel ii. 29, 30.) When St. Peter cited this prophecy to the Jews, assembled at the feast of Pentecost, he declared to them, that the promise contained in it 'is to you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.' (Acts ii. 39.) Christ, in his last sermon, after exhorting St. Philip to believe in him as God, equal to his Father; and after appealing to his works, as the testimony given ["* Lib. ii., cap. ii., &c. De Ind. Salut. procur.

["† Lib. iv., cap. iii., p. 358.

["‡ Aimoin, iv., 22.

["§ Erasmi Annot. in Matt. xxiii."]

[‖ Notes of the Church examined and confuted, pp. 209—213, 227—231.]

["¶ Undecima nota est gloria miraculorum; sunt autem duo fundamenta præmittenda. Unum, quod miracula sint necessaria ad novam fidem vel extraordinariam missionem persuadendam. Alterum, quod sint efficacia et sufficientia; nam ex priore deducemus non esse apud adversarios veram Ecclesiam, ex posteriore deducemus eam esse apud nos.

["Quod igitur miracula sint necessaria, probatur primo Scripturæ testimonio, Exod. iv., cum Moses mitteretur a Deo ad populum, ac diceret: 'Non credent mihi, neque audient vocem meam.' Non respondit Deus, 'Debent credere, velint nolint,' sed dedit illi potestatem faciendi miracula, et ait: 'Ut credant, quod apparuerit tibi Dominus,' &c. Et in Novo Testamento, Matt. x., 'Euntes, prædicate, dicentes: Appropinquavit regnum cœlorum; infirmos curate, mortuos suscitate, leprosos mundate, dæmones ejicite.' Joan. xv., 'Si opera non fecissem in eis quæ nemo alius fecit, peccatum non haberent.'"—Bellarm. Opera, tom. ii.; De Notis Ecclesiæ, lib. iv., cap. xiv., col 206, D. Coloniæ, 1619.]

[* Notes of the Church examined and confuted, pp. 250—252.]

† End of Controversy, Letter xxvi., p. 172. Eighth edit., London.

by his Father to this truth, expressed himself in the following solemn terms: 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do, shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do.' (John xiv. 12.) When, just before his ascension into heaven, Christ took his last leave of his Apostles, and gave them his last blessing, he mentioned to them the signs which should follow those who believed: 'In my name,' he said, 'shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and, if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover.' (Mark xvi. 17, 18.)

["Here Roman Catholics confidently ask: 'Did not Christ promise by these words, that miracles should be wrought in his church? that they should be wrought without limitation of time? that some of these should be greater than his own?'

["To say that the promise failed, would be impiety. Somewhere, therefore, miracles must have been uninterruptedly wrought. Now, the Roman Catholic is the only Church, which, from the first propagation of Christianity until the present time, has had a visible and uninterrupted existence: uninterrupted miracles, therefore, could only have existed in the Roman Catholic Church. They could not possibly have existed in any church which separated from the See of Rome at the time of the Reformation; for, to use an expression of Bossuet, in his controversy with M. Claude, 'when the Church of the Reformers first separated from the one, the holy, the Roman Catholic Church, their Church could not, by their own confession, enter into communion with a single church in the whole world.'

["But, while the Roman Catholics assert, that it has pleased Almighty God to work in every age, from the first preaching of the Gospel to the present time, many and incontestable miracles in favour of his church and her doctrines, they admit, without qualification, that no miracles, except those which are related in the Old or the New Testament, are articles of faith; that a person may disbelieve every other miracle, and may even disbelieve the existence of the persons through whose intercession they are related to have been wrought, without ceasing to be a Roman Catholic. This is equally agreeable to religion and common sense; for all miracles, which are not recorded in holy writ, depend on human reasoning. Now, human reasoning being always fallible, all miracles depending on it rest on fallible proof; and, consequently, may be untrue. Hence the Divines of the Roman Catholic Church never impose the belief of particular miracles, either upon the body of the faithful or upon individuals; they only recommend the belief of them. They never recommend the belief of any, the credibility of which does not appear to them to be supported by evidence of the highest nature; and, while they contend that the evidence is of this description, and cannot, therefore, be rationally disbelieved, they admit that it is still no more than human testimony, and therefore liable to error. Dr. Milner rejects,* in the wholesale, the miracles related in the Golden Legend of Jacobus de Voragine; those related in the Speculum of Vincentius Belluacensis; and those related in the Saints' Lives of the Patrician Metaphrastes: no Roman Catholic gives credit to those which rest on Surius, or Mombritius. Dr. Lingard calls Osbert, the biographer of St. Dunstan, and the writer of his Life, 'an injudicious biographer, whose anile credulity collected and embellished every fable.'* Dr. Lingard, also, while he asserts that there are many miracles in the Anglo-Saxon times, which it would require no small ingenuity to disprove, and incredulity to discredit, admits that 'there are also many which must shrink from the frown of criticism; some, which may have been the effect of accident or imagination; some, that are more calculated to excite the smile than the wonder of the readers; and some, which, on whatever ground they were originally admitted, depend, at the present, on the distant testimony of writers, not remarkable for sagacity or discrimination. It was their misfortune,' says the same authority, 'that the knowledge of these writers of miracles was not equal to their piety. Of their censors, it may sometimes be said, that their piety was not equal to their knowledge.'†] ‡

The same is maintained by the greater number of the Romanist Divines, and generally received by their people; and many narratives, but few proofs, are forthcoming of the modern and present existence of miracles among them. It is thought that this is necessary for the confirmation of the faith, and a sufficient mark to distinguish the church of God. Hence they extol the miracles of their Church, commencing at the time of the Apostles, and continued to the present.

["Mere miracles," observes Dr. Resbury, "without any other considerations whatever, are not a sufficient note of any church or religion. I add this passage, 'without any other considerations whatever,' because those miracles which are recorded and embraced by the faithful, as part of the undeniable proof of Christianity, are attended with all the circumstances that are requisite to strengthen and enforce them: whereas, those miracles to which the Church of Rome pretends, in confirmation of some doctrines, in which we differ from them, are attended with none of the requisite considerations to enforce them; that is, they are produced merely to confirm some particular doctrines, which doctrines have no antecedent advantage of being plainly and expressly laid down in the holy Scriptures, nor the miracles themselves of being foretold by any prophecy.

["As for those miracles which in primitive days were wrought to confirm Christianity in general: it was the infinite goodness of Providence to make them of that nature, and to order the performance of them in that way, that there is no room left for the honest, considering mind to reject them; either as to matter of fact, to mistrust that they were never done; or as to their force and efficacy, to suspect that they do not most fully confirm that for which they were produced.

["As to matter of fact: they were done publicly, and in the view of those that were the greatest enemies; and after they were done, they were reported partly so soon, in an age when there were many then alive that could have contradicted the report if it were not well grounded; and partly with so much hazard, that the very reporting them exposed them to the rage of the enemy to the uttermost; so the falsehood of them, if it had appeared, would have brought upon them the scorn of those that had been favourably inclined. Whereas, the miracles that are more peculiarly appropriated to the Church of Rome, are never pretended to be done but amongst those of their ["* End of Controversy, Letter xxvii. Eighth edit. London.

["* Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, cap. xii., n. 6.

["† Ibid., cap. ix."]

[‡ Butler's Book of the Roman Catholic Church, Letter iii., pp. 37—39, 46—48.]

own communion, never for the conviction of any gainsayer, no one of the Reformed religion having ever once been an eye-witness to any of them. They come handed to us from a dark and fabulous age, reported of persons, who themselves hint no such thing of themselves in any of their own writings, but rather to the contrary, as may be seen afterward: and the stories they have framed gave them no hazard, excepting loss of reputation with all wise men; for it was in a time when the Monks' plenty, and ease, and freedom from all dangers, gave them a luxuriancy of thought and fancy, and the invention itself a title to the favour of great men, and perhaps to the same kind of honour to be done for them after death. So St. Bernard had the fame of miracles affixed to him by those that came after him, as he had done to St. Malachy in the same age with himself. So also St. Anthonine tells his stories of St. Vincentius, and Surius his of him.

["Besides matter of fact, wherein as to the certainty of the thing and the reasons of credibility there is so great a difference, so also is there in the force and efficacy of the one and of the other, to confirm that for which they are produced. There is a most unquestionable force in the argument taken from those miracles that were for the first proof of Christianity, but not so in the other, as we shall see anon. There are these circumstances that highly recommend the primitive miracles:—

["Those which were wrought were generally very beneficial to human nature, doing mighty offices of kindness towards those who were the subjects of them; such as, healing the sick, raising the dead, restoring the deaf, the lame, and the blind, &c.; all which bore an excellent proportion to the great design of redeeming and saving mankind. And if at any time there were any mixture of severity in the very act, such as striking some dead by a word speaking, or putting others into the immediate possession of the devil by the act of excommunication; yet was even this done either in kindness to posterity, by fixing, in the first institution of things, one or two standing pillars of salt, that might be for example and admonition to after-ages, against some practices that might otherwise in time destroy Christianity; as, in the first instance, of Ananias and Sapphira against the sin of hypocrisy; or else, to some good purposes for the persons themselves, as in the last instance, of excommunication: so in the case of the incestuous person it was adjudged by St. Paul, 'to deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.' (1 Cor. v. 5.) None of these miracles were such useless, ludicrous actions as the Romish authors have filled their histories with; such as that of St. Berinus, who, 'being full sail for France, and half his voyage over, finding he had forgot something, walks out upon the sea, and returns back dry shod.' Such, again, as St. Francis, bespeaking the ass in the kind compellation of brother, 'to stand quiet till he had done preaching, and not disturb the solemnity.' Such as St. Mochua, by his prayer and staff hindering the poor lambs from sucking their dams, when they were running toward them with full appetite. And St. Fintanus keeping the calf from the cow, that they could neither of them move toward one another. Such, in a word, as St. Finnianus and St. Ruadanus, sporting their miracles with each other, as if they had the power given them for no other end but mere trial of skill, or some pretty diversion to bystanders.

["As the primitive miracles were generally very beneficial to human nature, so the design of them was of the greatest importance and significancy imaginable; and both this design and the miracles that should confirm it, plainly laid down beforehand in the prophecies of the Old Testament. The design was, to bring in and establish entirely an excellent religion, a perfectly new dispensation of things; nay, further to abolish a former model and constitution, that had been brought in and established by the very same argument of miracles. It was not to establish any one particular doctrine, that might be either in supplement to, or direct contradiction of, what had been hitherto delivered; but to settle one perfect and entire standard, that should be the rule and measure of all that we were to believe and practise to the world's end.

["It is true, the Jewish dispensation, as it was fixed and modelled wholly at the appointment of God, by the hands of his mediator Moses, so it was also enforced by such visible powers from above that abundantly authorized the institution, and gave it that confirmation (so long as it was framed and designed to continue) that there should be no kind of miracle pretended but should then have its trial by this standard; and if any thing should be wrought with design to draw any off from their present establishment, the 'sign' or 'wonder' should, for that reason, be rejected, and the pretender to it, though he had made himself signal in performing it, immediately condemned. (Deut. xiii.) But, as things were then settled for a continuance of time only, and the change of the whole scene was determined on the appearing of the promised Messiah; so this change, and the person that should effect it, with all the mighty works he should perform, and the vast success of these miracles accordingly, were all pointed out beforehand by express prophecies, uttered under this very Mosaic dispensation: 'The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto him ye shall hearken.' (Deut. xviii. 15.) To this prophecy St. Stephen appeals in the defence he makes for himself. (Acts vii. 37.) And this is the whole indication our Saviour thinks fit to give John the Baptist, that he himself was the person that 'should come;' namely, 'The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them,' (Matt. xi. 5,) as had been prophesied before.

["Now if the Cardinal could have shown, either that a new dispensation of things was to be introduced, after what had been established by Christ and his Apostles, or that what was to be introduced should be also afresh confirmed by some new endowments of power from above, and that accordingly the Church of Rome upon just warrant had introduced, and by her miracles had authorized, this great revolution; here, indeed, had been a reasonable proposal to our faith. But, as there is no hint of this in the holy Scriptures, nor any prediction of miracles to confirm it; so if such things be now pretended in any thing of this kind, they are no warrant to us to embrace it. There is, I confess, a considerable change foretold, and there is also a prophecy as to those wonders that should be wrought for the justifying of this change; but then, this change hath no other denomination than that of apostasy, or falling away, and the wonders by which it must be justified are to be no other than 'lying wonders, and with all deceiveableness of unrighteousness in them that perish.' (2 Thess. ii. 9, 10.) And as to this change and these wonders, if those of the Roman communion think fit to challenge them to themselves, we shall not contend with them in that affair. Here, therefore, is the just foundation upon which those divine miracles, that were wrought for confirmation of Christianity, do rest; namely, that the design of them was to bring in a new dispensation of things; and that this new dispensation had been predetermined by God, and the miracles that were to confirm it, when brought in, had their testimonials beforehand by prophecy. This testimony St. Peter builds upon, as having something in it of greater certainty than the miracles themselves. The miracles he mentions, when he tells them, 'We have not followed cunningly-devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty. For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, &c. And this voice, which came from heaven, we heard when we were with him in the holy mount.' But then the Apostle adds, 'We have also a more sure word of prophecy,' &c. (2 Peter i. 16—19.)"*]

1. The working of wonders does not always prove that to be the true church where they are wrought. The magicians performed strange things in Egypt. Antichrist shall come working signs and wonders; yet this does not prove the point in question. They are called "lying wonders," not only because they are false in themselves, but because they are produced to confirm lies, and discredit the truth. Wicked men may work wonders in the name of Christ, and yet not be Christ's disciples. (Matt. vii. 22.) The miracles of Christ and of Antichrist, of true and of false Prophets, differ not only in this, that the one class was true and the other false; but especially in respect of the power and end: for the saints of God work by His power, the others by that of Satan, whom God restrains; for the magicians were not able to imitate to the full extent the miracles of Moses. Therefore Nicodemus saith to Christ, "No man can do these miracles," that is, such great works, "that thou doest, except God be with him." (John iii. 2.) Christ and his Apostles, by their miracles, sought the glory of God and the good of men, in the conversion of their souls, and in the healing of their bodies. Satan worketh to deceive men by propagating falsehoods, as Origen showeth.† Such are the greater number of Popish miracles, devised for the maintenance of idolatry and superstitious worship.

2. Miracles, unless they have true doctrine associated with them, are profitless. The following passage of Scripture confirms this:—"If there arise among you a Prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder, and the sign or the wonder come to pass, whereof he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them; thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that Prophet, or that dreamer of dreams." (Deut. xiii. 1—3.) From this passage it is clear, that we are not authorized to follow evil practices, or receive false doctrines, though attempts may be made to confirm them by real or apparent miracles.

[Bishop Douglas lays down "a few general rules, by which we may try those pretended miracles, one and all, wherever they occur, and which may set forth the grounds on which we suspect them to be false. It would be an endless and an unnecessary task to enumerate all the manifold miracles reported amongst Pagans, and amongst Papists, and to examine them one by one, critically, in order to disprove them. I shall only, by way of illustration of my rules, select a few memorable ones by which may be formed a judgment of the rest.

["Now, I think," he says, "it will be impossible for you to assign any particular instance of a pagan or Popish miracle, the accounts of which do not labour under one or other of the following defects, which, we think, warrant our disbelieving them:—

["First. We suspect miracles to be false when the accounts of them are not published to the world till long after the time when they are said to have been performed.

["Secondly. We suspect them to be false when the accounts are not published in the place where it is pretended they were performed, but are propagated only at a great distance from the supposed scene of action.

["Thirdly. Supposing the accounts to have the two foregoing qualifications, we still may suspect them to be false, if in the time when, and at the place where, they took their rise, the circumstances were such that they might be suffered to pass without examination. For if the circumstances under which miracles were appealed to be such as that we can give a probable account of their passing current without examination, we shall be warranted to conclude that this really was the case.

["Now, in illustrating the last and the most important rule laid down, it immediately occurs to us that miracles may be supposed to have been admitted without examination, First, if they coincided with the favourite opinions and superstitious prejudices of those to whom they were reported, and who, on that account, might be eager to receive them without evidence: Secondly, if they were set on foot, or at least were encouraged and supported, by those who alone had the power of detecting the fraud, and who could prevent any examination which might tend to undeceive the world.

["And when we come to try, by this test, any particular miracle of Paganism or Popery, which can be traced up to contemporary witnesses, and was published on the spot, it will be instantly observed, that it labours under one or other, or both, of the above-mentioned defects. We shall ever find the people refusing any examination of the miracle, through a blind credulity and eagerness of belief; or the promoters of it, armed with power, rendering an examination impracticable.

["The same insufficiency of evidence which destroys the credibility of pagan miracles, equally affects the credibility of such of the Popish as can be traced up to the times when they were said to be performed, and were published on the spot. For, on trying them, as I have done the former, by the test of the third rule laid down by me, we shall invariably find, that the circumstances attending them are such as must satisfy us that the evidences on which they were supported, had this most capital defect, of having never been carefully examined, as the means of removing the suspicion of fraud being practised on the credulous believers.

["What, then, hath been the nature and tendency of the miracles that have at any time been appealed to by the Papists? They were always invented to propagate the belief of certain rites, and doctrines, and practices, which had crept into the Church; to advance the reputation of some particular chapel, or image, or order of religious, or to countenance opinions either such as were contested amongst themselves, or such as the whole Church did teach and require as points of faith. To descend to particular instances would, in a great measure, be unnecessary, because the accounts which are given of these pretended miracles are, on all hands, agreed to be true.

[* Notes of the Church, examined and confuted, pp. 252—258.]
† Origen. contra Celsum, lib. i.

[" Such, then, being the nature and genius of the pretended miracles of the Church of Rome, facts coinciding with the favourite opinions, and superstitious prejudices, of those to whom they were proposed; that the reports and accounts of them should undergo any strict examination, at the time of their being published, will appear highly improbable, when we consider, what certainly has always been the case, that the persons with whom such reports have gained any credit, had been trained up from their infancy in a persuasion that miraculous powers are continued in their Church. A previous disposition of this kind, to admit miracles in general, a credulity and superstition thus ready to embrace every strange story, will naturally incline persons of this character to believe, without scrutiny, those particular miracles proposed to them, which are so framed as to be agreeable to their favourite sentiments. Nothing will be too wonderful to pass current, if it be connected with their religious opinions. This circumstance alone will reconcile all difficulties, remove all doubts, and secure from being formally detected, stories which seem industriously to have been made up of the wildest inconsistencies, and strangest improbabilities, as experiments how far the credulity of the multitude may be wrought upon with success.

[" And this leads me naturally to observe that, as the Popish miracles have always been proposed to those whose superstition and prejudices previously disposed them to believe, without examination, the credibility of these boasted wonders will become still more suspicious, if we add another circumstance,—that they have always been set on foot, at least, have always been encouraged and supported, by those who, by their influence and power, could prevent any examination which might tend to undeceive the world,—they have been the arts of the powerful few, to keep in awe the ignorant many; the forgeries of the rulers, to countenance the corruptions with which they have disgraced the church; to add a sanction to doctrines and practices visibly calculated to extend their own influence, to add to their own riches, and to give themselves an unlimited command over their fellow-Christians, though at the expense of their common Christianity.

[" This, then, being the case, it would have been next to impossible to have set about an examination of these pretences to miracles. For, were we even to allow, that those to whom they were proposed, had the best inclination in the world not to believe but upon proper evidence, the danger which must attend their giving any signs of this inclination, would deter every one in his senses from attempting a detection. He who would set himself up to oppose a fraud supported by the authority and influence of the rulers of the Church, in a country where, in matters of religion, the civil Magistrate is guided by the Priest, would soon find reason to repent of his temerity.

[" Can there, therefore, be any hesitation in refusing to admit the truth of miraculous facts backed and supported by those who alone had the means of detecting the fraud, if there were any; and who, having the sword in their own hands, would point it against themselves, to punish their own impostures?"*]

[* The Criterion: or, Rules by which the true Miracles recorded in the New Testament are distinguished from the spurious Miracles of Pagans and Papists. By John Douglas, D.D., Lord Bishop of Salisbury. Pp. 19, 20, 40—43. 8vo. London, 1816.]

Many, if not most, of the miracles of which Romanists boast, are performed to support such doctrines and practices as promote superstition; and therefore cannot claim the authority which the miracles of Christ, and of his Apostles, possess.

[" It is painful to think," says Dr. Grier, " that in the present enlightened age, a gentleman like Dr. Milner, who displays learning in almost every department of science; who possesses experience, intelligence, and taste; who writes well, and reasons acutely; should be so besotted, as not only to believe himself, but to attempt to induce others to believe, all the stupid legends of the dark ages, and the modern fabrications of the same stamp. Such fatuity would be a miracle in itself, were it not known how superstition debases the reason, when it has gained the ascendant over the mind.

[" In the letter which that Prelate has devoted to the subject of miracles, he argues, that 'if the Roman Catholic Church were not the only true church, God would not have given any attestation in its favour.'* Thus he derives a new proof from false miracles, of the Church of Rome being the only true church. For, when once a strong faith admits the reality of those miracles, it concludes at once, that as none but members of the Church of Rome can perform them, that Church must be the only true church. 'Having demonstrated the distinctive,' by which he means the exclusive, holiness of the Roman Catholic Church, he professes himself 'prepared to show, that God has borne testimony to that holiness, by the many and incontestable miracles he has wrought in her favour, from the age of the Apostles down to the present time.'† These 'incontestable miracles,' he afterwards states to be cures of a miraculous nature, performed on different persons; as if such cures could be admitted as evidence of the truth of doctrines entertained by the persons relieved; inasmuch as they are not confined to the Romish Church, but are found in communions directly opposed to each other.

[" Our blessed Lord did not confine the power of working miracles to himself, or to his own time. If he promised this power to his Apostles, he confirmed his promise in their respective persons. It is nowhere said in Scripture, that a miraculous event should not take place out of the true church; and if it be not, then it follows, that such an event cannot be regarded as a proof of the truth of any particular church. This St. Paul determines to be the case; for, when speaking of the 'mystery of iniquity,' he says, that his 'coming would be after the working of Satan with all powers and signs and lying wonders.' (2 Thess. ii. 7, 9.) In fact, Dr. Milner himself seems to be reserved in putting in too great a claim to supernatural agency in favour of the Church of Rome; when he admits that it 'never possessed miraculous powers, so as to be able to effect cures, or other supernatural events, at her mere pleasure.' When the zeal is so great as to discover a miracle in every extraordinary event, for the purpose of strengthening the feeble arguments put forward in favour of the exclusive sanctity of the Romish Church, the number of miracles said to exist cannot excite surprise; and when those only, who are interested in pronouncing such events miraculous, are present during their performance, it cannot much promote Dr. Milner's views, were all the miracles reported to have been wrought since the age of the Apostles, conceded to his Church, since the advantage to be derived from the concession is only such as any other church would disdainfully reject.

[" * Letter xxvi., p. 163, et seq. Eighth edit. See also his Letters to a Prebendary; Inquiry into certain Opinions, &c., &c.

[" † Ibid.

["He begins with what Ignatius relates about the wild beasts, which were let loose upon the martyrs, being frequently restrained by a divine power from hurting them. On this head, a single observation will suffice. This Father's words are, Ne sicut in aliis, territæ sint et non eos tetigerunt; and imply, that the fierce animals did not behave as in ordinary cases, but that, being terrified at the sight of the surrounding spectators, they refused to fight. Ignatius considered the occurrence purely accidental and natural; otherwise, he would have given the glory to God, and have besought him not to repress their fury. And as to the miracle which deterred the Apostate Julian from rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem, it must of necessity have occurred;* or the prophecy which related to it could not be fulfilled. (Dan. ix. 27.) In its exact completion, I perfectly agree with Dr. Milner, and for the very reason assigned by Gibbon himself; that if it were not verified, 'the imperial sophist would have converted the success of his undertaking into a specious' (he should have said solid) 'argument, against the faith of prophecy, and the truth of revelation.'† But I am not equally disposed to admit, that there were other as extraordinary miracles, beside the one mentioned, since the apostolic age; or if there were, that they were performed for the purpose alleged by him.

["The miracle to which he alludes, as having taken place at Tipasa in Africa, consisted in this: that those Christians, whose tongues were cut out by order of the Arian Huneric, in the fifth century, were enabled to speak as distinctly as they did before this barbarous operation was performed. It is true, as the Doctor says, that some learned Protestants, as Abbadie and Dodwell, have admitted this miracle; but he is far from correct, when he sets down Mosheim as its advocate. This correct writer states the circumstances as transmitted to him by Procopius and others; but his own opinion he thus expresses: 'Whether it is to be attributed to a supernatural and miraculous power, is a matter not so easily decided, and which admits of much dispute.'‡ His able translator, likewise, after presenting his reader with a clear and concise view of the arguments advanced for and against the miracle by Dodwell and Toll, seems to feel the same doubts, which Mosheim did, about its existence. According to him, Dodwell considered the occasion of sufficient importance to require the divine interposition; while Toll maintained, that as it was not wrought to convert infidels to Christianity, but apparently for the purpose of making proselytes from Arianism to the Athanasian faith, the divine interposition was not necessary. Between these conflicting opinions, Maclaine takes a middle course, neither denying the power of God, on the one hand, nor, on the other, admitting the necessity of its exercise. He observes, that the case of the two who remained dumb, (of whom it should be remarked, Dr. Milner makes no mention,) 'furnishes a shrewd presumption, that all did not equally undergo the same operation.' When I say, I admit the full force of this observation, I wish to be understood, not as arguing against the possibility of such a miracle having occurred; God forbid! but the probability, against which I see such strong objections to exist. But, were I to acknowledge the miracle to the fullest extent of Dr. Milner's wishes, I conceive that my admission would be more prejudicial than serviceable to his cause; since the church, in whose favour the miracle is reported to have been performed, is rather to be considered the prototype of the Church of England, than that of the Church of Rome.

["I should not omit to mention, that the sceptical Gibbon relates the accounts transmitted to us of the miracle in question by the forementioned historians, with circumstantial accuracy; but in such a way, and with such a sneer against the Christians, that Dr. Milner cannot, in the next edition of his book, consistently refer to the authorities, to which his attention has, in the present instance, been directed by this fascinating but prejudiced writer.

["There still remain two of the many remarkable instances of supernatural agency spoken of by Dr. Milner, to which I shall now advert. The one relates to St. Augustine, 'the Apostle to England,' in the sixth, and the other to St. Xavier, the Popish Missionary to the Indies, in the sixteenth, century. The question, which relates to the planting and propagation of Christianity in England before Augustine's mission into that country, and the independence of the British Church from that of Rome, is happily set at rest by the learned labours of the Bishop of St. David's, and the Rev. Dr. Hales. On this point, therefore, it is unnecessary for me to enlarge; but I would ask Dr. Milner, whether the miracle of restoring sight to the blind (which, on the authority of Bede, he alleges Augustine to have wrought) convinced the British Bishops; or, whether they did in consequence admit the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Rome. We know that they did not; and that they equally resisted the threats and promises of his Missionary.

["As to Xavier: it might have been expected that the Doctor would have been more reserved in ascribing miraculous powers to one, who lived so much nearer our own times, than to those of more distant ages; because the means of detecting imposture is more within our reach in the former, than in the latter case; and because, if it be found that recourse has been had to fabrication with respect to accounts of modern date, it sinks into disrepute those of earlier origin.

["Of Xavier's miracles, which, Dr. Milner says, 'consisted in foretelling future events, speaking unknown languages, calming tempests at sea, and raising the dead to life;'* Acosta, a contemporary writer, a Jesuit, and a Missionary also, makes no mention.† But had those singular occurrences taken place, he must have noticed them. And with respect to the gift of tongues, which is ascribed to him in a supernatural degree, it is certain that he himself deeply lamented, in one of his letters, his deficiency in this very particular! Now, where he wanted a requisite which would have been so essential to the cause of proselytism among the Pagans; it is highly improbable that his saintship should have been vested with any other. Indeed, his simple acknowledgment on this one point throws discredit on the other marvellous stories told of him. But Dr. Milner adds, that Xavier's miracles 'were verified soon after the saint's death, by virtue of a commission from John III., King of Portugal.' Here, again, the silence of Acosta about those alleged miracles meets ["* Marcellinus, a contemporary of Julian, attests the fact of fiery eruptions and other convulsions of nature taking place, when the Apostate attempted to rebuild Jerusalem.

["† Decline and Fall, vol. iv., p. 104.

["‡ Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., cent. v., part. ii., chap. v., vol. ii., p. 62, et seq. 8vo. edit. London, 1825.

["* Letter xxvi., p. 169. Eighth edit.

["† De Procuranda Indorum Salute.

him; and not only this, but the express assertion of this writer, that no miracles whatever were performed in India. And as Acosta's account was not published for nearly forty years after Xavier's death, it is evident that that space of time at least elapsed, before his miracles were thought of. This is Bishop Douglas's opinion on the subject;* and although Dr. Milner attempts to invalidate it by a reference to Acosta's work, yet the very place referred to establishes its correctness.† That writer barely says, that 'great signs were reported of Xavier by numerous and credible witnesses.' But Dr. M. goes farther; since he says, that they not only 'vie in number, splendour, and publicity with the miracles of St. Bernard,' but appear to equal those of our Saviour himself!

["I must necessarily pass over the claims to supernatural agency, put forward for St. Francis of Sales, and others, whose performances, Dr. Milner tells us, extended even to the resurrection of the dead; because they rest, at best, but on doubtful authority, and are not acknowledged by some of the most eminent writers of the Popish communion! But the miracles of recent date, with which 'God has illustrated the (Roman) Catholic Church,' are beyond all suspicion; inasmuch as those which Dr. Milner did not witness himself, have 'had the most respectable attestation' to their genuineness! Those which he specifies are the cures of Joseph Lamb, 'who conceived that the spine of his back was broken;' of Mary Wood, who had received 'a desperate wound in her hand;' and of Winifred White, whose disease was 'a curvature of the spine, which produced a hemiplegia, or palsy.' The circumstances attendant on the recovery of those persons are detailed with such laboured minuteness, and are in themselves so marvellously ridiculous, that I should dismiss the subject as beneath serious notice, were it not for the importance attached to it by Dr. Milner.

["Whether we consider a miracle to be a suspension of the laws of nature,‡ or an effect above human power to produce, in attestation of some truth,§ or an extraordinary work, in which the interposition of a supernatural power is indisputable;‖ we shall not find the cases reported by Dr. Milner as coming under any one of those definitions. In them we can perceive no alteration in the course of nature; no effect above human means to accomplish; and no evidence of a divine agency: we can trace them all to their natural causes. With respect to Joseph Lamb, whom Dr. Milner reports, from actual knowledge, to have derived relief from the application of 'a dead man's hand'¶ (that of Priest Arrowsmith) to his diseased back; what more can be said, than that his imagination had been so powerfully worked upon, and so strongly excited, as to bring him relief? To this circumstance his cure is to be attributed; there being no evidence by revelation that it was brought about through divine interposition, and, in the absence of such evidence, we cannot go beyond bare conjecture, that his cure was miraculous, were we even disposed to think it so. The power of imagination, in the cure of agues, and of the evil by the royal touch, is known to be most astonishing. The fear of becoming a prisoner to Marshal Turenne, suddenly cured an Austrian General, who was crippled from the gout;* and Young, the tourist, mentions, that the terror of falling into the sea, or of being devoured by birds of prey, changed the colour of a person's hair from black to white, within the few minutes, during which he reckoned on death as inevitable.† Here are instances, not merely of the power of the imagination, but of the violence of the passions, producing wonderful effects on the human frame. Can we, therefore, be at a loss, to what the supposed miraculous cure of Joseph Lamb is to be attributed?

["As to the cures of Mary Wood and Winifred White, which Dr. Milner sets down as miraculous, we shall find that they were produced by the regular operations of nature; and where we can do so, reason points out to us this general rule, that we should never ascribe any event to miraculous interposition.

["Of the former he says, that 'being unable to use her hand, she had recourse to God, through the intercession of St. Winifred, by prayers for nine days; that she put a piece of moss, from the saint's well, on her wounded arm, continuing recollected and praying; when, to her great surprise, the next morning she found herself perfectly cured.'‡ Of the latter he remarks, that 'her disease was a curvature of the spine; that this produced a palsy on one side, so that she could feebly crawl; and that having performed certain acts of devotion, and having bathed in the fountain, she, in one instant of time, on the 28th of June, 1805, found herself freed from all her pains and disabilities, and was enabled to carry a greater weight on the arm which was diseased, than on the other!'§

["* See Criterion of Miracles, pp. 30, 31. Dr. Buchanan tells of his having observed to the Archbishop of Goa, that 'Xavier was an eminently great man; but that what others have written for him and of him tarnished his fame, by making him the inventor of fables. To which the chief Inquisitor candidly signified his assent.'—See Christian Researches, p. 162.

["This anecdote is the more valuable, both as it records the admission of a Popish Ecclesiastic of high rank, resident on the very theatre of Xavier's ministry, and, consequently, acquainted with every act of his; and as it exhibits the hollow pretensions set up for this saint by Dr. Milner, on the score of miraculous agency.

["† 'Quod miraculorum nulla facultas sit, quæ Apostoli plurima perpetrarunt.'—De Procur., &c., lib. ii., cap. 8.

["Here Acosta denies that the Missionaries had any power; but Dr. M.'s gloss is, that 'they only had not the same facility as the Apostles.' Facultas—'facility,' secundum Milner!—See Letter xxvii., p. 181.

["‡ Locke.

["§ Bentley.

["‖ Bishop Douglas.

